Yet peace—new music floats on Æther's wings;
Say, is it Harmony herself who sings?
No! while enraptur'd Sylphs the song inspire,
'Tis POPE who sweetly wakes the silver lyre,
To melting notes, more musically clear
Than Ariel whisper'd in Belinda's ear.
Too soon he quits them for a sharper tone;
See him, though form'd to fill the epic throne
Decline the sceptre of that wide domain,
To bear a licitor's rod in satire's train,
And, shrouded in a mist of moral spleen,
Behold him close the visionary scene.

THE LIFE OF POPE.

THE life and writings of POPE, "the great Poet of Reason," and "the Prince of Rhyme," have exhausted the copiousness of Ruffhead, and received every possible illustration from the candid and well informed criticism of Spence, the elegant and classical taste of Dr. Warton, and the acute precision of Dr. Johnson.

The facts stated, in the present account, are chiefly taken from the narratives of Ruffhead, and Dr. Johnson, whose copiousness and accuracy leave little to be corrected or supplied.

Ruffhead's information was collected from original manuscripts, communicated by Warburton, and Dr. Johnson's intelligence from Spence's MS. collections, communicated by the Duke of Newcastle.

Alexander Pope was born in London, May 22, 1688. His father, Alexander Pope, was a linen-draper in the Strand, of a good family in Oxfordshire, and a distant relation of the Earl of Downe. His mother, Editha Turner, was the daughter of William Turner, Esq. of York. She had three brothers, one of whom was killed, another died in the service of Charles I. and the eldest, on the discomfiture of the royalists, going abroad, and becoming a general officer in Spain, left her what remained of the family estate, after sequestrations and forfeiture. Both parents were Papists.

About the time of the Revolution, his father quitted his trade, and retired to Binfield in Windsor Forest, worth about 20,000*l.* which he put into a chest, and spent as he wanted it; for, being a Papist, he could not purchase land, and he made a point of conscience not to lend it to the new government; so that when Pope came to the inheritance, great part of the money was expended.

He was, from his birth, of a very delicate constitution, but is said to have shown remarkable gentleness and sweetness of disposition. His voice, when he was young, was so pleasing, that he was called in fondness "the little nightingale."

He was taught to read very early by an aunt, and when he was seven or eight years old, discovered an eager desire for information and improvement. He first learned to write by copying printed books, which he executed with great neatness and accuracy; though his ordinary hand was not elegant.

At eight years old he was placed in Hampshire, under Taverner, a Romish priest, who taught him the Greek and Latin rudiments together. He met with "Ogilby's Homer," and "Sandys's Ovid," which he read with a delight that showed the bent of his genius. Ogilby's assistance he never repaid with any praise; but of Sandys he declared in his notes to the Iliad, that English poetry owed much of its beauty to his translations.

He was sent from Taverner, under whom his proficiency was considerable, to a private school at Twyford near Winchester, where he continued a year; from this school he was sent to another at Hyde Park Corner, being then about ten years of age.

In the two last schools he considered himself as having made very little progress, of which he was so sensible, that among his earliest pieces, there is a satire on his master at Twyford; yet, under those masters, he translated more than a fourth part of "Ovid's Metamorphoses."

While he was at the school at Hyde Park Corner, he was frequently carried to the play house, and was so captivated with the drama, that he turned the chief transactions of the "Iliad" into a kind of play, composed of a number of speeches from Ogilby's translation, connected with verses of his own.

He prevailed upon his school-fellows to take part in this play, and upon his master's gardener, to act the part of Ajax.

At twelve years old, he was called by his father to Binfield, and there he had for a few months the assistance of one Deane, another priest, of whom he learned only to construe a little of "Tully's Offices," which, after having translated "Ovid," he might certainly do without great advances in learning.

Hitherto, then, he must have known little more than what he learned during one year under Taverner; and from this time, till twenty, he became his own preceptor; and gained what other knowledge he had by reading the classics, especially the poets, to whom he applied with great assiduity and delight.

His primary and principal purpose was to be a poet, with which his father accidentally concurred, by proposing subjects, and obliging him to correct his performance, by many revivals, after which, when he was satisfied, he would say, "These are good rhymes."

In perusing the English poets he soon distinguished the versification of Dryden, which he considered as the model to be studied, and was impressed with such veneration for his instructor, that he persuaded a friend to conduct him to a coffee-house which Dryden frequented, and pleased himself with having seen him.

"Who does not wish that Dryden could have known the value of the homage that was paid him, and foreseen the greatness of his young admirer?"

The earliest of his productions is the Ode on Solitude, written when he was twelve, in which there is nothing remarkable.

His time was now wholly spent in reading and writing. He soon learned to read Homer in the original, as he himself records in one of his imitations of Horace.

Bred up at home, full early I begun
To read in Greek the wrath of Peleus' son.

As he read the classics, he amused himself with translating them; and at fourteen made a version of the first book of the Thebaid of Statius, which, with some revision, he afterwards published. He translated likewise the Epistle of Sappho to Phaon, and Dryope and Pomona, from Ovid, which he afterwards printed.

He was also tempted, by "Dryden's Fables," to try his skill in reviving and imitating Chaucer's January and May, and the Prologue of the Wife of Bath, which he put into modern English.

He sometimes imitated the English poets, and professed to have written about this time, the poem upon Silence, in imitation of Rochester's "Nothing." He had now formed his versification, assisted by the rich melody of Dryden; and the smoothness of his numbers surpassed his original.

When he was fifteen, having made a considerable progress in the learned languages, he went to London to learn the French and Italian, which, by diligent application, he soon acquired.

He then returned to Binfield, and delighted himself with his own poetry. He wrote a comedy, a tragedy, Alexander an epic poem in four books, with panegyrics on all the princes of Europe; and, as he confesses, "thought himself the greatest genius that ever was."

The subject of the comedy is not known, but the tragedy was founded on the legend of St. Genevieve. Most of his puerile productions were afterwards destroyed. The epic poem was burnt by the persuasion of Atterbury. Some of its extravagancies are produced in the Art of Sinking in Poetry, signed Anonymous.

About this time, it is related, that he translated Tully on Old Age; and that, besides his books of poetry and criticism, he read "Temple's Essays," and "Locke on Human Understanding."

Books were not the only means through which he acquired information. He early procured the acquaintance of men of talents and literature, and improved himself by conversation.

At sixteen, he acquired the friendship of Sir William Trumball, a statesman of sixty, who had been in the highest offices at home and abroad.

From that age, the life of Pope, as an author, may be properly computed. He now wrote his Pastorals, which were for some time handed about among poets, and critics, and at last printed in Tonson's "Miscellany," 1709, in the same volume with the "Pastorals" of Philips.

He had by this time become acquainted with Garth, Steele, Gay, Addison, Congreve, Granville, Halifax, Somers, Walsh, Wycherly, Cromwell, and other wits. He lost the friendship of Wycherly, by correcting his bad poetry, and of Cromwell, by correcting his bad taste.

Their correspondence afforded the public its first knowledge of Pope's epistolary powers; for his letters were given by Cromwell to Mrs. Thomas, and she, many years afterwards, sold them to Curll, who inserted them in a volume of his miscellanies.

Walsh was one of his first encouragers. He received an advice from him, which seems to have regulated his studies. Walsh advised him to correctness, hitherto neglected by the English poets, and therefore an untrodden path to fame.

He had now declared himself a poet, and thinking himself entitled to poetical conversation, began at seventeen to frequent Will's Coffee-house, where the wits of that time used to assemble.

Soon after the Pastorals, appeared the Essay on Criticism, which procured him, as it deserved, a very high character. It was praised by Addison, attacked by Dennis, and commented by Warburton, who has discovered in it such order and connection as was not perceived by Addison, nor, as is said, intended by the author. It has been translated into French by Hamilton, by Robotham, and by Resael. It has also been translated into Latin verse by several writers; particularly by Smart, and Dr. Kirkpatrick, the author of a poem called "The Sea-Piece," which, though it is little known, has many very fine passages.

About the same time, he wrote the Ode for St. Cecilia's Day, which he undertook at the desire of Steele.

In the "Spectator" was published the Messiah, which he first submitted to the perusal of Steele, and corrected in compliance with his criticism.

The Elegy to the Memory of an Unfortunate Lady, was probably written about the time when his Essay on Criticism was published. Who the lady was, has not been ascertained. According to Ruffhead, she was a woman of high rank and large fortune, the ward of an uncle; she was in love with a young gentleman of an inferior condition. The uncle disapproved of her attachment, and proposed another person as a match. Finding she was determined to abide by her own choice, he sent her abroad. Deprived of every opportunity of conversing or corresponding with her lover, she became desperate, and procured a sword, which she directed to her heart.

In the "Gentleman's Magazine," vol. li. p. 314, it is asserted, that the lady's name was Witbinbury; that she was in love with Pope, and would have married him; that her guardian, though she was deformed in her person, looked upon such a match as beneath her, and sent her to a convent, where she put an end to her life. How far this account is true, cannot be known. Pope certainly, from the Elegy, and the concluding lines of the Eloisa, appears to have been very deeply affected by her fate. Dr. Johnson has censured her conduct with unreasonable severity. Hasty and culpable she was undoubtedly; but it ought to be considered, that no person ever has, or can be happy against violent inclinations, with constancy to a forced partner for life. To those on whom love has made a deep impression, nothing but its object can give happiness or peace of mind; considerations, indeed, that weigh little with the family pride of parents. It is evident that an indulgence of passion may be attended with happiness, but that the disappointment of it cannot.

In 1712, he produced The Dying Christian to his Soul, in imitation of the verses of Adrian, and the fragment of Sappho, by the advice of Steele. It strongly resembles an ode of Flatman, of whom he was probably a reader, as he certainly was of Crashaw, Carew, Quarles, and Herbert.

He contributed to the Spectator, Nos. 404, 408, and 409, and some other papers.

In 1712, he published The Rape of the Lock, in its present form. It was occasioned by a frolic of gallantry, in which Lord Petre cut off a lock of Mrs. Arabella Fermor's hair. This trifling cause produced a serious quarrel between the two families. Mr. Caryl, Secretary to King James's Queen, and author of the comedy of "Sir Solomon Single," and of several translations in "Dryden's Miscellanies," solicited Pope to endeavour a reconciliation, by a ludicrous poem. The first sketch was written in less than a fortnight, and published in 1711, in two cantos, without his name. It was received so well, that he enlarged it by the addition of the machinery of the Sylphs, and extended it into five cantos. At its first appearance, Addison declared it was "merum sal," a delicious little thing, and gave him no encouragement to retouch it. This was imputed to jealousy in Addison, but contains no proof that he was actuated by any bad passion. Pope fortunately did not follow Addison's advice; his attempt was justified by success.

When the Guardian was begun, he contributed the paper concerning the little club, under the name of Dick Ditch, a letter signed Gnatbo, a description of the Gardens of Alcinous, and a very severe ironical criticism on "Philips's Pastorals," in which he pretends to praise Philips, but with great art takes the superiority to himself.

About this time, he published The Temple of Fame, written two years before; which, as Steele observes, has a thousand beauties.

In 1713, he published Windsor Forest, of which part was written at sixteen, and the latter was added afterwards. It is dedicated to Lansdowne, who was then high in reputation and influence among the Tories.

When the tragedy of "Cato" made its appearance, he introduced it by a solemn and sublime prologue; and when Dennis published his "Remarks," undertook, not indeed to vindicate, but to revenge Addison by A Narrative of the Madness of John Dennis. Addison expressed no approbation of the ridicule of Pope against Dennis, and perhaps did not think he deserved much by his officiousness.

Two other pamphlets, published about this time against Edmund Curll, a bookseller, who lived by the publication and sale of productions on which respectable men of the profession would have no interest, are ascribed to Pope, and printed in "Pope and Swift's Miscellanies." Curll was concerned in many libellous pieces, both against individuals and the state; but it cannot be denied that English literature owes him considerable obligations.

About this time, he wrote the Epistle from Eloisa to Abelard; in consequence, as Savage told Dr. Johnson, of his perusal of Prior's "Nutbrown Maid," which it not only excels, but every composition of the same kind.

He had a strong inclination to unite the Art of Painting with that of Poetry, and put himself under the tuition of Jervas, to whom, about this time, he addressed an encomiastic Epistle, with "Dryden's translation of Fresnoy."

A picture of Betterton, copied by Pope from Kneller, was in the possession of the late Earl of Mansfield, and is said to be still at Caenwood.

After Betterton's death, he published, under his name, a version into modern English, of Chaucer's prologues, and one of his tales, which were believed by Fenton to have been the performance of Pope himself.

In 1713, when he was in his twenty-fifth year, he circulated proposals for publishing his translation of the Iliad, with notes, by subscription, in 6 vols. 4to, for six guineas.

The proposals were very favourably received; and the leading men, political and literary, of both parties, were busy to recommend his undertaking, and to promote his interest; but the Tories, in general, encouraged the subscription much more than the Whigs.

To him the hands of jarring faction join,
To heap their tribute on his Homer's shrine. HAYLEY.

His contract with Lintot the bookseller was very advantageous. It was agreed that he should receive 200 l. for the copy-right of each volume, and that Lintot should supply the copies to be delivered to subscribers, or presented to friends, at his own expence.

The subscribers were five hundred and seventy-five. The copies for which subscriptions were given, were six hundred and fifty-four; but only six hundred and sixty were printed. For those copies Pope had nothing to pay; he therefore received, including the two hundred pounds a volume, five thousand three hundred and twenty pounds four shillings, without deduction.

At first he found himself embarrassed with difficulties, which retarded his progress; but practice increased his facility of versification, and in a short time he represents himself as dispatching regularly fifty lines a-day.

It is not very likely, as Dr. Johnson observes, that he overflowed with Greek; but Latin translations were always at hand, and from them he could obtain his author's sense with sufficient certainty. He had the poetical translation of Eobanus Hessus, the French Homers of La Valterie, and Dacier, and the English of Chapman, Hobbes, and Ogilby. With Chapman he had very frequent consultations; and perhaps never translated any passage till he had read his version, which, indeed, he has been sometimes suspected of using instead of the original.

Broome, in the preface to his "Poems," declares himself the commentator, "in part upon the Iliad;" and it appears from Fenton's letter, preserved in the Museum, that Broome was at first engaged in consulting Eustathius, of whose work there was then no Latin version; but that after a time, he desisted. Another Cambridge man was then employed, who soon grew weary of the work; and a third, that was recommended by Thirlby, is now discovered to have been Jortin, a man since well known to the learned world, who complained that Pope having accepted and approved his performance, never testified any curiosity to see him. Broome then offered his service a second time, and was probably accepted, as they had afterwards a closer correspondence.

Parnell contributed the Life of Homer, which Pope found so harsh, that he took great pains in correcting it; and by his own diligence, with such help as kindness or money could procure him, in somewhat more than five years, he completed the English Iliad, with notes, which is allowed to be the best version of poetry that ever was written; and its publication must, therefore, be considered as one of the great events in the annals of learning. Halifax expected the dedication of his version; but he passed over peers and statesmen to inscribe it to Congreve. While the translation was in its progress, Mr. Craggs, Secretary of State, nobly offered to procure him a pension, which he thought proper to decline.

Proud of the frank reward his talents find,
And nobly conscious of no venal mind;
With the just world his fair account he clears,
And owns no debt to princes or to peers.

HAYLEY.

The original manuscript of the Iliad, written upon envelopes of letters, and accidental fragments of paper, being obtained by Bolingbroke as a curiosity, descended from him to Mallet, and is now, by the solicitation of the late Dr. Maty, repositied in the Museum.

The first volume of the Iliad was published in 1715, and a version of the first book by Tickell, was published the same year, which Pope suspected was really written by Addison, with an intention to injure his character and interest.

In an advertisement prefixed by Tickell, he professes to have no "other view in publishing this small specimen of Homer's Iliad, than to bespeak, if possible, the favour of the public to a translation of the Odyssey, wherein he had already made some progress."

Whether that was, or was not his motive, there is no evidence that Addison caused it to be published from envy and malice, as has been asserted, to injure Pope. Addison's opposition to Pope, at that time, could do him no particular injury; for his subscription was full, and his contract with his bookseller completed; and if he had been actuated by jealousy, it is not probable he would have spoken so highly of Pope's Iliad in the "Freeholder" of May 7, 1716.

Pope, whose disposition is acknowledged to have been irritable, was hurt beyond measure at this translation; and it is probable that the character of Atticus was written in the heat of his resentment on this occasion, as he expressed the very same sentiments to Mr. Craggs, in his letter of July 15, 1715. But it does not appear, as Ruffhead asserts, that there was any open breach between Addison and Pope upon this occasion, and Pope expressly tells Craggs there was none.

Addison, therefore, unless better proof can be given, must be acquitted of this odious charge, which seems to have been founded on some misapprehension in Pope; who, however excusable he may be thought in writing the character of Atticus in the first transports of poetical indignation, cannot be justified in suppressing it till after the death of Addison, and then permitting its publication; and at length, at the distance of eighteen years, transmitting it to posterity ingrafted in his Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot.

The inferior tribe of writers endeavoured to depreciate the Iliad. Dennis attacked it with his usual bitterness and scurrility; and among others, Duckett and Burnet, who was afterwards a judge of no mean reputation, censured it in a piece called "Homerides;"

In 1715, he prevailed on his father, it is said, to sell the estate at Binfield, and purchased the lease of the house at Twickenham, so much celebrated for his residence in it. How his father could have saleable property in land, being a Papist, does not appear.

Here he planted the vines, and the quincunx, which he has celebrated in his poems; and being under the necessity of making a subterraneous passage to a garden on the other side of the road, he dignified it with the title of a grotto; the decoration of which was the favourite amusement of his declining years.

In 1717, he collected his former works into one quarto volume, to which he prefixed a preface, written with great spriteliness and elegance.

In this year his father died suddenly, in his 75th year, having passed twenty-nine years in retirement. He is not known but by the character which his son has given him in the Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot.

In 1720, he was infected with the general contagion; but on the first fall of the South Sea Stock, was cured. He sold out just in time to save himself from loss.

The next year, he published the select poems of his friend Parnell, with an elegant poetical dedication to the Earl of Oxford.

In 1721, he gave to the world his edition of Shakspeare, in 6 vols. 4to.; for which Tonson demanded a subscription of six guineas, and was successful in disposing of most of the copies. This undertaking, to which he was induced by a reward of two hundred and seventeen pounds twelve shillings, is not reckoned to have contributed much to his reputation. Dr. Johnson observes, he did many things wrong, and left many things undone.

Theobald, first in his "Shakspeare Restored," and then in a formal edition, detected his deficiencies with all the insolence of victory; from which time he became an enemy to editors, commentators, and verbal critics.

About this time, he published proposals for a translation of the Odyssey, in 5 vols. 4to. for five guineas, and was assisted by Fenton, and Broome; who, as Ruffhead relates, had already begun the work. He translated only twelve books himself, his associates the rest. The account of the several shares, subjoined at the conclusion, is now known not to be true. The first, fourth, nineteenth, and twentieth books were translated by Fenton; the second, sixth, eighth, eleventh, twelfth, sixteenth, eighteenth, and twenty-third books, by Broome; but he revised their versions. Broome wrote the notes, for which he was not over liberally rewarded. The agreement with Lintot was the same as for the Iliad, except that he was to receive but one hundred pounds for each volume.

The subscribers were five hundred and seventy-four, and the copies eight hundred and nineteen; so that his profit, when he had paid Fenton 300 l. and Broome 600 l. was still very considerable.

Spence wrote a criticism on the English Odyssey, which was esteemed impartial, judicious, and candid. Pope was pleased with it, and sought the acquaintance of the writer, who lived with him from that time in great familiarity, compiled memorials of his conversation, and obtained, by his influence, very valuable preferments in the church.

In 1723, he appeared before the Lords at the trial of Bishop Atterbury, to give an account of his domestic life, and private employment, that it might appear how little time he had left for plots. He had but few words to utter, and in those few he made several blunders.

His letters to Atterbury, both before and after his misfortune, are full of esteem, gratitude, and tenderness. He often visited him in the Tower. At their last interview, Atterbury presented him with a Bible. Whatever might be Atterbury's political principles and views, he certainly possessed a highly cultivated understanding, an elegant taste, and a feeling heart.

In 1726, Voltaire having visited England, was introduced to Pope, and wrote him a letter of consolation, on his being overturned in passing a river, in the night, in Bolingbroke's coach, with the windows closed, from which the postillion snatched him, when he was in danger of being drowned, by breaking the glass; the fragments of which cut two of his fingers, in such a manner that he lost their use.

In 1727, Swift visited England, and joined with Pope in publishing three volumes of Miscellanies. Pope contributed the Memoirs of a Parish Clerk, Stradling versus Styles, Virgilius Restauratus, the Basset Table, and the Art of Sinking in Poetry, designed as a part of the Memoirs of Martinus Scriblerus, a satire projected in conjunction with Arbuthnot and Swift, On the Abuses of Human Learning, in the manner of Cervantes.

The year following, he published the Dunciad, one of his greatest and most elaborate performances; the history of which is very minutely related by himself, in a dedication which he wrote to Lord Middlesex, in the name of Savage.

Pope appears by this narrative to have been the aggressor; for nobody can believe that the letters in the Art of Sinking in Poetry were placed at random. If his intention had been to expose to ridicule and contempt, calumniators either of himself or of others, he ought to have confined himself to such libellers. If his design was to discourage bad writers from giving their productions to the world, he should have satirized persons of that description only. Theobald, Eusden, Blackmore, Philips, De Foe, Bentley, Hill, Welsted, and Cibber, were not such writers as deserved to be ridiculed; they were not generally slanderous, and had not calumniated him in particular. There is much reason to believe that he composed the Dunciad, partly to be revenged on those who had abused him, and partly to display his own superiority. He degraded himself by bestowing on scribbling calumniators, even the notice of resentment; to display superiority was totally unnecessary, where there could be no competition.

In the subsequent editions, he thought fit to omit the name of Hill, who expostulated with him in a manner superior to all mean solicitation, and obliged him to sneak and shuffle, sometimes to deny, and sometimes to apologise. He also omitted the name of Burnet, and substituted cordial friendship in the room of pious passion, which was understood by Duckett to convey a scandalous aspersions, and added a solemn disavowal of his malignant meaning.

The Dunciad is addressed to Swift; of the notes, part were written by Arbuthnot; and an apologetical letter was prefixed by Cleland, but supposed to have been written by Pope.

In 1731, he published an Epistle to the Earl of Burlington, on Taste: in which he severely criticises the house, furniture, garden, and entertainments of Timon, who was supposed to mean the Duke of Chandos, to whom he had been obliged. He wrote an exculpatory letter to the Duke, who accepted of his excuse, without believing his professions.

The next year he lost his friend Gay; who was a most amiable man, and loved by Pope with great tenderness.

The following year deprived him of his mother, who lived to the age of ninety-three; and did not die unlamented. His filial piety, Dr. Johnson observes, was, in the highest degree, amiable, and exemplary; his parents had the happiness of living till he was at the summit of his poetical reputation, till he was at ease in his fortune, and without a rival in his fame; and found no diminution of his respect or tenderness. Whatever was his pride, to them he was obedient; and whatever was his irritability, to them he was gentle. Life has among its soothing and quiet comforts few things better to bestow than such a son.

About this time, Curll published the surreptitious copy of Letters between Pope and his Friends; which were clandestinely conveyed to him for publication, as is believed, by Pope's direction, that he might decently and defensively publish them himself. The messenger was Worssdale the painter.

From the perusal of his Letters, Mr. Allen conceived the desire of being acquainted with him. When Pope told him his purpose of asserting his property by a genuine edition, he offered to pay the cost. This, however, Pope did not accept; but, in time, with success, solicited a subscription for a quarto volume, which appeared in 1737.

In 1733, he published the first epistle of his Essay on Man, without his name, which, being favourably received, the second and third Epistles were published; and being now generally suspected of writing them, at last, in 1734, he avowed the fourth, and claimed the honour of a moral poet.

In the conclusion, it is acknowledged, that the doctrine of the Essay was received from Bolingbroke, to whom it is inscribed, who is said to have ridiculed Pope, as having advanced principles contrary to his own; and of which he did not perceive the consequences. However that may be, it is manifest that the pleasure of the taste and fancy, from the perusal of the Essay, is much greater than the information or conviction of the understanding.

The fame of the Essay on Man was very great; it was translated into French prose, and afterwards, by Resnel, into verse. The translations were read by Croufaz, a professor in Switzerland. He believed that the positions of Pope were intended to represent the whole course of things as a chain of fatality, and made remarks on the Essay, tending to establish the free agency of man.

The celebrated Warburton undertook the defence of Pope, against the imputation of fatalism in "the Republic of Letters." Warburton, in his exculpatory comment, showed very great ingenuity, but is not generally reckoned to have completely removed the objections.

From this time, Pope lived in the closest intimacy with his commentator, who had before favoured his adversaries, and amply rewarded his kindness and zeal; for he introduced him to Mr. Murray, afterwards Lord Mansfield, by whose interest he became preacher at Lincoln's Inn, and to Mr. Allen, who gave him his niece and his estate.

He was now received with attention, not only by the nobility, but by the Prince of Wales, who honoured him with his friendship, and dined at his house. It is said that Queen Caroline expressed an intention of visiting him at Twickenham, but it was never accomplished.

In 1733, he published the Epistle to Lord Batbursi, on the Use of Riches; in which he draws the celebrated character of Kyril the Man of Rags.

In 1734, he inscribed to Lord Cobham his Characters of Men, in which he endeavours to establish and exemplify his favourite theory of the Ruling Passion; but with so little skill, that in the examples by which he illustrates and confirms it, he has confounded passions, appetites, and habits.

He added, soon after, an Epistle on the Characters of Women; supposed to have been addressed to Martha Blount, to whom, during the greatest part of his life, he had been very much attached. The character of the Duchess of Marlborough, under the name of Atossa, was afterwards inserted, with no great honour to his gratitude.

Between 1730 and 1740, he published, from time to time, his Imitations of Horace, generally with his name, which modernize ancient ideas and characters, more successfully than any which had before appeared.

His Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot, was published in January 1735, about a month before the death of his friend. It is to be regretted, Dr. Johnson observes, that either honour or pleasure should have been missed by Arbuthnot; a man estimable for his learning, amiable for his life, and venerable for his piety.

Arbuthnot was a man of great comprehension, skilful in his profession, versed in the sciences, acquainted with ancient literature, and able to animate his mass of knowledge, by a bright and active imagination; a scholar, with great brilliance of wit; a wit, who in the crowd of life retained and discovered a noble ardour of religious zeal.

In this epistle, Pope vindicates himself from censures, and, with dignity rather than arrogance, enforces his own claims to kindness and respect. In the character of Sporus he ridicules Lord Hervey, who had written an invective against him. Whether he or Pope made the first attack, perhaps cannot now be easily known.

In 1738, he published two satirical dialogues, named from the year of their appearance. In the first he degraded himself, by descending to party politics. In the second he attacked several private characters, which had nearly exposed him to the resentment of the legislature.

The Memoirs of Martinus Scriblerus were published about this time, extending to the first book of a work, projected by the Scriblerus Club; the production, probably of Arbuthnot, with a few touches perhaps by Pope. Besides its general resemblance to "Don Quixote," there will be found in it particular imitations of "The History of Mr. Ouffle."

In 1740, he published a collection of Latin poems, written by Italians, in 2 vols. 12mo. including the former collection made by Atterbury, but injuriously omitting his preface.

He published likewise about this time, a revival in smoother numbers, of Donne's Satires, which was recommended to him by the Duke of Shrewsbury, and the Earl of Oxford.

In 1742, he added, at Warburton's request, another book to the Dunciad.

In the Epistle to Arbuthnot, as in the Dunciad, he had attacked Cibber with great severity. Cibber, who well knew the irritability of Pope, and confident that he could give him pain, wrote a spirited pamphlet, containing several stories, tending to make him ridiculous. The incessant and unappeasable malignity of Pope, he imputes to his ridicule of the exploded scene of the mummy and the crocodile in The Three Hours after Marriage, supposed to be the joint production of Gay, Pope, and Arbuthnot. Pope enraged, published a new edition of the Dunciad, in which he degraded Theobald, and enthroned Cibber in his stead. By transferring the same ridicule from one to another, he destroyed its efficacy. Unhappily the two heroes were of opposite characters, and Pope was unwilling to lose what he had already written; he has therefore depraved his poem, by giving to Cibber the old books, the cold pedantry, and sluggish pertinacity of Theobald. Cibber repaid the Dunciad with another pamphlet, which, though he pretended to disregard, really gave him great uneasiness.

From this time, finding his diseases more oppressive, and his vital powers gradually declining, he wrote nothing new, but satisfied himself with revising his former works, in which he received advice and assistance from Warburton, whose hints, in the warmth of gratitude, he followed with all the blindness of infatuated affection.

He laid aside his epic poem, on the ridiculous fiction of the arrival of Brutus, the Trojan, in Britain; which he had begun in blank verse. The plan is exhibited by Ruffhead; but though the MS. was before him, he has given no specimen.

In 1743, he began to consider himself as approaching to his end. He had for at least five years been afflicted with an asthma, and other disorders, which his physicians were unable to relieve. While he was yet capable of amusement and conversation, his literary friends were almost continually with him, and endeavoured to alleviate his pain. His favourite, Martha Blount, is said to have neglected him, with shameful unkindness, in the latter time of his decay. Of this, however, he does not seem to have been sensible, as he left her the greater part of his property.

In May 1744, his death was approaching; on the 6th he was all day delirious. He afterwards complained of seeing things as through a curtain. He said that his greatest inconvenience was inability to think. He received the Sacrament from a Romish priest; and expressed undoubted confidence of a future state. He died on the evening of the 30th day of May, 1744, in perfect tranquillity; having, a few days before, entered the 57th year of his age. He was buried at Twickenham, near his father and mother, where a monument has been erected to him, by his friend Warburton.

By his will, made in the end of 1743, he appointed Lord Bathurst, Lord Marchmont, Mr. Murray, and Mr. Arbuthnot, his executors, and left the care of his papers to Lord Bolingbroke; and failing him, to Lord Marchmont; and to Warburton, the property of all his works, on which he had written, or should write commentaries, except those of which the property had been sold. To his noble friends he left his pictures, and statues, with some of his favourite books; with other legacies to his other friends, and to his favourite domestics; and the residue of his fortune, to Martha Blount, for her life, and then to be divided among his relations.

The contemptuous mention made in his will of Mr. Allen, and an affected repayment of his benefactions with 150 l., brought some reproach on his memory. Martha Blount had been invited with Pope to Mr. Allen's house at Prior Park. Having occasion to go to Bristol for a few days, he left her behind him. In his absence, she signified an inclination to go to the Popish chapel at Bath, and desired of Mr. Allen the use of his chariot; but he, being at that time Mayor of the city, suggested the impropriety of having his carriage seen at the door of a place of worship, to which, as a magistrate, he was at least restrained from giving a sanction, and might be required to suppress; and therefore desired to be excused.

Mrs. Blount resented this refusal, and told Pope of it at his return; and so infected him with her rage, that they both left the house abruptly. She parted from Mr. Allen in a state of irreconcilable dislike, and refused any legacy from Pope, unless he left the world with a disavowal of obligation to him. Pope complied with her demand, and polluted his will with female resentment. Mr. Allen accepted the legacy which he gave to the hospital at Bath.

He lost the favour of Bolingbroke, by a kind of posthumous offence. He had been desired by Bolingbroke to procure the impression of a very few copies of the "Patriot King;" and he assured him that no more copies had been printed than were allowed; but after his death the printer resigned a complete edition of 1500 copies, to the right owner, which Pope had ordered him to print, and to retain in secret. Bolingbroke delivered the whole impression to the flames, and employed Mallet, another friend of Pope, to expose the breach of trust to the public, with all its aggravations. Warburton undertook not indeed to vindicate the action, but to extenuate it by an apology. To this apology an answer was written, in "A letter to the most impudent man living."

His works were published in 9 vols. 8vo. 1751, with a commentary and notes by Warburton. Another edition appeared in 5 vols. 4to. 1769, with an account of his life, and observations on his writings, by Owen Ruffhead, Esq. An edition with notes, has been lately announced by Mr. Wakefield, the learned author of the "Silva Critica" and another by Dr. Warton, the elegant author of the "Essays on the Genius and writings of Pope," in 2 vols. 8vo. 1762, and 1782: A work abounding with information, learning and just principles of taste.

The person of Pope was diminutive and misshapen. In the "Guardian," he compares himself to a spider, and is said to have been protuberant behind and before. His stature was so low, that, to bring him to a level with common tables, it was necessary to raise his seat. But his face was sweet and animated, and his eye remarkably intelligent and piercing. One side was contracted. He wore a fur doublet under a shirt of coarse linen with fine sleeves. When he rose, he was invested in boddice made of stiff canvass, being scarce able to hold himself erect till they were laced. His legs were so slender, that he enlarged their bulk with three pair of stockings, which were drawn on and off by the maid; for he was not able to dress or undress himself, and neither went to bed nor rose without help. His weakness made it very difficult for him to be clean. The feebleness of his frame made him sickly and impatient. Both these causes made him a troublesome guest in the families which he visited. He was perpetually sending the servants on frivolous errands, but took care to compensate their trouble by pecuniary rewards. He expected that every thing should give way to his ease or humour. When he wanted to sleep, he nodded in company, and once slumbered at his own table, while the Prince of Wales was talking of poetry. In familiar or convivial conversation he was not distinguished by vivacity. In his eating, he was both dainty and voracious; and when he had eaten too much, if a dram had been offered to him, he pretended to be angry, but did not forbear to drink it. It does not appear that he was addicted to wine. His impatience and irritability often led him into little quarrels, that would make him leave the houses of his friends abruptly. At Lord Oxford's he frequently met Lady Mary Wortley Montague, who knowing his peevishness, could by no entreaties be restrained from contradicting him, till their disputes were sharpened to such asperity, that one or other quitted the house. At home he was chiefly distinguished for his frugality. It is said that when he had two guests in his house, he would only set a single pint of wine on the table. He sometimes gave a splendid entertainment; and on those occasions showed taste, and magnificence. Of his fortune, which was very honourably obtained, he was proud. The great topic of his ridicule is poverty. He was accused of loving money; but his love was eagerness to gain, not solicitude to keep it. He assisted Doddsley with a hundred pounds, that he might open a shop, and contributed twenty pounds a-year to the subscription for Savage; and bestowed considerable sums on charity. He was a faithful and constant friend; and notwithstanding the little defects of his constitutional temper, was beloved by them during his life, and remembered with the most tender affection after his death. His resentment was too easily excited, and his revenge carried to too great a length. The provocation he received by no means justified, in many cases, the severe satire of the Dunciad. His malignity to Philips, whom he had at first made ridiculous, and then hated for being angry, continued too long. Of his vain desire to make Bentley contemptible, no good reason can be given. He was sometimes wanton in his attacks, before Chandos, Lady Mary Wortley Montague, and Hill, mean in his retreat. Though, on the whole, a man of integrity, he frequently used artifices that bordered on dissimulation. Those, however, seem to have resulted more from the idea of superiority, than of imposing upon others. Even that gratification was a weakness in the character of Pope. Artifice and cunning require very little ability. A man of such exalted superiority, and so little moderation, would naturally have all his delinquencies observed; those who could not deny that he was excellent, would rejoice to find that he was not perfect.

Of his intellectual character, the constituent and fundamental principle was good sense, a prompt and intuitive perception of consonance and propriety. He had likewise genius; a mind active, ambitious, and adventurous, always investigating, always aspiring. He was endowed with a fertile invention, and brilliant wit. To assist these powers, he had great strength and exactness of memory, which readily supplied the understanding with abundance of materials. Those gifts he improved by indefatigable industry, and acquired a great compass of knowledge, completely digested.

Thus endowed with the means of acquisition, he superadded the most effectual and agreeable modes of communication. His language is clear, forcible and elegant, enriched with figures, that at once illustrate, adorn, and impress. He considered poetry as the business of his life, and however he might seem to lament his occupation, he followed it with constancy; to make verses was his first labour, and to mend them was his last. He used always the same fabric of verse. Of this uniformity the certain consequence was readiness and dexterity. By perpetual practice, language had in his mind a systematical arrangement; having always the same use for words, he had words so selected and combined as to be ready at his call.

On the general character and effect of his poems, it is the less necessary to enlarge, as little remains to be added to the distinct examination of his excellent biographer, Dr. Johnson, and the masterly criticism of Dr. Warton.

In his Pastorals, Dr. Warton observes, there is not to be found a single instance of a rural image that is new. The ideas of Theocritus, Virgil, and Spenser, are indeed exhibited in language equally mellifluous and pure, but the descriptions and sentiments are trite, and common. A mixture of British and Grecian ideas may justly be deemed a blemish. An Englishman speaks of "celestial Venus, and Idalia's Groves, of Diana and Cynthius." They exhibit, however, a series of versification, which had in English poetry no precedent, nor has since had an imitation.

The design of Windfor Forest is evidently derived from Denham's "Cooper's Hill," with some attention to Waller's poem on "The Park;" but Pope cannot be denied to excel his masters in variety, and elegance, and the art of interchanging description, narrative, and morality.

Of the Temple of Fame, every part is splendid; there is great luxuriance of ornaments. The original vision of Chaucer is much improved; the imagery is properly selected, and learnedly displayed; yet, with all this comprehension of excellence, it never obtained much notice, and is seldom quoted or mentioned, with either praise or blame.

That the Messiah excells the "Pollio" of Virgil, is no great praise, if it is considered from what sublime original the improvements are derived. Sometimes indeed the simple grandeur of Isaiab is diminished by florid epithets, and injudicious prettinesses.

The Elegy on an Unfortunate Lady, as it came from the heart, is very tender and pathetic; nor has Pope produced any poem in which the sense predominates more over the diction.

Of the Ode for St. Cecilia's Day, it is sufficient praise, that it is only inferior to the inimitable "Alexander's Feast" of Dryden. The general effect is very pleasing, and often striking.

Of the Essay on Criticism, Dr. Johnson observes, that if he had written nothing else, it would have placed him among the first critics and the first poets, as it exhibits every mode of excellence that can embellish or dignify didactic composition, selection of matter, novelty of arrangement, justness of precept, splendour of illustration, and propriety of digression.

The Rape of the Lock is universally allowed to be the most attractive of all ludicrous compositions. The means employed are, vigorous thought, brilliant fancy, poignant wit, forcible satire, and refined humour, most agreeably interwoven and diversified. The machinery is an ingenious expansion of that in Shakspeare's "Tempest," and the Rosicrucian dialogue of the Comte de Gabalis.

The epistle of Eloisa to Abelard is replete with poetical fire, passionate language, picturesque imagery, and pathetic exclamation, which strike the imagination with a captivating horror.

"Clouds interpose, waves roar, and winds arise."

It has certainly a charm hardly to be equalled; for who can read it without experiencing the alternate impulse of desire, pity, or rage; and lastly, the freezing languor of irrecoverable despair.

"This epistle," says Dr. Warton, "is one of the most highly finished, and certainly the most interesting of the pieces of Pope; and, together with the Elegy on an Unfortunate Lady, is the only instance of the pathetic he has given us."

The translation of Homer is a performance which no age or nation can pretend to equal. Such a version, the most perfect knowledge of the Greek and English languages could not have produced. It is not the work of a scholar or versifier merely; it is the performance of a poet. The diction and versification must vindicate to themselves a very considerable share of the merit of this masterly work. "Pope searched the pages of Dryden," says Dr. Johnson, "for happy combinations of poetic diction; but it will not be denied that he added much to what he found. He cultivated the language with so much diligence and art, that he has left in his Homer a treasure of poetical elegances to posterity. His version may be said to have tuned the English tongue; for since its appearance, no writer, however deficient in other powers, has wanted melody. Such a series of lines, so elaborately corrected, and so sweetly modulated, took possession of the public ear; the vulgar was enamoured of the poem, and the learned wondered at the translation."

It has been objected by some, that it is not Homeric; that it exhibits no resemblance of the original and characteristic manner of the Father of Poetry, as it wants his awful simplicity, his artless grandeur, his unaffected majesty. This cannot be totally denied. Homer doubtless owes to his translator many Ovidian graces, not strictly suitable to his character; but to have added can be no great crime, if nothing be taken away. Elegance is surely to be desired, if it be not gained at the expence of dignity. Pope wrote for his own age and his own nation; he knew that it was necessary to colour the images, and paint the sentiments of his author; he therefore made him graceful, but lost some of his sublimity.

As a work of wit and ingenious satire, the Dunciad has few equals. The hint is confessedly taken from Dryden's "Mac Flecknoe;" but the plan is so enlarged and diversified, as justly to claim the praise of an original, and affords, perhaps, the best specimen that has yet appeared of personal satire, ludicrously pompous. Without approving of the petulance and malignity of the design, the vigour of intellect, and the fertility of fancy which it displays, are equally admirable.

"The beauties of this poem," says Dr. Johnson, "are well known; its chief fault is the grossness of its images. But even this fault, offensive as it is, may be forgiven for the excellence of other passages; such as the formation and dissolution of Moore, the account of the Traveller, the misfortune of the Florist, and the crowded thoughts and stately numbers which dignify the concluding paragraph."

The Essay on Man, is a didactic poem written on metaphysical ideas, which he did not perfectly comprehend. His intentions were evidently good, to show men that the existence of imperfection and evil is not inconsistent with the wisdom and goodness of God. Many of the facts are true, many of the observations are just, but do not tend to establish the truth of the proposed system. The adaptation of human senses, passions, and reason, to their ends, the co-operation of the principles of self-love and benevolence, in producing happiness, the uncertainty of physical good, that man's supreme felicity consists in moral good, that we are very weak in comparison to our Creator, are all positions which are undoubtedly true, but do not prove that partial evil is universal good; that whatever is, is right. Pope, like Addison, had considered man chiefly in active life. When he exhibits him in action, his exhibition is natural, beautiful, and just; but when he analyses his principles of thought, and of action, he is not always so successful. Voltaire ridiculed Pope's favourite position in his Candide. The consequences which Candide's application of the principle to various cases produces, are certainly such as Pope never intended, yet it must be acknowledged he did not sufficiently guard against his interpretation.

"This essay," says Dr. Johnson, "is certainly not the happiest of Pope's performances. It affords an egregious instance of the predominance of genius, the dazzling splendour of imagery, and the seductive powers of eloquence. Never were penury of knowledge, and vulgarity of sentiment so happily disguised, or recommended by such a blaze of embellishments, or such sweetness of melody. The vigorous contraction of some thoughts, the luxuriant amplification of others, the incidental illustrations, and sometimes the dignity, sometimes the softness of the verses, enchain philosophy, suspend criticism, and oppress judgment, by overpowering pleasure."

"This is true of many paragraphs; yet if I had undertaken to exemplify Pope's felicity of composition before a rigid critic, I should not select the Essay on Man: for it contains more lines unsuccessfully laboured, more harshness of diction, more thoughts imperfectly expressed, more levity without elegance, and more heaviness without strength, than will easily be found in all his other works."

The Characters of Men and Women, are the product of diligent speculation upon life and manners, and show a thorough knowledge of the human mind, engaged in action, and modified by the manners of the times.

"I recommend," says Dr. Johnson, "a comparison of his Characters of Women, with Boileau's satire; it will then be seen with how much more perspicacity female nature is investigated, and female excellence selected. The Characters of Men, however, are written with more, if not with deeper thought, and exhibit many passages exquisitely beautiful. The Gem, and the Flower, will not easily be equalled. In the women's part are some defects; the character of Atossa, is not so neatly finished as that of Clodio; and some of the female characters may be found, perhaps, more frequently among men."

Of his Epistle to Lord Batburst, the most valuable passage is, perhaps, the eulogy on Good Sense; and of the Epistle to Lord Burlington, the end of Villiers, Duke of Buckingham. Of the Epistle to Arbuthnot, no part has more elegance, spirit, or dignity, than the vindication of his own character. The meanest passage is the satire upon Sporus. The allusion to his mother is exquisitely beautiful and interesting. His translations from Ovid are rendered with faithfulness and elegance. The epistle from Sappho to Phaon breathe such passionate and pathetic sentiments as are worthy of the exquisite sensibility of the amorous Sappho; and the versification is in point of melody next to that of the Pastorals.

On his Epitaphs, the minute criticism of Dr. Johnson, printed in the "Visitor," is acute, and well enforced; but his examination is too rigorous, and the general opinion is much more favourable.

His Imitations of Horace, display a great portion of wit, as well as argument. He has the humour, and almost the ease of Horace, with more wit, and falls little short of the severity of Juvenal. In his Letters he is seen as connected with the other contemporary wits, and suffers no disgrace in the comparison. Those of Arbuthnot are written with ease and a beautiful simplicity. Swift's also are unaffected. Several of Bolingbroke's and Atterbury's are masterly. There is something more studied and artificial in Pope's productions than the rest. His letters to ladies are full of affectation.

"Pope may be said," says Dr. Johnson, "to write always with his reputation in his head; Swift perhaps like a man who remembered that he was writing to Pope; but Arbuthnot, like one who lets thoughts drop from his pen, as they rise into his mind."

The compositions of Pope are perhaps a greater accession to English literature, than those of any other poet of our nation, except Spenser, Shakspeare, and Milton. Of those poets who rank in the highest class after them, Dryden is generally allowed to be the first; but his claim to that distinction is at least rendered doubtful by the pretensions of Pope, who learned his poetry from Dryden, and whose character perhaps may receive some illustration, if he be compared with his master.

To regulate the scale, by which the comparative merit of poetical pretensions is to be estimated, is one of the most difficult undertakings of criticism. Something of this kind, however, is attempted by Dr. Johnson in his parallel between Dryden and Pope, of which it is scarcely hyperbolical to affirm, that it is every way worthy of its subject, and such as perhaps the pen of Dr. Johnson only could have written.

"Integrity of understanding, and nicety of discernment, were not allotted in a less proportion to Dryden than to Pope. The rectitude of Dryden's mind was sufficiently shown by the dismissal of his poetical prejudices, and the rejection of unnatural thoughts, and rugged numbers. But Dryden never desired to apply all the judgment that he had. He wrote, and professed to write, merely for the people; and when he pleased others, he contented himself. Pope was not content to satisfy; he desired to excel; and therefore always endeavoured to do his best. He did not court the candour, but dared the judgment of his reader; and expecting no indulgence from others, he showed none to himself. For this reason, he kept his pieces very long in his hands, while he considered, and reconsidered them. It will seldom be found that he altered, without adding clearness, elegance and vigour. Pope had perhaps the judgment of Dryden, but Dryden certainly wanted the diligence of Pope.

"In acquired knowledge, the superiority must be allowed to Dryden, whose education was more scholastic. His mind has a larger range, and he collects his images and illustrations from a more extensive circumference of science. Dryden knew more of man in his general nature, and Pope in his local manners. The notions of Dryden were formed by a comprehensive speculation, and those of Pope by minute attention. There is more dignity in the knowledge of Dryden, and more certainty in that of Pope.

"Poetry was not the sole praise of either, for both excelled likewise in prose; but Pope did not borrow his prose from his predecessors. The style of Dryden is capricious and varied; that of Pope is cautious and uniform. Dryden observes the motions of his own mind; Pope constrains his mind to his own rules of composition. Dryden is sometimes vehement and rapid; Pope is always smooth, uniform, and gentle. Dryden's page is a natural field, rising into inequalities, and diversified by the varied exuberance of abundant vegetation; Pope's is a velvet lawn, shaven by the scythe, and levelled by the roller.

"Of genius, that power which constitutes a poet, that quality without which judgment is cold, and knowledge is inert; that energy which collects, combines, amplifies, and animates, the superiority must, with some hesitation, be allowed to Dryden. It is not to be inferred, that of this poetical vigour Pope had only a little, because Dryden had more, for every other writer since Milton must give place to Pope; and even of Dryden it must be said, that if he has brighter paragraphs, he has not better poems. Dryden's performances were always hasty, either excited by some external occasion, or extorted by some domestic necessity; he composed without consideration and published without correction. What his mind could supply at call, or gather in one excursion, was all that he sought, and all that he gave. The dilatory caution of Pope enabled him to condense his sentiments, to multiply his images, and to accumulate all that study might produce, or chance might supply. If the flights of Dryden therefore are higher, Pope continues longer on the wing. If of Dryden's fire the blaze is brighter, of Pope's the heat is more regular and constant. Dryden often surpasses expectation, and Pope never falls below it; Dryden is read with frequent astonishment, and Pope with perpetual delight."

The subject of this truly excellent parallel has been controverted by Mr. Weston and Miss Seward, in the "Gentleman's Magazine" for 1790. Both parties have shown much critical ingenuity in maintaining the pretensions of their favourite poet. To give any adequate idea of the controversy, would much exceed the limits of this preface. Mr. Weston, with justice, censures the poetry of Pope, as too exquisitely polished, too uniformly musical, and as glutting the ear with unvaried sweetness. Judging perhaps by principles, rather than perception, he seems to think studied discords, varied pauses, triplets, expletives, and Alexandrines, essential to rhyme, because they have been used by Dryden. But the poetry of Pope, though perhaps less impregnated with enthusiasm, less enriched with classical knowledge, less illumined by vivid imagination, and less diversified by variety of cadence, is certainly more elaborately correct, more regularly harmonious, more delicately polished, and more systematically dignified, than that of Dryden.

He has even ventured to assert, that Pope was not a poet, but only an elegant versifier. When he affirms that the author of the Rape of the Lock, of the Dunciad, of Eloisa to Abelard, and of the English Iliad, was not a poet, he must mean something by the term different from the general acceptance.

"If Pope be not a poet," says Dr. Johnson, "where is poetry to be found? To circumscribe poetry by a definition, will only show the narrowness of the definer, though a definition which shall exclude Pope, will not easily be made. Let us look round upon the present time, and back upon the past; let us inquire to whom the voice of mankind has decreed the wreath of poetry; let their productions be examined, and their claims stated, and the pretensions of Pope will no more be disputed. Had he given the world only his version, the name of poet must have been allowed him; if the writer of the Iliad were to class his successors, he would assign a very high place to his translator, without requiring any other evidence of genius."

A parallel, upon a more extensive scale, is given by Dr. Warton, in which the poetical qualifications of Pope are as candidly examined, as they are judiciously discriminated.

"Of Pope's works, the largest portion is of the didactic, moral, and satyric kind; and consequently not of the most poetic species of poetry: whence it is manifest, that good sense and judgment were his characteristic excellencies, rather than fancy and invention; not that the author of the Rape of the Lock and Eloisa can be thought to want imagination, but because his imagination was not his predominant talent; because he indulged it not, and because he gave not so many proofs of this talent as of the other. This turn of mind led him to admire French models; he studied Boileau attentively, formed himself upon him, as Milton formed himself upon the Grecian and Italian sons of fancy. He gradually became one of the most correct, even, and exact poets that ever wrote, polishing his pieces with a care and assiduity that no business or avocation ever interrupted; so that if he does not frequently ravish and transport his reader, yet he does not disgust him with unexpected inequalities and absurd improprieties. Whatever poetical enthusiasm he actually possessed, he withheld and stifled. The perusal of him affects not our minds with such strong emotions as we feel from Homer and Milton; so that no man of a true poetical spirit is master of himself while he reads them. Hence he is a writer fit for universal perusal, adapted to all ages and stations, for the old and for the young, the man of business and the scholar. He who would think "Palamon and Arcite," "The Tempest," or "Comus," childish and romantic, might relish Pope. Surely it is no narrow and niggardly encomium to say, that he is the great poet of reason, the first of ethical authors in verse.

Where then shall we, with justice, be authorised to place our admired Pope? Not assuredly in the same rank with Spenser, Shakspeare, and Milton; however justly we may applaud the Eloisa and Rape of the Lock; but, considering the correctness, elegance, and utility of his works, the weight of sentiment, and the knowledge of man they contain, we may venture to assign him a place next to Milton, and just above Dryden. Yet, to bring our minds steadily to make this decision, we must forget for a moment the divine "Music Ode" of Dryden, and may perhaps then be compelled to confess, that though Dryden be the greater genius, yet Pope is the better artist.

"The preference here given to Pope above other Modern English Poets, it must be remembered, is founded on the excellencies of his works in general, and taken all together; for there are parts and passages in other modern authors, in Young and in Thomson for instance, equal to any of Pope; and he has written nothing in a strain so truly sublime as the "Bard of Gray."

WORKS OF POPE.

EXTRACT FROM DR. WARBURTON'S ADVERTISEMENT

To the Ottawa Edition of Mr. POPE's Works, 1751.

MR. POPE, in his last illness, amused himself, amidst the care of his higher concerns, in preparing a corrected and complete edition of his writings; and, with his usual delicacy, was even solicitous to prevent any share of the offence they might occasion, from falling on the friend whom he had engaged to give them to the public.

In discharge of this trust, the public has here a complete edition of his works, executed in such a manner, as, I am persuaded, would have been to his satisfaction.

But it may be proper to be a little more particular concerning the superiority of this edition above all the preceding; so far as Mr. Pope himself was concerned. What the editor hath done, the reader must collect for himself.

The first volume, and the original poems in the second, are here printed from a copy corrected throughout by the author himself, even to the very preface; which, with several additional notes in his own hand, he delivered to the editor a little before his death. The Juvenile Translations, in the other part of the second volume, it was never his intention to bring into this edition of his works, on account of the levity of some, the freedom of others, and the little importance of any: but these being the property of other men, the editor had it not in his power to follow the author's intention.

The third volume, all but the Essay on Man (which, together with the Essay on Criticism, the author, a little before his death, had corrected and published in quarto, as a specimen of his projected edition), was printed by him in his last illness (but never published) in the manner it is now given. The disposition of the Epistle on the Characters of Men is quite altered; that on the Characters of Women, much enlarged; and the Epistles on Riches and Taste, corrected and improved. To these advantages of the third volume, must be added a great number of fine Verses, taken from the author's manuscript copies of these poems, communicated by him for this purpose to the editor. These, when he first published the poems to which they belong, he thought proper, for various reasons, to omit. Some from the manuscript copy of the Essay on Man, which tended to discredit fate, and to recommend the moral government of God, had, by the editor's advice, been restored to their places in the last edition of that poem. The rest, together with others of the like sort, from his manuscript copy of the other Ethic Epistles, are here inserted at the bottom of the page, under the title of Variations.

The fourth volume contains the Satires, with their prologue, the epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot, and epilogue, the two poems, intitled M DCC XXXVIII. The prologue and epilogue are here given with the like advantages as the Ethic Epistles in the foregoing volume; that is to say, with the variations, or additional verses, from the author's manuscripts. The epilogue to the satires is likewise enriched with many and large notes, now first printed from the author's own manuscript.

The fifth volume contains a correcter and completer edition of the Dunciad than hath been hitherto published; of which, at present, I have only this farther to add, that it was at my request he laid the plan of a fourth book. I often told him, it was a pity so fine a poem should remain disgraced by the meanness of its subject, the most insignificant of all dunces, bad rhymers, and malevolent cavillers; that he ought to raise and enoble it, by pointing his satire against the most pernicious of all, minute philosophers and freethinkers. I imagined too, it was for the interest of religion, to have it known that so great a genius had a due abhorrence of these pests of virtue and society. He came readily into my opinion; but, at the same time, told me it would create him many enemies: he was not mistaken; for though the terror of his pen kept them for some time in respect, yet on his death they rose with unrestrained fury, in numerous coffee-house tales, and Grub-street libels. The plan of this admirable satire was artfully contrived to shew, that the follies and defects of a fashionable education naturally led to, and necessarily ended in, freethinking; with design to point out the only remedy adequate to so fatal an evil. It was to advance the same ends of virtue and religion, that the editor prevailed on him to alter every thing in his moral writings that might be suspected of having the least glance towards fate, or naturalism; and to add what was proper to convince the world, that he was warmly on the side of moral government, and a revealed will: and it would be injustice to his memory, not to declare that he embraced these occasions with the most unfeigned pleasure.

The sixth volume consists of Mr. Pope's Miscellaneous Pieces, in verse and prose†. Among the verse several fine poems make now their first appearance in his works: and of the prose, all that is good, and nothing but what is exquisitely so, will be found in this edition.

The seventh, eighth, and ninth volumes, consist entirely of his Letters; the more valuable, as they are the only true models which we, or perhaps any of our neighbours have, of familiar epistles. This collection is now made more complete by the addition of several new pieces. Yet excepting a short explanatory letter to Col. M. and the letters to Mr. A. and Mr. W. (the latter of which are given to shew the editor's inducements, and the engagements he was under, to intend the care of this edition). excepting these, I say, the rest are all published from the author's own printed, though not published, copies, delivered to the editor.

On the whole, the advantages of this edition, above the preceding, are these: That it is the first complete collection which has ever been made of his original writings; that all his principal poems, of early or later date, are here given to the public with his last corrections and improvements; that a great number of his verses are here first printed from the manuscript copies of his principal poems of later date; that many new notes of the author's are here added to his poems; and, lastly, that several pieces, both in prose and verse, make now their first appearance before the public.

RECOMMENDATORY POEMS.

TO MR. POPE,

ON HIS PASTORALS.

IN those more dull, as more censorious days,
When few dare give, and fewer merit praise,
A muse sincere, that never flattery knew,
Pays what to friendship and desert is due.
Young, yet judicious; in your verse are found,
Art strengthening nature, sense improv'd by sound.
Unlike those wits, whose numbers glide along
So smooth, no thought e'er interrupts the song:
Laboriously enervate they appear,
And write not to the head, but to the ear:
Our minds unmov'd and unconcern'd they lull,
And are at best most musically dull:
So purling streams with even murmurs creep,
And hush the heavy hearers into sleep.
As smoothest speech is most deceitful sound,
The smoothest numbers oft are empty sound.
But wit and judgment join at once in you,
Sprightly as youth, as age consummate too:
Your strains are regularly bold, and please
With unforc'd care, and unaffected ease,
With proper thoughts, and lively images;
Such as by nature to the ancients shewn,
Fancy improves, and judgment makes your own:
For great men's fashions to be follow'd are,
Although disgraceful 'tis their clothes to wear.
Some, in a polish'd style, write pastoral:
Arcadia speaks the language of the Mall.
Like some fair shepherdess, the Sylvan muse
Should wear those flowers her native fields produce;
And the true measure of the shepherd's wit
Should, like his garb, be for the country fit:
Yet must his pure and unaffected thought
More nicely than the common swain's be wrought;
So, with becoming art, the players dress
In ficks the shepherd, and the shepherdess;
Yet still unchang'd the form and mode remain,
Shap'd like the homely russet of the swain.
Your rural muse appears to justify
The long-lost graces of simplicity:
So rural beauties captivate our sense
With virgin charms, and native excellence:
Yet long her modesty those charms conceal'd,
Till by men's envy to the world reveal'd;

For wits industrious to their trouble seem,
And needs will envy what they must esteem.

Live, and enjoy their spite! nor mourn that fate,
Which would, if Virgil liv'd, on Virgil wait;
Whose muse did once, like thine, in plains delight;
Thine shall, like his, soon take a higher flight:
So larks, which first from lowly fields arise,
Mount by degrees, and reach at last the skies.

W. WYCHERLEY.

TO MR. POPE,

ON HIS WINDSOR-FOREST.

HAIL! sacred bard! a muse unknown before
Salutes thee from the bleak Atlantic shore.
To our dark world thy shining page is shewn,
And Windsor's gay retreat becomes our own.
The eastern pomp had just bespoke our care,
And India pour'd her gaudy treasures here:
A various spoil adorn'd our naked land,
The pride of Persia glitter'd on our strand,
And China's earth was cast on common sand:
Toss'd up and down the glossy fragments lay,
And dress'd the rocky shelves, and pav'd the painted bay.

Thy treasures next arriv'd: and now we boast
A nobler cargo on our barren coast:
From thy luxuriant forest we receive
More lasting glories than the east can give.

Where'er we dip in thy delightful page,
What pompous scenes our busy thoughts engage!
The pompous scenes in all their pride appear,
Fresh in the page, as in the grove they were:
Nor half so true the fair Lodona shews
The sylvan state that on her border grows,
While she the wond'ring shepherd entertains
With a new Windsor in her watery plains;
The juster lays the lucid wave surpass,
The living scene is in the muse's glass.
Nor sweeter notes the echoing forests cheer,
When Philomela sits and warbles there,
Than when you sing the greens and opening glades,
And give us harmony as well as shades:
A Titian's hand might draw the grove; but you
Can paint the grove, and add the music too.

RECOMMENDATORY POEMS.

With vast variety thy pages shine;
A new creation starts in every line.
How sudden trees rise to the reader's sight,
And make a doubtful scene of shade and light,
And give at once the day, at once the night!
And here again what sweet confusion reigns,
In dreary deserts mix'd with painted plains!
And see! the deserts cast a pleasing gloom,
And shrubby heaths rejoice in purple bloom;
Whilst fruitful crops rise by their barren side,
And bearded groves display their annual pride.
Happy the man, who strings his tuneful lyre
Where woods, and brooks, and breathing fields inspire!

Thrice happy you! and worthy best to dwell
Amidst the rural joys you sing so well.
I in a cold, and in a barren clime,
Cold as my thought, and barren to my rhyme,
Here on the western beach attempt to chime,
O joyless flood! O rough tempestuous main!
Border'd with weeds, and solitudes obscene!

Snatch me, ye gods, from these Atlantic shores,
And shelter me in Windsor's fragrant bowers;
Or to my much-lov'd Isis' walk convey,
And on her flowery banks for ever lay.
Thence let me view the venerable scene,
The awful dome, the groves eternal green,
Where sacred Hough long found his fam'd retreat,
And brought the muses to the sylvan seat;
Reform'd the wits, unlock'd the classic store,
And made that music which was noise before.
There, with illustrious bards, I spent my days,
Not free from censure, nor unknown to praise:
Enjoy'd the blessings that his reign bestow'd,
Nor envy'd Windsor in the soft abode.
The golden minutes smoothly danc'd away,
And tuneful bards beguil'd the tedious day:
They sung, nor sung in vain, with numbers fir'd,
That Maro taught, or Addison inspir'd.
Ev'n I essay'd to touch the trembling string:
Who could hear them, and not attempt to sing?

Rous'd from these dreams by thy commanding strain,
I rise and wander through the field or plain;
Led by thy muse, from sport to sport I run,
Mark the stretch'd line, or hear the thundering gun.
Ah! how I melt with pity, when I spy
On the cold earth the fluttering pheasant lie!
His gaudy robes in dazzling lines appear,
And every feather shines and varies there.

Nor can I pass the generous courser by;
But while the prancing steed allures my eye,
He starts, he's gone! and now I see him fly
O'er hills and dales; and now I lose the course,
Nor can the rapid flight pursue the flying horse.
Oh, could thy Virgil from his orb look down,
He'd view a courser that might match his own!
Fir'd with the sport, and eager for the chace,
Lodona's murmurs stop me in the race.
Who can refuse Lodona's melting tale?
The soft complaint shall over time prevail;
The tale be told when shades forsake her shore,
The nymph be sung when she can flow no more.

Nor shall the song, old Thames! forbear to shine,
At once the subject and the song divine.

Peace, sung by thee, shall please ev'n Britons more
Than all their shouts for victory before.
Oh! could Britannia imitate thy stream,
The world should tremble at her awful name;
From various springs divided waters glide,
In different colours roll a different tide,
Murmur along their crooked banks a while,
At once they murmur and enrich the isle;
A while distinct through many channels run,
But meet at last, and sweetly flow in one;
There joy to lose their long-distinguish'd names,
And make one glorious and immortal Thames.

FR. KNAP.

TO MR. POPE,

By the Right Honourable

ANNE COUNTESS OF WINCHELSEA.

THE muse, of every heavenly gift allow'd
To be the chief, is public, though not proud.
Widely extensive is the poet's aim,
And in each verse he draws a bill on fame.
For none have wit (whatever they pretend)
Singly to raise a patron or a friend;
But whatso'er the theme or object be,
Some commendations to themselves foresee.
Then let us find, in your foregoing page,
The celebrating poems of the age;
Nor by injurious scruples think it fit,
To hide their judgments who applaud your wit:
But let their pens to yours the heralds prove,
Who strive for you, as Greece for Homer strove;
Whilst he who best your poetry asserts,
Asserts his own, by sympathy of parts.
Me panegyric verse does not inspire,
Who never well can praise what I admire,
Nor in those lofty trials dare appear,
But gently drop this counsel in your ear:
Go on, to gain applauses by desert;
Inform the head, whilst you dissolve the heart;
Inflame the soldier with harmonious rage,
Elate the young, and gravely warm the sage:
Allure, with tender verse, the female race;
And give their darling passion, courtly grace:
Describe the forest still in rural strains,
With vernal sweets fresh-breathing from the plains:
Your tales be easy, natural, and gay,
Nor all the poet in that part display;
Nor let the critic there his skill unfold,
For Boccace thus and Chaucer tales have told:
Soothe, as you only can, each different taste,
And for the future charm us in the past.
Then, should the verse of every artful hand
Before your numbers eminently stand;
In you no vanity could thence be shewn,
Unless, since short in beauty of your own,
Some envious scribbler might in spite declare,
That for comparison you plac'd them there.
But envy could not against you succeed:
'Tis not from friends that write, or foes that read;
Censure or praise must from ourselves proceed.

TO MR. POPE,

BY MISS JUD. COWPER, AFTERWARDS MRS. MADAN.

O POPE ! by what commanding wondrous art
 Dost thou each passion to each breast impart ?
 Our beating hearts with sprightly measures move,
 Or melt us with a tale of hapless love !
 Th' elated mind's impetuous starts control,
 Or gently sooth to peace the troubled soul !
 Graces till now that singly met our view,
 And singly charm'd, unite at once in you :
 A style polite, from affectation free,
 Virgil's correctness, Homer's majesty !
 Soft Waller's ease, with Milton's vigour wrought,
 And Spenser's bold luxuriance of thought.
 In each bright page, strength, beauty, genius shine,
 While nervous judgment guides each flowing line.
 No borrow'd tinsel glitters o'er these lays,
 And to the mind a false delight conveys :
 Throughout the whole with blended power is found,
 The weight of sense, and elegance of sound :
 A lavish fancy, wit, and force, and fire,
 Graces each motion of th' immortal lyre.
 The matchless strains our ravish'd senses charm :
 How great the thought ! the images how warm !
 How beautifully just the turns appear !
 The language how majestically clear !
 With energy divine each period swells,
 And all the bard th' inspiring God reveals.
 Lost in delights, my dazzled eyes I turn,
 Where Thames leans hoary o'er his ample urn ;
 Where his rich waves fair Windsor's towers sur-
 round,
 And bounteous rush amid poetic ground.
 O Windsor ! sacred to thy blissful seats,
 Thy sylvan shades, the muses' lov'd retreats ;
 Thy rising hills, low vales, and waving woods,
 Thy sunny glades, and celebrated floods !
 But chief Lodona's silver tides, that flow
 Cold and unfullied as the mountain snow ;
 Whose virgin name no time nor change can hide,
 Though ev'n her spotless waves should cease to glide :
 In mighty Pope's immortalizing strains,
 Still shall she grace and range the verdant plains ;
 By him selected for the muses' theme, [stream.
 Still shine a blooming maid, and roll a limpid
 Go on, and, with thy rare resistless art,
 Rule each emotion of the various heart ;
 The spring and test of verse unrival'd reign,
 And the full honours of thy youth maintain ;
 Soothe, with thy wonted ease and power divine,
 Our souls, and our degenerate tastes refine ;
 In judgment o'er our favourite follies sit,
 And soften Wisdom's harsh reproofs to wit.
 Now war and arms thy mighty aid demand,
 And Homer wakes beneath thy powerful hand ;
 His vigour, genuine heat, and manly force,
 In thee rise worthy of their sacred source ;
 His spirit heighten'd, yet his sense entire,
 As gold runs purer from the trying fire.
 O, for a muse like thine, while I rehearse
 Th' immortal beauties of thy various verse !

Now light as air th' enlivening numbers move,
 Soft as the downy plumes of fabled love,
 Gay as the streaks that stain the gaudy bow,
 Smooth as Meander's crystal mirrors flow.

But, when Achilles, panting for the war,
 Joins the fleet couriers to the whirling car ;
 When the warm hero, with celestial might,
 Augments the terror of the raging fight,
 From his fierce eyes refulgent lightnings stream
 (As Sol emerging darts a golden gleam) ;
 In rough hoarse verse we see th' embattled foes ;
 In each loud strain the fiery onset glows ;
 With strength redoubled here Achilles shines,
 And all the battle thunders in thy lines.

So the bright magic of the painter's hand
 Can cities, streams, tall towers, and far-stretch'd plains, command ;
 Here spreading woods embrown the beauteous scene,

Therethe wide landscape smiles with livelier green ;
 The floating glass reflects the distant sky,
 And o'er the whole the glancing sun-beams fly ;
 Buds open, and disclose the inmost shade ;
 The ripen'd harvest crowns the level glade.
 But when the artist does a work design,
 Where bolder rage informs each breathing line ;
 When the stretch'd cloth a rougher stroke receives,
 And Cæsar awful in the canvas lives ;
 When art like lavish nature's self supplies,
 Grace to the limbs, and spirit to the eyes ;
 When ev'n the passions of the mind are seen,
 And the soul speaks in the exalted mien ;
 When all is just, and regular, and great,
 We own the mighty Master's skill, as boundless as complete.

LORD MIDDLESEX TO MR. POPE,

On reading Mr. Addison's Account of the English Poets.

Is all who e'er invok'd the tuneful Nine,
 In Addison's majestic numbers shine,
 Why then should Pope, ye bards, ye critics, tell,
 Remain unsung, who sings himself so well ?
 Hear then, great bard, who can alike inspire
 With Waller's softness, or with Milton's fire ;
 Whilst I, the meanest of the muses throng,
 To thy just praises tune th' adventurous song.

How am I fill'd with rapture and delight,
 When gods and mortals, mix'd, sustain the fight !
 Like Milton then, though in more polish'd strains,
 Thy chariots rattle o'er the smoking plains.
 What though archangel 'gainst archangel arms,
 And highest Heaven resounds with dire alarms !
 Doth not the reader with like dread survey
 The wounded gods repuls'd with foul dismay ?

But when some fair one guides your softer verse,
 Her charms, her godlike features, to rehearse ;
 See how her eyes with quicker lightnings arm,
 And Waller's thoughts in smoother numbers charm !

When fools provoke, and dunces urge thy rage,
 Flecknoe improv'd bites keener in each page.
 Give o'er, great bard, your fruitless toil give o'er,
 For still king Tibbald scribbles as before ;

Poor Shakspeare suffers by his pen each day,
While Grub-street alleys own his lawful sway.

Now turn, my muse, thy quick, poetic eyes,
And view gay scenes and opening prospects rise.
Hark! how his rustic numbers charm around,
While groves to groves, and hills to hills resound!
The listening beasts stand fearless as he sings,
And birds attentive close their useless wings.
The swains and satyrs trip it o'er the plain,
And think old Spenser is reviv'd again.

But when once more the godlike man begun
In words smooth flowing from his tuneful tongue,
Ravish'd they gaze, and struck with wonder say,
Sure Spenser's self ne'er sung so sweet a lay:
Sure once again Eliza glads the isle,

That the kind muses thus propitious smile—
Why gaze ye thus? Why all this wonder, swains?—
'Tis Pope that sings, and Carolina reigns.

But hold, my muse! whose awkward verse betrays
Thy want of skill, nor shews the poet's praise;
Cease then, and leave some fitter bard to tell How Pope in every strain can write, in every strain excel.

TO MR. POPE,

ON THE PUBLISHING HIS WORKS.

He comes, he comes! bid every bard prepare
The song of triumph, and attend his car.
Great Sheffield's muse the long procession heads,
And throws a lustre o'er the pomp she leads;
First gives the palm she fir'd him to obtain,
Crowns his gay brow, and shews him how to reign.
Thus young Alcides, by old Chiron taught,
Was form'd for all the miracles he wrought:
Thus Chiron did the youth he taught applaud,
Pleas'd to behold the earnest of a God.

But hark! what shouts, what gathering crowds rejoice!

Unstain'd their praise by any venial voice,
Such as th' ambitious vainly think their due,
When prostitutes, or needy flatterers sue.
And see the chief! before him laurels borne;
Trophies from undeserving temples torn:
Here Rage enchain'd reluctant raves; and there
Pale Envy dumb, and sick'ning with despair,
Prone to the earth she bends her loathing eye,
Weak to support the blaze of majesty.

But what are they that turn the sacred page?
Three lovely virgins, and of equal age;
Intent they read, and all enamour'd seem,
As he that met his likeness in the stream:
The Graces these; and see how they contend,
Who most shall praise, who best shall recommend.

The chariot now the painful steep ascends,
The Pæans cease; thy glorious labour ends.
Here fix'd, the bright eternal temple stands,
Its prospect an unbounded view commands:
Say, wondrous youth, what column wilt thou choose,

What laurel'd arch for thy triumphant muse?
Though each great ancient court thee to his shrine,
Though every laurel through the dome be thine,

(From the proud epic, down to those that shade
The gentler brow of the soft Lesbian maid)
Go to the good and just, an awful train,
Thy soul's delight, and glory of the fane:
While through the earth thy dear remembrance
flies,

"Sweet to the world, and grateful to the skies."

SIMON HARCOURT.

TO MR. POPE,

BY MR. HARTE.

To move the springs of nature as we please;
To think with spirit, but to write with ease;
With living words to warm the conscious heart,
Or please the soul with nicer charms of art;
For this the Grecian soar'd in epic strains,
And softer Maro left the Mantuan plains:
Melodious Spenser felt the lover's fire,
And awful Milton strung his heavenly lyre.

'Tis yours, like these, with curious toil to trace
The powers of language, harmony, and grace;
How Nature's self with living lustre shines,
How judgment strengthens, and how art refines;
How to grow bold with conscious sense of fame,
And force a pleasure which we dare not blame;
To charm us more through negligence than pains,
And give ev'n life and action to the strains:
Led by some law, whose powerful impulse guides
Each happy stroke, and in the soul presides;
Some fairer image of perfection given
T' inspire mankind, itself deriv'd from heaven.

O ever worthy, ever crown'd with praise,
Blest in thy life, and blest in all thy lays!
Add that the Sisters every thought refine,
Or ev'n thy life be faultless as thy line;
Yet Envy still with fiercer rage pursues,
Obscures the virtue, and defames the muse.
A soul like thine, in pains, in grief resign'd,
Views with vain scorn the malice of mankind:
Not critics, but their planets, prove unjust;
And are they blam'd who sin because they must?

Yet sure not so must all peruse thy lays:
I cannot rival—and yet dare to praise.
A thousand charms at once my thoughts engage;
Sappho's soft sweetness, Pindar's warmer rage,
Statius' free vigour, Virgil's studious care,
And Homer's force, and Ovid's easier air.

So seems some picture, where exact design,
And curious pains, and strength, and sweetness join;
Where the free thought its pleasing grace bestows,
And each warm stroke with living colour glows;
Soft without weakness, without labour fair,
Wrought up at once with happiness, and care!

How blest the man that from the world removes,
To joys that Merdaunt*, or his Pope, approves;
Whose taste exact each author can explore,
And live the present and past ages o'er;
Who, free from pride, from penitence, or strife,
Moves calmly forward to the verge of life:

* Earl of Peterborough.

Such be my days, and such my fortunes be,
 To live by reason, and to write by thee !
 Nor deem this verse, though humble, a disgrace :
 All are not born the glory of their race :
 Yet all are born t' adore the great man's name,
 And trace his footsteps in the paths to fame.
 The muse, who now this early homage pays,
 First learn'd from thee to animate her lays :
 A muse as yet unhonour'd, but unstain'd,
 Who prais'd no vices, no preferment gain'd ;
 Unbias'd or to censure or commend,
 Who knows no envy, and who grieves no friend ;
 Perhaps too fond to make those virtues known,
 And fix her fame immortal on thy own.

THE TRIUMVIRATE OF POETS,

BY MRS. TOLLET.

BRITAIN with Greece and Rome contended long
 For lofty genius and poetic song,
 Till this Augustan age with Three was blest,
 To fix the prize, and finish the contest.
 In Addison, immortal Virgil reigns ;
 So pure his numbers, so refin'd his strains ;
 Of nature full, with more impetuous heat,
 In Prior Horace shines, sublimely great.
 Thy country, Homer ! we dispute no more,
 For Pope has fix'd it to his native shore.

P R E F A C E.

I AM inclined to think, that both the writers of books and the readers of them, are generally not a little unreasonable in their expectations. The first seem to fancy that the world must approve of whatever they produce, and the latter to imagine that authors are obliged to please them at any rate. Methinks, as, on the one hand, no single man is born with a right of controuling the opinions of all the rest; so, on the other, the world has no title to demand, that the whole care and time of any particular person should be sacrificed to its entertainment. Therefore, I cannot but believe that writers and readers are under equal obligations; for as much fame, or pleasure, as each affords the other.

Every one acknowledges, it would be a wild notion to expect perfection in any work of man: and yet one would think the contrary was taken for granted, by the judgment commonly passed upon poems. A critic supposes he has done his part, if he proves a writer to have failed in an expression, or erred in any particular point: and can it then be wondered at, if the Poets, in general, seem resolved not to own themselves in any error? For, as long as one side will make no allowances, the other will be brought to no acknowledgments*.

I am afraid this extreme zeal on both sides is ill-placed; Poetry and Criticism being by no means the universal concern of the world, but only the affair of idle men who write in their closets, and of idle men who read there.

Yet sure, upon the whole, a bad author deserves better usage than a bad critic: for a writer's endeavour, for the most part, is to please his readers, and he fails merely through the misfortune of an ill judgment; but such a critic's is to put them out of humour; a design he could never go upon without both that and an ill temper.

* In the former editions it was thus—"For as long as one side despises a well-meant endeavour, the other will not be satisfied with a moderate approbation."—But the Author altered it, as these words were rather a consequence from the conclusion he would draw, than the conclusion itself, which he has now inserted.

I think a good deal may be said to extenuate the fault of bad Poets. What we call a Genius, is hard to be distinguished, by a man himself, from a strong inclination: and if his genius be ever so great, he cannot at first discover it any other way, than by giving way to that prevalent propensity which renders him the more liable to be mistaken. The only method he has, is to make the experiment by writing, and appealing to the judgment of others: now, if he happens to write ill (which is certainly no sin in itself), he is immediately made an object of ridicule. I wish we had the humanity to reflect, that even the worst authors might, in their endeavour to please us, deserve something at our hands. We have no cause to quarrel with them but for their obstinacy in persisting to write; and this too may admit of alleviating circumstances. Their particular friends may be either ignorant or insincere; and the rest of the world in general is too well-bred to shock them with a truth, which generally their booksellers are the first that inform them of. This happens not till they have spent too much of their time, to apply to any profession which might better fit their talents; and till such talents as they have are so far discredited as to be but of small service to them. For (what is the hardest case imaginable) the reputation of a man generally depends upon the first steps he makes in the world; and people will establish their opinion of us, from what we do at that season, when we have least judgment to direct us.

On the other hand, a good poet no sooner communicates his works with the same desire of information, but it is imagined he is a vain young creature given up to the ambition of fame; when perhaps the poor man is all the while trembling with the fear of being ridiculous. If he is made to hope he may please the world, he falls under very unlucky circumstances: for, from the moment he prints, he must expect to hear no more truth, than if he were a prince, or a beauty. If he has not very good sense (and indeed there are twenty men of wit for one man of sense), his living thus in a course of flattery may put him in no small danger of becoming a coxcomb: if he has, he will consequently have so much diffidence as not to reap any great satisfaction from his praise; since, if it be given to his face, it can scarce be distinguished from flattery, and if in his absence, it is hard to be certain of it. Were he sure to be commended by the best and most knowing, he is as sure of being envied by the worst and most ignorant, which are the majority; for it is with a fine genius, as with a fine fashion, all those are displeased at it who are not able to follow it: and it is to be feared that esteem will seldom do any man so much good, as ill-will does him harm. Then there is a third class of people who make the largest part of mankind, those of ordinary or indifferent capacities; and these (to a man) will hate or suspect him: a hundred honest gentlemen will dread him as a wit, and a hundred innocent women as a satirist. In a word, whatever be his fate in poetry, it is ten to one but he must give up all the reasonable aims of life for it. There are indeed some advantages accruing from a genius to poetry, and they are all I can think of: the agreeable power of self-amusement when a man is idle or alone; the privilege of being admitted into the best company; and the freedom of saying as many careless things as other people, without being so severely remarked upon.

I believe, if any one, early in his life, should contemplate the dangerous fate of authors, he would scarce be of their number on any consideration. The life of a wit is a warfare upon earth; and the present spirit of the learned world is such, that to attempt to serve it (any way) one must have the constancy of a martyr, and a resolution to suffer for its sake. I could wish people would believe, what I am pretty certain they will not, that I have been much less concerned about fame than I durst declare till this occasion, when methinks I should find more credit than I could heretofore, since my writings have had their fate already, and it is too late to think of prepossessing the reader in their favour. I would plead it as some merit in me, that the world has never been prepared for these trifles by prefaces, biassed by recommendations, dazzled with the names of great patrons, wheedled with fine reasons and pretences, or troubled with excuses. I confess it was want of consideration that made me an author: I writ because it amused me; I corrected because it was as pleasant to me to correct as to write; and I published because I was told I might please such as it was a credit to please. To what degree I have done this, I am really ignorant; I had too much fondness for my productions to judge of them at first, and too much judgment to be pleased with them at last. But I have reason to think they can have no reputation which will continue long, or which deserves to do so; for they have always fallen short not only of what I read of others, but even of my own ideas of poetry.

If any one should imagine I am not in earnest, I desire him to reflect, that the Ancients (to say the least of them) had as much genius as we; and that to take more pains, and employ more time, cannot fail to produce more complete pieces. They constantly applied themselves not only to that art, but to that single branch of an art, to which their talent was most powerfully bent; and it was the business of their lives to correct and finish their works for posterity. If we can pretend to have used the same industry, let us expect the same immortality: Though, if we took the same care, we should still lie under a further misfortune: they writ in languages that became universal and everlasting, while ours are extremely limited both in extent and in duration: A mighty foundation for our pride! when the utmost we can hope is but to be read in one island, and to be thrown aside at the end of one age.

All that is left us is to recommend our productions by the imitation of the Ancients; and it will be found true, that, in every age, the highest character for sense and learning has been obtained by those who have been most indebted to them. For, to say truth, whatever is very good sense, must have been common sense in all times; and what we call Learning, is but the knowledge of the sense of our predecessors. Therefore they who say our thoughts are not our own, because they resemble the Ancients, may as well say our faces are not our own, because they are like our Fathers: And indeed it is very unreasonable, that people should expect us to be scholars, and yet be angry to find us so.

I fairly confess that I have served myself all I could by reading; that I made use of the judgment of authors dead and living; that I omitted no means in my power to be informed of my errors, both by my friends and enemies: But the true reason these pieces are not more correct, is owing to the consideration how short a time they and I have to live: One may be ashamed to consume half one's days in bringing sense and rhyme together; and what critic can be so unreasonable, as not to leave a man time enough for any more serious employment, or more agreeable amusement?

The only plea I shall use for the favour of the public, is, that I have as great a respect for it, as most authors have for themselves; and that I have sacrificed much of my own self-love for its sake, in preventing not only many mean things from seeing the light, but many which I thought tolerable. I would not be like those authors, who forgive themselves some particular lines for the sake of a whole poem, and vice versa a whole poem for the sake of some particular lines. I believe, no one qualification is so likely to make a good writer, as the power of rejecting his own thoughts; and it must be this (if any thing) that can give me a chance to be one. For what I have published, I can only hope to be pardoned; but for what I have burned, I deserve to be praised. On this account the world is under some obligation to me, and owes me the justice in return, to look upon no verses as mine that are not inserted in this collection. And perhaps nothing could make it worth my while to own what are really so, but to avoid the imputation of so many dull and immoral things, as partly by malice, and partly by ignorance, have been ascribed to me. I must further acquit myself of the presumption of having lent my name to recommend any miscellanies, or works of other men; a thing I never thought becoming a person who has hardly credit enough to answer for his own.

In this office of collecting my pieces, I am altogether uncertain, whether to look upon myself as a man building a monument, or burying the dead.

If time shall make it the former, may these poems (as long as they last) remain as a testimony that their author never made his talents subservient to the mean and unworthy ends of party or self-interest; the gratification of public prejudices or private passions; the flattery of the undeserving, or the insult of the unfortunate. If I have written well, let it be considered that it is what no man can do without good sense; a quality that not only renders one capable of being a good writer, but a good man. And if I have made any acquisition in the opinion of any one under the notion of the former, let it be continued to me under no other title than that of the latter.

But if this publication be only a more solemn funeral of my remains, I desire it to be known that I die in charity, and in my senses; without any murmurs against the justice of this age, or any mad appeals to posterity. I declare I shall think the world in the right, and quietly submit to every truth which time shall discover to the prejudice of these writings; not so much as wishing so irrational a thing, as that every body should be deceived merely for my credit. However, I desire it may be then considered, That there are very few things in this collection which were not written under the age of five-and-twenty; so that my youth may be made (as it never fails to be in executions) a case of compassion: That I was never so concerned about my works as to vindicate them in print, believing, if any thing was good, it would defend itself, and what was bad could never be defended: That I used no artifice to raise or continue a reputation, depreciated no dead author I was obliged to, bribed no living one with unjust praise, insulted no adversary with ill language; or, when I could not attack a rival's works, encouraged reports against his morals. To conclude, if this volume perish, let it serve as a warning to the critics, not to take too much pains for the future to destroy such things as will die of themselves; and a memento mori to some of my vain contemporaries the Poets, to teach them that, when real merit is wanting, it avails nothing to have been encouraged by the great, commended by the eminent, and favoured by the public in general.

VARIATIONS in the Author's Manuscript Preface.

AFTER page 9. c. 1. l. 27. it followed thus: For my part, I confess, had I seen things in this view, at first, the public had never been troubled either with my writings, or with this apology for them. I am sensible how difficult it is to speak of one's self with decency: but when a man must speak of himself, the best way is to speak truth of himself, or, he may depend upon it, others will do it for him. I'll therefore make this Preface a general confession of all my thoughts of my own poetry, resolving with the same freedom to expose myself, as it is in the power of any other to expose them. In the first place, I thank God and nature, that I was born with a love to poetry; for nothing more conduces to fill up all the intervals of our time, or, if rightly used, to make the whole course of life entertaining: "Cantantes licet usque (minus via lædet)." It is a vast happiness to possess the pleasures of the head, the only pleasures in which a man is sufficient to himself, and the only part of him which, to his satisfaction, he can employ all day long. The Muses are "amicæ omnium horarum;" and, like our gay acquaintance, the best company in the world, as long as one expects no real service from them. I confess there was a time when I was in love with myself, and my first productions were the children of self-love upon innocence. I had made an Epic Poem, and Panegyrics on all the princes in Europe, and thought myself the greatest genius that ever was. I cannot but regret those delightful visions of my childhood, which, like the fine colours we see when our eyes are shut, are vanished for ever. Many trials, and sad experience, have so undeceived me by degrees, that I am utterly at a loss at what rate to value myself. As for fame, I shall be glad of any I can get, and not repine at any I miss; and, as for vanity, I have enough to keep me from hanging myself, or even from wishing those hanged who would take it away. It was this that made me write. The sense of my faults made me correct; besides, that it was as pleasant to me to correct as to write.

At p. 9. c. 2. l. 26. In the first place, I own that I have used my best endeavours to the finishing these pieces: That I made what advantage I could of the judgment of authors dead and living; and that I omitted no means in my power to be informed of my errors by my friends and my enemies: And that I expect no favour on account of my youth, business, want of health, or any such idle excuses. But the true reason they are not yet more correct, is owing to the consideration how short a time they, and I, have to live. A man that can expect but sixty years, may be ashamed to employ thirty in measuring syllables, and bringing sense and rhyme together. We spend our youth in pursuit of riches or fame, in hopes to enjoy them when we are old; and when we are old, we find it too late to enjoy any thing. I therefore hope the Wits will pardon me, if I reserve some of my time to save my soul; and that some wise men will be of my opinion, even if I should think a part of it better spent in the enjoyments of life, than in pleasing the critics.

PASTORALS

WRITTEN IN THE YEAR 1704.

Rura mihi et rigui placeant in valibus amnes,
Flumina amem, sylvasque, inglorius.

DISCOURSE ON PASTORAL POETRY.*

THERE are not, I believe, a greater number of any sort of verses than those which are called Pastorals; nor a smaller, than those which are truly so. It therefore seems necessary to give some account of this kind of Poem; and it is my design to comprize in this short paper the substance of those numerous dissertations the Critics have made on the subject, without omitting any of their rules in my own favour. You will also find some points reconciled, about which they seem to differ; and a few remarks, which, I think, have escaped their observation.

The original of Poetry is ascribed to that Age which succeeded the creation of the world; and as the keeping of flocks seems to have been the first employment of mankind, the most ancient sort of Poetry was probably Pastoral†. It is natural to imagine, that the leisure of those ancient shepherds admitting and inviting some diversion, none was so proper to that solitary and sedentary life as singing; and that in their songs they took occasion to celebrate their own felicity. From hence a Poem was invented, and afterwards improved to a perfect image of that happy time; which, by giving us an esteem for the virtues of a former age, might recommend them to the present. And since the life of shepherds was attended with more tranquillity than any other rural employment, the poets chose to introduce their persons, from whom it received the name of Pastoral.

A pastoral is an imitation of the action of a shepherd, or one considered under that character. The form of this imitation is dramatic, or narrative, or mixed of both‡; the fable simple, the manners not too polite nor too rustic: the thoughts are plain, yet admit a little quickness and passion, but that short and flowing: the expression humble, yet as pure as the language will afford; neat, but not florid; easy, and yet lively. In short, the fable, manners thoughts, and expressions, are full of the greatest simplicity in nature.

The complete character of this poem consists in simplicity§, brevity, and delicacy; the two first of which render an eclogue natural, and the last delightful.

If we could copy nature, it may be useful to take this idea along with us, that pastoral is an image of what they call the Golden Age. So that we are not to describe our shepherds as shepherds at this day really are, but as they may be conceived then to have been, when the best of men followed the employment. To carry this resemblance yet further, it would not be amiss to give these shepherds some skill in astronomy, as far as it may be useful to that sort of life. And an air of piety to the gods should shine through the poem, which so visibly appears in all the works of antiquity; and it ought to preserve some relish of the old way of writing: the connection should be loose, the narrations and descriptions short*, and the periods concise: yet it is not sufficient, that the sentences only be brief; the whole eclogue should be so too: for we cannot suppose poetry in those days to have been the business of men, but their recreation at vacant hours.

But with respect to the present age, nothing more conduces to make these compositions natural, than when some knowledge in rural affairs is discovered†. This may be made to appear rather done by chance than on design, and sometimes is best shewn by inference; lest by too much study to seem natural, we destroy that easy simplicity from whence arises the delight: for what is inviting in this sort of poetry proceeds not so much from the idea of that business, as the tranquillity of a country life.

We must therefore use some illusion to render a pastoral delightful; and this consists in exposing the best side only of a shepherd's life, and in concealing its miseries‡. Nor is it enough to introduce shepherds discoursing together in a natural way; but a regard must be had to the subject, that it contain some particular beauty in itself, and that it be different in every eclogue. Besides, in each of them a designed scene or prospect is to be presented to our view, which should likewise have its variety§. This variety is obtained in a great degree by frequent comparisons, drawn from the most agreeable objects of the country; by interrogations to things inanimate; by beautiful digressions, but those short; sometimes by insisting a little on circumstances; and lastly, by elegant turns on the words, which render the numbers extremely sweet and pleasing. As for the numbers themselves, though they are properly of the heroic measure, they should be the smoothest, the most easy and flowing imaginable.

It is by rules like these that we ought to judge of pastoral. And since the instructions given for any art are to be delivered as that art is in perfection, they must of necessity be derived from those in whom it is acknowledged so to be. It is therefore from the practice of Theocritus and Virgil (the only undisputed authors of pastoral) that the critics have drawn the foregoing notions concerning it.

Theocritus excels all others in nature and simplicity. The subjects of his Idyllia are purely pastoral; but he is not so exact in his persons, having introduced reapers|| and fishermen as well as shepherds. He is apt to be too long in his descriptions, of which that of the cup in the first pastoral is a remarkable instance. In the manners he seems a little defective; for his swains are sometimes abusive and immodest, and perhaps too much inclining to rusticity; for instance, in his fourth and fifth Idyllia. But it is enough that all others learned their excellence from him, and that his dialect alone has a secret charm in it, which no other could ever attain.

Virgil, who copies Theocritus, refines upon his original: and in all points, where judgment is principally concerned, he is much superior to his master. Though some of his subjects are not pastoral in themselves, but only seem to be such; they have a wonderful variety in them, which the Greek was a stranger to*. He exceeds him in regularity and brevity, and falls short of him in nothing but simplicity and propriety of style; the first of which perhaps was the fault of his age, and the last of his language.

Among the moderns, their success has been greatest who have most endeavoured to make these ancients their pattern. The most considerable genius appears in the famous Tasso, and our Spenser. Tasso in his Aminta has as far excelled all the pastoral writers, as in his Gierusalemme he has outdone the epic poets of his country. But as his piece seems to have been the original of a new sort of poem, the pastoral comedy, in Italy, it cannot so well be considered as a copy of the ancients. Spenser's Calendar, in Mr. Dryden's opinion, is the most complete work of this kind which any nation has produced ever since the time of Virgil†: not but that he may be thought imperfect in some few points. His eclogues are somewhat too long, if we compare them with the ancients. He is sometimes too allegorical, and treats of matters of religion in a pastoral style, as the Mantuan had done before him. He has employed the lyric measure, which is contrary to the practice of the old poets. His stanza is not still the same, nor always well chosen. This last may be the reason his expression is sometimes not concise enough: for the tetralectic has obliged him to extend his sense to the length of four lines, which would have been more closely confined in the couplet.

In the manners, thoughts, and characters, he comes near to Theocritus himself; though, notwithstanding all the care he has taken, he is certainly inferior in his dialect: for the Doric had its beauty and propriety in the time of Theocritus; it was used in part of Greece, and frequent in the mouths of many of the greatest persons: whereas the old English and country phrases of Spenser were either entirely obsolete, or spoken only by people of the lowest condition. As there is a difference betwixt simplicity and rusticity, so the expression of simple thoughts should be plain, but not clownish. The addition he has made of a calendar to his eclogues, is very beautiful; since by this, besides the general moral of innocence and simplicity, which is common to other authors of pastoral, he has one peculiar to himself; he compares human life to the several seasons, and at once exposes to his readers a view of the great and little worlds, in their various changes and aspects. Yet the scrupulous division of his pastorals into months, has obliged him either to repeat the same description, in other words, for three months together; or, when it was exhausted before, entirely to omit it: whence it comes to pass that some of his eclogues (as the sixth, eighth, and tenth, for example) have nothing but their titles to distinguish them. The reason is evident, because the year has not that variety in it to furnish every month with a particular description, as it may every season.

Of the following eclogues I shall only say, that these four comprehend all the subjects which the critics upon Theocritus and Virgil will allow to be fit for pastoral: That they have as much variety of description, in respect of the several seasons, as Spenser's: That, in order to add to this variety, the several times of the day are observed, the rural employments in each season or time of day, and the rural scenes or places proper to such employments; not without some regard to the several ages of man, and the different passions proper to each age.

But after all, if they have any merit, it is to be attributed to some good old authors, whose works as I had leisure to study, so, I hope, I have not wanted care to imitate.

PASTORALS.

SPRING.

THE FIRST PASTORAL, OR DAMON.

TO SIR WILLIAM TRUMBULL,

FIRST in these fields I try the sylvan strains,
Nor blush to sport on Windsor's blissful plains :
Fair Thames, flow gently from thy sacred spring,
While on thy banks Sicilian muses sing ;
Let vernal airs through trembling osiers play,
And Albion's cliffs resound the rural lay.

Youth at, too wise for pride, too good for power,

Enjoy the glory to be great no more,
And, carrying with you all the world can boast,
To all the world illustriously are lost ! 10
O let my muse her slender reed inspire,
Till in your native shades you tune the lyre :
So when the nightingale to rest removes,
The thrush may chant to the forsaken groves,
But charm'd to silence, listens while she sings,
And all th' ærial audience clap their wings.

Soon as the flocks shook off the nightly dews,
Two swains, whom love kept wakeful, and the muse,

Pour'd o'er the whitening vale their fleecy care,
Fresh as the morn, and as the season fair : 20
The dawn now blushing on the mountain's side,
Thus Daphnis spoke, and Strephon thus reply'd.

DAPHNIS.

Hear how the birds, on every bloomy spray,
With joyous music wake the dawning day !
Why sit we mute, when early linnets sing,
When warbling Philomel salutes the spring ?
Why sit we sad, when Phosphor shines so clear,
And lavish nature paints the purple year ?

STREPHON.

Sing then, and Damon shall attend the strain,
While yon' slow oxen turn the furrow'd plain. 30
Here the bright crocus and blue violet glow ;
Here western winds on breathing roses blow,
I'll stake yon' lamb, that near the fountain plays,
And from the brink his dancing shade surveys.

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 34. The first reading was,
And his own image from the bank surveys.

DAPHNIS.

And I this bowl, where wanton ivy twines,
And swelling clusters bend the curling vines :
Four figures rising from the work appear,
The various seasons of the rolling year ;
And what is that, which binds the radiant sky,
Where twelve fair signs in beauteous order lie ? 40

DAMON.

Then sing by turns, by turns the muses sing ;
Now hawthorns blossom, now the daisies spring,
Now leaves the trees, and flowers adorn the
ground ;
Begin, the vales shall every note rebound.

STREPHON.

Inspire me, Phœbus, in my Delia's praise,
With Waller's strains, or Granville's moving lays !
A milk-white bull shall at your altars stand,
That threatens a fight, and spurns the rising sand.

DAPHNIS.

O Love ! for Sylvia let me gain the prize,
And make my tongue victorious as her eyes ; 50
No lambs or sheep for victims I'll impart,
Thy victim, Love, shall be the shepherd's heart.

STREPHON.

Me gentle Delia beckons from the plain,
Then, hid in shades, eludes her eager swain ;
But feigns a laugh, to see me search around,
And by that laugh the willing fair is found.

DAPHNIS.

The sprightly Sylvia trips along the green,
She runs, but hopes she does not run unseen ;
While a kind glance at her pursuer flies,
How much at variance are her feet and eyes ! 60

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 36. And clusters lurk beneath the curling vines.

Ver. 49. Originally thus in the MS.
Pan, let my numbers equal Strephon's lays,
Of Parian stone thy statue will I raise ;
But if I conquer, and augment my fold,
Thy Parian statue shall be chang'd to gold.

STREPHON.

O'er golden sands let rich Pactolus flow,
And trees weep amber on the banks of Po;
Blest Thames's shores the brightest beauties
yield;
Feed here my lambs, I'll seek no distant field.

DAPHNIS.

Celestial Venus haunts Idalia's groves;
Diana Cynthus, Ceres Hybla loves.
If Windsor shades delight the matchless maid,
Cynthus and Hybla yield to Windsor shade.

STREPHON.

All nature mourns, the skies relent in showers,
Hush'd are the birds, and clos'd the drooping
flowers;
If Delia smile, the flowers begin to spring,
The skies to brighten, and the birds to sing. 70

DAPHNIS.

All nature laughs, the groves are fresh and fair,
The sun's mild lustre warms the vital air;

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 61. It stood thus at first:

Let rich Iberia golden fleeces boast,
Her purple wool the proud Assyrian coast,
Blest Thames's shores, &c.

Ver. 61. Originally thus in the MS.

Go, flowery wreath, and let my Sylvia know,
Compar'd to thine how bright her beauties shew:
Then die; and dying, teach the lovely maid
How soon the brightest beauties are decay'd.

DAPHNIS.

Go, tuneful bird, that pleas'd the woods so long,
Of Amaryllis learn a sweeter song:
To heaven arising then her notes convey,
For heav'n alone is worthy such a lay.

Ver. 69. These verses were thus at first:

All nature mourns, the birds their songs deny,
Nor waisted brooks the thirsty flowers supply;
If Delia smile, the flowers begin to spring,
The brooks to murmur, and the birds to sing.

If Sylvia smiles, new glories gild the shore,
And vanquish'd nature seems to charm no more.

STREPHON.

In spring the fields, in autumn hills I love,
At morn the plains, at noon the shady grove,
But Delia always; absent from her sight,
Nor plains at morn, nor groves at noon delight. 80

DAPHNIS.

Sylvia's like autumn ripe, yet mild as May,
More bright than noon, yet fresh as early day;
Ev'n spring displeases, when she shines not here;
But, blest'd with her, 'tis spring throughout the year.

STREPHON.

Say, Daphnis, say, in what glad soil appears,
A wondrous tree that sacred monarch bears;
Tell me but this, and I'll disclaim the prize,
And give the conquest to thy Sylvia's eyes.

DAPHNIS.

Nay, tell me first, in what more happy fields
The thistle springs, to which the lily yields: 90
And then a nobler prize I will resign;
For Sylvia, charming Sylvia shall be thine.

DAMON.

Cease to contend; for, Daphnis, I decree
The bowl to Strephon, and the lamb to thee.
Blest swains, whose nymphs in every grace excel;
Blest nymphs, whose swains those graces sing so well!

Now rise, and haste to yonder woodbine bowers,
A soft retreat from sudden vernal showers;
The turf with rular dainties shall be crown'd,
While opening blooms diffuse their sweets a-
round. 100

For see! the gathering flocks to shelter tend,
And from the pleiads fruitful showers descend.

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 99. was originally,

The turf with country dainties shall be spread,
And trees with twining branches shade your head.

SUMMER.

THE SECOND PASTORAL, OR ALEXIS.

TO DR. GARTH.

A SHEPHERD's boy (he seeks no better name)
Led forth his flocks along the silver Thame,
Where dancing sun-beams on the waters play'd,
And verdant alders form'd a quivering shade.

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 1, 2, 3, 4. were thus printed in the first edition.

A faithful swain, whom love had taught to sing,
Bewail'd his fate beside a silver spring;

Soft as he mourn'd, the streams forgot to flow,
The flocks around a dumb compassion shew,

VARIATIONS.

Where gentle Thames his winding waters leads Through verdant forests, and through flowery meads.

Ver. 3. Originally thus in the MS.

There to the winds he plain'd his hapless love,
And Amyrillis fill'd the vocal grove.

The Naiads wept in every watery bower,
And Jove consented in a silent shower.
Accept O Garth, the muse's early lays,
That adds this wreath of ivy to thy bays; 10
Hear what from love unpractis'd hearts endure,
From love, the sole disease thou canst not cure.

Ye shady beeches, and ye cooling streams,
Defence from Phœbus', not from Cupid's beams,
To you I mourn; nor to the deaf I sing,
The woods shall answer, and their echo ring.
The hills and rocks attend my doleful lay,
Why art thou prouder and more hard than they?
The bleating sheep with my complaints agree,
They parch'd with heat, and I inflam'd by thee. 20
The sultry Sirius burns the thirsty plains,
While in thy heart eternal winter reigns.

Where stray ye, muses, in what lawn or grove,
While your Alexis pines in hopeless love?
In those fair fields where sacred Isis glides,
Or else where Cam his winding vales divides?
As in the crystal spring I view my face,
Fresh rising blushes paint the watery glass;
But since those graces please thy eyes no more,
I shun the fountains which I sought before. 30
Once I was skill'd in every herb that grew,
And every plant that drinks the morning dew;
Ah, wretched shepherd, what avails thy art,
To cure thy lambs, but not to heal thy heart!

Let other swains attend the rural care,
Feed fairer flocks, or richer fleeces shear:
But nigh yon' mountain let me tune my lays,
Embrace my love, and bind my brows with bays.
That flute is mine which Colin's tuneful breath
Inspir'd when living, and bequeath'd in death: 40
He said; Alexis, take this pipe, the same
That taught the groves my Rosalinda's name:
But now the reeds shall hang on yonder tree,
For ever silent, since despis'd by thee.
O! were I made by some transforming power
The captive bird that sings within thy bower!
Then might my voice thy listening ears employ,
And I those kisses he receives enjoy.

And yet my numbers please the rural throng,
Rough satyrs dance, and Pan applauds the song. 50
The nymphs, forsaking every cave and spring,
Their early fruit and milk-white turtles bring!

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 27.

Oft in the crystal spring I cast a view,
And equall'd Hylas, if the glass be true;
But since those graces meet my eyes no more,
I shun, &c.

Each amorous nymph prefers her gifts in vain,
On you their gifts are all bestow'd again,
For you the swains the fairest flowers design,
And in one garland all their beauties join;
Accept the wreath which you deserve alone,
In whom all beauties are compris'd in one.

See what delights in sylvan scenes appear!
Descending Gods have found Elysium here. 60
In woods bright Venus with Adonis stray'd,
And chaste Diana haunts the forest shade.
Come, lovely nymph, and bless the silent hours,
When swains from sheering seek their nightly
bowers;

When weary reapers quit the sultry field,
And crown'd with corn their thanks to Ceres yield.
This harmless grove no lurking viper hides,
But in my breast the serpent Love abides.
Here bees from blossoms sip the rosy dew,
But your Alexis knows no sweets but you. 70

Oh deign to visit our forsaken seats,
The mossy fountains, and the green retreats!
Where'er you walk, cool gales shall fan the glade;
Trees, where you sit, shall crowd into a shade:
Where'er you tread, the blushing flowers shall rise,
And all things flourish where you turn your eyes.
Oh! how I long with you to pass my days,
Invoke the muses, and resound your praise!

Your praise the birds shall chant in every grove,
And winds shall waft it to the powers above. 80
But would you sing, and rival Orpheus' strain,
The wondering forests soon should dance again,
The moving mountains hear the powerful call,
And headlong streams hang listening in their fall!

But see, the shepherds shun the noon-day heat,
The lowing herds to murmur'ing brooks retreat,
To closer shades the panting flock remove;
Ye gods and is there no relief for love!
But soon the sun with milder rays descends
To the cool ocean, where his journey ends: 90
On me love's fiercer flames for ever prey,
By night he scorches, as he burns by day.

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 79, 80.

Your praise the tuneful birds to heaven shall bear,
And listening wolves grow milder as they hear.

So the verses were originally written; but the author, young as he was, soon found the absurdity, which Spenser himself overlooked, of introducing wolves into England.

Ver. 91. Me love inflames, nor will his fires allay.

AUTUMN.

THE THIRD PASTORAL, OR HYLAS AND ÆGON.

TO MR. WYCHERLY.

BENEATH the shade a spreading beech displays,
Hylas and Ægon sung their rural lays:
This mourn'd a faithless, that an absent love;
And Delia's name and Dori's fill'd the grove.
Ye Mantuan nymphs, your sacred succour bring;
Hylas and Ægon's rural lays I sing.

Thou, whom the nine with Plautus' wit inspire,
The art of Terence and Menander's fire;
Whose sense instructs us, and whose humour charms,
Whose judgment sways us, and whose spirit
warms! 10

Oh, skill'd in Nature! see the hearts of swains,
Their artless passions, and their tender pains.

Now setting Phœbus shone serenely bright,
And fleecy clouds were streak'd with purple light;
When tuneful Hylas, with melodious moan,
Taught rocks to weep, and made the mountains
groan.

Go, gentle gales, and bear my sighs away!
To Delia's ear the tender notes convey,
As some sad turtle his lost love deploras,
And with deep murmurs fills the sounding shores; 20
Thus, far from Delia, to the winds I mourn,
Alike unheard, unpity'd, and forlorn.

Go, gentle gales, and bear my sighs along!
For her, the feather'd quires neglect their song;
For her, the limes their pleasing shades deny;
For her, the lilies hang their heads and die.
Ye flowers that droop, forsaken by the spring,
Ye birds that, left by summer, cease to sing,
Ye trees that fade when autumn heats remove,
Say, is not absence death to those who love? 30

Go, gentle gales, and bear my sighs away!
Curs'd be the fields that cause my Delia's stay;
Fade every blossom, wither ever tree,
Die every flower, and perish all, but she.
What have I said? where'er my Delia flies,
Let spring attend, and sudden flowers arise!
Let opening roses knotted oaks adorn,
And liquid amber drop from every thorn.

Go, gentle gales, and bear my sighs along!
The birds shall cease to tune their evening song, 40
The winds to breathe, the waving woods to move,
And streams to murmur, ere I cease to love.
Not bubbling fountains to the thirsty swain,
Not balmy sleep to labourers faint with pain,

Not showers to larks, or sunshine to the bee,
Are half so charming as thy sight to me.

Go, gentle gales, and bear my sighs away!
Come, Delia, come; ah, why this long delay?
Through rocks and caves the name of Delia sounds,
Delia, each cave and echoing rock rebounds. 50
Ye powers, what pleasing frenzy soothes my mind!
Do lovers dream, or is my Delia kind?

She comes, my Delia comes!—Now cease my lay,
And cease, ye gales, to bear my sighs away! [mir'd;
Next Ægon sung, while Windsor groves ad-
Rehearse, ye muses, what yourselves inspir'd.

Resound, ye hills, resound my mournful strain!
Of perjur'd Doris, dying I complain;
Here where the mountains, lessening as they rise,
Lose the low vales, and steal into the skies; 60
While labouring oxen, spent with toil and heat,
In their loose traces from the field retreat;
While curling smokes from village tops are seen,
And the fleet shades glide o'er the dusky green.

Resound, ye hills, resound my mournful lay!
Beneath yon' poplar oft we pass'd the day:
Oft on the rind I carv'd her amorous vows,
While she with garlands hung the bending boughs:
The garlands fade, the vows are worn away;
So dies her love, and so my hopes decay. 70

Resound, ye hills, resound my mournful strain!
Now bright Arcturus glads the teeming grain;
Now golden fruits on loaded branches shine,
And grateful clusters swell with floods of wine;
Now blushing berries paint the yellow grove;
Just gods! shall all things yield returns but love!

Resound, ye hills, resound my mournful lay!
The shepherds cry, "Thy flocks are left a prey."
Ah! what avails it me, the flocks to keep,
Who lost my heart while I preserv'd my sheep? 80
Pan came, and ask'd, what magic caus'd my smart,
Or what ill eyes malignant glances dart?

VARIATION.

Ver. 48. Originally thus in the MS.
With him through Libya's burning plains I'll go,
On Alpine mountains tread th' eternal snow;
Yet feel no heat but what our loves impart,
And dread no coldness but in Thirsis' heart.

What eyes but hers, alas, have power to move !
 And is there magic but what dwells in love ?
 Resound, ye hills, resound my mournful strains !
 I'll fly from shepherds, flocks, and flowery plains.
 From shepherds, flocks, and plains, I may remove,
 Forfake mankind, and all the world—but love !
 I know thee, Love ! on foreign mountains bred,
 Wolves gave thee suck, and savage tigers fed. 90
 Thou wert from Ætna's burning entrails torn,
 Got by fierce whirlinds, and in thunder born !

Resound, ye hills, resound my mournful lay !
 Farewell, ye woods, adieu the light of day !
 One leap from yonder cliffs shall end my pains ;
 No more, ye hills, no more resound my strains !
 Thus sung the shepherds till th' approach of night,
 The skies yet blushing with departing light,
 When falling dews with spangles deck'd the glade,
 And the low sun had lengthen'd every shade. 100

W I N T E R.

THE FOURTH PASTORAL, OR DAPHNE.

TO THE MEMORY OF MRS. TEMPEST.

LYCIDAS.

THYRSIS, the music of that murmuring spring
 Is not so mournful as the strains you sing ;
 Nor rivers winding through the vales below,
 So sweetly warble, or so smoothly flow.
 Now sleeping flocks on their soft fleeces lie,
 The moon, serene in glory, mounts the sky,
 While silent birds forget their tuneful lays,
 O sing of Daphne's fate, and Daphne's praise !

THYRSIS.

Behold the groves that shine with silver frost,
 Their beauty wither'd, and their verdure lost. 10
 Here shall I try the sweet Alexis' strain,
 That call'd the listening Dyrades to the plain ?
 Thames heard the numbers, as he flow'd along,
 And bade his willows learn the moving song.

LYCIDAS.

So may kind rains their vital moisture yield,
 And swell the future harvest of the field.
 Begin ; this charge the dying Daphne gave,
 And said, " Ye shepherds, sing around my grave !"
 Sing, while beside the shaded tomb I mourn,
 And with fresh bays her rural shrine adorn. 20

THYRSIS.

Ye gentle muses, leave your crystal spring,
 Let Nymphs and Sylvans cypress garlands bring ;
 Ye weeping loves, the stream with myrtles hide,
 And break your bows as when Adonis dy'd ;
 And with your golden darts, now useless grown,
 Inscribe a verse on this relenting stone :
 " Let nature change, let heaven and earth deplore,
 " Fair Daphne's dead, and love is now no more."

'Tis done, and nature's various charms decay :
 See gloomy clouds obscure the cheerful day ! 30
 Now hung with pearls the dropping trees appear,
 Their faded honours scatter'd on her bier.
 See where, on earth, the flowery glories lie !
 With her they flourish'd and with her they die.
 Ah, what avail the beauties nature wore ?
 Fair Daphne's dead, and beauty is no more !

For her the flocks refuse their verdant food,
 The thirsty heifers shun the gliding flood ;
 The silver swans her hapless fate bemoan,
 In notes more sad than when they sing their own ; 40

In hollow caves sweet Echo silent lies,
 Silent, or only to her name replies ;
 Her name with pleasure once she taught the shore,
 Now Daphne's dead, and pleasure is no more !

No grateful dews descend from evening skies,
 Nor morning odours from the flowers arise ;
 No rich perfumes refresh the fruitful field,
 Nor fragrant herbs their native incense yield.
 The balmy zephyrs, silent since her death,
 Lament the ceasing of a sweeter breath ; 50
 Th' industrious bees neglect their golden store ;
 Fair Daphne's dead, and sweetness is no more !

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 29. Originally thus in the MS.

'Tis done, and nature's chang'd since you are gone ;
 Behold, the clouds have " put their mourning on."

No more the mounting larks, while Daphne sings,
 Shall, listening in mid air, suspend their wings;
 No more the birds shall imitate her lays,
 Or, hush'd with wonder, hearken from the sprays;
 No more the streams their wonder shall forbear,
 A sweeter music than their own to hear;
 But tell the reeds, and tell the vocal shore,
 Fair Daphne's dead, and music is no more! 60

Her fate is whisper'd by the gentle breeze,
 And told in sighs to all the trembling trees;
 The trembling trees, in every plain and wood,
 Her fate remurmur to the silver flood:
 The silver flood, so lately calm, appears
 Swell'd with new passion, and o'erflows with tears;
 The winds, and trees, and floods, her death deplore,

Daphne, our grief! our glory now no more!

But see! where Daphne wondering mounts on high

Above the clouds, above the starry sky! 70
 Eternal beauties grace the shining scene,
 Fields ever fresh, and groves for ever green!
 There while you rest in amaranthine bowers,
 Or from those meads select unfading flowers,
 Behold us kindly, who your name implore,
 Daphne, our goddess, and our grief no more!

LYCIDAS.

How all things listen, while thy muse complains!
 Such silence waits on Philomela's strains;

In some still evening, when the whispering breeze
 Pants on the leaves, and dies upon the trees 80
 To thee bright goddess, oft a lamb shall bleed,
 If teeming ewes increase my fleecy breed.
 While plants their shade, or flowers their odours give,

Thy name, thy honour, and thy praise shall live!

THYRSIS.

But see, Orion sheds unwholesome dew;
 Arise, the pines a noxious shade diffuse;
 Sharp Boreas blows, and nature feels decay,
 Time conquers all, and we must time obey.
 Adieu, ye vales, ye mountains, streams, and groves,
 Adieu, ye shepherds' rural lays and loves; 90
 Adieu, my flocks; farewell, ye Sylvan crew;
 Daphne, farewell; and all the world adieu!

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 83. Originally thus in the MS.

While vapours rise, and driving snows descend,
 Thy honour, name, and praise, shall never end.

NOTE.

Ver. 89. &c.] These four last lines allude to the several subjects of the four Pastorals, and to the several scenes of them particularised before in each.

M E S S I A H.

A SACRED ECLOGUE.

IN IMITATION OF VIRGIL'S POLLIO.

ADVERTISEMENT.

IN reading several passages of the prophet Isaiah, which foretel the coming of Christ, and the felicities attending it, I could not but observe a remarkable parity between many of the thoughts, and those in the Pollio of Virgil. This will not seem surprising, when we reflect, that the Eclogue was taken from a Sibylline prophecy on the same subject. One may judge that Virgil did not copy it line for line; but selected such ideas as best agreed with the nature of Pastoral Poetry, and disposed them in that manner which served most to beautify his piece. I have endeavoured the same in this imitation of him, though without admitting any thing of my own; since it was written with this particular view, that the reader, by comparing the several thoughts, might see how far the images and descriptions of the prophet are superior to those of the poet. But as I fear I have prejudiced them by my management, I shall subjoin the passages of Isaiah, and those of Virgil, under the same disadvantage of a literal translation.

Ye nymphs of Solyma! begin the song:
To heavenly themes sublimer strains belong.
The mossy fountains and the fylvan shades,
The dreams of Pindus and th' Aonian maids,
Delight no more—O thou my voice inspire
Who touch'd Isaiah's hallow'd lips with fire!
Rapt into future times, the bard begun!
A Virgin shall conceive, a Virgin bear a Son!
From * Jesse's root behold a branch arise,
Whose sacred flower with fragrance fills the skies: 10

IMITATIONS.

Ver. 8. A Virgin shall conceive—All crimes shall cease, &c.]

Virg. Ecl. iv. ver. 6.

Jam redit et Virgo, redeunt Saturnia regna;
Jam nova progenies cœlo demittitur alto.
Te duce, si qua mancant sceleris vestigia nostri,

* Isai. xi. ver. 1.

Th' Æthereal spirit o'er its leaves shall move,
And on its top descends the mystic Dove.
Ye † Heavens! from high the dewy nectar pour,
And in soft silence shed the kindly shower!
The ‡ sick and weak the healing plant shall aid,
From storms a shelter, and from heat a shade.

IMITATIONS.

Pacatumque reget patriis virtutibus orbem.

“ Now the Virgin returns, now the kingdom of “ Saturn returns, now a new progeny is sent down
“ from high heaven. By means of thee, whate“ ver relics of our crimes remain, shall be wiped “ away, and free the world from perpetual fears.
“ He shall govern the earth in peace, with the vir-

All crimes shall cease, and ancient frauds shall fail,
Returning * Justice lift aloft her scale;
Peace o'er the world her olive wand extend,
And white-rob'd Innocence from heav'n descend. 20
Swift fly the years, and rise th' expected morn!
Oh spring to light, auspicious babe, be born!
See, nature hastes her earliest wreaths to bring,
With all the incense of the breathing spring:
See † lofty Lebanon his head advance,
See nodding forests on the mountains dance:
See spicy clouds from lowly Saron rise,
And Carmel's flowery top perfumes the skies!
Hark! a glad voice the lonely desert cheers;
Prepare the ‡ way! a God, a God appears! 30

pleasing flowers about thee."

Isaiah, Ch. xxxi. ver. 1. "The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad, and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose." Ch. lx.

A God, a God! the vocal hills reply,
The rocks proclaim th' approaching Deity.
Lo, earth receives him from the bending skies;
Sink down, ye mountains; and ye vallies, rise;
With heads declin'd, ye cedars, homage pay;
Be smooth, ye rocks: ye rapid floods, give way!
The Saviour comes! by ancient hards foretold:
Hear him, ye deaf; and all ye blind, behold!
He from thick films shall purge the visual ray,
And on the sightless eye-ball pour the day: 40
'Tis he th' obstructed paths of sound shall clear,
And bid new music charm th' unfolding ear:
The * dumb shall sing, the lame his crutch forego,
And leap exulting like the bounding roe.
No sigh, no murmur, the wide world shall hear,
From every face he wipes off every tear.
In † adamant chains shall death be bound,
And hell's grim tyrant feel th' eternal wound.
As the good ‡ shepherd tends his fleecy care,
Seeks freshest pasture, and the purest air; 50
Explores the lost, the wandering sheep directs,
By day o'ersees them, and by night protects;
The tender lambs he raises in his arms,
Feeds from his hand, and in his bosom warms;
Thus shall mankind his guardian care engage,
The promis'd § father of the future age.
No more shall ¶ nation against nation rise,
Nor ardent warriors meet with hateful eyes,
Nor fields with gleaming steel be cover'd o'er,
The brazen trumpets kindle rage no more: 60
But useless lances into scythes shall bend,
And the broad falchion in a ploughshare end.
Then palaces shall rise; the joyful ¶ Son shall finish what his short-liv'd Sire begun;
Their vines a shadow to their race shall yield,
And the same hand that sow'd, shall reap the field.

Rise, crown'd with light, imperial * Salem, rise!
Exalt thy towery head, and lift thy eyes!
See a long † race thy spacious courts adorn;
See future sons, and daughters yet unborn,
In crowding ranks on every side arise,
Demanding life, impatient for the skies! 90
See barbarous ‡ nations at thy gates attend,
Walk in thy light, and in thy temple bend;
See thy bright altars throng'd with prostrate kings,
And heap'd with products of § Sabeen springs,
For thee Idume's spicy forests blow,
And seeds of gold in Ophir's mountains glow.
See heaven its sparkling portals wide display,
And break upon thee in a flood of day!
No more the rising || sun shall gild the morn,
Nor evening Cynthia fill her silver horn; 100
But lost, dissolv'd in thy superior rays,
One tide of glory, one unclouded blaze
O'erflow thy courts: the Light himself shall shine
Reveal'd, and God's eternal day be thine!
The ¶ seas shall waste, the skies in smoke decay,
Rocks fall to dust, and mountains melt away;
But fix'd his word, his saving power remains;
Thy realm for ever lasts, thy own Messiah reigns!

WINDSOR-FOREST.

To the Right Honourable

GEORGE LORD LANSDOWN.

" Non injussa cano : Te nostræ, Vare, myricæ,
" Te Nemus omne canet : Nec Phœbo gratior ulla est,
" Quam sibi quæ Vari præscripsit pagina nomen."

VIRG.

THIS poem was written at two different times : the first part of it, which relates to the country, in the year 1704, at the same time with the pastorals : the latter part was not added till the year 1713, in which it was published.

THE forests, Windsor! and thy green retreats,
At once the monarch's and the muse's seats,
Invite my lays. Be present, Sylvan maids!
Unlock your springs, and open all your shades.
Granville commands; your aid, O muses, bring!
What muse for Granville can refuse to sing?
The groves of Eden, vanish'd now so long,
Live in description, and look green in song;
These, were my breast inspir'd with equal flame,
Like them in beauty, should be like in fame. 10
Here hills and vales, the woodland and the plain,
Here earth and water seem to strive again;
Not chaos-like together crush'd and bruis'd,
But, as the world, harmoniously confus'd;
Where order in variety we see,
And where, though all things differ, all agree.
Here waving groves a chequer'd scene display,
And part admit, and part exclude the day;

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 3, &c. Originally thus:

Chaste goddesses of the woods,
Nymphs of the vales, and Naiads of the floods,
Lead me through arching bow'rs, and glimm'ring
glades,
Unlock your springs—

As some coy nymph her lover's warm address
Nor quite indulges, nor can quite repress. 20
There, interspers'd in lawns and opening glades,
Thin trees arise that shun each other's shades.
Here in full light the russet plains extend;
There, wrapt in clouds, the bluish hills ascend.
Ev'n the wild heath displays her purple dyes,
And 'midst the desert, fruitful fields arise, [corn,
That, crown'd with tufted trees and springing
Like verdant isles the sable waste adorn.
Let India boast her plants, nor envy we
The weeping amber, or the balmy tree, 30
While by our oaks the precious loads are borne,
And realms commanded which those trees adorn.
Nor proud Olympus yields a nobler sight,
Though gods assembled grace his towering height,
Than what more humble mountains offer here,
Where, in their blessings, all those gods appear.

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 25. Originally thus:

Why should I sing our better suns or air,
Whose vital draughts prevent the leach's care,
While through fresh fields th' enliv'ning odours
breathe,
Or spread with vernal blooms the purple heath?

See Pan with flocks, with fruits Pomona crown'd
Here blushing Flora paints th' enamell'd ground,
Here Ceres' gifts in waving prospect stand,
And nodding tempt the joyful reaper's hand; 40
Rich Industry sits smiling on the plains,
And peace and plenty tell, a Stuart reigns.

Not thus the land appear'd in ages past,
A dreary desert, and a gloomy waste,
To savage beasts and savage laws a prey,
And kings more furious and severe than they;
Who claim'd the skies, dispeopled air and floods,
The lonely lords of empty wilds and woods:
Cities laid waste, they storm'd the dens and caves
(For wiser brutes were backward to be slaves). 50

What could be free, when lawless beasts obey'd,
And ev'n the elements a tyrant sway'd?
In vain kind seasons swell'd the teeming grain,
Soft showers distill'd, and suns grew warm in vain;
The swain with tears his frustrate labour yields,
And famish'd dies amidst his ripen'd fields.

What wonder then, a beast or subject slain
Were equal crimes in a despotic reign?

Both doom'd alike for sportive tyrants bled,
But, while the subject starv'd, the beast was fed.

Proud Nimrod first the bloody chace began, 61
A mighty hunter, and his prey was man:

Our haughty Norman boasts that barbarous name,
And makes his trembling slaves the royal game.

The fields are ravish'd from th' industrious
swains,

From men their cities, and from gods their fanes:
The levell'd towns with weeds lie cover'd o'er;

The hollow winds through naked temples roar;
Round broken columns clasping ivy twin'd;

O'er heaps of ruin stalk'd the stately hind; 70
The fox obscene to gaping tombs retires,

And savage howlings fill the sacred quires.
Aw'd by his nobles, by his commons curst,

Th' Oppressor rul'd tyrannic where he durst,
Stretch'd o'er the poor and church his iron rod,

And serv'd alike his vassals and his God.
Whom ev'n the Saxon spar'd, and bloody Dane,

The wanton victims of his sport remain.
But see, the man who spacious regions gave

A waste for beasts, himself deny'd a grave! 80

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 49. Originally thus in the MS.
From towns laid waste, to dens and caves they ran

Ver. 57, &c.

No wonder savages or subjects slain—
But subjects starv'd, while savages were fed.

It was originally thus; but the word Savages is not properly applied to beasts, but to men; which occasioned the alteration.

Ver. 72. And wolves with howling fill, &c.
The Author thought this an error, wolves not being common in England at the time of the Conqueror.

Stretch'd on the lawn his second hope survey,
At once the chacer, and at once the prey:
Lo! Rufus, tugging at the deadly dart,
Bleeds in the forest like a wounded hart.
Succeeding monarchs heard the subjects cries,
Nor saw displeas'd the peaceful cottage rise.
Then gathering flocks on unknown mountains fed,
O'er sandy wilds were yellow harvests spread,
The forests wonder'd at th' unusual grain,
And secret transport touch'd the conscious swain.
Fair Liberty, Britannia's goddess, rears 91
Her cheerful head, and leads the golden years.

Ye vigorous swains! while youth ferments your blood,

And purer spirits swell the sprightly flood,
Now range the hills, the gameful woods beset,
Wind the shrill horn, or spread the waving net.
When milder autumn summer's heat succeeds,
And in the new-shorn field the partridge feeds;
Before his lord the ready spaniel bounds,
Panting with hope, he tries the furrow'd grounds; 100
But when the tainted gales the game betray,
Couch'd close he lies, and meditates the prey:

Secure the trust th' unfaithful field beset,
Till hovering o'er them sweeps the swelling net.

Thus (if small things we may with great compare)

When Albion sends her eager sons to war,

Some thoughtless town, with ease and plenty blest,

Near and more near, the closing lines invest,

Sudden they seize th' amaz'd defenceless prize,

And high in air Britannia's standard flies. 110

See! from the brake the whirring pheasant

springs,

And mounts exulting on triumphant wings:

Short is his joy; he feels the fiery wound,

Flutters in blood, and panting beats the ground.

Ah! what avail his glossy varying dies,

His purple crest, and scarlet circled eyes,

The vivid green his shining plumes unfold,

His painted wings, and breast that flames with gold?

Nor yet when moist Arcturus clouds the sky,

The woods and fields their pleasing toils deny. 120

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 91.

Oh may no more a foreign master's rage,
With wrongs yet legal, curse a future age!
Still spread, fair liberty: thy heav'nly wings,
Breathe plenty on the fields, and fragrance on the springs.

Ver. 97.

When yellow autumn summer's heat succeeds,
And into wine the purple harvest bleeds,
The partridge feeding in the new-shorn fields,
Both morning sports and ev'ning pleasure yields.

Ver. 107. It stood thus in the first edition:
Pleas'd, in the general's sight, the host lie down
Sudden before some unsuspecting town;
The young, the old, one instant makes our prize,
And o'er their captive heads Britannia's standard
flies, 2

To plains with well-breath'd beagles we repair,
 And trace the mazes of the circling hare
 (Beasts, urg'd by us, their fellow beasts pursue,
 And learn of man each other to undo):
 With slaughtering guns th' unweary'd fowler roves,
 When frosts have whiten'd all the naked groves;
 Where doves in flocks the leafless trees o'ershade,
 And lonely woodcocks haunt the watery glade.
 He lifts the tube, and levels with his eye;
 Strait a short thunder breaks the frozen sky: 130
 Oft, as in airy rings they skim the heath,
 The clamorous lapwings feels the leaden death;
 Oft, as the mounting larks their notes prepare,
 They fall, and leave their little lives in air.

In genial spring, beneath the quivering shade,
 Where cooling vapours breathe along the mead,
 The patient fisher takes his silent stand,
 Intent, his angle trembling in his hand:
 With looks unmov'd, he hopes the scaly breed,
 And eyes the dancing cork and bending reed, 140
 Our plenteous streams a various race supply,
 The bright-ey'd perch with fins of Tyrian dye,
 The silver eel, in shining volumes roll'd,
 The yellow carp, in scales bedropp'd with gold,
 Swift trouts, diversify'd with crimson stains,
 And pikes, the tyrants of the watery plains.

Now Cancer glows with Phœbus' fiery car:
 The youth rush eager to the Sylvan war,
 Swarm o'er the lawns, the forest walks surround,
 Rouze the fleet hart, and cheer the opening
 hound. 150

Th' impatient courser pants in every vein,
 And, pawing, seems to beat the distant plain:
 Hills, vales, and floods, appear already cross'd,
 And, ere he starts, a thousand steps are lost.
 See the bold youth strain up the threat'ning steep,
 Rush through the thickets, down the vallies sweep,
 Hang o'er their courser's heads with eager speed,
 And earth rolls back beneath the flying steed.
 Let old Arcadia boast her ample plain,
 Th' immortal huntress, and her virgin-train; 160
 Nor envy, Windsor! since thy shades have seen
 As bright a goddess, and as chaste a queen;
 Whose care, like her's, protects the Sylvan reign,
 The earth's fair light, and empress of the main.

Here, too, 'tis sung, of old Diana stray'd,
 And Cynthus' top forsook for Windsor shade;
 Here was she seen o'er airy wastes to rove,
 Seek the clear spring, or haunt the pathless
 grove;

Here arm'd with silver bows, in early dawn,
 Her buskin'd virgins trac'd the dewy lawn. 170

Above the rest a rural nymph was fam'd,
 Thy offspring, Thames! the fair Lodona nam'd (Lodona's fate, in long oblivion cast,
 The muse shall sing, and what she sings shall last).

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 126.

O'er rustling leaves around the naked groves.

Ver. 129,

The fowler lifts his level'd tube on high.

Scarce could the goddess from her nymph be known,

But by the crescent and the golden zone.
 She scorn'd the praise of beauty, and the care;
 A belt her waist, a fillet binds her hair;
 A painted quiver on her shoulder sounds,
 And with her dart the flying deer she wounds. 180
 It chanc'd, as, eager of the chace, the maid
 Beyond the forest's verdant limits stray'd,
 Pan saw and lov'd, and burning with desire
 Pursu'd her flight; her flight increas'd his fire.
 Not half so swift the trembling doves can fly,
 When the fierce eagle cleaves the liquid sky;
 Not half so swiftly the fierce eagle moves,
 When through the clouds he drives the trembling
 doves;

As from the god she flew with furious pace,
 Or as the god, more furious, urg'd the chace. 190
 Now fainting, sinking, pale, the nymph appears;
 Now close behind, his sounding steps she hears;
 And now his shadow reach'd her as she run,
 His shadow lengthen'd by the setting sun;
 And now his shorter breath, with sultry air,
 Pants on her neck, and fans her parting hair.
 In vain on father Thames she calls for aid,
 Nor could Diana help her injur'd maid.
 Faint, breathless, thus she pray'd, nor pray'd in vain;

" Ah, Cynthia! ah—though banish'd from thy
 " train, 200

" Let me, O let me, to the shades repair,
 " My native shades!—there weep and murmur
 " there!"

She said, and, melting as in tears she lay,
 In a soft silver stream dissolv'd away.
 The silver stream her virgin coldness keeps,
 For ever murmurs, and for ever weeps;
 Still bears the name the hapless virgin bore,
 And bathes the forest where she rang'd before.
 In her chaste current oft the goddess laves,
 And with celestial tears augments the waves. 210
 Oft in her glass the musing shepherd spies
 The headlong mountains and the downward skies,
 The watery landskip of the pendant woods,
 And absent trees that tremble in the floods;
 In the clear azure gleam the flocks are seen,
 And floating forests paint the waves with green;
 Through the fair scene roll flow the lingering streams,
 Then foaming pour along, and rush unto the Thames.

Thou, too, great father of the British floods!
 With joyful pride survey'st our lofty woods; 220
 Where towering oaks their growing honours rear,
 And future navies on thy shores appear.
 Not Neptune's self from all her streams receives
 A wealthier tribute, than to thine he gives.
 No seas so rich, so gay no banks appear,
 No lake so gentle, and no spring so clear.
 Nor Po so swells the fabling poet's lays,
 While led along the skies his current strays.
 As thine, which visits Windsor's fam'd abodes,
 To grace the mansion of our earthly gods: 230
 Nor all his stars above a lustre show,
 Like the bright beauties on thy banks below;

Where Jove, subdu'd by mortal passion still,
Might change Olympus for a nobler hill.

Happy the man whom this bright court approves,

His sovereign favours, and his country loves :
Happy next him, who to these shades retires,
Whom nature charms, and whom the muse inspires ;

Whom humbler joys of home-felt quiet please,
Successive study, exercise, and ease. 240

He gathers health from herbs the forest yields,
And of their fragrant physic spoils the fields ;
With chemic art exalts the mineral powers,
And draws the aromatic souls of flowers :
Now marks the course of rolling orbs on high ;
O'er figur'd worlds now travels with his eye ;
Of ancient writ unlocks the learned store,
Consults the dead, and lives past ages o'er :
Or wandering thoughtful on the silent wood,
Attends the duties of the wife and good, 250

T' observe a mean, be to himself a friend,
To follow nature, and regard his end ;
Or looks on heaven with more than mortal eyes,
Bids his free soul expatiate in the skies,
Amid her kindred stars familiar roam,
Survey the region, and confess her home !
Such was the life great Scipio once admir'd,
Thus Atticus and Trumbull thus retir'd.

Ye sacred nine ! that all my soul possesses,
Whose raptures fire me, and whose visions blest, 260
Bear me, oh bear me to sequester'd scenes,
The bowery mazes, and surrounding greens ;
To Thames's banks which fragrant breezes fill,
Or where the muses sport on Cooper's Hill
(On Coopers Hill eternal wreaths shall grow, While lasts the mountain, or while Thames shall flow) :

I seem through consecrated walks to rove,
I hear soft music die along the grove :
Led by the sound, I roam from shade to shade,
By god-like poets venerable made : 270

Here his first lays majestic Denham sung ;
There the last numbers flow'd from Cowley's tongue.

O early lost ! what tears the river shed,
When the sad pomp along his banks was led !

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 233. It stood thus in the MS.
And force great Jove, if Jove's a lover still,
To change Olympus, &c.

Ver. 235.

Happy the man, who to the shades retires,
But doubly happy, if the muse inspires !
Blest whom the sweets of home-felt quiet please ;
But far more blest, whose study joins with ease.

Ver. 267. It stood thus in the MS.
Methinks around your holy scenes I rove,
And hear your music echoing through the grove ;
With transport visit each inspiring shade,
By godlike poets venerable made.

His drooping swans on every note expire,
And on his willows hung each muse's lyre.

Since fate relentless stopp'd their heavenly voice,
No more the forests ring, or groves rejoice ;
Who now shall charm the shades, where Cowley strung

His living harp, and lofty Denham sung 280

But hark ! the groves rejoice, the forest rings !
Are these reviv'd ? or is it Granville sings !
'Tis yours, my Lord, to bless our soft retreats,
And call the muses to their ancient seats ;
To paint anew the flowery Sylvan scenes,
To crown the forest with immortal greens,
Make Windsor hills in lofty numbers rise,
And lift her turrets nearer to the skies ;
To sing those honours you deserve to wear,
And add new lustre to her silver star. 290

Here noble Surrey felt the sacred rage,
Surrey, the Granville of a former age :
Matchless his pen, victorious was his lance,
Bold in the lists, and graceful in the dance :
In the same shades the Cupids tun'd his lyre,
To the same notes, of love, and soft desire :
Fair Geraldine, bright object of his vow,
Then fill'd the groves, as heavenly Mira now.

Oh wouldst thou sing what heroes Windsor
bore,

What king first breath'd upon her winding
shore, 300

Or raise old warriors, whose ador'd remains
In weeping vaults her hallow'd earth contains !
With Edward's acts adorn the shining page,
Stretch his long triumphs down through every age ;
Draw monarchs chain'd, and Cressi's glorious field,
The lilies blazing on the regal shield :
Then, from her roofs when Verrio's colours fall,
And leave inanimate the naked wall,
Still in thy song should vanquish'd France appear,
And bleed for ever under Britain's spear. 310

Let softer strains ill-fated Henry mourn,
And palms eternal flourish round his urn.
Here o'er the martyr-king the marble weeps,
And, fast behind him, once-fear'd Edward sleeps ;

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 275.

What sighs, what murmurs, fill'd the vocal shore !
His tuneful swans were heard to sing no more.

Ver. 290. her silver star.] All the lines that follow were not added to the poem till the year 1710. What immediately followed this, and made the conclusion, were these :

My humble muse, in unambitious strains,
Paints the green forests and the flowery plains ;
Where I obscurely pass my careless days,
Pleas'd in the silent shade with empty praise,
Enough for me that to the listening swains
First in these fields I sung the Sylvan strains.

Ver. 307. Originally thus in the MS.
When brass decays, when trophies lie o'erthrown,
And mouldering into dust drops the proud stone.

WINDSOR FOREST.

Whom not th' extended Albion could contain,
From old Belerium to the northern main,
The grave unites; where ev'n the great find rest,
And bleaded lie th' oppressor and th' oppressed!

Make sacred Charles's tomb for ever known
(Obscure the place, and uninscrib'd the stone); 320
Oh fact accurs'd! what tears has Albion shed!
Heavens, what new wounds! and how her old have bled!

She saw her sons with purple deaths expire,
Her sacred domes involv'd in rolling fire,
A dreadful series of intestine wars,
Inglorious triumphs, and dishonest scars.

At length great Anna said, "Let discord cease!"
She said, the world obey'd, and all was peace!

In that blest moment from his oozy bed
Old father Thames advanc'd his reverend head.
His tresses dropp'd with dews, and o'er the stream
His shining horns diffus'd a golden gleam:

Grav'd on his urn appear'd the moon, that guides
His swelling waters, and alternate tides;
The figur'd streams in waves of silver roll'd,
And on their banks Augusta rose in gold;

Around his throne the sea-born brothers stood
Who swell with tributary urns his flood!
First the fam'd authors of this ancient name,
The winding Isis, and the fruitful Thame: 340

The Kennet swift, for silver eels renown'd;
The Loddon flow, with verdant alders crown'd;
Cole, whose dark streams his flowery islands lave;
And chalky Wey, that rolls a milky wave:

The blue, transparent Vandalis appears;
The gulfy Lee his sedgy tresses rears;
And sullen Mole, that hides his diving flood;
And silent Darent, stain'd with Danish blood.

High in the midst, upon his urn reclin'd,
(His sea-green mantle waving with the wind) 350
The god appear'd: he turn'd his azure eyes
Where Windsor-domes and pompous turrets rise;

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 321. Originally thus in the MS.
Oh fact accurs'd! oh sacrilegious brood,
Sworn to rebellion, principled in blood!
Since that dire morn, what tears has Albion shed:
Gods what new wounds, &c.

Ver. 327. Thus in the MS.
Till Anna rose, and bade the furies cease;
Let there be peace—she said, and all was peace.

Between verse 330 and 331, originally stood these lines:

From shore to shore exulting shouts he heard,
O'er all his banks a lambient light appear'd;
With sparkling flames heaven's glowing concave
shone,
Fictitious stars, and glories not her own.
He saw, and gently rose above the stream;
His shining horns diffuse a golden gleam:
With pearl and gold his towery front was drest,
The tributes of the distant east and west.

Then bow'd, and spoke; the winds forget to roar,
And the hush'd waves glide softly to the shore.

Hail, sacred peace! hail, long-expected days,
That Thames's glory to the stars shall raise!
Though Tiber's streams immortal Rome behold,
Though foaming Hermus swells with tides of gold,
From heaven itself the seven-fold Nilus flows,
And harvests on a hundred realms bestows; 360

These now no more shall be the muses' themes,
Lost in my fame, as in the sea their streams.
Let Volga's banks with iron squadrons shine,
And groves of lances glitter on the Rhine;
Let barbarous Ganges arm a servile train:
Be mine the blessings of a peaceful reign.

No more my sons shall die with British blood,
Red Iber's sands, or Ister's foaming flood:
Safe on my shore each unmolested swain
Shall tend the flocks, or reap the bearded grain; 370
The shady empire shall retain no trace

Of war or blood, but in the Sylvan chace;
The trumpet sleep, while cheerful horns are blown,
And arms employ'd on birds and beasts alone.
Behold! th' ascending villas on my side,
Project long shadows o'er the crystal tide.

Behold! Augusta's glittering spires increase,
And temples rise, the beauteous works of peace.
I see, I see, where two fair cities bend
Their ample bow, a new Whitehall ascend! 380

There mighty nations shall inquire their doom,
The world's great oracle in times to come;
There kings shall sue, and suppliant states be seen
Once more to bend before a British queen.

Thy trees, fair Windsor! now shall leave their woods,

And half thy forests rush into thy floods;
Bear Britain's thunder, and her cross display,
To the bright regions of the rising day:
Tempt icy seas, where scarce the waters roll,
Where clearer flames glow round the frozen pole;
Or under southern skies exalt their sails, 390

Led by new stars, and borne by spicy gales!
For me the balm shall bleed, and amber flow,
The coral redden, and the ruby glow,
The pearly shell its lucid globe unfold,
And Phœbus warm the ripening ore to gold.
The time shall come, when free as seas or wind
Unbounded Thames shall flow for all mankind,
Whole nations enter with each swelling tide,
And seas but join the regions they divide; 400

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 363. Originally thus in the MS.
Let Venice boast her towers amidst the main,
Where the rough Adrian swells and roars in vain:
Here not a town, but spacious realm shall have
A sure foundation on the rolling wave.

Ver. 385, &c. were originally thus in the MS.
Now shall our fleets the bloody cross display
To the rich regions of the rising day,
Or those green isles, where headlong Titan sleeps
His hissing axle in th' Atlantic deeps:
Tempt icy seas, &c.

Earth's distant ends our glory shall behold,
 And the new world launch forth to seek the old.
 Then ships of uncouth form shall stem the tide,
 And feather'd people crowd my wealthy side,
 And naked youths and painted chiefs admire,
 Our speech, our colour, and our strange attire!
 Oh, stretch thy reign, fair peace! from shore to shore,
 Till conquest cease, and slavery be no more;
 Till the freed Indians in their native groves
 Reap their own fruits, and woo their sable loves;
 Peru once more a race of kings behold, 411
 And other Mexicos be roof'd with gold.
 Exil'd by thee from earth to deepest hell,
 In brazen bonds shall barbarous discord dwell:
 Gigantic pride, pale terror, gloomy care,
 And mad ambition, shall attend her there:
 There purple vengeance bath'd in gore retires,
 Her weapons blunted, and extinct her fires:

There hateful envy her own snakes shall feel,
 And persecution mourn her broken wheel: 420
 There faction roar, rebellion bite her chain,
 And gasping furies thirst for blood in vain.
 Here cease thy flight, nor with unhallow'd lays

Touch the fair fame of Albion's golden days:
 The thoughts of gods let Granville's verse recite,
 And bring the scenes of opening fate to light:
 My humble muse, in unambitious strains,
 Paints the green forests and the flowery plains,
 Where peace descending bids her olive spring,
 And scatters blessings from her dove-like wing.
 Ev'n I more sweetly pass my careless days, 431
 Pleas'd in the silent shade with empty praise;
 Enough for me, that to the listening swains
 First in these fields I sung the Sylvan strains.

ODES.

ODE FOR MUSIC ON ST. CECILIA'S DAY.

i.

DESCEND, ye nine ! descend, and sing ;
The breathing instruments inspire ;
Wake into voice each silent string,
And sweep the sounding lyre !
In a sadly-pleasing strain
Let the warbling lute complain ;
Let the loud trumpet sound,
Till the roofs all around
The shrill echoes rebound :
While, in more lengthen'd notes and flow,
The deep, majestic, solemn organs blow,
Hark ! the numbers soft and clear
Gently steal upon the ear ;
Now louder, and yet louder rise,
And fill with spreading sounds the skies ;
Exulting in triumph now swell the bold notes,
In broken air trembling, the wild music floats ;
Till, by degrees, remote and small,
The strains decay,
And melt away,
In a dying, dying fall.

ii.

By music, minds an equal temper know,
Nor swell too high, nor sink too low.
If in the breast tumultuous joys arise,
Music her soft, assuasive voice applies ;
Or when the soul is press'd with cares,
Exalts her in enlivening airs.
Warriors she fires with animated sounds ;
Pours balm into the bleeding lover's wounds ;
Melancholy lifts her head,
Morpheus rouses from his bed,
Sloth unfolds her arms and wakes,
Listening envy drops her snakes ;
Intestine war no more our passions wage,
And giddy factions hear away their rage.

iii.

But when our country's cause provokes to arms,
How martial music every bosom warms !
So when the first bold vessel dar'd the seas,
High on the stern the Thracian rais'd his strain,
While Argo saw her kindred trees
Descend from Pelion to the main.

Transported demi-gods stood round,
And men grew heroes at the sound,
Enflam'd with glory's charms :
Each chief his seven-fold shield display'd,
And half unsheath'd the shining blade :
And seas, and rocks, and skies, rebound
To arms, to arms, to arms !

iv.

But when through all th' infernal bounds,
Which flaming Phlegeton furrounds,
Love, strong as death, the poets led
To the pale nations of the dead,
What sounds were heard,
What scenes appear'd,
O'er all the dreary coasts !
Dreadful gleams,
Dismal screams,
Fires that glow,
Shrieks of woe,
Sullen moans,
Hollow groans,
And cries of tortur'd ghosts !
But hark ! he strikes the golden lyre ;
And see ! the tortur'd ghosts respire.
See, shady forms advance !
Thy stone, O Sisyphus, stands still,
Ixion rests upon his wheel,
And the pale spectres dance !
The furies sink upon their iron beds,
And snakes, uncurl'd, hang listening round their heads.

By the streams that ever flow,
By the fragrant winds that blow
O'er the Elysian flowers ;
By those happy souls who dwell
In yellow meads of asphodel,
Or amaranthine bowers ;
By the hero's armed shades,
Glittering through the gloomy glades ;
By the youths that dy'd for love,
Wandering in the myrtle grove,
Restore, restore Eurydice to life :
Oh, take the husband, or return the wife !

He sung, and hell consented
 To hear the poet's prayer;
 Stern Proserpine relented,
 And gave him back the fair.
 Thus song could prevail
 O'er death, and o'er hell,
 A conquest how hard and how glorious!
 Though fate had fast bound her
 With Styx nine times round her,
 Yet music and love were victorious.

VI.

But soon, too soon, the lover turns his eyes:
 Again she falls, again she dies, she dies!
 How wilt thou now the fatal sisters move?
 No crime was thine, if 'tis no crime to love.
 Now under hanging mountains,
 Beside the falls of fountains,
 Or where Hebrus wanders
 Rolling in mæanders
 All alone,
 Unheard, unknown,
 He makes his moan;
 And calls her ghost,
 For ever, ever, ever lost!
 Now with furies surrounded,
 Despairing, confounded,
 He trembles, he glows,
 Amidst Rhodope's snows:

See, wild as the winds, o'er the desert he flies;
 Hark! Hæmus resounds with the Bacchanals cries—

Ah, see, he dies!

Yet, ev'n in death Eurydice he sung;
 Eurydice still trembled on his tongue;
 Eurydice the woods,
 Eurydice the floods,
 Eurydice the rocks and hollow mountains rung.

VII.

Music the fiercest grief can charm,
 And fate's severest rage disarm:
 Music can soften pain to ease,
 And make despair and madness please:
 Our joys below it can improve,
 And antedate the bliss above.
 This the divine Cecilia found,
 And to her Maker's praise confin'd the sound.
 When the full organ joins the tuneful quire,
 Th' immortal powers incline their ear;
 Borne on the swelling notes our souls aspire,
 While solemn airs improve the sacred fire;
 And angels lean from heaven to hear.
 Of Orpheus now no more let poets tell,
 To bright Cecilia greater power is given:
 His numbers rais'd a shade from hell,
 Her's lift the soul to heaven.

TWO CHORUSES

TO THE TRAGEDY OF BRUTUS.

Altered from Shakspeare by the Duke of Buckingham; at whose desire these two Choruses were composed, to supply as many, wanting in his play. They were set many years afterwards by the famous Bononcini, and performed at Buckingham-house.

CHORUS OF ATHENIANS.

STROPHE I.

YE shades, where sacred truth is sought;
 Groves, where immortal fates taught;
 Where heavenly visions Plato fir'd,
 And Epicurus lay inspir'd!
 In vain your guiltless laurels stood
 Unspotted long with human blood.
 War, horrid war, your thoughtful walks invades,
 And steel now glitters in the muses shades.

ANTISTROPHE I.

Oh, heaven-born sisters! source of art!
 Who charm the sense, or mend the heart;
 Who lead fair virtue's train along,
 Mortal truth and mystic song!
 To what new clime, what distant sky,
 Forsaken, friendless, shall ye fly?

Say, will ye bless the bleak Atlantic shore?
 Or bid the furious Gaul be rude no more?

STROPHE II.

When Athens sinks by fates unjust,
 When wild barbarians spurn her dust;
 Perhaps ev'n Britain's utmost shore
 Shall cease to blush with stranger's gore;
 See arts her savage sons controul,
 And Athens rising near the pole!
 Till some new tyrant lifts his purple hand,
 And civil madness tears them from the land.

ANTISTROPHE II.

Ye gods, what justice rules the ball!
 Freedom and arts together fall;
 Fools grant whate'er ambition craves,
 And men, once ignorant, are slaves.
 Oh, curs'd effects of civil hate,
 In ev'ry age, in every state!

Still, when the lust of tyrant power succeeds,
Some Athens perishes, some Tully bleeds.

CHORUS OF YOUTHS AND VIRGINS.

SEMICHORUS.

Oh, tyrant love! hast thou possess'd
The prudent, learn'd, and virtuous breast!
Wisdom and wit in vain reclaim,
And arts but soften us to feel thy flame.
Love, soft intruder, enters here,
But entering learns to be sincere.
Marcus with blushes owns he loves,
And Brutus tenderly reproveth.
Why, virtue, dost thou blame desire,
Which nature has impress'd?
Why, nature, dost thou soonest fire
The mild and generous breast?

CHORUS.

Love's purer flames the gods approve;
The gods and Brutus bend to love:
Brutus for absent Porcia sighs,
And sterner Cassius melts at Junia's eyes.
What is loose love? a transient gust,
Spent in a sudden storm of lust;
A vapour fed from wild desire,
A wandering, self-consuming fire.

But Hymen's kinder flames unite,
And burn for ever one;
Chaste as cold Cynthia's virgin light,
Productive as the sun.

SEMICHORUS.

Oh, source of every social tie,
United wish, and mutual joy!
What various joys on one attend,
As son, as father, brother, husband, friend!
Whether his hoary fire he spies,
While thousand grateful thoughts arise;
Or meets his spouse's fonder eye;
Or views his smiling progeny;
What tender passions take their turns,
What home-felt raptures move!
His heart now melts, now leaps, now burns,
With reverence, hope, and love.

CHORUS.

Hence guilty joys, distastes, surmises,
Hence false tears, deceits, disguises,
Dangers, doubts, delays, surprises;
Fires that scorch, yet dare not shine:
Purest love's unwasting treasure,
Constant faith, fair hope, long leisure;
Days of ease, and nights of pleasure;
Sacred Hymen! these are thine.

ODE ON SOLITUDE.

Written when the Author was about Twelve Years old.

HAPPY the man, whose wish and care
A few paternal acres bound,
Content to breathe his native air,
In his own ground.
Whose herds with milk, whose fields with bread,
Whose flocks supply him with attire;
Whose trees in summer yield him shade,
In winter fire.
Blest, who can unconcern'dly find
Hours, days, and years slide soft away,
In health of body, peace of mind,
Quiet by day,
Sound sleep by night; study and ease,
Together mix'd; sweet recreation,
And innocence, which most does please
With meditation.
Thus let me live, unseen, unknown;
Thus unlamented let me die,
Steal from the world, and not a stone
Tell where I lie,

O D E.

THE DYING CHRISTIAN TO HIS SOUL.

I.

VITAL spark of heavenly flame!
Quit, oh quit this mortal frame:
Trembling, hoping, lingering, flying,
Oh the pain, the bliss of dying!
Cease, fond Nature, cease thy strife,
And let me languish into life.

II.

Hark! they whisper; Angels say,
Sister Spirit, come away.
What is this absorbs me quite?
Steals my senses, shuts my sight,
Drowns my spirits, draws my breath?
Tell me, my soul, can this be death?

III.

The world recedes; it disappears!
Heaven opens on my eyes! my ears
With sounds seraphic ring:
Lend, lend your wings! I mount! I fly!
O Grave! where is thy victory?
O Death! where is thy sting?

INTRODUCTION. That 'tis as great a fault to judge ill, as to write ill, and a more dangerous one to the public, ver. 1.

ESSAY ON CRITICISM.

'Tis hard to say, if greater want of skill
Appear in writing or in judging ill;
But of the two, less dangerous is th' offence
To tire our patience, than mislead our sense.
Some few in that, but numbers err in this,
Ten censure wrong for one who writes amiss;
A fool might once himself alone expose,
Now one in verse makes many more in prose.

'Tis with our judgments as our watches; none
Go just alike, yet each believes his own. 10

In poets as true genius is but rare,
True taste as seldom is the critic's share;
Both must alike from Heaven derive their light,
These born to judge, as well as those to write.
Let such teach others who themselves excel,
And censure freely who have written well:
Authors are partial to their wit, 'tis true;
But are not critics to their judgment too?

Yet, if we look more closely, we shall find
Most have the seeds of judgment in their mind: 20
Nature affords at least a glimmering light; [right,
The lines, though touch'd but faintly, are drawn
But as the slightest sketch, if justly trac'd,
Is by ill colouring but the more disgrac'd;
So by false learning is good sense defac'd: }
Some are bewilder'd in the maze of schools,
And some made coxcombs nature meant but fools.
In search of wit these lose their common sense,
And then turn critics in their own defence:
Each burns alike, who can, or cannot write, 30
Or with a rivals, or an eunuch's spite.
All fools have still an itching to deride,
And fain would be upon the laughing side.
If Mævius scribble in Apollo's spite,
There are who judge still worse than he can write.

Some have at first for wits, then poets past;
Turn'd critics next, and prov'd plain fools at last.
Some neither can for wits nor critics pass,
As heavy mules are neither horse nor ass.

VARIATIONS.

Between ver. 25 and 26 were these lines, since omitted by the Author:

Many are spoil'd by that pedantic throng,
Who with great pains teach youth to reason wrong:
Tutors, like virtuosos, oft inclin'd
By strange transfusion to improve the mind,
Draw off the sense we have, to pour in new:
Which yet, with all their skill, they ne'er could do.

Ver. 30, 31. In the first edition thus:
Those hate as rivals all that write; and others
But envy wits, as eunuchs envy lovers.

Ver. 32. "All fools," in the first edition: "All such," in edition, 1717; since restored.

VOL. VIII.

Those half-learn'd witlings, numerous in our isle,
As half-form'd insects on the banks of Nile; 41
Unfinish'd things, one knows not what to call,
Their generation's so equivocal:
To tell them would a hundred tongues require,
Or one vain wit's, that might a hundred tire.

But you, who seek to give and merit fame,
And justly bear a critic's noble name,
Be sure yourself and your own reach to know,
How far your genius, taste, and learning, go;
Launch not beyond your depth, but be discreet, 50
And mark that point where sense and dulness meet.

Nature to all things fix'd the limits fit,
And wisely curb'd proud man's pretending wit:
As on the land while here the ocean gains,
In other parts it leaves wide sandy plains;
Thus in the soul while memory prevails,
The solid power of understanding fails;
Where beams of warm imagination play,
The memory's soft figures melt away.

One science only will one genius fit; 60
So vast is art, so narrow human wit:
Not only bounded to peculiar arts,
But oft in those confin'd to single parts.
Like kings, we lose the conquests gain'd before,
By vain ambition still to make them more:
Each might his several province well command,
Would all but stoop to what they understand.

First follow nature; and your judgment frame
By her just standard, which is still the same:
Unerring NATURE, still divinely bright, 70
One clear, unchang'd, and universal light,
Life, force, and beauty, must to all impart,
At once the source, and end, and test of art,
Art from that fund each just supply provides;
Works without shew, and without pomp presides,
In some fair body thus th' informing soul
With spirits feeds, with vigour fills the whole,
Each motion guides, and every nerve sustains;
Itself unseen, but in th' effects remains.

Some, to whom Heaven in wit has been profuse,
Want as much more, to turn it to its use; 80
For wit and judgment often are at strife,
Though meant each others aid, like man and wife.

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 63. Ed. 1. But ev'n in those, &c.

Ver. 74.

That art is best, which most resembles her;
Which still presides, yet never does appear.

Ver. 76.—the secret soul.

Ver. 80.

There are whom Heaven has blest with store of wit,
Yet want as much again to manage it.

C

'Tis more to guide, than spur the muse's steed;
 Restrain his fury, than provoke his speed:
 The winged courser, like a generous horse,
 Shows most true mettle when you check his course.

Those rules of old discover'd, not devis'd,
 Are nature still, but nature methodis'd:
 Nature, like liberty, is but restrain'd 90
 By the same laws which first herself ordain'd.

Hear how learn'd Greece her useful rules endites,
 When to repress, and when indulge our flights:
 High on Parnassus' top her sons she shew'd,
 And pointed out those arduous paths they trod:
 Held from afar, aloft, th' immortal prize,
 And urg'd the rest by equal steps to rise.

Just precepts thus from great example given,
 She drew from them what they deriv'd from heaven.
 The generous critic fann'd the poet's fire, 100
 And taught the world with reason to admire.

Then criticism the muse's handmaid prov'd,
 To dress her charms, and make her more belov'd:
 But following wits from that intention stray'd,
 Who could not win the mistress woo'd the maid;
 Against the poets their own arms they turn'd,
 Sure to hate most the men from whom they learn'd.

So modern 'pothecaries taught the art
 By doctors bills to play the doctor's part,
 Bold in the practice of mistaken rules, 110
 Prescribe, apply, and call their masters fools.

Some on the leaves of ancient authors prey,
 Nor time nor moths e'er spoil'd so much as they:
 Some drily plain, without invention's aid,
 Write dull receipts how poems may be made.
 These leave the sense, their learning to display,
 And those explain the meaning quite away. [steer,

You then whose judgment the right course would Know well each Ancient's proper character:
 His fable, subject, scope in every page; 120
 Religion, country, genius of his age:
 Without all these at once before your eyes,
 Cavil you may, but never criticise.
 Be Homer's works your study and delight
 Read them by day, and meditate by night;

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 90. Ed. 1. Nature, like monarchy, &c.

Ver. 92.

First learned Greece just precepts did endite,
 When to repress, and when indulge our flight.

Ver. 97.

From great examples useful rules were given.

After ver. 104, this line is omitted:

Set up themselves, and drove a separate trade.

Ver. 116. Ed. 1. These lost, &c.

Ver. 117. And these explain'd, &c.

Ver. 123. Ed. 1. You may confound, but, &c.

Ver. 123. Cavil you may, but never criticise.

The Author after this verse originally inserted the following, which he has however omitted in all the editions:

Zoilus, had these been known, without a name
 Had dy'd, and Perault ne'er been damn'd to fame:
 The sense of sound antiquity had reign'd,
 And sacred Homer yet been unprofan'd.
 None e'er had thought his comprehensive mind
 To modern customs, modern rules confin'd;
 Who for all ages writ, and all mankind,

Thence form your judgment, thence your maxims bring,

And trace the muses upward to their spring;
 Still with itself compar'd, his text peruse;
 And let your comment be the Mantuan muse.

When first young Maro, in his boundless mind

A work t' outlast immortal Rome design'd, 131

Perhaps he seem'd above the critic's law,
 And but from nature's fountains scorn'd to draw:
 But when t' examine every part he came,
 Nature and Homer were, he found, the same.
 Convinc'd, amaz'd, he checks the bold design;
 And rules as strict his labour'd work confine,
 As if the Stagyrite o'erlook'd each line. }

Learn hence for ancient rules a just esteem;
 To copy nature, is to copy them. 140

Some beauties yet no precepts can declare,
 For there's a happiness as well as care.

Music resembles poetry; in each
 Are nameless graces which no methods teach, }
 And which a master-hand alone can reach. }
 If, where the rules not far enough extend, (Since rules were made but to promote their end),

Some lucky license answer to the full
 Th' intent propos'd, that license is a rule.

Thus Pegasus, a safer way to take, 150
 May boldly deviate from the common track;
 From vulgar bounds with brave disorder part,
 And snatch a grace beyond the reach of art,
 Which, without passing through the judgment, gains

The heart, and all its end at once attains.
 In prospects thus, some objects please our eyes, }
 Which out of nature's common order rise, }
 The shapeless rock, or hanging precipice.

Great wits sometimes may gloriously offend,
 And rise to faults true critics dare not mend. 160
 But though the ancients thus their rules invade
 (As kings dispense with laws themselves have made);

Moderns, beware! or, if you must offend
 Against the precept, ne'er transgress its end:
 Let it be seldom, and compell'd by need;
 And have, at least, their precedent to plead.
 The critic else proceeds without remorse.
 Seizes your fame, and puts his laws in force.

VARIATIONS.

 Ere warning Phœbus touch'd his trembling ears.

Ver. 136.

Convinc'd, amaz'd, he check'd the bold design;
 And did his work to rules as strict confine.

Ver. 145. Ed. 1. And which a master's hand, &c.

After ver. 158. the first edition reads,
 But care in poetry must still be had,
 It asks discretion ev'n in running mad;
 And though the ancients, &c.

And what are now ver. 159, 160, followed ver. 151.

I know there are, to whose presumptuous thoughts
 Those freer beauties, ev'n in them, seem faults. 170
 Some figures monstrous and mis-shap'd appear,
 Consider'd singly, or beheld too near,
 Which, but proportion'd to their light, or place,
 Due distance reconciles to form and grace.
 A prudent chief not always must display
 His powers in equal ranks, and fair array,
 But with th' occasion and the place comply,
 Conceal his force, nay sometimes seem to fly.
 Those oft are stratagems which error seem,
 Nor is it Homer nods, but we that dream. 180
 Still green with bays each ancient altar stands,
 Above the reach of sacrilegious hands;
 Secure from flames, from envy's fiercer rage,
 Destructive war, and all-involving age.
 See from each clime the learn'd their incense bring!
 Hear, in all tongues consenting Pæans ring!
 In praise so just let every voice be join'd,
 And fill the general chorus of mankind.
 Hail, bards triumphant! born in happier days;
 Immortal heirs of universal praise! 190
 Whose honours with increase of ages grow,
 As streams roll down, enlarging as they flow;
 Nations unborn your mighty names shall sound,
 And worlds applaud that must not yet be found!
 O may some spark of your celestial fire,
 The last, the meanest of your sons inspire,
 (That, on weak wings, from far pursues your flights, Glows while he reads, but trembles as he writes)
 To teach vain wits a science little known,
 T' admire superior sense, and doubt their own:
 Of all the causes which conspire to blind, 201
 Man's erring judgment, and misguide the mind,
 What the weak head with strongest bias rules,
 Is pride, the never-failing voice of fools.
 Whatever nature has in worth deny'd,
 She gives in large recruits of needful pride!
 For as in bodies, thus in souls, we find
 What wants in blood and spirits, swell'd with wind:
 Pride, where wit fails, steps in to our defence,
 And fills up all the mighty void of sense. 210
 If once right reason drives that cloud away,
 Truth breaks upon us with resistless day.
 Trust not yourself; but, your defects to know,
 Make use of every friend—and every foe.
 A little learning is a dangerous thing!
 Drink deep, or taste not the Pierian spring:
 There shallow draughts intoxicate the brain,
 And drinking largely sobers us again.
 Fir'd at first sight with what the muse imparts,
 In fearless youth we tempt the heights of arts, 220

Ver. 197. Ed. 1. That with weak wings, &c.

Ver. 219.

 In fearless youth we tempt the heights of art.

Ver. 223. But more advanc'd, survey, &c.

While, from the bounded level of our mind,
 Short views we take, nor see the lengths behind;
 But more advanc'd, behold with strange surprise
 New distant scenes of endless science rise!
 So pleas'd at first the towering Alps we try,
 Mount o'er the vales, and seem to tread the sky;
 Th' eternal snows appear already past,
 And the first clouds and mountains seem the last:
 But, those attain'd, we tremble to survey
 The growing labours of the lengthen'd way; 230
 Th' increasing prospect tires our wandering eyes,
 Hills peep o'er hills, and Alps on Alps arise!
 A perfect judge will read each work of wit
 With the same spirit that its author writ:
 Survey the whole, nor seek slight faults to find Where nature moves, and rapture warms the mind;
 Nor lose, for that malignant dull delight,
 The generous pleasure to be charm'd with wit.
 But, in such lays as neither ebb nor flow,
 Correctly cold, and regularly low, 240
 That, shunning faults, one quiet tenour keep;
 We cannot blame indeed—but we may sleep.
 In wit, as nature, what affects our hearts
 Is not th' exactness of peculiar parts;
 'Tis not a lip, or eye, we beauty call,
 But the joint force and full result of all.
 Thus when we view some well-proportion'd dome,
 (The world's just wonder, and ev'n thine, O Rome!)
 No single parts unequally surprise,
 All comes united to th' admiring eyes; 250
 No monstrous height, or breadth, or length appear;
 The whole at once is bold, and regular.
 Whoever thinks a faultless piece to see,
 Thinks what ne'er was, nor is, nor e'er shall be.
 In every work regard the writer's end,
 Since none can compass more than they intend;
 And if the means be just, the conduct true,
 Applause, in spite of trivial faults, is due.
 As men of breeding, sometimes men of wit,
 T' avoid great errors must the less commit: 260
 Neglect the rules each verbal critic lays,
 For not to know some trifles, is a praise.
 Most critics, fond of some subservient art,
 Still make the whole depend upon a part:
 They talk of principles, but notions prize,
 And all to one lov'd folly sacrifice.
 Once on a time, La Mancha's knight, they say,
 A certain bard encountering on the way,
 Discours'd in terms as just, with looks as sage,
 As e'er could Dennis, of the Grecian stage; 270

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 225.

So pleas'd at first the towering alps to try,
 Fill'd with ideas of fair Italy,
 The traveller beholds with cheerful eyes
 The lessening vales, and seems to tread the skies!

Ver. 259.

As men of breeding, oft the men of wit.

Ver. 265.

They talk of principles, but parts they prize.

Ver. 270.

As e'er could Dennis of the laws o' th' stage.

Concluding all were desperate fots and fools,
Who durst depart from Aristotle's rules.
Our, author, happy in a judge so nice,
Produc'd his play, and begg'd the knight's advice :
Made him observe the subject, and the plot,
The manners, passions, unities; what not ?
All which, exact to rule, were brought about,
Were but a combat in the lists left out.

"What! leave the combat out?" exclaims the knight.

Yes, or we must renounce the stagirite. 280

"Not so, by heaven! (he answers in a rage)

"Knights, 'squires, and steeds, must enter on the "stage."

So vast a throng the stage can ne'er contain.

"Then build a new, or act it in a plain."

Thus critics, of less judgment than caprice,
Curious, not knowing, not exact but nice,
Form short ideas; and offend in arts

Some to conceit alone their taste confine, 289

And glittering thoughts struck out at every line;

Pleas'd with a work where nothing's just or fit;

One glaring chaos and wild heap of wit.

Poets like painters, thus unskill'd to trace

The naked nature, and the living grace,

With gold and jewels cover every part,

And hide with ornaments their want of art.

True wit is nature to advantage dress'd,

What oft was thought, but ne'er so well express'd;

Something, whose truth convinc'd at sight we find,

That gives us back the image of our mind. 300

As shades more sweetly recommend the light,

So modest plainness sets off sprightly wit;

For works may have more wit than does them good,

As bodies perish through excess of blood.

Others for language all their care express,

And value books, as women men, for dress:

Their praise is still—the style is excellent:

The sense, they humbly take upon content.

Words are like leaves; and where they most abound,

Much fruit of sense beneath is rarely found. 310

False eloquence, like the prismatic glass,

Its gaudy colours spreads on every place;

The face of nature we no more survey,

All glares alike, without distinction gay:

But true expression, like th' unchanging sun,

Clears and improves what'er it shines upon;

It gilds all objects, but it alters none. }

Expression is the dress of thought, and still

Appears more decent, as more suitable;

A vile conceit in pompous words express'd, 320

Is like a clown in regal purple dress'd:

For different styles with different subjects sort,

As several garbs, with country, town, and court.

Some by old words to farge have made pretence,

Ancients in phrase, mere moderns in their sense;

Such labour'd nothings, in so strange a style,
Amaze th' unlearn'd, and make the learned smile.

Unlucky, as Fungosa in the play,

These sparks with aukward vanity display

What the fine gentleman wore yesterday; 330 }

And but so mimic ancient wits at best,

As apes our grandfathers in their doublets dress'd.

In words, as fashions, the same rule will hold;

Alike fantastic, if too new or old:

Be not the first by whom the new are try'd,

Nor yet the last to lay the old aside.

But most by numbers judge a poet's song;

And smooth or rough, with them, is right or wrong: [spire,

In the bright muse though thousand charms con-

Who haunt Parnassus but to please their ear,

Not mend their minds; as some to church repair, }

Not for the doctrine, but the music there.

These, equal syllables alone require,

Though oft the ear the open vowels tire;

While expletives their feeble aid do join,

And ten slow words oft creep in one dull line:

While they ring round the same unvary'd chimes,

With sure returns of still expected rhymes; 349

Where'er you find "the cooling western breeze,"

In the next line it "whispers through the trees:"

If crystal streams "with pleasing murmurs creep,"

The reader's threaten'd (not in vain) with "sleep:"

Then at the last and only couplet fraught

With some unmeaning thing they call a thought,

A needless Alexandrine ends the song,

That, like a wounded snake, drags its slow length

along. [know

Leave such to tune their own dull rhymes, and

What's roundly smooth, or languishingly flow;

And praise the easy vigour of a line, 360

Where Denham's strength and Waller's sweetness

join.

True ease in writing comes from art, not chance,

As those move easiest who have learn'd to dance.

'Tis not enough no harshness gives offence,

The sound must seem an echo to the sense:

Soft is the strain when zephyr gently blows,

And the smooth stream in smoother numbers flows;

But when loud surges lash the sounding shore,

The hoarse, rough verse should like the torrent roar.

When Ajax strives some rock's vast weight to throw, 370

The line too labours, and the words move flow:

Not so when swift Camilla scours the plain,

Flies o'er th' unbending corn, and skims along the main.

Hear how Timotheus' vary'd lays surprise,

And bid alternate passions fall and rise:

While, at each change, the son of Libyan Jove

Now burns with glory, and then melts with love;

Now his fierce eyes with sparkling fury glow,

Now sighs steal out, and tears begin to flow:

Perfians and Greeks like turns of nature found, 380
And the world's victor stood subdued by sound!
The power of music all our hearts allow,
And what Timotheus was, is Dryden now.

Avoid extremes; and shun the fault of such,
Who still are pleas'd too little or too much.
At every trifle scorn to take offence,
That always shows great pride, or little sense;
Those heads, as stomachs, are not sure the best,
Which nauseate all, and nothing can digest.
Yet let not each gay turn thy rapture move; 390
For fools admire, but men of sense approve:
As things seem large which we through mists
descry,

Dulness is ever apt to magnify.
Some foreign writers, some our own despise;
The ancients only, or the moderns prize:
Thus wit, like faith, by each man is apply'd
To one small sect, and all are damn'd beside.
Meanly they seek the blessing to confine,
And force that sun but on a part to shine,
Which not alone the southern wit sublimed, 400
But ripens spirits in cold northern climes;
Which from the first has shone on ages past,
Enlights the present, and shall warm the last;
Though each may feel increases and decays,
And see now clearer and now darker days.
Regard not then if wit be old or new,
But blame the false, and value still the true.

Some ne'er advance a judgment of their own,
But catch the spreading notion of the town;
They reason and conclude by precedent, 410
And own stale nonsense which they ne'er invent.
Some judge of authors names, not works, and then
Nor praise nor blame the writings, but the men.
Of all this servile herd, the worst is he
That in proud dulness joins with quality;
A constant critic at the great man's board,
To fetch and carry nonsense for my lord,
What woful stuff this madrigal would be,
In some starv'd hackney-sonneteer, or me!
But let a lord once own the happy lines, 420
How the wit brightens! how the style refines!
Before his sacred name flies every fault,
And each exalted stanza teems with thought!

The vulgar thus through imitation err;
As oft the learn'd by being singular;
So much they scorn the crowd, that if the throng
By chance go right, they purposely go wrong:
So Schismatics the plain believers quit,
And are but damn'd for having too much wit.
Some praise at morning what they blame at night,
But always think the last opinion right. 431
A muse by these is like a mistress us'd,
This hour she's idoliz'd, the next abus'd;
While their weak heads, like towns unfortify'd,
'Twixt sense and nonsense daily change their side.
Ask them the cause; they're wiser still, they say;
And still to-morrow's wiser than to-day.
We think our fathers fools, so wise we grow;
Our wiser sons, no doubt, will think us so,

And none had sense enough to be confuted:

Amidst their kindred cobwebs in Duck-lane.
If faith itself has different dresses worn,
What wonder modes in wit should take their turn?

Oft, leaving what is natural and fit,
The current folly proves the ready wit;
And authors think their reputation safe, 450
Which lives as long as fools are pleas'd to laugh.

Some, valuing those of their own side or mind,
Still make themselves the measure of mankind:
Fondly we think we honour merit then,
When we but praise ourselves in other men.
Parties in wit attend on those of state,
And public faction doubles private hate.
Pride, malice, folly, against Dryden rose,
In various shapes of parsons, critics, beaux:

Nay, should great Homer lift his awful head,
Zoilus again would start up from the dead.
Envy will merit, as its shade, pursue;
But, like a shadow, proves the substance true:
For envy'd wit, like Sol eclips'd, makes known
Th' opposing body's grossness, not its own.
When first that sun too powerful beams displays.

It draws up vapours which obscure its rays; 471
But ev'n those clouds at last adorn its way,
Reflect new glories, and augment the day.

Be thou the first, true merit to befriend;
His praise is lost, who stays till all commend.
Short is the date, alas, of modern rhymes,
And 'tis but just to let them live betimes.
No longer now that golden age appears,
When patriarch-wits surviv'd a thousand years;
Now length of fame (our second life) is lost, 480
And bare threescore is all ev'n that can boast;
Our sons their fathers failing language see,
And such as Chaucer is, shall Dryden be.
So when the faithful pencil has design'd
Some bright idea of the master's mind,
Where a new world leaps out at his command,
And ready nature waits upon his hand;

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 447. Between this and ver. 448.
The rhyming clowns that gladdened Shakspear's age,
No more with crambo entertain the stage.
Who now in anagrams their patron praise,
Or sing their mistress in acrostic lays?
Ev'n pulpits pleas'd with merry puns of yore;
Now all are banish'd to th' Hibernian shore!
Thus leaving what was natural and fit,
The current folly prov'd their ready wit;
And authors thought their reputation safe,
Which liv'd as long as fools were pleas'd to laugh.

Ver. 485. Ed. 1. Some fair idea, &c.

When the ripe colours soften and unite,
And sweetly melt into just shade and light;
When mellowing years their full perfection give,
And each bold figure just begins to live; 491
The treacherous colours the fair art betray,
And all the bright creation fades away!

Unhappy wit, like most mistaken things,
Atones not for that envy which it brings;
In youth alone its empty praise we boast,
But soon the short-liv'd vanity is lost:
Like some fair flower the early spring supplies,
That gaily blooms, but ev'n in blooming dies.
What is this wit, which must our cares employ?
The owner's wife, that other men enjoy; 501
The most our trouble still when most admir'd,
And still the more we give, the more requir'd;
Whose fame with pains we guard, but lose with ease,

Sure some to vex, but never all to please;
'Tis what the vicious fear, the virtuous shun;
By fools 'tis hated, and by knaves undone!
If wit so much from ignorance undergo,
Ah, let not learning too commence its foe!
Of old, those met rewards, who could excel, 510
And such were prais'd who but endeavour'd well;
Though triumphs were to generals only due,
Crowns were reserv'd to grace the soldiers too.
Now, they who reach Parnassus' lofty crown,
Employ their pains to spurn some others down;
And while self-love each jealous writer rules,
Contending wits become the sport of fools:
But still the worst with most regret commend,
For each ill author is as bad a friend.
'To what base ends, and by what abject ways, 520
Are mortals urg'd through sacred lust of praise?
Ah, ne'er so dire a thirst of glory boast,
Nor in the critic let the man be lost.
Good-nature and good-sense must ever join;
'To err, is human; to forgive, divine.

But if in noble minds some dregs remain,
Not yet purg'd off, of spleen and sour disdain;
Discharge that rage on more provoking crimes,
Nor fear a dearth in these flagitious times.
No pardon vile obscenity should find, 530
'Though wit and art conspire to move your mind;

But dulness with obscenity must prove
As shameful sure as impotence in love.
In the fat age of pleasure, wealth, and ease,
Sprang the rank weed, and thriv'd with large increase:

When love was all in easy monarch's care;
Seldom at council, never in a war:
Jilts rul'd the state, and statesmen farces writ;
Nay wits had pensions, and young lords had wit:
The fair fat panting at a courtier's play, 540
And not a mask went unimprov'd away:
The modest fan was lifted up no more,
And virgins smil'd at what they blush'd before.
The following license of a foreign reign
Did all the dregs of bold Socinus drain;
Then unbelieving priests reform'd the nation,
And taught more pleasant methods of salvation;
Where heaven's free subjects might their rights dispute,

Left God himself should seem too absolute:
Pulpits their sacred satire learn'd to spare, 550
And vice admir'd to find a flatterer there!
Encourag'd thus, wit's Titans brav'd the skies,
And the press groan'd with licens'd blasphemies.
These monsters, critics! with your darts engage,
Here point your thunder, and exhaust your rage!
Yet shun their fault, who, scandalously nice,
Will needs mistake an author into vice;
All seems infected that th' infected spy,
As all looks yellow to the jaundic'd eye.

Learn then what morals critics ought to show;
For 'tis but half a judge's task, to know. 561
'Tis not enough, taste, judgment, learning, join;
In all you speak, let truth and candour shine;
That not alone what to your sense is due
All may allow, but seek your friendship too.

Be silent always, when you doubt your sense;
And speak, though sure, with seeming diffidence:
Some positive, persisting fops we know,
Who, if once wrong, will needs be always so;
But you, with pleasure, own your errors past, 570
And make each day a critic on the last.

'Tis not enough your counsel still be true;
Blunt truths more mischief than nice falsehoods do;
Men must be taught as if you taught them not,
And things unknown propos'd as things forgot.
Without good breeding truth is disapprov'd;
That only makes superior sense below'd.

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 547. The Author has here omitted the two following lines; as containing a national reflection, which in his stricter judgment he could not but disapprove on any people whatever.:

Then first the Belgians morals were extoll'd;
We their religion had, and they our gold.

Ver. 562. 'Tis not enough, wit, art, and learning
join.

Ver. 564. That not alone what to your judgment's due.

Ver. 569. That if once wrong, &c.

Ver. 575. And things ne'er know, &c.

Ver. 576. Without good-breeding truth is not approv'd.

Be niggards of advice on no pretence;
For the worst avarice is that of sense.
With mean complacence, ne'er betray your trust,
Nor be so civil as to prove unjust. 581
Fear not the anger of the wise to raise;
Those best can bear reproof, who merit praise.

'Twere well might critics still this freedom take:
But Appius reddens at each word you speak,
And stares tremendous, with a threatening eye,
Like some fierce tyrant in old tapestry.
Fear most to tax an honourable fool,
Whose right it is, uncensur'd, to be dull!
Such, without wit, are poets when they please.
As without learning they can take degrees. 591
Leave dangerous truths to unsuccessful satires,
And flattery to fulsome dedicators,
Whom, when they praise, the world believes no
more

Than when they promise to give scribbling o'er.
'Tis best sometimes your censure to restrain,
And charitably let the dull be vain:
Your silence there is better than your spite,
For who can rail so long as they can write? 599
Still humming on, their drowsy course they keep,
And lash'd so long, like tops, are lash'd asleep.
False steps but help them to renew the race,
As, after stumbling, jades will mend their pace.
What crowds of these, impenitently bold,
In sounds and jingling syllables grown old,
Still run on poets, in a raging vein,
Ev'n to the dregs and squeezings of the brain,
Strain out the last dull dropping of their sense,
And rhyme with all the rage of impotence!

Such shameless bards we have: and yet 'tis true,

There are as mad, abandon'd critics too. 611
The bookful blockhead, ignorantly read,
With loads of learned lumber in his head,
With his own tongue still edifies his ears,
And always listening to himself appears.
All books he reads, and all he reads assails,
From Dryden's Fables down to Dursley's Tales:
With him, most authors steal their works, or buy
Garth did not write his own Dispensary.

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 586. And stares tremendous, &c.] This picture was taken to himself by John Dennis, a furious old critic by profession, who, upon no other provocation, wrote against this essay, and its author, in a manner perfectly lunatic: For, as to mention made of him in ver. 270, he took it as a compliment, and said it was treacherously meant to cause him to overlook this abuse of his person.

Ver. 597. And charitably let dull fools be vain.
Ver. 600.

Still humming on, their old dull course they keep.

NOTE.

Ver. 619. Garth did not write, &c.] A common slander at that time in prejudice of that deserving author. Our poet did him this justice, when that slander most prevailed; and it is now (perhaps the sooner for this very verse) dead and forgotten.

Name a new play, and he's the poet's friend, 620
Nay show'd his faults—but when would poets
mend?

No place so sacred from such fops is barr'd,
Nor is Paul's church more safe than Paul's churchyard:

Nay, fly to altars; there they'll talk you dead;
For fools rush in where angels fear to tread.
Distrustful sense with modest caution speaks,
It still looks home, and short excursions makes: }
But rattling nonsense in full volleys breaks,
And, never shock'd, and never turn'd aside,
Bursts out, resistless, with a thundering tide. 630

But where's the man, who counsel can bestow,
Still pleas'd to teach, and yet not proud to know?
Unbias'd, or by favour, or by spite;
Not dully prepossess'd, nor blindly right; [sincere;
Though learn'd, well-bred; and though well-bred,
Modestly bold, and humanely severe:

Who to a friend his faults can freely show.
And gladly praise the merit of a foe?
Blest with a taste exact, yet unconfin'd;
A knowledge both of books and human kind; 640
Generous converse; a soul exempt from pride;
And love to praise, with reason on his side?

Such once were critics; such the happy few
Athens and Rome in better ages knew:
The mighty Stagyrte first left the shore,
Spread all his sails, and durst the deeps explore;
He steer'd securely, and discover'd far,
Led by the light of the Mæonian star.
Poets, a race long unconfin'd and free,
Still fond and proud of savage liberty, 650
Receiv'd his laws; and stood convinc'd 'twas fit,
Who conquer'd nature, should preside o'er wit.

Horace still charms with graceful negligence,
And without method talks us into sense,
Will, like a friend, familiarly convey
The truest notions in the easiest way.

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 623. Between this and ver. 624.
In vain you shrug and sweat, and strive to fly;
These know no manners but of poetry:
They'll stop a hungry chaplain in his grace,
To treat of unities of time and place.

Ver. 624. Nay run to altars, &c.
Ver. 634. Not dully prepossess'd, or blindly right.

Between ver. 646 and 649, I found the following lines, since suppressed by the author:
That bold Columbus of the realms of wit,
Whose first discovery's not exceeded yet,
Led by the light of the Mæonian star,
He steer'd securely, and discover'd far.
He, when all nature was subdued before,
Like his great pupil, sigh'd, and long'd for more:
Fancy's wild regions yet unvanquish'd lay.
A boundless empire, and that own'd no sway.
Poets, &c.

After ver. 648. the first edition reads,
Not only nature did his laws obey,
But fancy's boundless empire own'd his sway.

Ver. 655. Does, like a friend, &c.

Ver. 655, 656. These lines are not in Ed. 1.

He, who supreme in judgment, as in wit,
Might boldly censure, as he boldly writ, [fire ;
Yet judg'd with coolness, though he sung with
His precepts teach but what his works inspire.

Our critics take a contrary extreme, 661
They judge with fury, but they write with phlegm:
Nor suffers Horace more in wrong translations
By wits, than critics in as wrong quotations.

See Dionysius Homer's thoughts refine,
And call new beauties forth from every line !

Fancy and art in gay Petronius please,
The scholar's learning, with the courtier's ease.

In grave Quintilian's copious work, we find
The justest rules and clearest method join'd : 670
Thus useful arms in magazines we place,
All rang'd in order, and dispos'd with grace,
But less to please the eye, than arm the hand,
Still fit for use, and ready at command.

Thee, bold Longinus ! all the Nine inspire,
And bless their critic with a poet's fire.
An ardent judge, who, zealous in his trust,
With warmth gives sentence, yet is always just ;
Whose own example strengthens all his laws ;
And is himself that great sublime he draws. 680

Thus long succeeding critics justly reign'd,
License repress'd, and useful laws ordain'd.
Learning and Rouse alike in empire grew,
And arts still follow'd where her eagles flew ;
From the same foes, at last, both felt their doom,
And the same age saw learning fall, and Rome.

With tyranny, then superstition join'd,
As that the body, this enslav'd the mind ;
Much was believ'd, but little understood,
And to be dull was construed to be good : 690

A second deluge learning thus o'er-ran,
And the Monks finish'd what the Goths began.

At length Erasmus, that great injur'd name,
(The glory of the priesthood, and the shame !)
Stemm'd the wild torrent of a barbarous age,
And drove those holy Vandals off the stage.

VARIATIONS.

The scholar's learning, and the courtier's ease.

Ver. 673, &c.

Nor thus alone the curious eye to please,
But to be found, when need requires, with ease.

The muses sure Longinus did inspire,
And bless'd their critic with a poet's fire.

An ardent judge, that zealous, &c.

Ver. 689. All was believ'd, but nothing understood.

Between ver. 690 and 691. the Author omitted these two :

Vain wits and critics were no more allow'd,
When none but saints had license to be proud.

But see ! each muse, in Leo's golden days,
Starts from her trance, and trims her wither'd bays ;

Rome's ancient genius, o'er its ruins spread,
Shakes off the dust, and rears his reverend head. 700

Then sculpture and her sister-arts revive ;
Stones leap'd to form, and rocks began to live ;
With sweeter notes each rising temple rung ;
A Raphael painted, and a Vida sung.

Immortal Vida ! on whose honour'd brow
The poet's bays and critic's ivy grow :

Cremona now shall ever boast thy name,
As next in place to Mantua, next in fame !

But soon, by impious arms from Latium chas'd,
Their ancient bounds the banish'd muses pass'd ;
Thence arts o'er all the northern world advance,
But critic-learning flourish'd most in France :

The rules a nation, born to serve, obeys ;
And Boileau still in right of Horace sways.

But we, brave Britons, foreign laws despis'd,
And kept unconquer'd, and unciviliz'd ;

Fierce for the liberties of wit, and bold,
We still defy'd the Romans, as of old.

Yet some there were among the sounder few
Of those who less presum'd, and better knew, 720

Who durst assert the juster ancient cause,
And here restor'd wit's fundamental laws.

Such was the muse, whose rules and practice tell,
" Nature's chief master-piece is writing well."

Such was Roscommon, not more learn'd than good,
With manners generous as his noble blood ;

To him the wit of Greece and Rome was known,
And every author's merit but his own.

Such late was Walsh—the muse's judge and friend,
Who justly knew to blame or to commend ; 730

To failings mild, but zealous for desert ;

The clearest head, and the sincerest heart.

This humble praise, lamented shade ! receive,

This praise at least a grateful muse may give :

The muse, whose early voice you taught to sing,
Prescrib'd her heights, and prun'd her tender

wing,

(Her guide now lost) no more attempts to rise,

But in low numbers short excursions tries :

Content, if hence th' unlearn'd their wants may view,

The learn'd reflect on what before they knew. 740

Careless of censure, nor too fond of fame ;

Still pleas'd to praise, yet not afraid to blame ;

Averse alike, to flatter or offend ;

Not free from faults, nor yet too vain to mend.

THE RAPE OF THE LOCK.

AN HEROIC-COMICAL POEM,

WRITTEN IN THE YEAR 1711.

"Nolueram, Belinda, tuos violare capillos,
"Sed juvat, hoc precibus me tribuisse tuis."

MART.

TO MRS. ARABELLA FERMOR.

MADAM,

IT will be in vain to deny that I have some regard for this piece, since I dedicate it to you; yet you may bear me witness, it was intended only to divert a few young ladies, who have good sense and good humour enough to laugh not only at their sex's little unguarded follies, but at their own. But as it was communicated with the air of a secret, it soon found its way into the world. An imperfect copy having been offered to a bookseller, you had the good nature, for my sake, to consent to the publication of one more correct: This I was forced to, before I had executed half my design, for the machinery was entirely wanting to complete it.

The machinery, Madam, is a term invented by the critics, to signify that part which the deities, angels, or dæmons, are made to act in a poem: For the ancient poets are in one respect like many modern ladies; let an action be never so trivial in itself, they always make it appear of the utmost importance. These machines I determined to raise on a very new and odd foundation, the Rosicrucian doctrine of spirits.

I know how disagreeable it is to make use of hard words before a lady; but it is so much the concern of a poet to have his works understood, and particularly by your sex, that you must give me leave to explain two or three difficult terms.

The Rosicrucians are a people I must bring you acquainted with. The best account I know of them is in a French book called Le Comte de Ga- balis, which, both in its title and size, is so like a novel, that many of the fair sex have read it for one by mistake. According to these gentlemen, the four elements are inhabited by spirits, which they call sylphs, gnomes, nymphs, and salamanders. The gnomes, or dæmons of earth, delight in mischief; but the sylphs, whose habitation is in the air, are the best-conditioned creatures imaginable; for they say, any mortals may enjoy the most intimate familiarities with these gentle spirits, upon a condition very easy to all true adepts, an inviolate preservation of chastity.

As to the following cantos, all the passages of them are as fabulous as the vision at the beginning, or the transformation at the end (except the loss of your hair, which I always mention with reverence). The human persons are as fictitious as the airy ones; and the character of Belinda, as it is now managed, resembles you in nothing but in beauty.

If this poem had as many graces as there are in your person, or in your mind, yet I could never hope it should pass through the world half so uncensured as you have done. But let its fortune be what it will, mine is happy enough, to have given me this occasion of assuring you that I am, with the truest esteem,

Madam,

Your most obedient, humble servant,
A. POPE.

THE RAPE OF THE LOCK.

CANTO I.

WHAT dire offence from amorous causes springs,
 What mighty contests rise from trivial things,
 I sing—this verse to Caryl, muse! is due:
 This ev'n Belinda may vouchsafe to view:
 Slight is the subject, but not so the praise,
 If she inspire, and he approve my lays.

Say what strange motive, goddess! could compel
 A well-bred lord t' assault a gentle belle?
 O say what stranger cause, yet unexplor'd,
 Could make a gentle belle reject a lord? 10
 In tasks so bold, can little men engage?
 And in soft bosoms dwells such mighty rage?

Sol through white curtains shot a timorous ray,
 And ope'd those eyes that must eclipse the day:
 Now lap-dogs give themselves the rousing shake,
 And sleepless lovers, just at twelve, awake:
 Thrice rung the bell, the slipper knock'd the ground,
 And the press'd watch return'd a silver sound.
 Belinda still her downy pillow prest,
 Her guardian sylph prolong'd the balmy rest: 20
 'Twas he had summon'd to her silent bed
 The morning dream that hover'd o'er her head.
 A youth more glittering than a birth-night beau
 (That ev'n in slumber caus'd her cheek to glow)
 Seem'd to her ear his winning lips to lay,
 And thus in whispers said, or seem'd to say:

Fairest of mortals, thou distinguish'd care
 Of thousand bright inhabitants of air!
 If e'er one vision touch thy infant thought,
 Of all the nurse and all the priest have taught; 30

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 11, 12. It was in the first editions:
 And dwells such rage in softest bosoms then,
 And lodge such daring souls in little men?

Ver. 13, &c. stood thus in the first edition:
 Sol through white curtains did his beams display,
 And ope'd those eyes which brighter shone than they;

Shock just had given himself the rousing shake,
 And nymphs prepar'd their chocolate to take;
 Thrice the wrought slipper knock'd against the
 ground,
 And striking watches the tenth hour resound.

Ver. 19. Belinda still, &c.] All the verses from hence to the end of this canto were added afterwards.

Of airy elves by moonlight shadows seen,
 The silver token, and the circled green,
 Or virgins visited by angel-powers,
 With golden crowns and wreaths of heavenly
 flowers;

Hear and believe! thy own importance know,
 Nor bound thy narrow views to things below,
 Some secret truths, from learned pride conceal'd,
 To maids alone and children are reveal'd:
 What though no credit doubting wits may give?
 The fair and innocent shall still believe. 40

Know then, unnumber'd spirits round thee fly,
 The light militia of the lower sky:
 These, though unseen, are ever on the wing,
 Hang o'er the box, and hover round the ring.
 Think what an equipage thou hast in air.
 And view with scorn two pages and a chair.
 As now your own, our beings were of old,
 And once enclos'd in woman's beauteous mould;
 Thence, by a soft transition, we repair
 From earthly vehicles to these of air. 50
 Think not, when women's transient breath is fled,

That all her vanities at once are dead.
 Succeeding vanities she still regards,
 And though she plays no more, o'erlooks the cards.
 Her joy in gilded chariots, when alive,
 And love of ombre, after death survive,
 For when the fair in all their pride expire,
 To their first elements their souls retire:
 The sprites of fiery termagants in flame
 Mount up, and take a salamander's name, 60
 Soft yielding minds to water glide away,
 And sip, with nymphs, their elemental tea.
 The graver pride sinks downward to a gnome,
 In search of mischief still on earth to roam.
 The light coquettes in sylphs aloft repair,
 And sport and flutter in the fields of air.

Know farther yet; whoever fair and chaste
 Rejects mankind, is by some sylph embrac'd:
 For, spirits, freed from mortal laws, with ease
 Assume what sexes and what shape they please. 70
 What guards the purity of melting maids,
 In courtly balls, and midnight masquerades,
 Safe from the treacherous friends, the daring spark,
 The glance by day, the whisper in the dark,
 When kind occasion prompts their warm desires,
 When music softens, and when dancing fires?
 'Tis but their sylph, the wise celestials know,
 Though honour is the word with men below.

Some nymphs there are, too conscious of their face,

For life predestin'd to the gnomes embrace. 80

These swell their prospects, and exalt their pride,
When offers are disdain'd, and love deny'd :

Then gay ideas crowd the vacant brain,

While peers, and dukes, and all their sweeping train,

And garters, stars, and coronets appear,

And in soft sounds, your Grace salutes their ear.

'Tis these that early taint the female soul,

Instruct the eyes of young coquettes to roll,

Teach infant cheeks a bidden blush to know,

And little hearts to flutter at a beau. 90

Oft, when the world imagine women stray,

The sylphs through mystic mazes guide their way,

Through all the giddy circle they pursue,

And old impertinence expel by new,

What tender maid but must a victim fall

To one man's treat, but for another's ball ?

When Florio speaks, what virgin could withstand,

If gentle Damon did not squeeze her hand ?

With varying vanities, from every part,

They shift the moving toy-shop of their heart ; 100

Where wigs with wigs, with sword-knots sword-

knots strive,

Beaux banish beaux, and coaches coaches drive.

This erring mortals levity may call ;

Oh, blind to truth ! the sylphs contrive it all.

Of these am I, who thy protection claim,

A watchful sprite, and Ariel is my name.

Late, as I rang'd the crystal wilds of air,

In the clear mirror of thy ruling star

I saw, alas ! some dread event impend,

Ere to the main this morning sun descend ; 110

But heaven reveals not what, or how, or where :

Warn'd by the sylph, oh pious maid, beware !

This to disclose is all thy guardian can ;

Beware of all, but most beware of man !

He said ; when Shock, who thought she slept too long,

Leap'd up, and wak'd his mistress with his tongue,

'Twas then, Belinda, if report say true,

Thy eyes first open'd on a billet doux ;

Wounds, charms, and ardours, were no sooner read,

But all the vision vanish'd from thy head, 120

And now, unveil'd, the toilet stands display'd,

Each silver vase in mystic order laid.

First, rob'd in white, the nymph intent adores,

With head uncover'd, the cosmetic powers.

A heavenly image in the glass appears,

To that she bends, to that her eyes she rears ;

Th' inferior priestess, at her altar side,

Trembling, begins the sacred rites of pride.

Unnumber'd treasures ope at once, and here

The various offerings of the world appear ; 130

From each she nicely culls with curious toil,

And decks the goddess with the glittering spoil.

This casket India's glowing gems unlocks,

And all Arabia breathes from yonder box.

The tortoise here and elephant unite,

Transform'd to combs, the speckled and the white.

Here files of pins extend their shining rows,

Puffs, powders, patches, bibles, billet-doux.

Now awful beauty puts on all its arms ;

The fair each moment rises in her charms, 140

Repairs her smiles, awakens every grace,
And calls forth all the wonders of her face :
Sees by degrees a purer blush arise,
And keener lightnings quicken in her eyes.
The busy sylphs surround their darling care ;
These set the head, and those divide the hair ;
Some fold the sleeve, whilst others plait the gown ;
And Betty's prais'd for labours not her own.

CANTO II.

NOT with more glories in th' ethereal plain,
The sun first rises o'er the purpled main,
Than, issuing forth, the rival of his beams
Launch'd on the bosom of the silver'd Thames.
Fair nymphs and well-dress'd youths around her
shone,

But every eye was fix'd on her alone.
On her white breast a sparkling cross she wore,
Which Jews might kiss, and Infidels adore.
Her lively looks a sprightly mind disclose,
Quick as her eyes, and as unfix'd as those : 10
Favours to none, to all she smiles extends ;
Oft she rejects, but never once offends.
Bright as the sun, her eyes the gazers strike,
And, like the sun, they shine on all alike.
Yet graceful ease, and sweetness void of pride,
Might hide her faults, if belles had faults to hide ;
If to her share some female errors fall,
Look on her face, and you'll forget them all.

This nymph, to the destruction of mankind,
Nourish'd two locks, which graceful hung behind 20

In equal curls, and well conspir'd to deck
With shining ringlets the smooth ivory neck.
Love in these labyrinths his slaves detains,
And mighty hearts are held in slender chains.
With hairy springs we the birds betray ;
Slight lines of hair surprise the finny prey ;
Fair tresses man's imperial race ensnare,
And beauty draws us with a single hair.

Th' adventurous baron the bright locks ad-
mir'd ;

He saw, he wish'd, and to the prize aspir'd. 30
Resolv'd to win, he meditates the way,
By force to ravish, or by fraud betray ;
For when success a lovers toil attends,
Few ask, if fraud or force attain'd his ends.

For this, ere Phœbus rose, he had implor'd
Propitious heav'n, and every power ador'd ;
But chiefly Love—to Love an altar built,
Of twelve vast French romances neatly gilt.
There lay three garters, half a pair of gloves,
And all the trophies of his former loves. 40

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 4. Launch'd on the bosom] From hence the poem continues, in the first edition to ver. 46.
The rest the winds dispers'd in empty air ;
all after, to the end of this canto, being additional.

With tender billet-doux he lights the pyre,
And breathes three amorous sighs to raise the fire.
Then prostrate falls, and begs with ardent eyes
Soon to obtain, and long possess the prize
The powers gave ear, and granted half his prayer;
The rest, the winds dispers'd in empty air.

But now secure the painted vessel glides,
The sun-beams trembling on the floating tides:
While melting music steals upon the sky,
And soften'd sounds along the waters die; 50
Smooth flow the waves, the zephyrs gently play,
Belinda smil'd, and all the world was gay,
All but the sylph—with careful thoughts oppress'd,
Th' impending wo sat heavy on his breast.
He summons strait his denizens of air;
The lucid squadrons round the sails repair;
Soft o'er the shroud aerial whispers breathe,
That seem'd but zephyrs to the train beneath.
Some to the sun their insect wings unfold,
Waft on the breeze, or sink in clouds of gold; 60
Transparent forms, too fine for mortal sight,
Their fluid bodies half dissolv'd in light.
Loose to the wind their airy garments flew,
Thin glittering textures of the filmy dew,
Dipp'd in the richest tinctures of the skies,
Where light disports in ever-mingling dyes,
While every beam new transient colours flings,
Colours that change whene'er they wave their wings.

Amid the circle on the gilded mast,
Superior by the head was Ariel plac'd; 70
His purple pinions opening to the sun,
He rais'd his azure wand and thus begun:

Ye sylphs and sylphids, to your chief give ear;
Fays, fairies, genii, elves, and dæmons, hear!
Ye know the spheres, and various tasks assign'd
By laws eternal to th' aerial kind.

Some in the fields of purest æther play,
And bask and whiten in the blaze of day;
Some guide the course of wondering orbs on high,

Or roll the planets through the boundless sky; 80
Some, less refin'd, beneath the moon's pale light
Pursue the stars that shoot athwart the night,
Or suck the mists in grosser air below,
Or dip their pinions in the painted bow,
Or brew fierce tempests on the wintery main,
Or o'er the globe distil the kindly rain.

Others on earth o'er human race preside,
Watch all their ways, and all their actions guide:
Of these the chief the care of nations own,
And guard with arms divine the British throne. 90

Our humbler province is to tend the fair,
Not a less pleasing, though less glorious care;
To save the powder from too rude a gale,
Nor let th' imprison'd essences exhale;
To draw fresh colours from the vernal flowers;
To steal from rainbows, ere they drop in showers,
A brighter wash; to curl their waving hairs,
Assist their blushes, and inspire their airs;
Nay oft, in dreams, invention we bestow,
To change a flounce, or add a furbelow. 100

This day, black omens threat the brightest fair
That e'er deserv'd a watchful spirits's care;

Some dire disaster, or by force, or flight;
But what, or where, the fates have wrapp'd in night.

Whether the nymph shall break Diana's law,
Or some frail China-jar receive a flaw;
Or stain her honour, or her new brocade;
Forget her prayers, or miss a masquerade;
Or lose her heart, or necklace at a ball;
Or whether Heaven has deem'd that Shock must fall. 110

Haste then, ye spirits! to your charge repair:
The fluttering fan be Zephyretta's care;
The drops to thee, Brillante, we consign;
And, Momentilla, let the watch be thine;
Do thou, Crispissa, tend her favourite Lock;
Ariel himself shall be the guard of Shock.

To fifty chosen sylphs, of special note,
We trust th' important charge, the petticoat:
Oft have we known that seven-fold fence to fail,
Though stiff with hoops, and arm'd with ribs of whale. 120

Form a strong line about the silver bound,
And guard the wide circumference around.

Whatever spirit, careless of his charge,
His post neglects, or leaves the fair at large,
Shall feel sharp vengeance soon o'ertake his sins,
Be stopp'd in vials, or transfix'd with pins;
Or plung'd in lakes of bitter washes lie,
Or wedg'd whole ages in a bodkin's eye:
Gums and pomatums shall his flight restrain,
While clogg'd he beats his silken wings in vain; 130

Or alum styptics with contracting power
Shrink his thin essence like a shrivel'd flower:
Or, as Ixion fix'd, the wretch shall feel
The giddy motion of the whirling mill,
In fumes of burning chocolate shall glow,
And tremble at the sea that froths below!

He spoke; the spirits from the sails descend:
Some, orb in orb, around the nymph extend;
Some thrid the mazy ringlets of her hair;
Some hang upon the pendants of her ear;
With beating hearts the dire event they wait,
Anxious, and trembling for the birth of fate.

CANTO III.

CLOSE by those meads, for ever crown'd with flowers, [towers,
Where Thames with pride surveys his rising
There stands a structure of majestic frame,
Which from the neighbouring Hampton takes its name.

Here Britain's statesmen oft the fall foredoom
Of foreign tyrants, and of nymphs at home;
Here thou, great Anna! whom three realms obey,
Dost sometimes counsel take—and sometimes tea.

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 1. Close by those meads,] The first edition continues from this line to ver. 24. of this Canto.

Hither the heroes and the nymphs resort,
 To taste awhile the pleasures of a court; 10
 In various talk th' instructive hours they pass.
 Who gave the ball, or paid the visit last;
 One speaks the glory of the British queen,
 And one describes a charming Indian screen;
 A third interprets motions, looks, and eyes;
 At every word a reputation dies.
 Snuff, or the fan, supply each pause of chat,
 With sighing, laughing, ogling, and all that.
 Meanwhile, declining from the noon of day,
 The sun obliquely shoots his burning ray; 20
 The hungry judges soon the sentence sign,
 And wretches hang, that jurymen may dine;
 The merchant from th' Exchange returns in peace,
 And the long labours of the toilet cease.
 Belinda now, whom thirst of fame invites,
 Burns to encounter two adventurous knights,
 At Ombre singly to decide their doom;
 And swells her breast with conquests yet to come.
 Strait the three bands prepare in arms to join,
 Each band the number of the sacred nine, 30
 Soon as she spreads her hand, th' aerial guard
 Descend, and sit on each important card:
 First Ariel perch'd upon a Matadore,
 Then each according to the rank they bore:
 For sylphs, yet mindful of their ancient race,
 Are, as when women, wondrous fond of place.
 Behold, four Kings in majesty rever'd,
 With hoary wiskers and a forked beard;
 And four fair Queens, whose hands sustain a flower,
 Th' expressive emblem of their softer power;
 Four Knaves in garbs succinct, a trusty band;
 Caps on their heads, and halberts in their hand;
 And party-coloured troops, a shining train,
 Drawn forth to combat on the velvet plain.
 The skilful nymph reviews her force with care:
 Let Spades be trumps! she said, and trumps they were.
 Now move to war her sable Matadores,
 In show like leaders of the swarthy Moors.
 Spadillio first, unconquerable Lord!
 Led off two captive trumps, and swept the 50 board.
 As many more Manillio forc'd to yield,
 And march'd a victor from the verdant field.
 Him Basto follow'd, but his fate more hard
 Gain'd but one trump, and one Plebeian card.
 With his broad sabre next, a chief in years,
 The hoary Majesty of Spades appears,

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 11, 12. Originally in the first edition,
 In various talk the cheerful hours they pass,
 Of, who was bit, or who capotted last.

Ver. 24. And the long labours of the toilet cease.] All that follows of the game at Ombre,
 was added since the first edition, till ver. 105,
 which connected thus:

Sudden the board with cups and spoons is crown'd.

Puts forth one manly leg, to fight reveal'd,
 The rest, his many-colour'd robe conceal'd.
 The rebel Knave, who dares his prince engage,
 Proves the just victim of his royal rage. 60
 Ev'n mighty Pam, that Kings and Queens o'er-threw,
 And mow'd down armies in the fights of Lu,
 Sad chance of war now destitute of aid,
 Falls undistinguish'd by the victor Spade!
 Thus far both armies to Belinda yield;
 Now to the Baron fate inclines the field.
 His warlike Amazon her host invades,
 Th' imperial consort of the crown of Spades.
 The Club's black tyrant first her victim dy'd,
 Spite of his haughty mien, and barbarous pride: 70
 What boots the regal circle on his head.
 His giant limbs in state unwieldy spread;
 That long behind he trails his pompous robe,
 And, of all monarchs, only grasps the globe?
 The Baron now his Diamonds pours apace;
 Th' embroider'd King who shows but half his face,
 And his refulgent Queen with powers combin'd,
 Of broken troops an easy conquest find.
 Clubs, Diamonds, Hearts, in wild disorder seen,
 With throngs promiscuous strew the level green. 80
 Thus when dispers'd a routed army runs,
 Of Asia's troops, and Afric's sable sons,
 With like confusion different nations fly,
 Of various habit, and of various dye,
 The pierc'd battalions disunited fall,
 In heaps on heaps; one fate o'erwhelms them all.
 The Knave of Diamonds tries his wily arts,
 And wins (oh shameful chance!) the Queen of Hearts.
 At this, the blood the virgin's face forsook,
 A livid paleness spreads o'er all her look;
 She sees, and trembles at th' approaching ill,
 Just in the jaws of ruin, and codille.
 And now (as oft in some distemper'd state)
 On one nice trick depends the general fate,
 An Ace of Hearts steps forth: the King unseen
 Lurk'd in her hand, and mourn'd his captive
 Queen:
 He springs to vengeance with an eager pace,
 And falls like thunder on the prostrate Ace.
 The nymph exulting fills with shouts the sky;
 The walls, the woods, and long canals reply. 100
 O thoughtless mortals! ever blind to fate,
 Too soon dejected, and too soon elate.
 Sudden, these honours shall be snatch'd away,
 And curs'd for ever this victorious day.
 For lo! the board with cups and spoons is
 crown'd,
 The berries crackle, and the mill turns round:
 On shining altars of Japan they raise
 The silver lamp; the fiery spirits blaze:
 From silver spouts the grateful liquors glide,
 While China's earth receives the smoking tide: 110

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 103. Sudden the board, &c.] From hence the first edition continues to ver. 134.

At once they gratify their scent and taste,
 And frequent cups prolong the rich repast.
 Strait hover round the fair her airy band;
 Some, as she sipp'd, the fuming liquor fann'd;
 Some o'er her lap their careful plumes display'd,
 Trembling, and conscious of the rich brocade.
 Coffee (which makes the politician wife,
 And see through all things with his half-shut eyes)
 Sent up in vapours to the Baron's brain
 New stratagems, the radiant Lock to gain. 120
 Ah cease, rash youth! desist ere 'tis too late,
 Fear the just gods, and think of Scylla's fate!
 Chang'd to a bird, and sent to flit in air,
 She dearly pays for Nisus' injured hair!

But when to mischief mortals bend their will,
 How soon they find fit instruments of ill!
 Just then, Clarissa drew with tempting grace
 A two-edg'd weapon from her shining case:
 So ladies, in romance, assist their knight,
 Present the spear, and arm him for the fight. 130
 He takes the gift with reverence, and extends
 The little engine on his fingers ends;
 This just behind Belinda's neck he spread,
 As o'er the fragrant stream she bends her head.
 Swift to the Lock a thousand sprites repair,
 A thousand wings, by turns, blow back the hair;
 And thrice they twitch'd the diamond in her ear;
 Thrice she look'd back, and thrice the foe drew near.

Just in that instant, anxious Ariel fought
 The close recesses of the virgin's thought; 140
 As on the nosegay in her breast reclin'd,
 He watch'd th' ideas rising in her mind,
 Sudden he view'd, in spite of all her art,
 An earthly lover lurking at her heart.
 Amaz'd, confus'd, he found his power expir'd,
 Resign'd to fate, and with a sigh retir'd.

The Peer now spreads the glittering forfex wide,
 T' inclose the Lock; now joins it, to divide.
 Ev'n then, before the fatal engine clos'd,
 A wretched sylph too fondly interpos'd; 150
 Fate urg'd the sheers, and cut the sylph in twain
 (But airy substance soon unites again)
 The meeting points the sacred hair dis sever
 From the fair head, for ever, and for ever!
 Then flash'd the living lightning from her eyes,
 And screams of horror rend th' affrighted skies.
 Not louder shrieks to pitying heaven are cast,
 When husbands, or when lap-dogs, breathe their last!

Or when rich China vessels, fall'n from high,
 In glittering dust and painted fragments lie! 160
 Let wreaths of triumph now my temples twine
 (The victor cry'd), the glorious prize is mine!

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 134. In the first edition it was thus:
 As o'er the fragrant stream she bends her head,
 First he expands the glittering forfex wide
 T' enclose the Lock; then joins it to divide:
 The meeting points the sacred hair dis sever
 From the fair head, for ever and for ever. Ver. 154.
 All that is between was added afterwards.

While fish in streams, or birds delight in air,
 Or in a coach and six the British fair,
 As long as Atalantis shall be read,
 Or the small pillow grace a lady's bed,
 While visits shall be paid on solemn days,
 When numerous wax-lights in bright order blaze,
 While nymphs take treats, or assignations give,
 So long my honour, name, and praise, shall live! 170
 What time would spare, from steel receives its date,
 And monuments, like men, submit to fate!
 Steel could the labour of the gods destroy,
 And strike to dust th' imperial powers of Troy;
 Steel could the works of mortal pride confound,
 And hew triumphal arches to the ground.
 What wonder then, fair nymph! thy hairs should feel
 The conquering force of unresisted steel?

CANTO IV.

BUT anxious cares the pensive nymph oppress'd,
 And secret passions labour'd in her breast.
 Not youthful kings in battle seiz'd alive,
 Not scornful virgins who their charms survive,
 Not ardent lovers robb'd of all their bliss,
 Not ancient ladies when refus'd a kiss,
 Not tyrants fierce that unrepenting die,
 Not Cynthia when her mantau's pinn'd awry,
 E'er felt such rage, resentment, and despair,
 As thou, sad virgin! for thy ravish'd hair. 10
 For, that sad moment, when the sylphs withdrew,

And Ariel weeping from Belinda flew,
 Umbriel, a dusky, melancholy sprite,
 As ever sully'd the fair face of light,
 Down to the central earth, his proper scene,
 Repair'd to search the gloomy cave of spleen.

Swift on his footy pinions flits the gnome,
 And in a vapour reach'd the dismal dome.
 No cheerful breeze this sullen region knows,
 The dreaded east is all the wind that blows. 20
 Here in a grotto, shelter'd close from air,
 And screen'd in shades from day's detested glare,
 She sighs for ever on her pensive bed,
 Pain at her side, and Megrim at her head.

Two handmaids wait the throne: alike in place,
 But differing far in figure and in face.
 Here stood Ill-nature like an ancient maid,
 Her wrinkled form in black and white array'd;
 With store of prayers, for mornings, nights, and noons,
 Her hand is fill'd; her bosom with lampoons. 30

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 11. For, that sad moment, &c.] All the lines from hence to the 94th verse, describe the house of Spleen, and are not in the first edition;
 instead of them followed only these:
 While her rack'd soul repose and peace requires,
 The fierce Thalestris fans the rising fires;
 and continued at the 94th verse of this Canto.

There Affectation, with a sickly mien,
Shows in her cheek the roses of eighteen,
Practis'd to lisp, and hang the head aside.
Faints into airs, and languishes with pride,
On the rich quilt sinks with becoming wo,
Wrapt in a gown, for sickness, and for show.
The fair ones feel such maladies as these,
When each new night-dress gives a new disease.

A constant vapour o'er the palace flies;
Strange phantoms rising as the mists arise; 40
Dreadful, as hermits dreams in haunted shades,
Or bright, as visions of expiring maids.
Now glaring fiends, and snakes on rolling spires,
Pale spectres, gaping tombs, and purple fires:
Now lakes of liquid gold, Elysian scenes,
And crystal domes, and angels in machines.

Unnumber'd throngs on every side are seen,
Of bodies chang'd to various forms by spleen.
Here living tea-pots stand, one arm held out,
One bent; the handle this, and that the spout: 50
A pipkin there, like Homer's tripod, walks;
Here sighs a jar, and there a goose-pye talks;
Men prove with child, as powerful fancy works,
And maids, turn'd bottles, call aloud for corks.

Safe past the gnome through this fantastic band,
A branch of healing spleen-wort in his hand,
Then thus address'd the power—Hail, wayward
queen!

Who rule the sex to fifty from fifteen:
Parent of vapours, and of female wit,
Who give th' hysterick, or poetic fit, 60
On various tempers act by various ways,
Make some take physic, others scribble plays;
Who cause the proud their visits to delay,
And send the godly in a pet to pray.
A nymph there is, that all thy power disdains,
And thousands more in equal mirth maintains.
But oh! if e'er thy gnome could spoil a grace,
Or raise a pimple on a beauteous face,
Like citron-waters matrons cheeks inflame,
Or chang'd complexions at a losing game; 70
If e'er with airy horns I planted heads,
Or rumpled petticoats, or tumbled beds,
Or caus'd suspicion where no soul was rude,
Or compos'd the head-dress of a prude,
Or e'er to costly lap-dog gave disease,
Which not the tears of brightest eyes could ease:
Hear me, and touch Belinda with chagrin;
'That single act gives half the world the spleen.

The goddess with a discontented air,
Seems to reject him, though she grants his prayer. 80

A wondrous bag with both her hands she binds,
Like that where once Ulysses held the winds;
There she collects the force of female lungs,
Sighs, sobs, and passions, and the war of tongues.
A vial next she fills with fainting fears,
Soft sorrows, melting griefs, and flowing tears.
The gnome rejoicing bears her gifts away,
Spreads his black wings, and slowly mounts to day.

Sunk in Thalestris' arms the nymph he found,
Her eyes dejected, and her hair unbound. 90
Full o'er their heads the swelling bag he rent,
And all the furies issued at the vent,

Belinda burns with more than mortal ire,
And fierce Thalestris fans the rising fire.
O wretched maid! she spread her hands, and
cry'd,

(While Hampton's echoes, wretched maid! re-ply'd)

Was it for this you took such constant care
The bodkin, comb, and essence, to prepare?
For this your locks in paper durance bound,
For this with torturing irons wreath'd around? 100
For this with fillets strain'd your tender head,
And bravely bore the double loads of lead?
Gods! shall the ravisher display your hair,
While the fops envy, and the ladies stare?
Honour forbid! at whose unrival'd shrine
Ease, pleasure, virtue, all our sex resign.
Methinks already I your tears survey,
Already hear the horrid things they say,
Already see you a degraded toast,
And all your honour in a whisper lost! 110
How shall I, then, your helpless fame defend?
'Twill then be infamy to seem your friend!
And shall this prize, th' inestimable prize,
Expos'd through crystal to the gazing eyes,
And heighten'd by the diamond's circling rays,
On that rapacious hand for ever blaze!

Sooner shall grass in Hyde Park circus grow,
And wits take lodgings in the sound of Bow?
Sooner let earth, air, sea, to chaos fall,
Men, monkeys, lap-dogs, parrots, perish all! 120

She said; then raging to Sir Plume repairs,
And bids her beau demand the precious hairs!
(Sir Plume of amber snuff-box justly vain,
And the nice conduct of a clouded cane)
With earnest eyes, and round unthinking face,
He first the snuff-box open'd, then the case,
And thus broke out—"My Lord, why, what the devil?"

"Z—ds! damn the Lock! 'fore Gad, you must be civil!"

"Plague on't! 'tis past a jest—nay prythee, pox!
"Give her the hair"—he spoke, and rapp'd his
box. 130

It grieves me much (reply'd the peer again)
Who speaks so well should ever speak in vain;
But by this Lock, this sacred Lock, I swear,
(Which never more shall join its parted hair;
Which never more its honour shall renew,
Clipp'd from the lovely head where late it grew)
That while my nostrils draw the vital air,
This hand, which won it, shall for ever wear.
He spoke, and speaking, in proud triumph spread
The long-contended honours of her head. 140

But Umbriel, hateful gnome! forbears not so;
He breaks the vial whence the sorrows flow.
Then see! the nymph in beauteous grief appears,
Her eyes half languishing, half drown'd in tears;
On her heav'd bosom hung her drooping head,
Which, with a sigh, she rais'd; and thus she said:

For ever curst be this detested day,
Which snatch'd my best, my favourite curl away!
Happy! ah, ten times happy had I been,
If Hampton-court these eyes had never seen! 150
Yet am not I the first mistaken maid
By love of courts to numerous ills betray'd.

Oh, had I rather unadmir'd remain'd
 In some lone isle, or distant northern land;
 Where the gilt chariot never marks the way,
 Where none learn Ombre, none e'er taste bohea!
 There kept my charms conceal'd from mortal eye,
 Like roses, that in deserts bloom and die.
 What mov'd my mind with youthful lords to roam?
 Oh, had I stay'd, and said my prayers at home! 160
 'Twas this, the morning omens seem'd to tell,
 Thrice from my trembling hand the patch-box fell;
 The tottering china shook without a wind,
 Nay Poll sat mute, and Shock was most unkind!
 A sylph too warn'd me of the threats of fate,
 In mystic visions, now believ'd too late!
 See the poor remnants of these flighted hairs!
 My hand shall rend, what ev'n thy rapine spares:
 These in two fable ringlets taught to break,
 Once gave new beauties to the snowy neck; 170
 The sister-lock now sits uncouth, alone,
 And in its fellow's fate foresees its own;
 Uncurl'd it hangs, the fatal sheers demands,
 And tempts, once more, thy sacrilegious hands.
 Oh, hadst thou, cruel! been content to seize Hairs less in fight, or any hairs but these!

CANTO V.

SHE said: the pitying audience melt in tears;
 But fate and Jove had stopp'd the baron's ears.
 In vain Thalestris with reproach assails,
 For who can move when fair Belinda fails?
 Not half so fix'd the Trojan could remain,
 While Anna begg'd and Dido rag'd in vain.
 Then grave Clarissa graceful wav'd her fan;
 Silence ensued, and thus the nymph began.
 Say, why are not beauties prais'd and honour'd most,
 The wise man's passion, and the vain man's toast? 10
 Why deck'd with all that land and sea afford,
 Why angels call'd, and angel-like ador'd?
 Why round our coaches crowd the white-glov'd beaux?
 Why bows the side-box from its inmost rows?
 How vain are all these glories, all our pains,
 Unless good sense preserve what beauty gains:
 That men may say, when we the front-box grace,
 Behold the first in virtue as in face!
 Oh! if to dance all night and dress all day,
 Charm'd the small pox, or chac'd old age away; 20
 Who would not scorn what housewife's cares produce,
 Or who would learn one earthly thing to use?
 To patch, nay ogle, may become a saint;
 Nor could it sure be such a sin to paint.
 But since, alas! frail beauty must decay;
 Curl'd or uncurl'd, since Locks will turn to grey;

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 7. Then grave Clarissa, &c.] A new character introduced in the subsequent editions, to open more clearly the moral of the poem, in a parody of the speech of Sarpedon to Glaucus in Homer.

Since painted, or not painted, all shall fade,
 And she who scorns a man must die a maid;
 What then remains, but well our power to use;
 And keep good humour still, whate'er we lose? 30
 And trust me, dear! good-humour can prevail,
 When airs, and flights, and screams, and scolding fail,

Beauties in vain their pretty eyes may roll;
 Charms strikes the sight, but merit wins the soul.
 So spoke the dame, but no applause ensued;
 Belinda frown'd, Thalestris call'd her prude.
 To arms, to arms! the fierce Virago cries,
 And swift as lightning to the combat flies.
 All side in parties, and begin th' attack; [crack;
 Fans clap, silks rustle, and tough whalebones
 Heroes and heroines shouts confus'dly rise, 41
 And bass and treble voices strike the skies.

No common weapon in their hands are found;
 Like gods they fight, nor dread a mortal wound.
 So when bold Homer makes the gods engage,
 And heavenly breasts with human passions rage;
 'Gainst Pallas, Mars; Latona Hermes arms;
 And all Olympus rings with loud alarms;
 Jove's thunder roars, heaven trembles all around,
 Blue Neptune storms, the bellowing deeps resound:
 Earth shakes her nodding towers, the ground gives way, 51

And the pale ghosts start at the flash of day!
 Triumphant Umbriel on a scone's height
 Clapp'd his glad wings, and sat to view the fight:
 Propp'd on their bodkin spears, the sprites survey
 The growing combat, or assist the fray.

While through the press enrag'd Thalestris flies,
 And scatters death around from both her eyes,
 A beau and winking perish'd in the throng,
 One dy'd in metaphor, and one in song.
 "O cruel nymph! a living death I bear," 60
 Cry'd Dapperwit, and sunk beside his chair.
 A mournful glance Sir Fopling upwards cast,
 "Those eyes are made so killing"—was his last.
 Thus on Mæander's flowery margin lies
 Th' expiring swan, and as he sings he dies.

When bold Sir Plume had drawn Clarissa down,
 Chloe stepp'd in, and kill'd him with a frown;
 She smil'd to see the doughty hero slain;
 But, at her smile, the beau reviv'd again. 70

Now Jove suspends his golden scales in air,
 Weighs the mens wits against the lady's hair
 The doubtful beam long nods from side to side;
 At length the wits mount up, the hairs subside.

See, fierce Belinda on the Baron flies,
 With more than usual lightning in her eyes:
 Nor fear'd the chief th' unequal fight to try,
 Who fought no more than on his foe to die.
 But this bold lord, with manly strength endued,
 She with one finger and a thumb subdued: 80

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 37. To arms, to arms!] From hence the first edition goes to the conclusion, except a very few short insertions added, to keep the machinery in view to the end of the poem.

Ver. 53. Triumphant Umbriel] These four lines added, for the reason before mentioned.

Just where the breath of life his nostrils drew,
A charge of snuff the wily virgin threw;
The Gnomes direct, to every atom just,
The pungent grains of titillating dust.
Sudden, with starting tears each eye o'erflows,
And the high dome re-echoes to his nose.

Now meet thy fate, incens'd Belinda cry'd,
And drew a deadly bodkin from her side.
(The same, his ancient personage to deck,
Her great-great-grandfire wore about his neck, 90
In three seal-rings; which after, melted down,
Form'd a vast buckle for his widow's gown:
Her infant grandame's whistle next it grew,
The bells she jingled, and the whistle blew;
Then in a bodkin grac'd her mother's hairs,
Which long she wore, and now Belinda wears.)

Boast not my fall (he cry'd), insulting foe!
Thou by some other shalt be laid as low.
Nor think, to die dejects my lofty mind:
All that I dread is leaving you behind! 100
Rather than so, ah! let me still survive,
And burn in Cupid's flames—but burn alive.

Restore the Lock, she cries; and all around,
Restore the Lock! the vaulted roofs rebound.
Not fierce Othello in so loud a strain
Roar'd for the handkerchief that caus'd his pain.
But see how oft ambitious aims are cross'd,
And chiefs contend till all the prize is lost!
The Lock, obtain'd with guilt, and kept with pain,

In every place is sought, but sought in vain: 110
With such a prize no mortal must be blest,
So heaven decrees! with heaven who can contest?

Some thought it mounted to the Lunar sphere,
Since all things lost on earth are treasur'd there.
There heroes wits are kept in ponderous vases,
And beaux in snuff-boxes and tweezer cases:
There broken vows and death-bed alms are found,
And lovers hearts with ends of ribband bound;

The courtier's promises, and sick man's prayers,
The smiles of harlots, and the tears of heirs, 120
Cages for gnats, and chains to yoke a flea,
Dry'd butterflies, and tomes of casuistry.

But trust the muse—she saw it upward rise,
Though mark'd by none but quick, poetic eyes:
(So Rome's great founder to the heavens withdrew,
To Proculus alone confess'd in view)
A sudden star, it shot through liquid air,
And drew behind a radiant trail of hair.
Not Berenice's locks first rose so bright,
The heaven bespangling with dishevell'd light. 130
The Sylphs behold it kindling as it flies,
And pleas'd pursue its progress through the skies.

This the Beau-monde shall from the Mall survey,
And hail with music its propitious ray.
This the blest lover shall for Venus take,
And send up vows from Rosamonda's lake.
This partridge soon shall view in cloudless skies,
When next he looks through Galileo's eyes;
And hence th' egregious wizard shall foredoom
The fate of Louis, and the fall of Rome. 140

Then cease, bright nymph! to mourn thy ravish'd hair,

Which adds new glory to the shining sphere!
Not all the tresses that fair head can boast,
Shall draw such envy as the Lock you lost.
For, after all the murders of your eye,
When, after millions slain, yourself shall die;
When those fair suns shall set, as set they must,
And all those tresses shall be laid in dust,
This Lock, the muse shall consecrate to fame,
And 'midst the stars inscribe Belinda's name. 150

E L E G Y

To the memory of an Unfortunate Lady.

WHAT beckoning ghost, along the moonlight shade,

Invites my steps, and points to yonder glade?

'Tis she!—but why that bleeding bosom gor'd,

Why dimly gleams the visionary sword?

Oh ever beauteous, ever friendly! tell,

Is it, in heaven, a crime to love too well?

To bear too tender, or too firm a heart,

To act a lover's or a Roman's part?

Is there no bright reversion in the sky,

For those who greatly think, or bravely die?

Why bade ye else, ye Powers! her soul aspire
Above the vulgar flight of low desire?

Ambition first sprung from your blest abodes;

The glorious fault of angels and of gods:

Thence to their images on earth it flows,

And in the breasts of kings and heroes glows.

Most souls, 'tis true, but peep out once an age,

Dull sullen prisoners in the body's cage:

Dim lights of life, that burn a length of years,

Useless, unseen, as lamps in sepulchres;

Like eastern kings a lazy state they keep,

And, close confin'd to their own palace, sleep.

From these perhaps (ere nature bade her die)
Fate snatch'd her early to the pitying sky.

As into air the purer spirits flow,

And separate from their kindred dregs below;

So flew the soul to its congenial place,

Nor left one virtue to redeem her race.

But thou, false guardian of a charge too good,

Thou, mean deserter of thy brother's blood!

See on these ruby lips the trembling breath,

These cheeks now fading at the blast of death;

Cold is that breast which warm'd the world before,

And those love-darting eyes must roll no more.

Thus, if eternal justice rules the ball,

Thus shall your wives, and thus your children fall:

On all the line a sudden vengeance waits,

And frequent hearſes ſhall beſiege your gates;

There paſſengers ſhall ſtand, and pointing ſay,

(While the long funerals blacken all the way)

Lo! theſe were they, whoſe ſouls the furies ſteel'd,

And curſt with hearts unknowing how to yield.

Thus unlamented paſs the proud away,

The gaze of ſouls, and pageant of a day!

So periſh all, whoſe breſt ne'er learn'd to glow

For others good, or melt at others woe.

What can atone (oh, ever injur'd ſhade!)

Thy fate unpity'd, and thy rites unpaid?

No friend's complaint, no kind domestic tear
Pleas'd thy pale ghost, or grac'd thy mournful bier:

By foreign hands thy dying eyes were clos'd,

By foreign hands thy decent limbs compos'd,

By foreign hands thy humble grave adorn'd,

By strangers honour'd, and by stranger's mourn'd!

What though no friends in fable weeds appear;

Grieve for an hour, perhaps, then mourn a year,

And bear about the mockery of woe

To midnight dances, and the public show?

What though no weeping loves thy ashes grace,

Nor polish'd marble emulate thy face?

What though no sacred earth allow thee room,

Nor hallow'd dirge be mutter'd o'er thy tomb?

Yet shall thy grave with rising flowers be dress'd,

And the green turf lie lightly on thy breast:

There shall the morn her earliest tears bestow,

There the first roses of the year shall blow;

While angels with their silver wings o'erſhade

The ground now ſacred by thy relics made.

So, peaceful reſts, without a ſtone, a name,

What once had beauty, titles, wealth, and fame.

How lov'd, how honour'd once, avails thee not,

To whom related, or by whom begot;

A heap of duſt alone remains of thee,

'Tis all thou art, and all the proud ſhall be!

Poets themſelves muſt fall, like thoſe they ſung,

Deaf the prais'd ear, and mute the tuneful tongue.

Ev'n he, whoſe ſoul now melts in mournful lays,

Shall ſhortly want the generous tear he pays;

Then from his cloſing eyes thy form ſhall part,

And the laſt pang ſhall tear thee from his heart,

Life's idle buſineſs at one gasp be o'er,

The muſe forgot, and thou believ'd no more!

MR. ADDISON'S TRAGEDY OF CATO.

To wake the ſoul by tender ſtrokes of art,
To raiſe the genius, and to mend the heart;
To make mankind in conſcious virtue bold,
Live o'er each ſcene, and be what they behold:
For this the Tragic Muſe firſt trod the ſtage,
Commanding tears to ſtream through every age;
Tyrants no more their ſavage nature kept,
And ſets to virtue wonder'd how they wept.

Our author shuns by vulgar springs to move
The hero's glory, or the virgin's love;
In pitying Love, we but our weakness show,
And wild Ambition well deserves its woe.
Here tears shall flow from a more generous cause,
Such tears as patriots shed for dying laws:
He bids your breasts with ancient ardour rise,
And calls forth Roman drops from British eyes.
Virtue confess'd in human shape he draws,
What Plato thought, and godlike Cato was:
No common object to your sight displays,
But what with pleasure heaven itself surveys,
A brave man struggling in the storms of fate,
And greatly falling with a falling state.
While Cato gives his little senate laws,
What bosom beats not in his country's cause?
Who sees him act, but envies every deed?
Who hears him groan, and does not wish to bleed?
Ev'n when proud Cæsar 'midst triumphal cars,
The spoils of nations, and the pomp of wars,
Ignobly vain, and impotently great,
Shew'd Rome her Cato's figure drawn in state;
As her dead father's reverend image past,
The pomp was darken'd, and the day o'ercast;
The triumph ceas'd, tears gush'd from every eye;
The world's great victor pass'd unheeded by;
Her last good man dejected Rome ador'd,
And honour'd Cæsar's less than Cato's sword.

Britons, attend: be worth like this approv'd,
And show you have the virtue to be mov'd.
With honest scorn the first fam'd Cato view'd
Rome learning arts from Greece, whom she subdued;

Your scene precariously subsists too long
On French translation, and Italian song.
Dare to have sense yourselves; assert the stage,
Be justly warm'd with your own native rage:
Such plays alone should win a British ear,
As Cato's self had not disdain'd to hear.

EPILOGUE

TO

MR. ROWE'S JANE SHORE.

DESIGNED FOR MRS. OLDFIELD.

Prodigious this! the frail-one of our play
From her own sex should mercy find to-day!
You might have held the pretty head aside,
Peep'd in your fans, been serious, thus, and cry'd,
The play may pass—but that strange creature,
Shore,

I can't—indeed now—I so hate a whore—
Just as a blockhead rubs his thoughtless skull,
And thanks his stars he was not born a fool;
So from a sister sinner you shall hear,
"How strangely you expose yourself, my dear!"
But let me die, all raillery apart,
Our sex are still forgiving at their heart;
And, did not wicked custom so contrive,
We'd be the best, good-natur'd things alive.

There are, 'tis true, who tell another tale,
That virtuous ladies envy while they rail;
Such rage without betrays the fire within;
In some close corner of the soul, they sin;
Still hoarding up, most scandalously nice,
Amidst their virtues a reserve of vice.
The godly dame, who fleshly failings damns,
Scolds with her maid, or with her chaplain crams.
Would you enjoy soft nights, and solid dinners:
Faith, gallants, board with saints, and bed with sinners.

Well, if our author in the wife offends,
He has a husband that will make amends:
He draws him gentle, tender, and forgiving,
And sure such kind good creatures may be living,
In days of old they pardon'd breach of vows,
Stern Cato's self was no relentless spouse:
Plu—Plutarch, what's his name, that writes his life?

Tells us, that Cato dearly lov'd his wife:
Yet if a friend, a night or so, should need her,
He'd recommend her as a special breeder.
To lend a wife, few here would scruple make;
But, pray, which of you all would take her back?
Though with the stoic chief our stage may ring,
The stoic husband was the glorious thing.
The man had courage, was a sage, 'tis true,
And lov'd his country—but what's that to you?
Those strange examples ne'er were made to fit ye.
But the kind cuckold might instruct the city:
There many an honest man may copy Cato,
Who ne'er saw naked sword, or look'd in Plato.

If, after all, you think it a disgrace,
That Edward's miss thus perks it in your face;
To see a piece of failing flesh and blood,
In all the rest so impudently good;
Faith let the modest matrons of the town
Come here in crowds, and stare the strumpet down.

SAPPHO TO PHAON.

SAY, lovely youth, that dost my heart command,
Can Phaon's eyes forget his Sappho's hand?
Must then her name the wretched writer prove,
To thy remembrance lost, as to thy love?
Ask not the cause that I new numbers choose,
The lute neglected, and the lyric muse;
Love taught my tears in sadder notes to flow,
And tun'd my heart to elegies of woe,
I burn, I burn, as when through ripen'd corn
By driving winds the spreading flames are borne.
Phaon to Ætna's scorching fields retires,
While I consume with more than Ætna's fires!
No more my soul a charm in music finds,
Music has charms alone for peaceful minds.
Soft scenes of solitude no more can please,
Love enters there, and I'm my own disease.
No more the Lesbian dames my passion move,
Once the dear objects of my guilty love;
All other loves are lost in only thine,
Ah, youth ungrateful to a flame like mine!
Whom would not all those blooming charms surprise,
Those heavenly looks, and dear deluding eyes?

D ij

The harp and how would you like Phœbus bear,
A brighter Phœbus Phaon might appear;
Would you with ivy wreath your flowing hair,
Not Bacchus' self with Phaon could compare:
Yet Phœbus lov'd, and Bacchus felt the flame,
One Daphne warm'd, and one the Cretan dame;
Nymphs that in verse no more could rival me,
Than ev'n those gods contend in charms with thee.

The muses teach me all their softest lays,
And the wide world resounds with Sappho's praise.
Though great Alcæus more sublimely sings,
And strikes with bolder rage the sounding strings,
No less renown attends the moving lyre,
Which Venus tunes, and all her loves inspire;
To me what nature has in charms deny'd,
Is well by wit's more lasting flames supply'd.
Though short my stature, yet my name extends
To heaven itself, and earth's remotest ends.
Brown as I am, an Ethiopian dame
Inspir'd young Perseus with a generous flame:
Turtles and doves of differing hues unite,
And glossy jet is pair'd with shining white.
If to no charms thou wilt thy heart resign,
But such as merit, such as equal thine,
By none, alas! by none thou canst be mov'd!
Phaon alone by Phaon must be lov'd!
Yet once thy Sappho could thy cares employ,
Once in her arms you centr'd all your joy:
No time the dear remembrance can remove,
For, oh! how vast a memory has love!
My music, then, you could for ever hear,
And all my words were music to your ear.
You stopp'd with kisses my enchanting tongue,
And found my kisses sweeter than my song.
In all I pleas'd, but most in what was best;
And the last joy was dearer than the rest.
Then with each word, each glance, each motion fir'd,
You still enjoy'd, and yet you still desir'd,
Till all dissolving in the trance we lay,
And in tumultuous raptures dy'd away.
The fair Sicilians now thy soul inflame;
Why was I born, ye gods! a Lesbian dame?
But ah, beware, Sicilian nymphs! nor boast
That wandering heart which I so lately lost;
Nor be with all those tempting words abus'd,
Those tempting words were all to Sappho us'd.
And you that rule Sicilia's happy plains,
Have pity, Venus, on your poet's pains!
Shall fortune still in one sad tenor run,
And still increase the woes so soon begun?
Inur'd to sorrow from my tender years,
My parent's ashes drank my early tears:
My brother next, neglecting wealth and fame,
Ignobly burn'd in a destructive flame:
An infant daughter late my griefs increas'd,
And all a mother's cares distract my breast.
Alas, what more could fate itself impose,
But thee, the last and greatest of my woes?
No more my robes in waving purple flow,
Nor on my hand the sparkling diamonds glow;
No more my locks in ringlets curl'd diffuse
The costly sweetness of Arabian dews,
Nor braids of gold the varied tresses bind,
That fly disorder'd with the wanton wind:

For whom should Sappho use such arts as these?
He's gone, whom only she desir'd to please!
Cupid's light darts my tender bosom move,
Still is there cause for Sappho still to love:
So from my birth the sisters fix'd my doom,
And gave to Venus all my life to come;
Or, while my muse in melting notes complains,
My yielding heart keeps measure to my strains.
By charms like thine which all my soul have won,
Who might not—ah! who would not be undone?
For those Aurora Cephalus might scorn,
And with fresh blushes paint the conscious morn:
For those might Cynthia lengthen Phaon's sleep,
And bid Endymion nightly tend his sheep:
Venus for those had rapt thee to the skies,
But Mars on thee might look with Venus' eyes.
O scarce a youth, yet scarce a tender boy!
O useful time for lovers to employ!
Pride of thy age, and glory of thy race,
Come to these arms, and melt in this embrace!
The vows you never will return, receive;
And take at least the love you will not give.
See, while I write, my words are lost in tears!
The less my sense, the more my love appears.
Sure 'twas not much to bid one kind adieu;
(At least to feign was never hard to you!)
Farewell, my Lesbian love, you might have said;
Or coldly thus, Farewell, oh Lesbian maid!
No tear did you, no parting kiss receive,
Nor knew I then how much I was to grieve.
No lover's gift your Sappho could confer,
And wrongs and woes were all you left with her.
No charge I gave you, and no charge could give,
But this, Be mindful of our loves, and live.
Now by the Nine, those powers ador'd by me,
And Love, the god that ever waits on thee,
When first I heard (from whom I hardly knew)
That you were fled, and all my joys with you,
Like some sad statue, speechless, pale I stood,
Grief chill'd my breast, and stopp'd my freezing
blood;
No sigh to rise, no tear had power to flow,
Fix'd in a stupid lethargy of woe:
But when its way th' impetuous passion found,
I rend my tresses, and my breast I wound;
I rave, then weep; I curse, and then complain;
Now swell to rage, now melt in tears again.
Not fiercer pangs distract the mournful dame,
Whose first-born infant feeds the funeral flame.
My scornful brother with a smile appears,
Insults my woes, and triumphs in my tears:
His hated image ever haunts my eyes;
And why this grief? thy daughter lives, he cries.
Stung with my love, and furious with despair,
All torn my garments, and my bosom bare,
My woes, thy crimes, I to the world proclaim;
Such inconsistent things are love and shame!
'Tis thou art all my care and my delight,
My daily longing, and my dream by night:
O night, more pleasing than the brightest day,
When fancy gives what absence takes away,
And, dress'd in all its visionary charms,
Restores my fair deserter to my arms!
Then round your neck in wanton wreaths I twine;
Then you, methinks, as fondly circle mine:

A thousand tender words I hear and speak;
A thousand melting kisses give, and take :
Then fiercer joys : I blush to mention these,
Yet, while I blush, confess how much they please.
But when, with day, the sweet delusions fly,
And all things wake to life and joy, but I;
As if once more forsaken, I complain,
And close my eyes to dream of you again :
Then frantic rise, and like some fury rove
Through lonely plains, and through the silent
grove ;

As if the silent grove, and lonely plains,
That knew my pleasures, could relieve my pains.
I view the grotto, once the scene of love,
The rocks around, the hanging roofs above,
That charm'd me more, with native moss o'er-grown,

Than Phrygian marble, or the Parian stone.
I find the shades that veil'd our joys before ;
But, Phaon gone, those shades delight no more.
Here the press'd herbs with bending tops betray
Where oft entwin'd in amorous folds we lay ;
I kiss that earth which once was press'd by you,
And all with tears the withering herbs bedew.
For thee the fading trees appear to mourn,
And birds defer their songs till thy return :
Night shades the groves, and all in silence lie,
All but the mournful Philomel and I :
With mournful Philomel I join my strain,
Of Tereus she, of Phaon I complain.

A spring there is, whose silver waters show,
Clear as a glass, the shining sands below ;
A flowery Lotos spreads its arms above,
Shades all the banks, and seems itself a grove ;
Eternal greens the mossy margin grace,
Watch'd by the Sylvan genius of the place.
Here as I lay, and swell'd with tears the flood,
Before my sight a watery virgin stood :
She stood and cry'd, " O you that love in vain !
" Fly hence, and seek the fair Leucadian main.
" There stands a rock, from whose impending steep
" Apollo's fane surveys the rolling deep ;
" There injur'd lovers, leaping from above,
" Their flames extinguish, and forget to love.
" Deucalion once with hopeless fury burn'd,
" In vain he lov'd, relentless Pyrrha scorn'd :
" But when from hence he plung'd into the main,
" Deucalion scorn'd, and Pyrrha lov'd in vain.
" Haste, Sappho, haste, from high Leucadia throw
" Thy wretched weight, nor dread the deeps below !"

She spoke, and vanish'd with the voice—I rise,
And silent tears fall trickling from my eyes.
I go, ye nymphs ! those rocks and seas to prove ;
How much I fear, but ah, how much I love !
I go, ye nymphs, where furious love inspires ;
Let female fears submit to female fires.
To rocks and seas I fly from Phaon's hate,
And hope from seas and rocks a milder fate.
Ye gentle gales, beneath my body blow,
And softly lay me on the waves below !
And thou, kind love, my sinking limbs sustain,
Spread thy soft wings, and waft me o'er the main,
Nor let a lover's death the guiltless flood profane !

On Phœbus' shrine my harp I'll then bestow,
And this inscription shall be plac'd below.
" Here she who sung, to him that did inspire,
" Sappho to Phœbus consecrates her lyre ;
" What suits with Sappho, Phœbus, suits with thee ;
" The gift, the giver, and the god agree."
By why, alas, relentless youth, ah, why
To distant seas must tender Sappho fly ?
Thy charms than those may far more powerful be,
And Phœbus' self is less a god to me.
Ah ! canst thou doom me to the rocks and sea,
O, far more faithless, and more hard than they ?
Ah ! canst thou rather see this tender breast
Dash'd on these rocks than to thy bosom press'd ;
This breast, which once, in vain ! you lik'd so well ;
Where the loves play'd, and where the muses dwell ?
Alas ! the muses now no more inspire,
Untun'd my lute, and silent is my lyre ;
My languid numbers have forgot to flow,
And fancy sinks beneath a weight of woe.
Ye Lesbian virgins, and ye Lesbian dames,
Themes of my verse, and objects of my flames,
No more your groves with my glad songs shall ring,
No more these hands shall touch the trembling
string :

My Phaon's fled, and I those arts resign,
(Wretch that I am, to call that Phaon mine !)
Return, fair youth, and bring along
Joy to my soul, and vigour to my song :
Absent from thee, the poet's flame expires ;
But ah ! how fiercely burn the lover's fires ?
Gods ! can no prayers, no sighs, no numbers, move
One savage heart, or teach it how to love ?
The winds my prayers, my sighs, my numbers bear,
The flying winds have lost them all in air !
Oh when, alas ! shall more auspicious gales
To these fond eyes restore thy welcome sails ?
If you return—ah, why these long delays ?
Poor Sappho dies while careless Phaon stays.
O, launch thy bark, nor fear the watery plain !
Venus for thee shall smooth her native main.
O, launch thy bark, secure of prosperous gales !
Cupid for thee shall spread the swelling sails.
If you will fly—(yet ah ! what cause can be,
Too cruel youth, that you should fly from me ?)
If not from Phaon, I must hope for ease,
Ah, let me seek it from the raging seas !
To raging seas unprov'd I'll remove,
And either cease to live, or cease to love !

ELOISA TO ABELARD.

Argument.

ABELARD and Eloisa flourished in the twelfth century ; they were two of the most distinguished persons of their age in learning and beauty, but for nothing more famous than for their unfortunate passion. After a long course of calamities, they retired each to a several convent, and consecrated the remainder of their days to religion.
It was many years after this separation, that a letter of Abelard's to a friend, which contained the history of his misfortunes, fell into the hands of Eloisa. This awakening all her tenderness, occasioned those celebrated letters (out of which the following is partly extracted), which give so lively a picture of the struggles of grace and nature, virtue and passion.

In these deep solitudes and awful cells,
Where heavenly-pensive contemplation dwells,
And ever-musing melancholy reigns;
What means this tumult in a vestal's veins?
Why rove my thoughts beyond this last retreat?
Why feels my heart its long-forgotten heat?
Yet, yet I love!—From Abelard it came,
And Eloisa yet must kiss the name.

Dear, fatal name! rest ever unreveal'd,
Nor pass these lips in holy silence seal'd;
Hide it, my heart, within that close disguise,
Where, mix'd with God's, his lov'd idea lies:
O, write it not, my hand—the name appears
Already written—wash it out my tears!
In vain lost Eloisa weeps and prays,
Her heart still dictates, and her hand obeys.

Relentless walls! whose darksome round contains
Repentant sighs, and voluntary pains:
Ye rugged rocks! which holy knees have worn;
Ye grotts and caverns shagg'd with horrid thorn!
Shrines! where their vigils pale-eyed virgins keep;
And pitying saints, whose statues learn to weep!
Though cold like you, unmov'd and silent grown,
I have not yet forgot myself to stone.

All is not heaven's while Abelard has part,
Still rebel nature holds out half my heart;
Nor prayers, nor fasts, its stubborn pulse restrain,
Nor tears for ages taught to flow in vain.

Soon as thy letters trembling I unclose,
That well-known name awakens all my woes.
Oh, name for ever sad! for ever dear!
Still breath'd in sighs, still usher'd with a tear.
I tremble too, where'er my own I find,
Some dire misfortune follows close behind.
Line after line my gushing eyes o'erflow,
Led through a sad variety of woe:
Now warm in love, now withering in my bloom,
Lost in a convent's solitary gloom!
There stern religion quench'd th' unwilling flame,
There dy'd the best of passions, love and fame.

Yet write, oh, write me all, that I may join
Griefs to thy griefs, and echo sighs to thine!
Nor, for nor fortune take this power away;
And is my Abelard less kind than they?
Tears still are mine, and those I need not spare,
Love but demands what else were shed in prayer;
No happier task these faded eyes pursue;
To read and weep is all they now can do.

Then share thy pain, allow that sad relief;
Ah, more than share it, give me all thy grief.
Heav'n first taught letters for some wretch's aid,
Some banish'd lover, or some captive maid; [spires,
They live, they speak, they breathe what love in-
Warm from the soul, and faithful to its fires,
The virgin's wish without her fears impart,
Excuse the blush, and pour out all the heart,
Speed the soft intercourse from soul to soul,
And waft a sigh from Indos to the pole.

Thou know'st how guiltless first I met thy flame,
When love approach'd me under friendship's name;
My fancy form'd thee of angelic kind,
Some emanation of th' all-beauteous mind.
Those smiling eyes, attemp'ring every ray,
Shone sweetly lambent with celestial day.
Guiltless I gaz'd; heaven listen'd while you sung;
And truths divine came mended from that tongue:
From lips like those what precept fail'd to move?
Too soon they taught me 'twas no sin to love:
Back through the paths of pleasing sense I ran,
Nor wish'd an angel whom I lov'd a man.
Dim and remote the joys of saints I see;
Nor envy them that heaven I lose for thee.

How oft, when press'd to marriage, have I said,
Curse on all laws but those which love has made!
Love, free as air, at sight of human ties,
Spreads his light wings, and in a moment flies.
Let wealth, let honour, wait the wedded dame,
August her deed, and sacred be her fame;
Before true passion all those views remove;
Fame, wealth, and honour! what are you to love?
The jealous God, when we profane his fires,
Those restless passions in revenge inspires,
And bids them make mistaken mortals groan,
Who seek in love for aught but love alone.
Should at my feet the world's great master fall,
Himself, his throne, his world, I'd scorn them all:
Not Cæsar's empress would I deign to prove;
No, make me mistress to the man I love.

If there be yet another name more free,
More fond than mistress, make me that to thee!
Oh, happy state! when souls each other draw,
When love is liberty, and nature law:
All then is full, possessing and possess'd,
No craving void left aching in the breast:
Ev'n thought meets thought, e'er from the lips its part,

And each warm wish springs mutual from the heart.
This sure is bliss (if bliss on earth there be),
And once the lot of Abelard and me.

Alas, how chang'd! what sudden horrors rise!
A naked lover bound and bleeding lies!
Where, where was Eloise? her voice, her hand,
Her poniard had oppos'd the dire command.
Barbarian, stay! that bloody stroke restrain;
The crime was common, common be the pain.
I can no more; by shame, by rage suppress'd,
Let tears and burning blushes speak the rest.

Canst thou forget that sad, that solemn day,
When victims at yon altar's foot we lay?
Canst thou forget what tears that moment fell,
When, warm in youth, I bade the world farewell?
As with cold lips I kiss'd the sacred veil,
The shrines all trembled, and the lamps grew pale;
Heaven scarce believ'd the conquest it survey'd,
And saints with wonder heard the vows I made.
Yet then, to those dread altars as I drew,
Not on the cross my eyes were fix'd, but you:
Not grace, or zeal, love only was my call;
And if I lose thy love, I lose my all.
Come! with thy looks, thy words, relieve my woe:
Those still at least are left thee to bestow.
Still on that breast enamour'd let me lie,
Still drink delicious poison from thy eye.

Pant on thy lip, and to thy heart be press'd;
Give all thou canst—and let me dream the rest.
Ah, no! instruct me other joys to prize,
With other beauties charm my partial eyes,
Full in my view set all the bright abode,
And make my soul quit Abelard for God.

Ah, think at least thy flock deserves thy care!
Plants of thy hand, and children of thy prayer.
From the false world in early youth they fled,
By thee to mountains, wilds, and deserts led.
You rais'd these hallow'd walls; the desert smil'd,
And paradise was open'd in the wild.
No weeping orphan saw his father's stores
Our shrines irradiate, or emblaze the floors;
No silver saints, by dying misers given,
Here bribe the rage of ill-requited heaven;
But such plain roofs as piety could raise,
And only vocal with the Maker's praise.
In these lone walls (their days eternal bound)
These moss-grown domes with spiry turrets
crown'd,

Where awful arches make a noon-day night,
And the dim windows shed a solemn light;
Thy eyes diffus'd a reconciling ray,
And gleams of glory brighten'd all the day.
But now no face divine contentment wears,
'Tis all blank sadness, or continual tears.
See how the force of others prayers I try,
(O pious fraud of amorous charity!)
But why should I on others prayers depend?
Come thou, my father, brother, husband, friend!
Ah, let thy handmaid, sister, daughter, move,
And all those tender names in one, thy love!
The darksome pines that o'er yon rocks reclin'd
Wave high, and murmur to the hollow wind,
The wandering streams that shine between the hills,

The grots that echo to the tinkling rills,
The dying gales that pant upon the trees,
The lakes that quiver to the curling breeze;
No more these scenes my meditation aid,
Or lull to rest the visionary maid.
But o'er the twilight groves and dusky caves,
Long-sounding aisles, and intermingled graves,
Black melancholy sits, and round her throws
A death-like silence, and a dread repose;
Her gloomy presence saddens all the scene,
Shades every flower, and darkens every green,
Deepens the murmur of the falling floods,
And breathes a browner horror on the woods.

Yet here for ever, ever must I stay;
Sad proof how well a lover can obey!
Death, only death, can break the lasting chain;
And here, ev'n then, shall my cold dust remain;
Here all its frailties, all its flames resign,
And wait till 'tis no sin to mix with thine.

Ah, wretch! believ'd the spouse of God in
vain,
Confess'd within the slave of love and man.
Assist me, heaven! but whence arose that prayer?
Sprung it from piety, or from despair?
Ev'n here, where frozen chastity retires,
Love finds an altar for forbidden fires.
I ought to grieve, but cannot what I ought;
I mourn the lover, not lament the fault;

I view my crime, but kindle at the view,
Repent old pleasures, and solicit new;
Now turn'd to heaven, I weep my past offence,
Now think of thee, and curse my innocence.
Of all affliction taught a lover yet,
'Tis sure the hardest science to forget!
How shall I lose the sin, yet keep the sense,
And love th' offender, yet detest th' offence?
How the dear object from the crime remove,
Or how distinguish penitence from love?
Unequal task! a passion to resign,
For hearts so touch'd, so pierc'd, so lost as mine!
E'er such a soul regains its peaceful state,
How often must it love, how often hate!
How often hope, despair, resent, regret,
Conceal, disdain—do all things but forget!
But let heaven seize it, all at once 'tis fir'd:
Not touch'd, but rapt; not weaken'd, but inspir'd!
Oh, come! oh, teach me nature to subdue,
Renounce my love, my life, myself—and you!
Fill my fond heart with God alone, for he Alone can rival, can succeed to thee.

How happy is the blameless vestal's lot;
The world forgetting, by the world forgot!
Eternal sun-shine of the spotless mind!
Each prayer accepted, and each wish resign'd;
Labour and rest that equal periods keep;
"Obedient slumbers that can wake and weep;"
Desires compos'd, affections ever even;
Tears that delight, and sighs that waft to heaven.
Grace shines around her with serenest beams,
And whispering angels prompt her golden dreams.
For her th' unfading rose of Eden blooms,
And wings of seraphs shed divine perfumes;
For her the spouse prepares the bridal ring;
For her white virgins hymenæals sing:
To sounds of heavenly harps she dies away,
And melts in visions of eternal day.

Far other dreams my erring soul employ,
Far other raptures of unholy joy:
When at the close of each sad, sorrowing day,
Fancy restores what vengeance snatch'd away,
Then conscience sleeps, and leaving nature free,
All my loose soul unbounded springs to thee.
O, curst, dear horrors of all-conscious night!
How glowing guilt exalts the keen delight!
Provoking demons all restraint remove,
And stir within me every source of love.
I hear thee, view thee, gaze o'er all thy charms,
And round thy phantom glue my clasping arms.
I wake:—no more I hear, no more I view,
The phantom flies me, as unkind as you.
I call aloud; it hears not what I say:
I stretch my empty arms; it glides away.
To dream once more I close my willing eyes;
Ye soft illusions, dear deceits, arise!
Alas, no more! methinks we wandering go
Through dreary wastes, and weep each other's woe,
Where round some mouldering tower pale ivy
creeps,
And low-brow'd rocks hang nodding o'er the deeps.
Sudden you mount, you beckon from the skies;
Clouds interpose, waves roar, and winds arise.
I shriek, start up, the same sad prospect find,
And wake to all the griefs I left behind.

For thee the fates, severely kind, ordain
A cool suspense from pleasure and from pain;
Thy life a long dead calm of fix'd repose;
No pulse that riots, and no blood that glows.
Still as the seas, e'er winds were taught to blow,
Or moving spirit bade the waters flow;
Soft as the slumbers of a saint forgiven,
And mild as opening gleams of promis'd heaven.

Come, Abelard! for what hast thou to dread?
The torch of Venus burns not for the dead.
Nature stands check'd; religion disapproves;
Ev'n thou art cold—yet Eloisa loves.
Ah, hopeless, lasting flames! like those that burn
To light the dead, and warm th' unfruitful urn.

What scenes appear where'er I turn my view!
The dear ideas, where I fly, pursue,
Rise in the grove, before the altar rise,
Stain all my soul, and wanton in my eyes.
I waste the matin lamp in sighs for thee,
Thy image steals between my God and me,
Thy voice I seem in every hymn to hear,
With every bead I drop too soft a tear.
When from the censer clouds of fragrance roll,
And swelling organs lift the rising soul,
One thought of thee puts all the pomp to flight,
Priests, tapers, temples, swim before my sight:
In seas of flame my plunging soul is drown'd,
While altars blaze, and angels tremble round.

While prostrate here in humble grief I lie,
Kind, virtuous drops just gathering in my eye,
While, praying, trembling, in the dust I roll,
And dawning grace is opening on my soul:
Come, if thou dar'st, all charming as thou art!
Oppose thyself to heaven; dispute my heart;
Come, with one glance of those deluding eyes
Blot out each bright idea of the skies; [tears;
Take back that grace, those sorrows, and those
Take back my fruitless penitence and prayers;
Snatch me, just mounting, from the blest abode;
Assist the fiends, and tear me from my God!

No, fly me, fly me, far as pole from pole;
Rise Alps between us! and whole oceans roll!
Ah, come not, write not, think not once of me,
Nor share one pang of all I felt for thee.
Thy oaths I quit, thy memory resign;
Forget, renounce me, hate what'er was mine.
Fair eyes, and tempting looks (which yet I view!)
Long lov'd, ador'd ideas, all adieu!
O, grace serene! O virtue heavenly fair!
Divine oblivion of low-thoughted care!
Fresh-blooming hope, gay daughter of the sky!
And faith, our early immortality!
Enter, each mild, each amicable guest;
Receive and wrap me in eternal rest!

See in her cell sad Eloisa spread,
Propt on some tomb, a neighbour of the dead.
In each low wind methinks a spirit calls,
And more than echoes talk along the walls.
Here, as I watch'd the dying lamp around,
From yonder shrine I heard a hollow sound.

"Come, sister, come!" (it said, or seem'd to say)
"Thy place is here, sad sister, come away!"
"Once like thyself, I trembled, wept, and pray'd,
"Love's victim then, though now a fainting maid:
"But all is calm in this eternal sleep;
"Here grief forgets to groan, and love to weep:
"Ev'n superstition loses every fear;
"For God, not man, absolves our frailties here."

I come, I come! prepare your roseate bowers,
Celestial palms, and ever-blooming flowers.
Thither, where sinners may have rest, I go,
Where flames refin'd in breasts seraphic glow:
Thou, Abelard! the last sad office pay,
And smooth my passage to the realms of day;
See my lips tremble, and my eye-balls roll,
Suck my last breath, and catch my flying soul!
Ah, no—in sacred vestments mayst thou stand,
The hallow'd taper trembling in thy hand,
Present the cross before my lifted eye,
Teach me at once, and learn of me to die.
Ah then, thy once-lov'd Eloisa see!

It will be then no crime to gaze on me.
See from my cheek the transient roses fly!
See the last sparkle languish in my eye!
Till every motion, pulse, and breath be o'er;
And ev'n my Abelard be lov'd no more.
O, death all eloquent! you only prove
What dust we doat on, when 'tis man we love.

Then too, when fate shall thy fair frame destroy,
(That cause of all my guilt, and all my joy),
In trance ecstatic may the pangs be drown'd,
Bright clouds descend, and angels watch thee
round,

From opening skies may streaming glories shine,
And saints embrace thee with a love like mine!

May one kind grave unite each hapless name,
And graft my love immortal on thy fame!
Then, ages hence, when all my woes are o'er,
When this rebellious heart shall beat no more;
If ever chance two wandering lovers brings
To Paraclete's white walls and silver springs,
O'er the pale marble shall they join their heads,
And drink the falling tears each other sheds;
Then sadly say, with mutual pity mov'd,
"O, may we never love as these have lov'd!"
From the full choir, when loud hosannahs rise,
And swell the pomp of dreadful sacrifice,
Amid that scene of some relenting eye
Glance on the stone where our cold relics lie,
Devotion's self shall steal a thought from heaven,
One human tear shall drop, and be forgiven.
And sure if fate some future bard shall join
In sad similitude of griefs to mine,
Condemn'd whole years in absence to deplore,
And image charms he must behold no more;
Such if there be, who loves so long, so well;
Let him our sad, our tender story tell!
The well-sung woes will soothe my pensive ghost;
He best can paint them who shall feel them most.

TRANSLATIONS AND IMITATIONS.

ADVERTISEMENT.

THE following translations were selected from many others done by the Author in his youth; for the most part indeed but a sort of exercises, while he was improving himself in the languages, and carried by his early bent to poetry to perform them rather in verse than prose. Mr. Dryden's Fables came out about that time, which occasioned the Translations from Chaucer. They were first separately printed in Miscellanies, by J. Tonson and B. Lintot, and afterwards collected in the Quarto Edition of 1717. The Imitations of English Authors, which follow, were done as early, some of them at fourteen or fifteen years old.

THE TEMPLE OF FAME.

Written in the Year 1711.

ADVERTISEMENT.

THE hint of the following piece was taken from Chaucer's House of Fame. The design is in a manner entirely altered, the descriptions and most of the particular thoughts my own; yet I could not suffer it to be printed without this acknowledgment. The reader who would compare this with Chaucer, may begin with his third book of Fame, there being nothing in the two first books that answers to their title: wherever any hint is taken from him, the passage itself is set down in the marginal notes.

The poem is introduced in the manner of the Provençal poets, whose works were for the most part visions, or pieces of imagination, and constantly descriptive. From these, Petrarch and Chaucer frequently borrowed the idea of their poems. See the Trionfi of the former, and the Dream, Flower, and the Leaf, &c. of the latter.

The Author of this therefore chose the same sort of exordium.

IN that soft season, when descending showers
Call forth the greens, and wake the rising flowers;
When opening buds salute the welcome day,
And earth relenting feels the genial ray;
As balmy sleep had charm'd my cares to rest,
And love itself was banish'd from my breast,
(What time the morn mysterious visions brings,
While purer slumbers spread their golden wings)
A train of phantoms in wild order rose,
And, join'd, this intellectual scene compose. 10
I stood, methought, betwixt earth, seas, and skies,
The whole creation open to my eyes:

IMITATIONS.

Ver. II, &c.] These verses are hinted from the following of Chaucer, Book ii.
Though beheld I fields and plains,
Now hills, and now mountains,

In air self-balanc'd hung the globe below,
Where mountains rise, and circling oceans flow,
Here naked rocks, and empty wastes were seen;
There towery cities, and the forests green:
Here sailing ships delight the wandering eyes;
There trees and intermingled temples rise:
Now a clear sun the shining scene displays;
The transient landscape now in clouds decays. 20

O'er the wide prospect as I gaz'd around,
Sudden I heard a wild promiscuous sound,
Like broken thunders that at distance roar,
Or billows murmuring on the hollow shore:
Then gazing up, a glorious pile beheld,
Whose towering summit ambient clouds conceal'd,
High on a rock of ice the structure lay,
Steep its ascent, and slippery was the way;
The wonderous rock like Parian marble shone,
And seem'd, to distant sight, of solid stone. 30
Inscriptions here of various names I view'd,
The greater part by hostile time subdu'd;
Yet wide was spread their fame in ages past;
And poets once had promis'd they should last.
Some fresh engrav'd appear'd of wits renown'd;
I look'd again, nor could their trace be found.
Critics I saw, that other names deface,
And fix their own, with labour, in their place:
Their own, like others, soon their place resign'd,
Or disappear'd, and left the first behind. 40
Nor was the work impair'd by storms alone,
But felt th' approaches of too warm a sun;

IMITATIONS.

Now valeis, and now forestes,
And now unneth great bestes,
Now rivers, now citees,
Now towns, now great trees,
Now shippes sayling in the see.

Ver. 27. High on a rock of ice, &c.] Chaucer's third book of Fame.

It stood upon so high a rock,
Higher standeth none in Spayne—
What manner stone this rock was,
For it was like a lymed glass,
But that it shone full more clere;
But of what congeled matere
It was, I niste redily;
But at the last espied I,
And found that it was every dele,
A rock of ice, and not of stele.

Ver. 31. Inscriptions here, &c.]

Though saw I all the hill y-grave
With famous folkes names sele,
That had been in much wele
And her fames wide y-blow;
But well unneth might I know,
Any letters for to rede
Their names by, for out of drede
They weren almost off-thawen so,
That of the letters one or two
Were molte away of every name,
So unfamous was woxe her fame;
But men said what may ever last?

Ver. 41. Nor was the work impair'd, &c.]

Though gan I in myne barte cast,

For Fame, impatient of extremes, decays
Not more by envy, than excess of praise.
Yet part no injuries of heaven could feel,
Like crystal faithful to the graving steel;
The rock's high summit, in the temple's shade,
Nor heat could melt, nor beating storm invade.
Their names inscrib'd unnumber'd ages past
From time's first birth, with time itself shall last; 50
These ever new, nor subject to decays,
Spread, and grow brighter with the length of days.

So Zembla's rocks (the beauteous work of frost)
Rise white in air, and glitter o'er the coast;
Pale fens, unfelt, at distance roll away,
And on th' impassive ice the lightnings play;
Eternal snows the growing mass supply,
Till the bright mountains prop th' incumbent sky
As Atlas fix'd, each hoary pile appears,
The gather'd winter of a thousand years. 60
On this foundation Fame's high temple stands;
Stupendous pile! not rear'd by mortal hands.
Whate'er proud Rome or artful Greece beheld,
Or elder Babylon, its frame excell'd.
Four faces had the dome, and every face
Of various structure, but of equal grace!
Four brazen gates, on columns lifted high,
Salute the different quarters of the sky.
Here fabled chiefs in darker ages born,
Or worthies old, whom arms or arts adorn, 70
Who cities rais'd, or tam'd a monstrous race,
The walls in venerable order grace:
Heroes in animated marble frown,
And legislators seem to think in stone.

Westward, a sumptuous frontispiece appear'd,
On Doric pillars of white marble rear'd,
Crown'd with an architrave of antique mold,
And sculpture rising on the roughen'd gold.
In shaggy spoils here Theseus was beheld,
And Perseus dreadful with Minerva's shield: 80
There great Alcides, stooping with his toil,
Rests on his club, and holds th' Hesperian spoil:
Here Orpheus sings; trees moving to the sound
Start from their roots, and form a shade around:
Amphion there the loud creating lyre
Strikes, and behold a sudden Thebes aspire!

IMITATIONS.

That they were molte away for heate,
And not away with stormes beate.

Ver. 45. Yet part no injuries, &c.]

For on that other side I sey
Of that hill which northward ley,
How it was written full of names
Of folke, that had afore great fames,
Of old time, and yet they were
As fresh as men had written hem there
That self day, or that houre
That I on hem gan to poure;
But well I wiste what it made;
It was conserved with the shade
(All the writing that I fye)
Of the castle that stoode on high,
And stood eke in so cold a place,
That heat might it not deface.

Cythæron's echoes answer to his call,
And half the mountain rolls into a wall:
There might you see the lengthening spires ascend,
The domes swell up, the widening arches bend, 90
The growing towers like exhalations rise,
And the huge columns heave into the skies.

The eastern front was glorious to behold,
With diamond flaming, and Barbaric gold.
There Ninus shone, who spread th' Assyrian fame,
And the great founder of the Persian name:
There in long robes the royal Magi stand,
Grave Zoroaster waves the circling wand:
The sage Chaldeans rob'd in white appear'd,
And Brachmans, deep in desert woods rever'd. 100
These stopp'd the moon, and call'd th' unbody'd shades

To midnight banquets in the glimmering glades;
Made visionary fabrics round them rise,
And airy spectres skim before their eyes;
Of Talismans and Sigils knew the power,
And careful watch'd the planetary hour.
Superior, and alone, Confucius stood,
Who taught that useful science to be good.

But on the south, a long majestic race
Of Egypt's priests the gilded niches grace, 110
Who measur'd earth, describ'd the starry spheres,
And trac'd the long records of lunar years.
High on his car Sesostris struck my view,
Whom scepter'd slaves in golden harness drew:
His hands a bow and pointed javelin hold;
His giant limbs are arm'd in chains of gold.
Between the statues obelisks were plac'd,
And the learn'd walls with hieroglyphics grac'd.

Of Gothic structure was the northern side,
O'erwrought with ornaments of barbarous pride. 120
There huge Colossus rose, with trophies crown'd,
And Runic characters were grav'd around.
There sate Zamolxis with erected eyes,
And Odin here in mimic trances dies.
There on rude iron columns, smear'd with blood,
The horrid forms of Scythian heroes stood.
Druids and Bards (their once loud harps unstrung)
And youths that dy'd to be by poets sung.
These and a thousand more of doubtful fame,
To whom old fables gave a lasting name. 130
In ranks adorn'd the temple's outward face;
The wall in lustre and effect like glass,
Which, o'er each object casting various dyes,
Enlarges some, and others multiplies:
Nor void of emblem was the mystic wall,
For thus romantic Fame increases all.

The temple shakes, the sounding gates unfold,
Wide vaults appear, and roofs of fretted gold:
Rais'd on a thousand pillars wreath'd around
With laurel-foliage, and with eagles crown'd: 140
Of bright transparent beryl were the walls,
The freezes gold, and gold the capitals;

IMITATIONS.

Ver. 132. The walls in lustre, &c.]

It shone lighter than a glass,
And made well more than it was,
As kind of thing Fame is.

As heaven with stars, the roof with jewels glows,
And ever-living lamps depend in rows.
Full in the passage of each spacious gate,
The sage historians in white garments wait;
Grav'd o'er their seats the form of time was found.
His scythe revers'd, and both his pinions bound
Within stood heroes, who through loud alarms
In bloody fields pursued renown in arms. 150
High on a throne with trophies charg'd I view'd
The youth that all things but himself subdu'd;
His feet on sceptres and tiaras trod,
And his horn'd head bely'd the Libyan god.
There Cæsar, grac'd with both Minervas shone;
Cæsar, the world's great master, and his own;
Unmov'd, superior still in every state,
And scarce detested in his country's fate.
But chief were those, who not for empire fought,
But with their toils their people's safety bought: 160
High o'er the rest Epaminondas stood;
Timoleon, glorious in his brother's blood;
Bold Scipio, saviour of the Roman state;
Great in his triumphs, in retirement great;
And wise Aurelius, in whose well-taught mind
With boundless power unbounded virtue join'd,
His own strict judge, and patron of mankind.

Much suffering heroes next their honours claim,
Those of less noisy, and less guilty fame,
Fair virtue's silent train: supreme of these 170
Here ever shines the godlike Socrates;
He whom ungrateful Athens could expell,
At all times just, but when he sign'd the shell:
Here his abode the martyr'd Phocion claims,
With Agis, not the last of Spartan names:
Unconquer'd Cato shews the wound he tore,
And Brutus his ill genius meets no more.

But in the centre of the hollow'd choir,
Six pompous columns o'er the rest aspire;
Around the shrine itself of fame they stand, 180
Hold the chief honours, and the same command.
High on the first, the mighty Homer shone;
Eternal Adamant compos'd his throne,
Father of verse: in holy fillets drest,
His silver beard wav'd gently o'er his breast;
Though blind, a boldness in his looks appears;
In years he seem'd, but not impair'd by years.

IMITATIONS.

Ver. 179. Six pompous columns, &c.]

From the dees many a pillere,
Of metal that shone not full clere, &c.
Upon a pillere saw I stonde
That was of lede and iron fine,
Him of the sect Saturnine,
The Ebraicke Josephus the old, &c.

Upon an iron pillere strong,
That painted was all endlong,
With tigers' blood in every place,
The Tholosan that hight Stace,
That bear of Thebes up the name, &c.

Ver. 182.

Full wonder high on a pillere
Of iron, he the great Omer,
And with him Dares and Titus, &c.

The wars of Troy were round the pillar seen :
 Here fierce Tydides wounds the Cyprian queen ;
 Here Hector glorious from Patroclus' fall, 190
 Here dragg'd in triumph round the Trojan wall.
 Motion and life did every part inspire,
 Bold was the work, and prov'd the master's fire ;
 A strong expression most he seem'd t' affect,
 And here and there disclos'd a brave neglect.

A golden column next in rank appear'd.
 On which a shrine of purest gold was rear'd ;
 Finish'd the whole, and labour'd every part,
 With patient touches of unwearied art :
 The Mantuan there in sober triumph sat, 200
 Compos'd his posture, and his look sedate ;
 On Homer still he fix'd a reverend eye,
 Great without pride, in modest majesty.
 In living sculpture on the sides were spread
 The Latian wars, and haughty Turnus dead ;
 Eliza stretch'd upon the funeral pyre,
 Æneas bending with his aged fire :
 Troy flam'd in burning gold, and o'er the throne
 Arms and the man in golden cyphers shone.

Four swans sustain a car of silver bright, 210
 With heads advanc'd, and pinions stretch'd for flight :

Here, like some furious prophet, Pindar rode,
 And seem'd to labour with th' inspiring God.
 Across the harp a careless hand he flings,
 And boldly sinks into the sounding strings,
 The figur'd games of Greece the column grace,
 Neptune and Jove survey the rapid race.
 The youths hang o'er their chariots as they run ;
 The fiery steeds seem starting from the stone ;
 The champions in distorted postures threat ; 220
 And all appear'd irregularly great.

Here happy Horace tun'd th' Ausonian lyre
 To sweeter sounds, and temper'd Pindar's fire ;
 Pleas'd with Alceæus' manly rage t' infuse
 The softer spirit of the Sapphic muse.
 The polish'd pillar different sculptures grace ;
 A work outlasting monumental brass.

IMITATIONS.

Ver. 196, &c.

There saw I stand on a pillere
 That was of tinned iron cleere,
 The Latin poet Virgilye,
 That hath bore up of a great while
 The fame of pious Æneas :

And next him on a pillere was
 Of copper, Venus' clerke Ovide,
 That hath sown wondrous wide
 The great god of love's fame—

Tho' saw I on a pillere by
 Of iron wrought full sternly,
 The great poet Dan Lucan,
 That on his shoulders bore up then
 As hye as that I might see,
 The fame of Julius and Pompee.

And next him on a pillere stode
 Of sulphure, like as he were wode,
 Dan Claudian, so the for to tell,
 That bare up all the fame of hell, &c.

Here smiling Loves and Bacchanals appear,
 The Julian star and great Augustus here.
 The doves that round the infant poet spread 230
 Myrtles and bays, hung hovering o'er his head.

Here, in a shrine that cast a dazzling light,
 State fix'd in thought the mighty Stagyrte ;
 His sacred head a radiant Zodiac crown'd,
 And various animals his sides surround ;
 His piercing eyes, erect, appear to view
 Superior worlds, and look all nature through.

With equal rays immortal Tully shone,
 The Roman rostra deck'd the consul's throne :
 Gathering his flowing robe, he seem'd to stand 240
 In act to speak, and graceful stretch'd his hand.
 Behind, Rome's genius waits with civic crowns,
 And the great father of his country owns.

These massy columns in a circle rise,
 O'er which a pompous dome invades the skies :
 Scarce to the top I stretch'd my aching sight,
 So large it spread, and swell'd to such a height.
 Full in the midst proud Fame's imperial seat
 With jewels blaz'd, magnificently great ;
 The vivid emeralds there revive the eye, 250

The flaming rubies shew their sanguine dye,
 Bright azure rays from lively sapphires stream,
 And lucid amber casts a golden gleam.

With various-colour'd light the pavement shone,
 And all on fire appear'd the glowing throne ;
 The dome's high arch reflects the mingled blaze,
 And forms a rainbow of alternate rays.

When on the goddess first I cast my sight,
 Scarce seem'd her statue of a cubit's height ;
 But swell'd to larger size, the more I gaz'd, 260
 Till to the roof her towering front she rais'd.

With her, the Temple every moment grew,
 And ampler vistas open'd to my view :
 Upward the columns shoot, the roofs ascend,
 And arches widen, and long aisles extend.

Such was her form, as ancient bards have told,
 Wings raise her arms, and wings her feet infold ;
 A thousand busy tongues the goddess bears,
 And thousand open eyes, and thousand listening ears.
 Beneath, in order rang'd, the tuneful nine 270

(Her virgin handmaids) still attend the shrine :
 With eyes on Fame for ever fix'd, they sing ;
 For Fame they raise the voice, and tune the string,
 With time's first birth began the heavenly lays.
 And last, eternal, through the length of days.

IMITATIONS.

Ver. 259. Scarce seem'd her stature, &c.

Methought that she was so lite,
 That the length of a cubite
 Was longer than she seem'd be ;
 But thus soone in a while she,
 Her selfe tho' wonderly straight,
 That with her feet she the earth right,
 And with her head she touchyd heaven—

Ver. 270. Beneath, in order rang'd, &c.]

I heard about her throne y-sung
 That all the palays walls rung,
 So sung the mighty muse, she
 That cleped is Calliope,
 And her seven sisters eke—

Around these wonders as I cast a look,
The trumpet sounded, and the temple shook,
And all the nations, summon'd at the call,
From different quarters fill the crowded hall :
Of various tongues the mingled sounds were heard ; 280

In various garbs promiscuous throngs appear'd ;
Thick as the bees, that with the spring renew
Their flowery toils, and sip the fragrant dew,
When the wing'd colonies first tempt the sky,
O'er dusky fields and shaded waters fly,
Or, settling, seize the sweets the blossoms yield,
And a low murmur runs along the field.
Millions of suppliant crowds the shrine attend,
And all degrees before the goddesses bend ;
The poor, the rich, the valiant, and the sage, 290
And boasting youth, and narrative old age.
Their pleas were different, their request the same ;
For good and bad alike are fond of Fame.
Some she disgrac'd, and some with honours crown'd ;
Unlike successes equal merits found.

Thus her blind sister, fickle Fortune, reigns,
And undiscerning scatters crowns and chains.
First at the shrine the learned world appear,
And to the goddesses thus prefer their prayer.
Long have we sought t' instruct and please mankind, 300

With studies pale, with midnight vigils blind ;
But thank'd by few, rewarded yet by none,
We here appeal to thy superior throne :
On wit and learning the just prize bestow,
For Fame is all we must expect below.

The goddesses heard, and bade the muses raise
The golden trumpet of eternal praise :
From pole to pole the winds diffuse the sound,
That fills the circuit of the world around ;
Not all at once, as thunder breaks the cloud ; 310
The notes at first were rather sweet than loud :
By just degrees they every moment rise,
Fill the wide earth, and gain upon the skies.
At every breath were balmy odours shed,
Which still grew sweeter, as they wider spread ;
Less fragrant scents th' unfolding rose exhales,
Or spices breathing in Arabian gales.

IMITATIONS.

Ver. 276. Around these wonders, &c.]
I heard a noise approachen blive,
That far'd as bees done in a hive,
Against her time of out-flying,
Right such a manere murmuring,
For all the world it seemed me,
Tho gan I look about and see
That there came entering into th' hall,
A right great company withal ;
And that of sundry regions,
Of all kind of conditions, &c.—

Ver. 294. Some she disgrac'd, &c.]
And some of them she granted sone,
And some she warn'd well and fair,
And some she granted the contrair—
Right as her sister dame Fortune
Is wont to serve in commune.

Next these the good and just, an awful train,
Thus on their knees address the sacred fane.
Since living virtue is with envy curs'd, 320
And the best men are treated like the worst,
Do thou, just goddesses, call our merits forth,
And give each deed th' exact intrinsic worth.
Not with bare justice shall your act be crown'd,
(Said Fame) but high above desert renown'd :
Let fuller notes th' applauding world amaze,
And the loud clarion labour in your praise.

This band dismiss'd, behold another crowd
Preferr'd the same request, and lowly bow'd ;
The constant tenor of whose well-spent days 330
No less deserv'd a just return of praise.
But straight the direful tramp of slander sounds ;
Through the big dome the doubling thunder bounds ;
Loud as the burst of cannon rends the skies,
The dire report through every region flies,
In every ear incessant rumours rung,
And gathering scandals grew on every tongue.
From the black trumpet's rusty concave broke
Sulphureous flames, and clouds of rolling smoke :
The poisonous vapour blots the purple skies, 340
And withers all before it as it flies.

A troop came next, who crowns and armour wore,
And proud defiance in their looks they bore :

Tho came the third companye,
And gan up to the dees to hyc,
And down on knees they fell anone,
And saiden : We been everichone
Folke that han full truely
Deserved fame right-fully,
— And prayen you it might be knowe
Right as it is, and forth blowe.
I grant, quoth she, for now we list
That your good works shall be wist.
And yet ye shall have better loos,
Right in despite of all, your foos,
Than worthy is, and that anone.
Let now (quoth she) thy trump gone—
And certes all the breath that went
Out of his trump's mouth smel'd
As men a pot of baume held
Among a basket full of roses.—

Ver. 328, 338. Behold another crowd, &c.—
From the black trumpet's rusty, &c.]
Therewithal there came anone
Another huge companye
Of good folke—
What did this Eolus, but he Took out his trump of brass,
That fouler than the devil was :
And gan his trump for to blowe,
As all the world should overthrowe.
Throughout every regione
Went this foul trumpet's sounne
Swift as a pellet out of a gunne,
When fire is in the powder runne.
And such a smoke gan out wende,
Out of the foul trumpet's ende—&c.

For thee (they cry'd) amidst alarms and strife,
We sail'd in tempests down the stream of life;
For thee whole nations fill'd with flames and blood.
And swam to empire through the purple flood.
'Those ills we dar'd, thy inspiration own;
What virtue seem'd was done for thee alone.
Ambitious fools! (the queen reply'd, and frown'd)
Be all your acts in dark oblivion drown'd; 351
There sleep forgot, with mighty tyrants gone,
Your statues moulder'd, and your names unknown!
A sudden cloud straight snatch'd them from my sight,

And each majestic phantom sunk in night.
Then came the smallest tribe I yet had seen;
Plain was their dress, and modest was their mien.
Great idol of mankind! we neither claim
The praise of merit, nor aspire to fame!
But, safe in deserts from th' applause of men, 360
Would die unheard-of, as we liv'd unseen.
'Tis all we beg thee, to conceal from sight
Those acts of goodness which themselves requite.
O let us still the secret joy partake,
To follow virtue ev'n for virtue's sake.

And live there men, who slight immortal fame?
Who then with incense shall adore our name?
But, mortals! know, 'tis still our greatest pride,
To blaze those virtues which the good would hide.
Rise! muses, rise! add all your tuneful breath; 370
These must not sleep in darkness and in death.
She said: in air the trembling music floats,
And on the winds triumphant swell the notes;
So soft, though high, so loud, and yet so clear,
Ev'n listening angels lean from heaven to hear:
To farthest shores th' ambrosial spirit flies,
Sweet to the world, and grateful to the skies.
Next these a youthful train their vows express'd,
With feathers crown'd, with gay embroidery
dress'd:

Hither, they cry'd, direct your eyes, and see 380
The men of pleasure, dress, and gallantry;

Ours is the place at banquets, balls, and plays;
Sprightly our nights, polite are all our days;
Courts we frequent, where 'tis our pleasing care
To pay due visits, and address the fair:
In fact, 'tis true, no nymph we could persuade,
But still in fancy vanquish'd every maid;
Of unknown duchesses lewd tales we tell,
Yet, would the world believe us, all were well.
The joy let others have, and we the name, 389
And what we want in pleasure, grant in fame.

The queen assents, the trumpet rends the skies,
And at each blast a lady's honour dies. [prest

Pleas'd with the strange success, vast numbers
Around the shrine, and made the same request:
What you (she cry'd), unlearn'd in arts to please,
Slaves to yourselves, and even fatigued with ease,
Who lose a length of undeserving days,
Would you usurp the lover's dear-bought praise?
To just contempt, ye vain pretenders, fall, 400
The people's fable, and the scorn of all.

Straight the black clarion sends a horrid sound,
Loud laughs burst out, and bitter scoffs fly round,
Whispers are heard, with taunts reviling loud,
And scornful hisses run through all the crowd.

Last, those who boast of mighty mischiefs done,
Enslave their country, or usurp a throne;
Or who their glory's dire foundation lay'd
On sovereigns ruin'd, or on friends betray'd;
Calm, thinking villains, whom no faith could fix, 410

Of crooked counsels and dark politics;
Of these a gloomy tribe surround the throne,
And beg to make th' immortal treasons known.
The trumpet roars, long flaky flames expire,
With sparks that seem'd to set the world on fire.
At the dread sound, pale mortals stood aghast,
And startled nature trembled with the blast.

This having heard and seen, some power unknown [the throne.
Straight chang'd the scene, and snatch'd me from

And said, they yeve not a leke
For no fame ne such renowne;
For they for contemplacyone,
And Goddes love had it wrought,
Ne of fame would they ought.

And ween ye for to do good,
And for to have it of no fame?
Have ye despite to have my name?
Nay ye shall lien everichone:

Ver. 406. Last, those who boast of mighty, &c.]

Tho came another companye,
That had y-done the treachery, &c.

Ver. 418. This having heard and seen. &c.]

The scene here changes from the Temple of Fame, to that of Rumour, which is almost entirely Chaucer's. The particulars follow.

Tho saw I stonde in a valey,
Under the castle fast by
A house, that Domus Dedali
That Labyrinthus cleped is,
Nas made so wonderly I wis,
Ne half so queintly y-wrought!
And evermo as swift as thought,
This queint house about went,
That never more it still stent—
And eke this house hath of entrees,
As many as leaves are on trees

Before my view appear'd a structure fair, 420
 Its site uncertain, if in earth or air;
 With rapid motion turn'd the mansion round;
 With ceaseless noise the ringing walls resound:
 Not less in number were the spacious doors,
 Than leaves on trees, or sands upon the shores;
 Which still unfolded stand, by night, by day,
 Pervious to winds, and open every way.
 As flames by nature to the skies ascend,
 As weighty bodies to the centre tend,
 As to the sea returning rivers roll, 430
 And the touch'd needle trembles to the pole;
 Hither as to their proper place, arise
 All various sounds from earth, and seas, and skies,
 Or spoke aloud, or whisper'd in the ear;
 Nor ever silence, rest, or peace, is here.
 As on the smooth expanse of crystal lakes
 The sinking stone at first a circle makes;
 The trembling surface, by the motion stirr'd,
 Spreads in a second circle, then a third;
 Wide, and more wide, the floating rings advance, 440
 Fill all the watery plain, and to the margin dance:
 Thus every voice and sound, when first they break,
 On neighbouring air a soft impression make;
 Another ambient circle then they move;
 That, in its turn, impels the next above;
 Through undulating air the sounds are sent,
 And spread o'er all the fluid element.
 There various news I heard of love and strife,
 Of peace and war, health, sickness, death, and life,
 Of loss and gain, of famine and of store, 450
 Of storms at sea, and travels on the shore,
 Of prodigies, and portents seen in air,
 Of fires and plagues, and stars with blazing hair,
 Of turns of fortune, changes in the state,
 The falls of favourites, projects of the great,
 Of old mismanagements, taxations new:
 All neither wholly false, nor wholly true.

IMITATIONS.

In summer, when they ben grene;
 And in the roof yet men may see
 A thousand hoels and well mo
 To letten the soune out-go;
 And by day in every tide,
 Ben all the doors open wide,
 And by night each one unshet;
 No porter is there one to let,
 No manner tydings in to pace:
 Ne never rest is in that place.
 Ver. 448. There various news I heard, &c.]
 Of werres, of peace, of marriages,
 Of rest, of labour, of voyages,
 Of abode, of dethe, and of life,
 Of love and hate, accord and strife,
 Of loss, of lore, and of winnings,
 Of hele, of sickness, and lessings,
 Of divers transmutations,
 Of estates and eke of regions,
 Of trust, of dred, of jealousy,
 Of wit, of winning, and of folly,
 Of good, or bad government,
 Of fire, and of divers accident.

Above, below, without, within, around,
 Confus'd, unnumber'd multitudes are found,
 Who pass, repass, advance, and glide away; 460
 Hosts rais'd by fear, and phantoms of a day:
 Astrologers, that future fates foreflew,
 Projectors, quacks, and lawyers not a few;
 And priests, and party zealots, numerous bands
 With home-born lies, or tales from foreign lands:
 Each talk'd aloud, or in some secret place,
 And wild impatience star'd in every face.
 The flying rumours gather'd as they roll'd,
 Scarce any tale was sooner heard than told;
 And all who told it added something new, 470
 And all who heard it made enlargements too,
 In every ear it spread, on every tongue it grew,
 Thus flying east and west, and north and south,
 Newstravell'd with increase from mouth to mouth.
 So from a spark, that kindled first by chance,
 With gathering force the quickening flames advance;
 Till to the clouds their curling heads aspire,
 And towers and temples sink in floods of fire.
 When thus ripe lies are to perfection sprung,
 Full grown, and fit to grace a mortal tongue, 480
 Through thousand vents, impatient, forth they flow,
 And rush in millions on the world below,
 Fame sits aloft, and points them out their course,
 Their date determines, and prescribes their force:
 Some to remain, and some to perish soon;
 Or wane and wax alternate like the moon.
 Around, a thousand winged wonders fly,
 Borne by the trumpet's blast, and scatter'd through the sky.
 There, at one passage, oft you might survey
 A lie and truth contending for the way; 490

Ver. 458. Above, below, without, within, &c.]
 But such a grete congregation
 Of folke as I saw roame about,
 Some within, and some without,
 Was never seen, ne shall be est—
 And every wight that I saw there
 Rowned everich in others ear
 A new tyding privily,
 Or else he told it openly
 Right thus, and said, Knowst not thou
 That is betide to-night now?
 No, quoth he, tell me what?
 And then he told him this and that, &c.
 —Thus north and south
 Went every tyding from mouth to mouth,
 And that encreasing evermo,
 As fire is wont to quicken and go
 From a sparkle sprong amiss,
 Till all the citee brent up is.
 Ver. 489. There, at one passage, &c.]
 And sometime I saw there at once,
 A leising and a sad sooth saw
 That gonnen at adventure draw
 Out of a window forth to pace—
 And no man, be he ever so wrothe,
 Shall have one of these two, but bothe, &c.

And long 'twas doubtful, both so closely pent,
Which first should issue through the narrow vent:
At last agreed, together out they fly,
Inseparable now, the truth and lie;
The strict companions are for ever join'd,
And this or that unmix'd, no mortal e'er shall find.

While thus I stood, intent to see and hear,
One came, methought, and whisper'd in my ear:
What could thus high thy rash ambition raise?
Art thou, fond youth, a candidate for praise? 500

'Tis true, said I, not void of hopes I came,
For who so fond as youthful bards of fame!
But few, alas! the casual blessing boast,
So hard to gain, so easy to be lost.
How vain that second life in others breath,
Th' estate which wits inherit after death!
Ease, health, and life, for this they must resign,
(Unsure the tenure, but how vast the fine!)
The great man's curse, without the gains, endure,
Be envy'd, wretched, and be flatter'd, poor; 510
All luckless wits their enemies profess,
And all successful, jealous friends at best.
Nor Fame I slight, nor for her favours call;
She comes unlook'd-for, if she comes at all.
But if the purchase costs so dear a price
As soothing folly, or exalting vice:
Oh! if the muse must flatter lawless sway,
And follow still where fortune leads the way;
Or if no basis bear my rising name,
But the fall'n ruins of another's fame; 520
Then, teach me, heaven! to scorn the guilty bays,
Drive from my breast that wretched lust of praise;
Unblemish'd let me live, or die unknown:
Oh, grant an honest fame, or grant me none!

JANUARY AND MAY:

OR,

THE MERCHANT'S TALE.

FROM CHAUCER.

THERE liv'd in Lombardy, as authors write,
In days of old, a wife and worthy knight;
Of gentle manners, as of generous race,
Blest with much sense, more riches, and some grace;

Yet, led astray by Venus' soft delights,
He scarce could rule some idle appetites:
For long ago, let priests say what they could,
Weak sinful laymen were but flesh and blood.

But in due time, when sixty years were o'er,
He vow'd to lead this vicious life no more:
Whether pure holiness inspir'd him forth to wed,
Or dotage turn'd his brain, is hard to find;
But his high courage prick'd him forth to wed,
And try the pleasures of a lawful bed.
This was his nightly dream, his daily care,
And to the heavenly powers his constant prayer,
Once ere he dy'd, to taste the blissful life
Of a kind husband and a loving wife.

These thoughts he fortify'd with reasons still,
(For none want reasons to confirm their will).
Grave authors say, and witty poets sing,
That honest wedlock is a glorious thing:
But depth of judgment most in him appears,
Who wisely weds in his maturer years.
Then let him choose a damsel young and fair,
To bless his age, and bring a worthy heir;
To soothe his cares, and, free from noise and strife,
Conduct him gently to the verge of life.
Let sinful bachelors their woes deplore,
Full well they merit all they feel, and more:
Unaw'd by precepts human or divine,
Like birds and beasts promiscuously they join:
Nor know to make the present blessing last,
To hope the future, or esteem the past:
But vainly boast the joys they never try'd,
And find divulg'd the secrets they would hide.
The marry'd man may bear his yoke with ease,
Secure at once himself and heaven to please;
And pass his inoffensive hours away,
In bliss all night, and innocence all day: [mains,
Though fortune change, his constant spouse re-
Augments his joys, or mitigates his pains.

But what so pure, which envious tongues will spare?

Some wicked wits have libell'd all the fair.
With matchless impudence they style a wife
The dear-bought curse, and lawful plague of life;
A bosom-serpent, a domestic evil,
A night invasion, and a mid-day devil.
Let not the wife these slanderous words regard,
But curse the bones of every lying bard.
All other goods by fortune's hand are given,
A wife is the peculiar gift of heaven.
Vain fortune's favours, never at a stay,
Like empty shadows, pass, and glide away;
One solid comfort, our eternal wife,
Abundantly supplies us all our life:
This blessing lasts (if those who try say true)
As long as heart can wish—and longer too.

Our grandfire Adam, ere of Eve possess'd,
Alone, and ev'n in paradise unblest'd,
With mournful looks the blissful scenes survey'd,
And wander'd in the solitary shade:
The Maker saw, took pity, and bestow'd
Woman, the last, the best reserv'd of God.

A wife! ah, gentle deities, can he
That has a wife, e'er feel adversity?
Would men but follow what the sex advise,
All things would prosper, all the world grow wise.
'Twas by Rebecca's aid that Jacob won
His father's blessing from an elder son:
Abusive Nabal ow'd his forfeit life
To the wise conduct of a prudent wife:
Heroic Judith, as old Hebrews shew,
Preserv'd the Jews, and slew th' Assyrian foe:
At Hester's suit, the persecuting sword
Was sheath'd, and Israel liv'd to bless the Lord.

These weighty motives, January the sage
Maturely ponder'd in his riper age;
And, charm'd with virtuous joys and sober life,
Would try that Christian comfort, call'd a wife.
His friends were summon'd on a point so nice,
To pass their judgment, and to give advice;

But fix'd before, and well resolv'd was he;
(As men that ask advice are wont to be).

My friends, he cry'd (and cast a mournful look Around the room, and sigh'd before he spoke);
Beneath the weight of threescore years I bend,
And worn with cares, and hastening to my end;
How I have liv'd, alas! you know too well,
In worldly follies, which I blush to tell;
But gracious heaven has open'd my eyes at last,
With due regret I view my vices past,
And, as the precept of the church decrees,
Will take a wife, and live in holy ease.
But, since by counsel all things should be done,
And many heads are wiser still than one;
Choose you for me, who best shall be content
When my desire's approv'd by your consent.

One caution yet is needful to be told,
To guide your choice; this wife must not be old:
There goes a saying, and 'twas shrewdly said,
Old fish at table, but young flesh in bed.
My soul abhors the tasteless, dry embrace
Of a stale virgin with a winter face:
In that cold season love but treats his guest
With bean-straw, and tough forage at the best.
No crafty widows shall approach my bed;
Those are too wise for bachelors to wed;
As subtle clerks by many schools are made,
Twice marry'd dames are mistresses o' th' trade:
But young and tender virgins, rul'd with ease,
We form like wax, and mould them as we please.

Conceive me, Sirs, nor take my sense amiss;
'Tis what concerns my soul's eternal bliss:
Since if I found no pleasure in my spouse,
As flesh is frail, and who (God help me) knows?
Then should I live in lewd adultery,
And sink downright to Satan when I die.
Or were I curs'd with an unfruitful bed,
The righteous end were lost, for which I wed;
To raise up seed to bless the powers above,
And not for pleasure only, or for love
Think not I doat; 'tis time to take a wife,
When vigorous blood forbids a chaster life;
Those that are blest with store of grace divine,
May live like saints, by heaven's consent and mine.

And since I speak of wedlock, let me say,
(As, thank my stars, in modest truth I may)
My limbs are active, still I'm sound at heart,
And a new vigour springs in every part.
Think not my virtue lost, though time has shed
These reverend honours on my head;
Thus trees are crown'd with blossoms white as snow,

The vital sap then rising from below:
Old as I am, my lusty limbs appear
Like winter greens, that flourish all the year.
Now, Sirs, you know to what I stand inclin'd,
Let every friend with freedom speak his mind.

He said; the rest in different parts divide;
The knotty point was urg'd on either side:
Marriage, the theme on which they all declaim'd,
Some prais'd with wit, and some with reason blam'd;
Till, what with proofs, objections, and replies,
Each wondrous positive, and wondrous wife,
There fell between his brothers a debate,
Placebo this was call'd, and Justin that.

VOL. VIII

First to the knight Placebo thus begun
(Mild were his looks, and pleasing was his tone):
Such prudence, Sir, in all your words appears,
As plainly proves experience dwells with years!
Yet you pursue sage Solomon's advice,
To work by counsel when affairs are nice:
But, with the wife man's leave, I must protest,
So may my soul arrive at ease and rest
As still I hold your own advice the best.

Sir, I have liv'd a courtier all my days,
And study'd men, their manners, and their ways;
And have observ'd this useful maxim still,
To let my betters always have their will.
Nay, if my lord affirm'd that black was white,
My word was this, Your honour's in the right.
Th' assuming wit, who deems himself so wise,
As his mistaken patron to advise,
Let him not dare to vent his dangerous thought,
A noble fool was never in a fault.

This, Sir, affects not you, whose every word
Is weigh'd with judgment, and befits a lord:
Your will is mine; and is (I will maintain)
Pleasing to God, and should be so to man!
At least, your courage all the world must praise,
Who dare to wed in your declining days.
Indulge the vigour of your mounting blood,
And let grey fools be indolently good,
Who, past all pleasure, damn the joys of sense,
With reverend dulness, and grave impotence.

Justin, who silent sat, and heard the man,
Thus, with a philosophic frown, began.

A heathen author of the first degree,
(Who, though not faith, had sense as well as we)
Bids us be certain our concerns to trust
To those of generous principles and just.
The venture's greater, I'll presume to say,
To give your person, than your goods away;
And therefore, Sir, as you regard your rest,
First learn your lady's qualities at least:
Whether she's chaste or rampant, proud or civil,
Meek as a saint, or haughty as the devil;
Whether an easy, fond, familiar fool,
Or such a wit as no man e'er can rule.
'Tis true, perfection none must hope to find
In all this world, much less in womankind;
But if her virtues prove the larger share,
Bless the kind fates, and think your fortune rare.
Ah, gentle Sir, take warning of a friend,
Who knows too well the state you thus commend;
And, spite of all his praises, must declare,
All he can find is bondage, cost, and care.
Heaven knows, I shed full many a private tear,
And sigh in silence, lest the world should hear!
While all my friends applaud my blissful life,
And swear no mortal's happier in a wife;
Demure and chaste as any vestal nun,
The meekest creature that beholds the sun!
But, by th' immortal powers, I feel the pain,
And he that smarts has reason to complain.
Do what ye list, for me; you must be sage,
And cautious sure; for wisdom is in age:
But at these years, to venture on the fair;
By him who made the ocean, earth, and air,
To please a wife, when her occasions call,
Would busy the most vigorous of us all.

E

And trust me, Sir, the chastest you can choose
Will ask observance, and exact her dues.
If what I speak my noble lord offend,
My tedious sermon here is at an end.

'Tis well, 'tis wond'rous well, the knight replies,

Most worthy kinsman, saith you're mighty wife!
We, Sirs, are fools, and must resign the cause
To heathenish authors, proverbs, and old saws.
He spoke with scorn, and turn'd another way:—
What does my friend, my dear Placebo say?

I say, quoth he, by heaven the man's to blame,
To slander wives, and wedlock's holy name.

At this the council rose, without delay;
Each, in his own opinion, went his way;
With full consent, that, all disputes appeas'd,
The knight should marry, when and where he pleas'd.

Who now but January exults with joy?
The charms of wedlock all his soul employ;
Each nymph by turns his wavering mind possesst,
And reign'd the short-liv'd tyrant of his breast;
While fancy pictur'd every lively part,
And each bright image wander'd o'er his heart.
Thus, in some public forum fix'd on high,
A mirror shews the figures moving by;
Still one by one, in swift succession, pass
The gliding shadows o'er the polish'd glass.
This lady's charms the nicest could not blame.
But vile suspicions had aspers'd her fame;
That was with sense, but not with virtue blest;
And one had grace that wanted all the rest.
Thus doubting long what nymph he should obey,
He fix'd at last upon the youthful May.
Her faults he knew not, Love is always blind,
But every charm revolv'd within his mind:
Her tender age, her form divinely fair,
Her easy motion, her attractive air,
Her sweet behaviour, her enchanting face,
Her moving softness, and majestic grace.

Much in his prudence did our knight rejoice,
And thought no mortal could dispute his choice:
Once more in haste he summon'd every friend,
And told them all, their pains were at an end.
Heaven, that (said he) inspir'd me first to wed,
Provides a comfort worthy of my bed:
Let none oppose th' election, since on this
Depends my quiet, and my future bliss.

A dame there is, the darling of my eyes,
Young, beauteous, artless, innocent, and wife;
Chaste, though not rich; and, though not nobly born,
Of honest parents, and may serve my turn.
Her will I wed, if gracious Heaven so please,
To pass my age in sanctity and ease;
And thank the powers, I may possess alone
The lovely prize, and share my bliss with none!
If you, my friends, this virgin can procure,
My joys are full, my happiness is sure.

One only doubt remains: Full oft I've heard,
By casuists grave, and deep divines averr'd,
That 'tis too much for human race to know
The bliss of heaven above, and earth below.
Now should the nuptial pleasures prove so great,
To match the blessings of the future state,

Those endless joys were ill-exchang'd for these;
Then clear this doubt, and set my mind at ease.

This Justin heard, nor could his spleen controul,
Touch'd to the quick, and tickled at the soul.
Sir Knight, he cry'd, if this be all you dread,
Heaven put it past your doubt, whene'er you wed;
And to my fervent prayers so far consent,
That, ere the rites are o'er, you may repent!
Good Heaven, no doubt, the nuptial state approves,
Since it chastises still what best it loves.
Then be not, Sir, abandon'd to despair;
Seek, and perhaps you'll find among the fair.
One that may do your business to a hair;
Not ev'n in wish, your happiness delay,
But prove the scourge to lash you on your way:
Then to the skies your mounting soul shall go,
Swift as an arrow soaring from the bow!
Provided still you moderate your joy,
Nor in your pleasures all your might employ,
Let reason's rule your strong desires abate,
Nor please too lavishly your gentle mate.
Old wives there are, of judgment most acute,
Who solve those questions beyond all dispute;
Consult with those, and be of better cheer;
Marry, do penance, and dismiss your fear.

So said, they rose, nor more the work delay'd;
The match was offer'd, the proposals made.
The parents, you may think, would soon comply,
The old have interest ever in their eye.
Nor was it hard to move the lady's mind;
When fortune favours, still the fair are kind.

I pass each previous settlement and deed,
Too long for me to write, or you to read;
Nor will with quaint impertinence display
The pomp, the pageantry, the proud array.
The time approach'd, to church the parties went,
At once with carnal and devout intent:
Forth came the priest, and bade th' obedient wife
Like Sarah or Rebecca lead her life;
Then pray'd the powers the fruitful bed to bless,
And made all sure enough with holiness.

And now the palace gates are open'd wide,
The guests appear in order, side by side,
And plac'd in state the bridegroom and the bride,
The breathing flute's soft notes are heard around,
And the shrill trumpets mix their silver sound;
The vaulted roofs with echoing music ring,
These touch the vocal stops, and those the trembling string,

Not thus Amphion tun'd the warbling lyre,
Nor Joab the sounding clarion could inspire,
Nor fierce Theodamas, whose sprightly strain
Could swell the soul to rage, and fire the martial
train.

Bacchus himself, the nuptial feast to grace,
(So poets sing) was present on the place:
And lovely Venus, goddess of delight,
Shook high her flaming torch in open sight,
And danc'd around, and smil'd on every knight,
Pleas'd her best servant would his courage try,
No less in wedlock, than in liberty.
Full many an age old Hymen had not spy'd
So kind a bridegroom, or so bright a bride.
Ye bards! renown'd among the tuneful throng
For gentle lays, and joyous nuptial song;

Think not your softest numbers can display
The matchless glories of this blissful day :
The joys are such, as far transcend your rage,
When tender youth has wedded blooming age.

The beauteous dame sat smiling at the board,
And darted amorous glances at her lord.
Not Hester's self, whose charms the Hebrews sing,
E'er look'd so lovely on her Persian king :
Bright as the rising sun in summer's day,
And fresh and blooming as the month of May !
The joyful knight survey'd her by his side,
Nor envy'd Paris with the Spartan bride :
Still as his mind revolv'd with vast delight
Th' entrancing raptures of th' approaching night
Restless he sat, invoking every power
To speed his bliss, and haste the happy hour.
Meantime the vigorous dancers beat the ground,
And songs were sung, and flowing bowls went round.

With odorous spices they perfum'd the place,
And mirth and pleasure shone in every face.

Damian alone, of all the menial train,
Sad in the midst of triumphs, sigh'd for pain ;
Damian alone, the Knight's obsequious Squire,
Consum'd at heart, and fed a secret fire.
His lovely mistress all his soul possess'd ;
He look'd, he languish'd, and could take no rest :
His task perform'd, he sadly went his way,
Fell on his bed, and loth'd the light of day.
There let him lie, till his relenting dame
Weep in her turn, and waste in equal flame.

The weary sun, as learned poets write,
Forsook th' horizon, and roll'd down the light ;
While glittering stars his absent beams supply,
And night's dark mantle overspread the sky.
Then rose the guests ; and, as the time requir'd,
Each paid his thanks, and decently retir'd. [drefs,

The foe once gone, our knight prepar'd t' un-
So keen he was, and eager to possess :
But first thought fit th' assistance to receive,
Which grave physicians scruple not to give ;
Satyrion near, with hot Eringos stood,
Cantharides, to fire the lazy blood,
Whose use old bards describe in luscious rhymes,
And critics learn'd explain to modern times.

By this the sheets were spread, the bride undress'd,

The room was sprinkled, and the bed was bless'd.
What next ensued beseems me not to say ;
'Tis sung, he labour'd till the dawning day,
Then briskly sprung from bed, with heart so light,
As all were nothing he had done by night ;
And sipp'd his cordial as he sat upright. }
He kiss'd his balmy spouse with wanton play,
And feebly sung a lusty roundely :
Then on the couch his weary limbs he cast ;
For every labour must have rest at last.

But anxious cares the pensive Squire oppress'd,
Sleep fled his eyes, and peace forsook his breast :
The raging flames that in his bosom dwell,
He wanted art to hide, and means to tell ;
Yet hoping time th' occasion might betray,
Compos'd a sonnet to the lovely May ;
Which, writ and folded with the nicest art,
He wrapp'd in silk, and laid upon his heart.

When now the fourth revolving day was run,
('Twas June, and Cancer had receiv'd the sun)
Forth from her chamber came the beauteous bride ;
The good old Knight mov'd slowly by her side.
High mass was sung ; they feasted in the hall ;
The servants round stood ready at their call.
The Squire alone was absent from the board,
And much his sickness griev'd his worthy lord.
Who pray'd his spouse, attended with her train,
To visit Damian, and divert his pain.
Th' obliging dames obey'd with one consent ;
They left the hall, and to his lodging went.
The female tribe surround him as he lay,
And close beside him sat the gentle May :
Where, as she try'd his pulse, he softly drew
A heaving sigh, and cast a mournful view !
Then gave his bill, and brib'd the powers divine,
With secret vows, to favour his design.

Who studies now but discontented May ?

On her soft couch uneasily she lay :
The lumpish husband snor'd away the night,
Till coughs awak'd him near the morning light.
What then he did, I'll not presume to tell,
Nor if she thought herself in heaven or hell :
Honest and dull in nuptial bed they lay,
Till the bell toll'd, and all arose to pray.

Were it by forceful destiny decreed,
Or did from chance, or nature's power proceed ;
Or that some star, with aspect kind to love,
Shed its selected influence from above ;
Whatever was the cause, the tender dame
Felt the first motions of an infant flame ;
Receiv'd th' impressions of the love-sick Squire,
And wasted in the soft infectious fire.

Ye fair, draw near, let May's example move
Your gentle minds to pity those who love !
Had some fierce tyrant in her stead been found,
The poor adorer sure had hang'd, or drown'd :
But she, your sex's mirror, free from pride,
Was much too meek to prove a homicide.

But to my tale : Some sages have defin'd
Pleasure the sovereign bliss of human kind :
Our knight (who study'd much, we may suppose)
Deriv'd his high philosophy from those :
For, like a prince, he bore the vast expence
Of lavish pomp, and proud magnificence :
His house was stately, his retinue gay ;
Large was his train, and gorgeous his array.
His spacious garden, made to yield to none,
Was compass'd round with walls of solid stone ;
Priapus could not half describe the grace
(Though god of gardens) of this charming place :
A place to tire the rumbling wits of France
In long descriptions, and exceed romance ;
Enough to shame the gentlest bard that sings
Of painted meadows, and of purling springs.

Full in the centre of the flowery ground,
A crystal fountain spread its streams around, }
The fruitful banks with verdant laurels crown'd :
About this spring (if ancient fame say true)
The dapper elves their moon-light sports pursue :
Their pigmy king, and little fairy queen,
In circling dances gambol'd on the green,
While tuneful sprites a merry concert made,
And airy music warbled through the shade.

Hither the noble knight would oft repair,
 (His scene of pleasure, and peculiar care)
 For this he held it dear, and always bore
 The silver key that lock'd the garden-door.
 To this sweet place, in summer's sultry heat,
 He us'd from noise and business to retreat;
 And here in dalliance spend the live-long day,
 "Solus cum sola," with his sprightly May:
 For whate'er work was undischarg'd a-bed,
 The duteous knight in this fair garden sped.

But, ah! what mortal lives of bliss secure?
 How short a space our worldly joys endure!
 O Fortune, fair, like all thy treacherous kind,
 But faithless still, and wavering as the wind!
 O painted monster, form'd mankind to cheat
 With pleasing poison, and with soft deceit!
 This rich, this amorous venerable knight,
 Amidst his ease, his solace and delight,
 Struck blind by thee, resigns his days to grief,
 And calls on death, the wretch's last relief.

The rage of jealousy then seiz'd his mind,
 For much he fear'd the faith of woman-kind.
 His wife, not suffer'd from his side to stray,
 Was captive kept, he watch'd her night and day,
 Abridg'd her pleasures, and confin'd her sway.
 Full oft in tears did hapless May complain,
 And sigh'd full oft; but sigh'd and wept in vain:
 She look'd on Damian with a lover's eye;
 For, oh, 'twas fix'd, she must possess or die!
 Nor less impatience vex'd her amorous Squire,
 Wild with delay, and burning with desire.
 Watch'd as she was, yet could he not refrain
 By secret writing to disclose his pain:
 The dame by signs reveal'd her kind intent,
 Till both were conscious what each other meant.

Ah, gentle knight, what could thy eyes avail,
 Though they could see as far as ships can sail?
 'Tis better, sure, when blind, deceiv'd to be,
 Than be deluded when a man can see!

Argus himself, so cautious and so wise,
 Was over-watch'd, for all his hundred eyes;
 So many an honest husband may, 'tis known,
 Who, wisely, never thinks the case his own.

The dame at last, by diligence and care,
 Procur'd the key her knight was wont to bear;
 She took the wards in wax before the fire,
 And gave th' impression to the trusty Squire.
 By means of this, some wonder shall appear,
 Which, in due place and season, you may hear.

Well sung sweet Ovid, in the days of yore,
 What slight is that, which love will not explore?
 And Pyramus and Thisbe plainly show
 The feats true lovers, when they list, can do:
 Though watch'd and captive, yet in spite of all,
 They found the art of kissing through a wall.

But now no longer from our tale to stray;
 It happ'd, that once upon a summer's day,
 Our reverend knight was urg'd to amorous play;
 He rais'd his spouse ere Matin bell was rung,
 And thus his morning canticle he sung.

Awake, my love, disclose thy radiant eyes;
 Arise, my wife, my beauteous lady, rise!
 Hear how the doves with pensive notes complain,

And in soft murmurs tell the trees their pain:

The winter's past; the clouds and tempests fly;
 The sun adorns the fields, and brightens all the sky.
 Fair without spot, whose every charming part
 My bosom wounds, and captivates my heart;
 Come, and in mutual pleasure let's engage,
 Joy of my life, and comfort of my age.

This heard, to Damian straight a sign she made,
 To haste before; the gentle Squire obey'd:
 Secret, and undescry'd, he took his way,
 And ambush'd close behind an arbour lay.

It was not long ere January came,
 And hand in hand with him his lovely dame;
 Blind as he was, not doubting all was sure,
 He turn'd the key, and made the gate secure.

Here let us walk, he said, observ'd by none,
 Conscious of pleasures to the world unknown:
 So may my soul have joy, as thou, my wife,
 Art far the dearest solace of my life;
 And rather would I choose, by Heaven above,
 To die this instant, than to lose thy love.
 Reflect what truth was in my passion shown,
 When unendow'd I took thee for my own,
 And sought no treasure but thy heart alone.
 Old as I am, and now depriv'd of sight,
 Whilst thou art faithful to thy own true knight,
 Nor age nor blindness rob me of delight.
 Each other loss with patience I can bear,
 The loss of thee is what I only fear.

Consider then, my lady, and my wife,
 The solid comforts of a virtuous life.
 As, first, the love of Christ himself you gain;
 Next, your own honour undefil'd maintain;
 And lastly, that which sure your mind must move,
 My whole estate shall gratify your love:
 Make your own terms, and e'er to-morrow's sun
 Displays his light, by Heaven, it shall be done.
 I seal the contract with a holy kiss,
 And will perform, by this—my dear, and this—
 Have comfort, spouse, nor think thy Lord unkind;
 'Tis love, not jealousy, that fires my mind.
 For when thy charms my sober thoughts engage,
 And join'd to them my own unequal age,
 From thy dear side I have no power to part,
 Such secret transports warm my melting heart.
 For who, that once possess'd those heavenly charms,
 Could live one moment absent from thy arms?
 He ceas'd, and May with modest grace reply'd (Weak was her voice, as while she spoke she cry'd):

Heaven knows (with that a tender sigh she drew)
 I have a soul to save as well as you;
 And, what no less you to my charge commend,
 My dearest honour, will to death defend.
 To you in holy church I gave my hand,
 And join'd my heart in wedlock's sacred band:
 Yet, after this, if you distrust my care,
 Then hear, my lord, and witness what I swear.

First, may the yawning earth her bosom rend,
 And let me hence to hell alive descend;
 Or die the death I dread no less than hell,
 Sew'd in a sack, and plung'd into a well;
 Ere I my fame by one lewd act disgrace,
 Or once renounce the honour of my race:
 For know, Sir Knight, of gentle blood I came;
 I lothe a whore, and startle at the name.

But jealous men on their own crimes reflect,
And learn from hence their ladies to suspect :
Else why these needless cautions, Sir, to me ?
These doubts and fears of female constancy !
This chime still rings in every lady's ear,
The only strain a wife must hope to hear.

Thus while she spoke, a sidelong glance she cast,
Where Damian, kneeling, worshipp'd as she past.
She saw him watch the motions of her eye,
And singled out a pear-tree planted nigh :
'Twas charg'd with fruit that made a goodly show,

And hung with dangling pears was every bough.
Thither th' obsequious Squire address'd his pace,
And, climbing, in the summit took his place ;
The knight and lady walk'd beneath in view,
Where let us leave them, and our tale pursue.

'Twas now the season when the glorious sun
His heavenly progress through the twins had run ;
And Jove, exalted, his mild influence yields,
To glad the glebe, and paint the flowery fields.
Clear was the day, and Phœbus, rising bright,
Had streak'd the azure firmament with light ;
He pierc'd the glittering clouds with golden streams,
And warm'd the womb of earth with genial beams.

It so befel, in that fair morning-tide,
The fairies sported on the garden side,
And in the midst their monarch and his bride. }
So featly tripp'd the light-foot ladies round, }
The knights so nimbly o'er the greensword } bound, [ground.

That scarce they bent the flowers, or touch'd the
The dances ended, all the fairy train
For pinks and daisies search'd the flowery plain ;
While, on a bank reclin'd of rising green,
Thus, with a frown, the king bespoke his queen.

'Tis too apparent, argue what you can,
The treachery you women use to man :
A thousand authors have this truth made out,
And sad experience leaves no room for doubt.

Heaven rest thy spirit, noble Solomon,
A wiser monarch never saw the sun ;
All wealth, all honours, the supreme degree
Of earthly bliss, was well bestow'd on thee !
For sagely hast thou said : Of all mankind,
One only just and righteous hope to find :
But shouldst thou search the spacious world around,
Yet one good woman is not to be found.

Thus says the king, who knew your wickedness :
The son of Sirach testifies no less.
So may some wildfire on your bodies fall,
Or some devouring plague consume you all.
As well you view the lecher in the tree,
And well this honourable knight you see :
But since he's blind and old (a helpless case),
His Squire shall cuckold him before your face.

Now, by my own dread majesty I swear,
And by this awful sceptre which I bear,
No impious wretch shall 'scape unpunish'd long,
That in my presence offers such a wrong.
I will this instant undeceive the knight,
And in the very act restore his sight ;
And set the strumpet here in open view,
A warning to these ladies, and to you,
And all the faithless sex, for ever to be true.

And will you so, reply'd the queen, indeed ?
Now, by my mother's soul it is decreed,
She shall not want an answer at her need.
For her, and for her daughters, I'll engage,
And all the sex in each succeeding age !
Art shall be theirs, to varnish an offence,
And fortify their crime with confidence.
Nay, were they taken in a strict embrace,
Seen with both eyes, and pinion'd on the place ;
All they shall need is to protest and swear,
Breathe a soft sigh, and drop a tender tear ;
Till their wise husbands, gull'd by arts like these,
Grow gentle, tractable, and tame as geese.

What though this slanderous Jew, this Solomon,
Call'd women fools, and knew full many a one ;
The wiser wits of later times declare,
How constant, chaste, and virtuous, women are :
Witness the martyrs, who resign'd their breath,
Serene in torments, unconcern'd in death ;
And witness next what Roman authors tell,
How Arria, Portia, and Lucretia fell.

But, since the sacred leaves to all are free,
And men interpret texts, why should not we ?
By this no more was meant, than to have shown,
That sovereign goodness dwells in him alone }
Who only is, and is but only One.

But grant the worst ; shall women then be weigh'd
By every word, that Solomon has said ?
What though this king (as ancient story boasts)
Built a fair temple to the Lord of Hosts ;
He ceas'd at last his Maker to adore,
And did as much for idol gods, or more.

Beware what lavish praises you confer
On a rank lecher and idolater ;
Whose reign, indulgent God, says holy writ,
Did but for David's righteous sake permit ;
David, the monarch after heaven's own mind,
Who lov'd our sex, and honour'd all our kind.

Well, I'm a woman, and as such must speak ;
Silence would swell me, and my heart would break.
Know then, I scorn your dull authorities,
Your idle wits, and all their learned lies.
By heaven, those authors are our sex's foes,
Whom, in our right, I must and will oppose.

Nay (quoth the king) dear madam, be not wroth :

I yield it up ; but since I gave my oath,
That this much-injur'd knight again should see,
It must be done—I am a king, said he,
And one, whose faith has ever sacred been.

And so has mine (she said)—I am a queen :
Her answer she shall have, I undertake ;
And thus an end of all dispute I make.
Try when you list ; and you shall find, my lord,
It is not in our sex to break our word.

We leave them here in this heroic strain,
And to the knight our story turns again ;
Who in the garden, with his lovely May,
Sung merrier than the cuckoo or the jay :
This was his song ; " Oh kind and constant be,
" Constant and kind I'll ever prove to thee."

Thus singing as he went, at last he drew
By easy steps, to where the pear-tree grew :
The longing dame look'd up, and spy'd her love
Full fairly perch'd among the boughs above.

She stopp'd, and sighing: Oh good gods! she
cry'd,

What pangs, what sudden shoots, distend my side!
Of for that tempting fruit, so fresh, so green;
Help, for the love of heaven's immortal Queen!
Help, dearest lord, and save at once the life
Of thy poor infant, and thy longing wife!

Sore sigh'd the knight to hear his lady's cry,
But could not climb, and had no servant nigh:
Old as he was and void of eye-sight too,
What could, alas! a helpless husband do?
And must I languish then, she said, and die,
Yet view the lovely fruit before my eye?
At least, kind Sir, for charity's sweet sake,
Vouchsafe the trunk between your arms to take;
Then from your back I might ascend the tree;
Do you but stoop, and leave the rest to me.

With all my soul, he thus reply'd again,
I'd spend my dearest blood to ease thy pain.
With that, his back against the trunk he bent,
She seiz'd a twig, and up the tree she went.

Now prove your patience, gentle ladies all!
Nor let on me your heavy anger fall:
'Tis truth I tell, though not in phrase refin'd;
Though blunt my tale, yet honest is my mind.
What feats the lady in the tree might do,
I pass, as gambols never known to you;
But sure it was a merrier fit, she swore,
Than in her life she ever felt before.

In that nice moment, lo! the wondering
knight

Look'd out, and stood restor'd to sudden sight.
Straight on the tree his eager eyes he bent,
As one whose thoughts were on his spouse intent;
But when he saw his bosom-wife so dress'd,
His rage was such as cannot be express'd;
Not frantic mothers when their infants die,
With louder clamours rend the vaulted sky:
He cry'd, he roar'd, he storm'd, he tore his hair;
Death! hell! and furies! what dost thou do there?

What ails my lord? the trembling dame re-
ply'd;

I thought your patience had been better try'd:
Is this your love, ungrateful and unkind,
This my reward for having cur'd the blind?
Why was I taught to make my husband see,
By struggling with a man upon a tree?
Did I for this the power of magic prove?
Unhappy wife, whose crime was too much love!

If this be struggling, by this holy light,
'Tis struggling with a vengeance (quoth the knight):

So Heaven preserve the sight it has restor'd;
As with these eyes I plainly saw thee whor'd;
Whor'd by my slave—perfidious wretch! may hell

As surely seize thee, as I saw too well!

Guard me, good angels! cry'd the gentle May,
Pray heaven, this magic work the proper way!
Alas, my love! 'tis certain, could you see,
You ne'er had us'd these killing words to me:
So help me, fates, as 'tis no perfect sight,
But some faint glimmering of a doubtful light.

What I have said (quoth he) I must maintain,
For by th' immortal powers it seem'd too plain—

By all those powers, some frenzy seiz'd your mind

(Reply'd the dame): are these the thanks I find?
Wretch that I am, that e'er I was so kind!
She said; a rising sigh express'd her woe,
The ready tears apace began to flow,
And, as they fell, she wip'd from either eye
The drops (for women, when they list, can cry).

The knight was touch'd, and in his looks appear'd

Signs of remorse, while thus his spouse he cheer'd:
Madam, 'tis past, and my short anger o'er;
Come down, and vex your tender heart no more:
Excuse me, dear, if aught amiss was said,
For, on my soul, amends shall soon be made:
Let my repentance your forgiveness draw,
By heaven, I swore but what I thought I saw.

Ah, my lov'd lord! 'twas much unkind (she cry'd)

On bare suspicion thus to treat your bride.

But, till your sight's establish'd, for a while,
Imperfect objects may your sense beguile.

Thus when from sleep we first our eyes display,
The balls are wounded with the piercing ray,

And dusky vapours rise, and intercept the day.

So, just recovering from the shades of night,

Your swimming eyes are drunk with sudden
light,

Strange phantoms dance around, and skim before [your sight:]

Then, Sir, be cautious, nor too rashly deem;

Heaven knows how seldom things are what they seem!

Consult your reason, and you soon shall find

'Twas you were jealous, not your wife unkind:

Jove ne'er spoke oracle more true than this,

None judge so wrong as those who think amiss.

With that she leap'd into her lord's embrace,

With well-dissembled virtue in her face.

He hugg'd her close, and kiss'd her o'er and o'er,

Disturb'd with doubts and jealousies no more:

Both, pleas'd and bless'd, renew'd their mutual vows,

A fruitful wife, and a believing spouse.

Thus ends our tale; whose moral next to make,

Let all wise husbands hence example take;

And pray, to crown the pleasure of their lives,

To be so well deluded by their wives.

THE WIFE OF BATH,

HER PROLOGUE.

FROM CHAUCER.

BEMOLD the woes of matrimonial life,
And hear with reverence an experienc'd wife!
To dear-bought wisdom give the credit due,
And think, for once, a woman tells you true.

In all these trials I have borne a part,
I was myself the scourge that caus'd the smart;
For, since fifteen, in triumph have I led
Five captive husbands from the church to bed.

Christ saw a wedding once, the scripture says,
And saw but one, 'tis thought, in all his days;

Whence some infer, whose conscience is too nice,
No pious Christian ought to marry twice.

But let them read, and solve me, if they can,
The words address'd to the Samaritan:
Five times in lawful wedlock she was join'd;
And sure the certain stint was ne'er defin'd.

"Increase and multiply," was heaven's command,

And that's a text I clearly understand.
This too, "Let men their fires and mothers leave,
And to their dearer wives for ever cleave."

More wives than one by Solomon were try'd,
Or else the wisest of mankind's bely'd.

I've had myself full many a merry fit;
And trust in heaven, I may have many yet,
For when my transitory spouse, unkind,
Shall die, and leave his woeful wife behind,
I'll take the next good Christian I can find.

Paul, knowing one could never serve our turn,
Declar'd 'twas better far to wed than burn.
There's danger in assembling fire and tow;
I grant them that, and what it means you know.
The same apostle too has elsewhere own'd,
No precept for virginity he found:

'Tis but a counsel—and we women still
Take which we like, the counsel, or our will.

I envy not their bliss, if he or she
Think fit to live in perfect chastity;
Pure let them be, and free from taint of vice;
I, for a few slight spots, am not so nice.
Heaven calls us different ways, on these bestows
One proper gift, another grants to those:
Not every man's obliged to sell his store,
And give up all his substance to the poor;
Such as are perfect may, I can't deny;
But, by your leaves, divines, so am not I.

Full many a faint, since first the world began,
Liv'd an unspotted maid, in spite of man:
Let such (a-God's name) with fine wheat be fed,
And let us honest wives eat barley bread.
For me, I'll keep the post assign'd by heaven,
And use the copious talent it has given:
Let my good spouse pay tribute, do me right,
And keep an equal reckoning every night.
His proper body is not his, but mine;
For so said Paul, and Paul's a sound divine.

Know then, of those five husbands I have had,
Three were just tolerable, two were bad.
The three were old, but rich and fond beside,
And toil'd most piteously to please their bride:
But since their wealth (the best they had) was mine,

The rest, without much loss, I could resign.
Sure to be lov'd, I took no pains to please,
Yet had more pleasure far than they had ease.

Presents flow'd in apace: with showers of gold,
They made their court, like Jupiter of old.
If I but smil'd, a sudden youth they found,
And a new palsy seiz'd them when I frown'd.

Ye sovereign wives! give ear and understand,
Thus shall ye speak, and exercise command.
For never was it given to mortal man,
To lie so boldly as we women can: [eyes,
Forswear the fact, though seen with both his
And call your maids to witness how he lies,

Hark, old Sir Paul! ('twas thus I us'd to say)
Whence is our neighbour's wife so rich and gay?
Treated, caress'd, where'er she's pleas'd to roam—
I sit in tatters, and immur'd at home.

Why to her house dost thou so oft repair
Art thou so amorous? and is she so fair?
If I but see a cousin or a friend,
Lord! how you swell, and rage like any fiend!
But you reel home, a drunken beastly bear,
Then preach till midnight in your easy chair;
Cry, wives are false, and every woman evil
And give up all that's female to the devil.

If poor (you say) she drains her husband's purse;
If rich, she keeps her priest, or something worse;
If highly born, intolerably vain,
Vapours and pride by turns possess her brain,
Now gayly mad, now sourly splenetic;
Freakish when well, and fretful when she's sick.
If fair, then chaste she cannot long abide,
By pressing youth attack'd on every side;
If foul, her wealth the lusty lover lures,
Or else her wit some fool-gallant procures,
Or else she dances with becoming grace,
Or shape excuses the defects of face.

There swims no goose so grey, but, soon or late,
She finds some honest gander for her mate.

Horses (thou say'st) and asses men may try,
And ring suspected vessels ere they buy:
But wives, a random choice, untry'd they take;
They dream in courtship, but in wedlock wake:
Then, nor till then, the veil's removed away,
And all the woman glares in open day.

You tell me, to preserve your wife's good grace,
Your eyes must always languish on my face,
Your tongue with constant flatteries feed my ear,
And tag each sentence with, My life! my dear!
If, by strange chance, a modest blush be rais'd,
Be sure my fine complexion must be prais'd.
My garments always must be new and gay,
And feasts still kept upon my wedding day.
Then must my nurse be pleas'd, and favourite
maid;

And endless treats, and endless visits paid,
To a long train of kindred, friends, allies.
All this thou say'st, and all thou say'st are lies.

On Jenkin too you cast a squinting eye:
What! can your 'prentice raise your jealousy?
Fresh are his ruddy cheeks, his forehead fair,
And like the burnish'd gold his curling hair.
But clear thy wrinkled brow, and quit thy sorrow,
I'd scorn your 'prentice, should you die to-morrow.

Why are thy chests all lock'd? on what design?
Are not thy worldly goods and treasure mine?
Sir, I'm no fool; nor shall you, by St. John,
Have goods and body to yourself alone.
One you shall quit, in spite of both your eyes—
I heed not, I, the bolts, and locks and spies.
If you had wit, you'd say, "Go where you will,
"Dear spouse, I credit not the tales they tell:
"Take all the freedoms of a married life;
"I know thee for a virtuous, faithful wife."

Lord! when you have enough, what need you
care
How merrily soever others fare?

Though all the day I give and take delight,
Doubt not, sufficient will be left at night.

'Tis but a just and rational desire,
To light a taper at a neighbour's fire.

There's danger too, you think, in rich array,
And none can long be modest that are gay.
The cat, if you but finge her tabby skin,
The chimney keeps, and sits content within;
But once grown sleek, will from her corner run,
Sport with her tail, and wanton in the sun;
She licks her fair round face, and frisks abroad,
To shew her fur, and to be catterwaw'd.

Lo thus, my friends, I wrought to my desires
These three right ancient venerable fires.
I told them, thus you say, and thus you do,
And told them false, but Jenkin swore 'twas true.
I, like a dog, could bite as well as whine,
And first complain'd, whene'er the guilt was mine.

I tax'd them oft with wenching and amours.
When their weak legs scarce dragg'd them out of doors;

And swore the rambles that I took by night,
Were all to spy what damsels they bedight.
That colour brought me many hours of mirth;
For all this wit is given us from our birth.
Heaven gave to women the peculiar grace,
To spin, to weep, and cully human race.
By this nice conduct, and this prudent course,
By murmuring, wheedling, stratagem, and force,
I still prevail'd, and would be in the right,
Or curtain-lectures made a restless night.

If once my husband's aim was o'er my side,
What! so familiar with your spouse? I cry'd:
I levied first a tax upon his need:

Then let him—'twas a nicety indeed!

Let all mankind this certain maxim hold,
Marry who will, our sex is to be sold.

With empty hands no taffels you can lure,
But fulsome love for gain we can endure;
For gold we love the impotent and old,

And heave, and pant, and kiss, and cling, for gold,

Yet with embraces, curses oft I mix'd,
Then kiss'd again, and chid, and rail'd betwixt.
Well, I may make my will in peace, and die.

For not one word in man's arrears am I.

To drop a dear dispute I was unable,
Ev'n though the Pope himself had sat at table.

But when my point was gain'd, then thus I spoke:

"Billy, my dear, how sleepily you look!"

"Approach, my spouse, and let me kiss thy cheek;

"Thou shouldst be always thus, resign'd and meek!"

"Of Job's great patience since so oft you preach,

"Well should you practise, who so well can teach,

"'Tis difficult to do, I must allow,

"But I, my dearest, will instruct you how.

"Great is the blessing of a prudent wife,

"Who puts a period to domestic strife.

"One of us two must rule, and one obey;

"And since in man right reason bears the sway,

"Let that frail thing, weak woman, have her way."

"The wives of all my family have rul'd

"Their tender husbands, and their passions cool'd."

"Fy, 'tis unmanly thus to sigh and groan; lone,

"What! would you have me to yourself a part!"

"Why take me, love! take all and every part!"

"Here's your revenge! you love it at your heart.

"Would I vouchsafe to tell what nature gave,

"You little think what custom I could have,

"But see! I'm all your own—nay hold—for shame; [blame."

"What means my dear—indeed—you are to

Thus with my first three lords I pass my life;

A very woman, and a very wife.

What sums from these old spouses I could raise,

Procur'd young husbands in my riper days.

Though past my bloom, not yet decay'd was I,

Wanton and wild, and chatter'd like a pie.

In country dances still I bore the bell,

And sung as sweet as evening Philomel.

To clear my quailpipe, and refresh my soul,

Full oft I drain'd the spicy nut brown bowl;

Rich luscious wines, that youthful blood improve,

And warm the swelling veins to seats of love:

For 'tis as sure, as cold engenders hail,

A liquorish mouth must have a lecherous tail

Wine lets no lover unrewarded go,

As all true gamesters by experience know.

But oh, good gods! whene'er a thought I cast

On all the joys of youth and beauty past,

To find in pleasures I have had my part,

Still warms me to the bottom of my heart.

This wicked world was once my dear delight;

Now all my conquests, all my charms, good night!

The flour consum'd the best that now I can,

Is e'n to make my market of the bran.

My fourth dear spouse was not exceeding true;

He kept, 'twas thought, a private miss or two;

But all that score I paid—as how? you'll say,

Not with my body, in a filthy way:

But I so dress'd, and danc'd, and drank, and din'd;

And view'd a friend with eyes so very kind,

As stung his heart, and made his marrow fry

With burning rage, and frantic jealousy.

His soul, I hope, enjoys eternal glory,

For here on earth I was his purgatory.

Oft, when his shoe the most severely wrung,

He put on careless airs, and sat and sung.

How sore I gall'd him, only heaven could know,

And he that felt, and I that caus'd the woe.

He dy'd, when last from pilgrimage I came,

With other gossips, from Jerusalem;

And now lies buried underneath a rood,

Fair to be seen, and rear'd of honest wood:

A tomb indeed, with fewer sculptures grac'd

Than that Mausolus' pious widow plac'd,

Or where inshrind the great Darius lay;

But cost on graves is merely thrown away.

The pit fill'd up, with turf we cover'd o'er;

So blest the good man's soul, I say no more.

Now for my fifth lov'd lord, the last and best;

(Kind heaven afford him everlasting rest!)

Full hearty was his love, and I can show

The tokens on my ribs in black and blue;

Yet, with a knock, my heart he could have won,

While yet the smart was shooting in the bone.

How quaint an appetite in women reigns!

Free gifts we scorn, and love what costs us pains;

Let men avoid us, and on them we leap;
A glutted market makes provision cheap.

In pure good will I took this jovial spark,
Of Oxford he, a most egregious clerk.
He boarded with a widow in the town,
A trusty gossip, one dame Allison.
Full well the secrets of my soul she knew,
Better than e'er our parish-priest could do.
To her I told whatever could befall:
Had but my husband pish'd against a wall,
Or done a thing that might have cost his life,
She—and my niece—and one more worthy wife,
Had known it all: what most he would conceal,
To these I made no scruple to reveal.
Oft has he blush'd from ear to ear for shame,
That e'er he told a secret to his dame.

It so befel, in holy time of Lent,
That oft a day I to this gossip went
(My husband, thank my stars, was out of town);
From house to house we rambled up and down,
This clerk, myself, and my good neighbour Alse,
To see, be seen, to tell, and gather tales.
Visits to every church we daily paid,
And march'd in every holy masquerade,
The stations duly and the vigils kept:
Not much we fasted, but scarce ever slept.
At sermons too I shone in scarlet gay;
The waisting moths ne'er spoil'd my best array;
The cause was this, I wore it every day.

'Twas when fresh May her early blossom yields,
This clerk and I were walking in the fields,
We grew so intimate, I can't tell how,
I pawn'd my honour, and engag'd my vow,
If e'er I laid my husband in his urn,
That he, and only he, should serve my turn.
We straight struck hands, the bargain was agreed;
I still have shifts against a time of need:
The mouse that always trusts to one poor hole,
Can never be a mouse of any soul.

I vow'd, I scarce could sleep since first I knew him,
And durst be sworn he had bewitch'd me to him;
If e'er I slept, I dream'd of him alone,
And dreams foretel, as learned men have shown.
All this I said; but dreams, sirs, I had none:
I follow'd but my crafty crony's lore,
Who bid me tell this lie—and twenty more.

Thus day by day, and month by month we pass;
It pleas'd the Lord to take my spouse at last.
I tore my gown, I soil'd my locks with dust,
And beat my breasts, as wretched widows—must.
Before my face my handkerchief I spread,
To hide the flood of tears I did—not shed.
The good man's coffin to the church was borne;
Around, the neighbours, and my clerk too, mourn.
But as he march'd, good gods! he show'd a pair
Of legs and feet, so clean, so strong, so fair!
Of twenty winters age he seem'd to be;
I (to say truth) was twenty more than he;
But vigorous still, a lively buxom dame;
And had a wonderful gift to quench a flame.
A conjuror once, that deeply could divine,
Assur'd me, Mars in Taurus was my sign.
As the stars order'd, such my life has been:
Alas, alas, that ever love was sin!

Fair Venus gave me fire and sprightly grace,
And Mars assurance and a dauntless face.
By virtue of this powerful constellation,
I follow'd always my own inclination.

But to my tale: A month scarce pass'd away,
With dance and song we kept the nuptial day.
All I possess'd I gave to his command,
My goods and chattels, money, house, and land:
But oft repented, and repent it still;
He prov'd a rebel to my sovereign will:
Nay once, by heaven, he struck me on the face;
Hear but the fact, and judge yourselves the case.

Stubborn as any lioness was I;
And knew full well to raise my voice on high;
As true a Rambler as I was before,
And would be so, in spite of all he swore.
He against this right sagely would advise,
And old examples set before my eyes,
Tell how the Roman matrons led their life,
Of Gracchus' mother, and Duilius' wife;
And close the sermon, as becom'd his wit,
With some grave sentence out of holy writ.
Oft would he say, who builds his house on sands,
Pricks his blind horse across the fallow lands;
Or lets his wife abroad with pilgrims roam,
Deserves a fool's cap, and long ears at home.
All this avail'd not; for whoe'er he be
That tells my faults, I hate him mortally;
And so do numbers more, I boldly say,
Men, women, clergy, regular, and lay.

My spouse (who was, you know, to learning bred)

A certain treatise oft at evening read,
Where divers authors (whom the devil confound
For all their lies), were in one volume bound.
Valerius, whole: and of St. Jerome, part;
Chrysippus and Tertullian, Ovid's art,
Solomon's Proverbs, Eloisa's loves;
And many more than sure the church approves.
More legends were there here of wicked wives,
Than good in all the Bible and saints lives.
Who drew the lion vanquish'd? 'Twas a man.
But could we women write as scholars can, [ness,
Men should stand mark'd with far more wicked-
Than all the sons of Adam could redress.
Love seldom haunts the breast where learning lies,
And Venus sets e'er Mercury can rise.

Those play the scholars, who can't play the men,
And use that weapon which they have, their pen;
When old, and past the relish of delight,
Then down they sit, and in their dotage write,
That not one woman keeps her marriage vow.
(This by the way, but to my purpose now).

It chanc'd my husband, on a winters night,
Read in his book, aloud, with strange delight,
How the first female (as the Scriptures show)
Brought her own spouse, and all his race, to woe.
How Samson fell; and he whom Dejanire
Wrapp'd in th' envenom'd shirt, and set on fire.
How curs'd Eryphile her lord betray'd,
And the dire ambush Clytemnestra laid.
But what most pleas'd him was the Cretan dame,
And husband-bull—oh, monstrous! fie for shame!

He had by heart the whole detail of woe
Xantippe made her good man undergo;

How oft she scolded in a day, he knew,
How many piss-pots on the sage she threw;
Who took it patiently, and wip'd his head;
"Rain follows thunder," that was all he said.

He read, how Arius to his friend complain'd,
A fatal tree was growing in his land,
On which three wives successively had twin'd
A sliding noose, and waver'd in the wind.
Where grows this plant (reply'd the friend), oh,
where?

For better fruit did never orchard bear.
Give me some slip of this most blissful tree,
And in my garden planted shall it be. [prove,

Then how two wives their lords' destruction
Through hatred one, and one through too much love;
That for her husband mix'd a poisonous draught,
And this for lust an amorous philtre bought:
The nimble juice soon seiz'd his giddy head,
Frantic at night, and in the morning dead.

How some with swords their sleeping lords have slain,

And some have hammer'd nails into their brain,
And some have drench'd them with a deadly potion;
All this he read, and read with great devotion.

Long time I heard, and swell'd, and blush'd,
and frown'd:

But when no end of these vile tales I found,
When still he read, and laugh'd, and read again,
And half the night was thus consum'd in vain;
Provok'd to vengeance, three large leaves I tore,
And with one buffet fell'd him on the floor.

With that my husband in a fury rose,
And down he settled me with hearty blows.
I groan'd, and lay extended on my side;
Oh! thou hast slain me for my wealth (I cry'd),
Yet I forgive thee—take my last embrace—
He wept, kind soul! and stoop'd to kiss my face,
I took him such a box as turn'd him blue,
Then sigh'd and cry'd, adieu, my dear, adieu!

But after many a hearty struggle past,
I condescended to be pleas'd at last.
Soon as he said, my mistress and my wife,
Do what you list, the term of all your life;
I took to heart the merits of the cause,
And stood content to rule by wholesome laws;
Receiv'd the reins of absolute command,
With all the government of house and land,
And empire o'er his tongue, and o'er his hand. }
As for the volume that revil'd the dames,
'Twas torn to fragments, and condemn'd to flames.

Now heaven on all my husbands gone bestow
Pleasures above, for tortures felt below:
That rest they wish'd for, grant them in the grave,
And bless those souls my conduct help'd to save!

THE FIRST BOOK OF STATIUS HIS THEBAIS.

Translated in the Year 1703.

THE ARGUMENT.

ŒDIPUS King of Thebes, having by mistake slain
his father Laius, and married his mother Jocasta, put out his own eyes, and resigned the realm to his sons, Eteocles and Polynices. Being neglected by them, he makes his prayer to the fury

Tisiphone, to sow debate betwixt the brothers.
They agree at last to reign singly, each a year
by turns, and the first lot is obtained by Eteocles. Jupiter, in a council of the gods, declares his resolution of punishing the Thebans, and Argives also, by means of a marriage betwixt
Polynices and one of the daughters of Adrastus
King of Argos. Juno opposes, but to no effect;
and Mercury is sent on a message to the Shades, to the ghost of Laius, who is to appear to Eteo-
cles, and provoke him to break the agreement.
Polynices in the mean time departs from Thebes
by night, is overtaken by a storm, and arrives at Argos; where he meets with Tydeus, who had fled from Calydon, having killed his brother.
Adrastus entertains them, having received an oracle from Apollo, that his daughters should be married to a boar and a lion, which he understands to be meant of these strangers, by whom the hides of those beasts were worn, and who arrived at the time when he kept an annual feast in honour of that god. The rise of this solemnity he relates to his guests, the loves of Phœbus and Psamathe, and the story of Chorcæbus. He inquires, and is made acquainted with their descend and quality. The sacrifice is renewed, and the book concludes with a hymn to Apollo.

[The translator hopes he need not apologise for his choice of this piece, which was made almost in his childhood; but, finding the version better than he expected, he gave it some correction a few years afterwards.]

FRATERNAL rage, the guilty Thebes alarms,
The alternate reign destroy'd by impious arms,
Demand our song; a sacred fury fires
My ravish'd breast, and all the muse inspires.
O, goddess, say, shall I deduce my rhymes
From the dire nation in its early times,
Europa's rape, Angenor's stern decree,
And Cadmus searching round the spacious sea?
How with the serpent's teeth he sow'd the soil,
And reap'd an iron harvest of his toil?
Or how from joining stones the city sprung,
While to his harp divine Amphion sung?
Or shall I Juno's hate to Thebes resound,
Whose fatal rage th' unhappy monarch found?
The fire against the son his arrows drew,
O'er the wide fields the furious mother flew,
And while her arms a second hope contain,
Sprung from the rocks, and plung'd into the main.

But wave whate'er to Cadmus may belong,
And fix, O, muse! the barrier of thy song
At Œdipus—from his disasters trace
The long confusions of his guilty race:
Nor yet attempt to stretch thy bolder wing,
And mighty Cæsar's conquering eagles sing;
How twice he tam'd proud Ister's rapid flood,
While Dacian mountains stream'd with barbarous
blood;

Twice taught the Rhine beneath his laws to roll,
And stretch'd his empire to the frozen pole;

Or long before, with early valour, strove
In youthful arms to assert the cause of Jove.
And thou, great heir of all thy father's fame,
Increase of glory to the Latin name!
O, bless thy Rome with an eternal reign,
Nor let desiring worlds entreat in vain.
What though the stars contract their heavenly space,
And crowd their shining ranks to yield thee place;
Though all the skies, ambitious of thy sway,
Conspire to court thee from our world away;
Though Phœbus longs to mix his rays with thine,
And in thy glories more serenely shine;
Though Jove himself no less content would be
To part his throne, and share his heaven with thee;
Yet stay, great Cæsar! and vouchsafe to reign
O'er the wide earth, and o'er the watery main;
Resign to Jove his empire of the skies,
And people heaven with Roman deities.

The time will come, when a diviner flame
Shall warm my breast to sing of Cæsar's fame:
Meanwhile permit, that my preluding muse
In Theban wars an humbler theme may choose:
Of furious hate surviving death, she sings,
A fatal throne to two contending kings,
And funeral flames, that parting wide in air
Express the discord of the souls they bear:
Of towns dispeopled, and the wandering ghosts
Of kings unbury'd in the wasted coasts;
When Dirce's fountain blush'd with Grecian blood,
And Thetis, near Ismenos' swelling flood,
With dread beheld the rolling surges sweep,
In heaps, his slaughter'd sons into the deep.

What hero, Clio! wilt thou first relate?
The rage of Tydeus, or the prophet's fate?
Or how, with hills of slain on every side,
Hippomedon repell'd the hostile tide?
Or how the youth, with every grace adorn'd,
Untimely fell, to be for ever mourn'd?
Then to fierce Capaneus thy verse extend,
And sing with horror his prodigious end.

Now wretched Oedipus, depriv'd of sight,
Led a long death in everlasting night;
But, while he dwells where not a cheerful ray
Can pierce the darkness, and abhors the day,
The clear reflecting mind presents his sin
In frightful views, and makes it day within;
Returning thoughts in endless circles roll,
And thousand furies haunt his guilty soul;
The wretch then lifted to th' unpitying skies
Those empty orbs from whence he tore his eyes,
Whose wounds, yet fresh, with bloody hands he strook,

While from his breast these dreadful accents broke:
Ye gods! that o'er the gloomy regions reign,
Where guilty spirits feel eternal pain;
Thou, fable Styx! whose livid streams are roll'd
Through dreary coasts, which I, though blind, behold:

Tisiphone, that oft has heard my prayer,
Assist, if Oedipus deserve thy care!
If you receiv'd me from Jocasta's womb,
And nurs'd the hope of mischiefs yet to come:
If leaving Polybus, I took my way
To Cyrrha's temple, on that fatal day,

When by the son the trembling father dy'd,
Where the three roads the Phocian fields divide:
If I the Sphynx's riddles durst explain,
Taught by thyself to win the promis'd reign:
If wretched I, by baleful furies led,
With monstrous mixture stain'd my mother's bed,
For hell and thee begot an impious brood,
And with full lust those horrid joys renew'd;
Then self-condemn'd to shades of endless night,
Forc'd from these orbs the bleeding balls of sight:
O, hear, and aid the vengeance I require,
If worthy thee, and what thou mightst inspire!
My sons their old unhappy fire despise,
Spoil'd of his kingdom, and depriv'd of eyes;
Guideless I wander, unregarded mourn,
While these exalt their sceptres o'er my urn;
These sons, ye gods! who, with flagitious pride,
Insult my darkness, and my groans deride.
Art thou a father, unregarding Jove?
And sleeps thy thunder in the realms above?
Thou fury, then, some lasting curse entail,
Which o'er their children's children shall prevail:
Place on their heads that crown distain'd with gore,
Which those dire hands from my slain father tore:
Go, and a parent's heavy curses bear;
Break all the bonds of nature, and prepare
Their kindred souls to mutual hate and war.
Give them to dare, what I might wish to see,
Blind as I am, some glorious villany!
Soon shalt thou find, if thou but arm their hands,
Their ready guilt preventing thy commands:
Could'st thou some great, proportion'd mischief
frame,

They'd prove the father from whose loins they came.
The Fury heard, while on Cocytus' brink
Her snakes untied sulphureous waters drink;
But at the summons roll'd her eyes around,
And snatch'd the starting serpents from the ground.
Not half so swiftly shoots along in air
The gliding lightning, or descending star. [flight,
Through crowds of airy shades she wing'd her
And dark dominions of the silent night;
Swift as she pass'd, the flitting ghosts withdrew,
And the pale spectres trembled at her view:
To th' iron gates of Tænarus she flies,
There spreads her dusky pinions to the skies.
The day beheld, and, sickening at the sight,
Veil'd her fair glories in the shades of night.
Affrighted Atlas, on the distant shore,
Trembled, and shook the heavens and gods he bore.

Now from beneath Malca's airy height
Aloft she sprung, and steer'd to Thebes her flight;
With eager speed the well-known journey took,
Nor here regrets the hell she late forsook.
A hundred snakes her gloomy visage shade,
A hundred serpents guard her horrid head,
In her sunk eye-balls dreadful meteors glow:
Such rays from Phœbe's bloody circles flow,
When, labouring with strong charms, she shoots from high
A fiery gleam, and reddens all the sky.
Blood stain'd her cheeks, and from her mouth
there came
Blue steaming poisons, and a length of flame.

From every blast of her contagious breath,
Famine and drought proceed, and plagues, and death.

A robe obscene was o'er her shoulders thrown,
A dress by fates and furies worn alone.
She toss'd her meagre arms; her better hand
In waving circles whirl'd a funeral brand:
A serpent from her left was seen to rear
His flaming crest, and lash the yielding air.

But when the Fury took her stand on high,
Where vast Cithæron's top salutes the sky,
A hiss from all the snaky tire went round;
The dreadful signal all the rocks rebound,
And through th' Achaian cities send the sound. }
Oete, with high Parnassus, heard the voice;
Eurotas' banks remurmur'd to the noise;
Again Leucothoë shook at these alarms,
And press'd Palæmon closer in her arms.
Headlong from thence the glowing Fury springs,
And o'er the Theban palace spreads her wings,
Once more invades the guilty dome, and shrouds
Its bright pavilions in a veil of clouds.

Straight with the rage of all their race possess'd, }
Stung to the soul, the brothers start from rest,
And all their furies wake within their breast. }
Their tortur'd minds repining Envy tears,
And Hate, engender'd by suspicious fears;
And sacred thirst of sway; and all the ties
Of nature broke; and royal perjuries;
And impotent Desire to reign alone,
That scorns the dull reversion of a throne;
Each would the sweets of sovereign rule devour,
While Discord waits upon divided power.

As stubborn steers by brawny ploughmen broke,
And join'd reluctant to the galling yoke,
Alike disdain with servile necks to bear
Th' unwonted weight, or drag the crooked share,
But rend the reins, and bound a different way,
And all the furrows in confusion lay;
Such was the discord of the royal pair,
Whom fury drove precipitate to war.
In vain the chiefs contriv'd a specious way,
To govern Thebes by their alternate sway:
Unjust decree! while this enjoys the state,
That mourns in exile his unequal fate,
And the short monarch of a hasty year
Foresees with anguish his returning heir.
Thus did the league their impious arms restrain,
But scarce subsisted to the second reign.

Yet then, no proud aspiring piles were rais'd,
No fretted roofs with polish'd metals blaz'd;
No labour'd columns in long order plac'd,
No Grecian stone the pompous arches grac'd;
No nightly bands in glittering armour wait
Before the sleepless tyrant's guarded gate;
No chargers then were wrought in burnish'd gold.
Nor silver vases took the forming mould;
Nor gems on bowls emboss'd were seen to shine,
Blaze on the brims, and sparkle in the wine—
Say, wretched rivals! what provokes your rage?
Say, to what end your impious arms engage?
Not all bright Phœbus views in early morn,
Or when his evening beams the west adorn,
When the south glows with his meridian ray,
And the cold north receives a fainter day;

For crimes like these, not all those realms suffice,
Were all those realms the guilty victor's prize!

But fortune now (the lots of empire thrown)
Decrees to proud Eteocles the crown:
What joys, oh tyrant! swell'd thy soul that day,
When all were slaves thou couldst around survey,
Pleas'd to behold unbounded power thy own,
And singly fill a fear'd and envy'd throne!

But the vile vulgar, ever discontent,
Their growing fears in secret murmurs vent;
Still prone to change, though still the slaves of state,
And sure the monarch whom they have, to hate;
New lords they madly make, then tamely bear,
And softly curse the tyrants whom they fear.
And one of those who groan beneath the sway
Of kings impos'd, and grudgingly obey,
(Whom envy to the great and vulgar spite
With scandal arm'd, th' ignoble mind's delight)
Exclaim'd—O Thebes! for thee what fates remain
What woes attend this inauspicious reign!
Must we, alas! our doubtful necks prepare,
Each haughty masters yoke by turns to bear,
And still to change whom chang'd we still must } fear?

These now controul a wretched people's fate,
These can divide, and these reverse the state:
Ev'n fortune rules no more:—O servile land,
Where exil'd tyrants still by turns command!
Thou fire of gods and men, imperial Jove!
Is this th' eternal doom decreed above?
On thy own offspring hast thou fix'd this fate,
From the first birth of our unhappy state;
When banish'd Cadmus, wandering o'er the main,
For lost Europa search'd the world in vain,
And, fated in Bœotian fields to found
A rising empire on a foreign ground,
First rais'd our walls on that ill-omen'd plain,
Where earth-born brothers were by brothers slain?
What lofty looks th' unrival'd monarch bears!
How all the tyrant in his face appears!
What sullen fury clouds his scornful brow?
Gods! how his eyes with threatening ardour glow!
Can this imperious lord forget to reign,
Quit all his state, descend, and serve again?
Yet who, before, more popularly bow'd,
Who more propitious to the suppliant crowd?
Patient of right, familiar in the throne?
What wonder then? he was not then alone.
O wretched we, a vile submissive train,
Fortune's tame fools, and slaves in every reign!

As when two winds with rival force contend,
This way and that, the wavering sails they bend,
While freezing Boreas and black Eurus blow,
Now here, now there, the reeling vessel throw:
Thus, on each side, alas! our tottering state
Feels all the fury of resistless fate;
And doubtful still, and still distracted stands,
While that prince threatens, and while this com-
And now th' almighty father of the gods [mands,
Convenes a council in the blest abodes:
Far in the bright recesses of the skies,
High o'er the rolling heavens, a mansion lies,
Whence, far below, the gods at once survey
The realms of rising and declining day, [sea. }
And all th' extended space of earth, and air, and

Full in the midst, and on a starry throne,
 The majesty of heaven superior shone;
 Serene he look'd, and gave an awful nod,
 And all the trembling spheres confess'd the God.
 At Jove's assent, the deities around
 In solemn state the consistory crown'd.
 Next a long order of inferior powers
 Ascend from hills, and plains, and shady bowers;
 Those from whose urns the rolling rivers flow;
 And those that give the wandering winds to blow:
 Here all their rage, and ev'n their murmurs cease,
 And sacred silence reigns, and universal peace.
 A shining synod of majestic gods
 Gilds with new lustre the divine abodes;
 Heaven seems improv'd with a superior ray,
 And the bright arch reflects a double day.
 The monarch then his solemn silence broke,
 The still creation listened while he spoke;
 Each sacred accent bears eternal weight.
 And each irrevocable word is fate.

How long shall man the wrath of Heaven defy,
 And force unwilling vengeance from the sky!
 Oh race confederate into crimes, that prove
 Triumphant o'er th' eluded rage of Jove!
 This weary arm can scarce the bolt sustain,
 And unregarded thunder rolls in vain:
 Th' o'erlabour'd Cyclop from his task retires;
 Th' Æolian forge exhausted of its fires,
 For this I suffer'd Phœbus' steeds to stray,
 And the mad ruler to misguide the day,
 When the wide earth to heaps of ashes turn'd,
 And heaven itself the wandering chariot burn'd.
 For this, my brother of the watery reign
 Releas'd th' impetuous sluices of the main:
 But flames consum'd, and billows rag'd in vain. }
 Two races now, ally'd to Jove, offend:
 To punish these, see Jove himself descend.
 The Theban kings their line from Cadmus trace,
 From godlike Perseus those of Argive race.
 Unhappy Cadmus' fate who does not know,
 And the long series of succeeding woe?
 How oft the furies, from the deeps of night,
 Arose, and mix'd with men in mortal fight:
 Th' exulting mother, stain'd with filial blood;
 The savage hunter, and the haunted wood?
 The direful banquet why should I proclaim,
 And crimes that grieve the trembling gods to name?

Ere I recount the sins of these profane, }
 The sun would sink into the western main,
 And rising gild the radiant east again.
 Have we not seen (the blood of Laius shed)
 The murdering son ascend his parent's bed,
 Through violated nature force his way,
 And stain the sacred womb where once he lay?
 Yet now in darkness and despair he groans,
 And for the crimes of guilty fate atones;
 His sons with scorn their eyeless father view,
 Insult his wounds, and make them bleed anew.
 Thy curse, oh! Oedipus, just heaven alarms,
 And sets th' avenging thunderer in arms.
 I from the root thy guilty race will tear,
 And give the nations to the waste of war.
 Adrastus soon, with gods averse, shall join
 In dire alliance with the Theban line:

Hence strife shall rise, and mortal war succeed;
 The guilty realms of Tantalus shall bleed:
 Fix'd is their doom; this all-remembering breast
 Yet harbours vengeance for the tyrant's feast.

He said; and thus the queen of heaven re-turn'd

(With sudden grief her labouring bosom burn'd):
 Must I, whose cares Phoroneus' towers defend,
 Must I, oh Jove, in bloody wars contend?
 Thou know'st those regions my protection claim,
 Glorious in arms, in riches, and in fame:
 Though there the fair Ægyptian heifer fed,
 And there deluded Argus slept, and bled;
 Though there the brazen tower was storm'd of old,
 When Jove descended in almighty gold.
 Yet I can pardon those obscurer rapes,
 Those bashful crimes disguis'd in borrow'd shapes;
 But Thebes, where, shining in celestial charms,
 Thou cam'st triumphant to a mortal's arms,
 When all my glories o'er her limbs were spread,
 And blazing lightnings danc'd around her bed;
 Curs'd Thebes the vengeance it deserves may prove—

Ah, why should Argos feel the rage of Jove?
 Yet, since thou wilt thy sister queen controul,
 Since still the lust of discord fires thy soul,
 Go, raze my Samos, let Mycene fall,
 And level with the dust the Spartan wall;
 No more let mortals Juno's power invoke,
 Her fanes no more with eastern incense smoke, }
 Nor victims sink beneath the sacred stroke;
 But to your Isis all my rights transfer,
 Let altars blaze and temples smoke for her;
 For her, through Egypt's fruitful clime renown'd,
 Let weeping Nilus hear the timbrel sound.
 But if thou must reform the stubborn times,
 Avenging on the sons the father's crimes,
 And from the long records of distant age
 Derive incitements to renew thy rage;
 Say, from what period then has Jove design'd
 To date his vengeance; to what bounds confin'd?
 Begin from whence, where first Alpheus hides
 His wandering stream, and through the briny } tides

Unmix'd to his Sicilian river glides.
 Thy own Arcadians there the thunder claim,
 Whose impious rites disgrace the mighty name;
 Who raise thy temples where the chariot stood
 Of fierce Oenomaus, defil'd with blood;
 Where once his steeds their savage banquet found
 And human bones yet whiten all the ground.
 Say, can those honours please? and canst thou love

Presumptuous Crete, that boasts the tomb of Jove;
 And shall not Tantalus's kingdom share
 Thy wife and sister's tutelary care?
 Reverse, O Jove, thy too severe decree,
 Nor doom to war a race deriv'd from thee;
 On impious realms and barbarous kings impose
 Thy plagues, and curse them with such sons as those.

Thus, in reproach and prayer, the queen express'd
 The rage and grief contending in her breast;
 Unmov'd remain'd the ruler of the sky,
 And from his throne return'd this stern reply:

'Twas thus I deem'd thy haughty soul would bear }
 The dire, though just, revenge which I prepare }
 Against a nation thy peculiar care :
 No less Dione might for Thebes contend,
 Nor Bacchus less his native town defend ;
 Yet these in silence see the fates fulfil
 Their work, and reverence our superior will.
 For, by the black infernal Styx I swear,
 (That dreadful oath which binds the thunderer),
 'Tis fix'd ; th' irrevocable doom of Jove ;
 No force can bend me, no persuasion move.
 Haste then, Cyllenius, through the liquid air ;
 Go mount the winds, and to the shades repair ;
 Bid hell's black monarch my commands obey,
 And give up Laius to the realms of day,
 Whose ghost, yet shivering on Cocytus' sand,
 Expects its passage to the farther strand :
 Let the pale fire revisit Thebes, and bear
 These pleasing orders to the tyrant's ear ;
 That, from his exil'd brother, swell'd with pride
 Of foreign forces, and his Argive bride,
 Almighty Jove commands him to detain
 The promis'd empire, and alternate reign :
 Be this the cause of more than mortal hate :
 The rest, succeeding times shall ripen into fate.

The god obeys, and to his feet applies
 Those golden wings that cut the yielding skies.
 His ample hat his beamy locks o'erspread,
 And veil'd the starry glories of his head.
 He seiz'd the wand that causes sleep to fly,
 Or in soft slumbers seals the wakeful eye ;
 That drives the dead to dark Tartarian coasts,
 Or back to life compels the wandering ghosts.
 Thus, through the parting clouds, the son of May Wings on the whistling winds his rapid way ;
 Now smoothly steers through air his equal flight,
 Now springs aloft, and towers th' ethereal height ;
 Then wheeling down the steep of heaven he flies,
 And draws a radiant circle o'er the skies.

Meantime the banish'd Polynices roves
 (His Thebes abandon'd) through th' Aonian groves, [light,
 While future realms his wandering thoughts de-
 His daily vision, and his dream by night ;
 Forbidden Thebes appears before his eye,
 From whence he sees his absent brother fly,
 With transport views the airy rule his own,
 And swells on an imaginary throne.
 Fain would he cast a tedious age away,
 And live out all in one triumphant day.
 He chides the lazy progress of the sun,
 And bids the year with swifter motion run.
 With anxious hopes his craving mind is tost,
 And all his joys in length of wishes lost.

The hero then resolves his course to bend }
 Where ancient Danaus' fruitful fields extend, }
 And fam'd Mycene's lofty towers ascend,
 (Where late the sun did Atreus' crimes detest,
 And disappear'd in horror of the feast.)
 And now, by chance, by fate, or furies led,
 From Bacchus' consecrated caves he fled,
 Where the shrill cries of frantic matrons sound.
 And Pentheus' blood enrich'd the rising ground.
 Then sees Cithæron towering o'er the plain,
 And thence declining gently to the main.

Next to the bounds of Nisus' realm repairs,
 Where treacherous Scylla cut the purple hairs !
 The hanging cliffs of Scyron's rock explores,
 And hears the murmurs of the different shores :
 Passes the straight that parts the foaming seas,
 And stately Corinth's pleasing site surveys.

'Twas now the time when Phœbus yields to night,
 And rising Cynthia sheds her silver light,
 Wide o'er the world in solemn pomp she drew
 Her airy chariot hung with pearly dew ;
 All birds and beasts lie hush'd : sleep steals away
 The wild desires of men, and toils of day,
 And brings, descending through the silent air,
 A sweet forgetfulness of human care.
 Yet no red clouds, with golden borders gay,
 Promise the skies the bright return of day ;
 No faint reflections of the distant light
 Streak with long gleams the scattering shades of night ;

From the damp earth impervious vapours rise,
 Increase the darkness, and involve the skies.
 At once the roaring skies with rushing sound
 Burst from th' Æolian caves, and rend the ground.
 With equal rage their airy quarrel try,
 And win by turns the kingdom of the sky ;
 But with a thicker night black Auster shrouds
 The heavens, and drives on heaps the rolling clouds,
 From whose dark womb a rattling tempest pours,
 Which the cold north congeals to haily showers.
 From pole to pole the thunder roars aloud,
 And broken lightnings flash from every cloud.
 Now smokes with showers the misty mountain
 ground,

And floated fields lie undistinguish'd round.
 Th' Inachian streams with headlong fury run,
 And Erisinus rolls a deluge on :
 The foaming Lerna swells above its bounds,
 And spreads its ancient poisons o'er the grounds :
 Where late was dust, now rapid torrents play,
 Rush through the mounds, and bear the dams a-
 way :

Old limbs of trees from crackling forests torn,
 Are whirl'd in air, and on the winds are borne :
 The storm the dark Lycæan groves display'd,
 And first to light expos'd the sacred shade.
 Th' intrepid Theban bears the bursting sky,
 Sees yawning rocks in massy fragments fly,
 And views astonish'd from the hills afar,
 The floods descending, and the watery war,
 That, driven by storms, and pouring o'er the plain,
 Swept, herds and hinds, and houses to the main.
 Through the brown horrors of the night he fled,
 Nor knows, amaz'd, what doubtful path to tread ;
 His brother's image to his mind appears,
 Inflames his heart with rage, and wings his feet,
 with fears.

So fares a sailor on the stormy main,
 When clouds conceal Boöte's golden wain,
 When not a star its friendly lustre keeps,
 Not trembling Cynthia glimmers on the deeps ;
 He dreads the rocks, and shoals, and seas and skies,
 While thunder roars, and lightning round him
 flies.

Thus strove the chief, on every side distress'd,
 Thus still his courage with his toils increas'd ;

With his broad shield oppos'd, he forc'd his way Through thickest woods, and rous'd the beasts of prey.

Till he beheld, where from Lerissa's height
The shelving walls reflect a glancing light :
Thither with haste the Theban hero flies ;
On this side Lerna's poisonous water lies,
On that Profymna's grove and temple rise :
He pass'd the gates which then unguarded lay,
And to the regal palace bent his way ;
On the cold marble, spent with toil, he lies,
And waits till pleasing slumber seal his eyes.

Adrastus here his happy people sways,
Blest with calm peace in his declining days.
By both his parents of descent divine,
Great Jove and Phœbus grac'd his noble line :
Heaven had not crown'd his wishes with a son,
But two fair daughters heir'd his state and throne.
To him Apollo (wondrous to relate !
But who can pierce into the depths of fate ?)
Had sung—" Expect thy sons on Argos' shore,
" A yellow lion, and a bristly boar."

This long resolv'd in his paternal breast,
Sate heavy on his heart, and broke his rest ;
This, great Amphiaras, lay hid from thee,
Though skill'd in fate, and dark futurity.
The father's care and prophet's art were vain,
For thus did the predicting god ordain.

Lo hapless Tydeus, whose ill fated hand
Had slain his brother, leaves his native land,
And seiz'd with horror in the shades of night,
Through the thick deserts headlong urg'd his flight:
Now by the fury of the tempest driven,
He seeks a shelter from th' inclement heaven,
Till, led by Fate, the Theban's steps he treads,
And to fair Argos' open court succeeds.

When thus the chiefs from different lands resort
To Adrastus' realms, and hospitable court ;
The king surveys his guests with curious eyes,
And views their arms and habit with surprise.
A lion's yellow skin the Theban wears,
Horrid his mane, and rough with curling hairs ;
Such one employ'd Alcides' youthful toils,
Ere yet adorn'd with Nemea's dreadful spoils.
A boar's stiff hide, of Calydonian breed,
Oenides' manly shoulders overspread :
Oblique his tusks, erect his bristles stood ;
Alive, the pride and terror of the wood.

Struck with the sight, and fix'd in deep amaze,
The king th' accomplish'd oracle surveys,
Reveres Apollo's vocal caves, and owns
The guided godhead, and his future sons.
O'er all his bosom secret transports reign,
And a glad horror shoots through every vein.
To heaven he lifts his hands, erect his sight,
And thus invokes the silent queen of night :

Goddeſs of ſhades, beneath whoſe gloomy reign,
Yon' ſpangled arch glows with the ſtarry train ;
You who the cares of heaven and earth allay,
Till nature quicken'd by th' inſpiring ray,
Wakes to new vigour with the riſing day ;
O thou who freeſt me from my doubtful ſtate,
Long loſt and wilder'd in the maze of fate !
Be preſent ſtill, oh goddeſs ! in our aid ;
Proceed, and firm thoſe omens thou haſt made.

We to thy name our annual rites will pay,
And on thy altars ſacrifices lay.

The ſable flock ſhall fall beneath the ſtroke,
And fill thy temples with a grateful ſmoke.
Hail, faithful Tripos ! hail, ye dark abodes
Of awful Phœbus : I confeſs the gods !

Thus, ſeiz'd with ſacred fear, the monarch
pray'd ;

Then to his inner court the gueſts convey'd :
Where yet thin fumes from dying ſparks ariſe,
And duſt yet white upon each altar lies,
The relics of a former ſacrifice.

The king once more the ſolemn rites requires,
And bids renew the feaſts, and wake the fires.
His train obey, while all the courts around
With noiſy care and various tumult ſound.
Embroider'd purple clothes the golden beds ;
This ſlave the floor, and that the table ſpreads ;
A third diſpels the darkneſs of the night,
And fills depending lamps with beams of light ;
Here loaves in caniſters are pil'd on high,
And there in flames the ſlaughter'd victims fly.
Sublime in regal ſtate Adraſtus ſhone,
Stretch'd on rich carpets on his ivory throne ;
A lofty couch receives each princely gueſt ;
Around at awful diſtance wait the reſt.

And now the king, his royal feaſt to grace,
Aceſtis calls, the guardian of his race,
Who firſt their youth in arts of virtue train'd,
And their ripe years in modeſt grace maintain'd ;
Then ſoftly whiſper'd in her faithful ear,
And bade his daughters at the rites appear.
When, from the cloſe apartments of the night,
The royal nymphs approach divinely bright ;
Such was Diana's, ſuch Minerva's face :
Nor ſhine their beauties with ſuperior grace,
But that in theſe a milder charm endears,
And leſs of terror in their looks appears.
As on the heroes firſt they caſt their eyes,
O'er their fair cheeks the glowing bluſhes riſe,
Their downcaſt looks a decent ſhame confeſs'd,
Then on their father's reverend features reſt.

The banquet done, the monarch gives the ſign
To fill the goblet high with ſparkling wine,
Which Danaus us'd in ſacred rites of old,
With ſculpture grac'd, and rough with riſing gold.
Here to the clouds victorious Perſeus flies,
Meduſa ſeems to move her languid eyes,
And, ev'n in gold, turns paler as ſhe dies.
There from the chace Jove's towering eagle bears,
On golden wings, the Phrygian to the ſtars :
Still as he riſes in th' ethereal height,
His native mountains leſſen to his ſight ;
While all his ſad companions upward gaze,
Fix'd on the glorious ſcene in wild amaze ;
And the ſwift bounds, affrighted as he flies,
Run to the ſhade, and bark againſt the ſkies.

This golden bowl with generous juice was
crown'd,

The firſt libation ſprinkled on the ground :
By turns on each celeftial power they call ;
With Phœbus' name reſounds the vaulted hall.
The courtly train, the ſtrangers, and the reſt,
Crown'd with chaſte laurel, and with garlands
drec'd,

While with rich gums the fuming altars blaze,
Salute the god in numerous hymns of praise.

Then thus the king: Perhaps, my noble guests,
These honour'd altars, and these annual feasts
To bright Apollo's awful name design'd,
Unknown, with wonder may perplex your mind.
Great was the cause; our old solemnities
From no blind zeal or fond tradition rise;
But, sav'd from death, our Argives yearly pay
These grateful honours to the God of day.

When by a thousand darts the Python slain
With orbs unroll'd lay covering all the plain, (Transfix'd as o'er Castalia's streams he hung,
And suck'd new poisons with his triple tongue)
To Argos' realms the victor god resorts,
And enters old Crotopus' humble courts.
This rural prince one only daughter blest'd,
That all the charms of blooming youth possess'd;
Fair was her face, and spotless was her mind,
Where filial love with virgin sweetness join'd.
Happy! and happy still she might have prov'd,
Were she less beautiful, or less belov'd!
But Phœbus lov'd, and on the flowery side
Of Nemea's stream the yielding fair enjoy'd:
Now, e'er ten moons their orb with light adorn,
Th' illustrious offspring of the God was born;
The nymph, her father's anger to evade,
Retires from Argos to the sylvan shade;
To woods and wilds the pleasing burden bears,
And trusts her infant to a shepherd's cares.

How mean a fate, unhappy child, is thine!
Ah, how unworthy those of race divine!
On flowery herbs in some green covert laid,
His bed the ground, his canopy the shade,
He mixes with the bleating lambs his cries,
While the rude swain his rural music tries,
To call soft slumber on his infant eyes.
Yet even in those obscure abodes to live,
Was more, alas! than cruel fate would give;
For on the grassy verdure as he lay,
And breath'd the freshness of the early day,
Devouring dogs the helpless infant tore,
Fed on his trembling limbs, and lapp'd the gore.
Th' astonish'd mother, when the rumour came,
Forgets her father, and neglects her fame,
With loud complaints she fills the yielding air,
And beats her breasts, and rends her flowing hair;
Then wild with anguish to her fire she flies,
Demands the sentence, and contented dies.

But, touch'd with sorrow for the dead too late,
The raging god prepares t' avenge her fate.
He sends a monster, horrible and fell,
Begot by furies in the depths of hell.
The pest a virgin's face and bosom bears;
High on a crown a rising snake appears,
Guards her black front, and hisses in her hairs:
About the realm she walks her dreadful round,
When night with sable wings o'erspreads the
ground,
Devours young babes before their parents eyes,
And feeds and thrives on public miseries.

But generous rage the bold Chorcæbus warms,
Chorcæbus, fam'd for virtue, as for arms;
Some few like him, inspir'd with martial flame,
Thought a short life well lost for endless fame.

These, where two ways in equal parts divide,
The direful monster from afar descri'd;
Two bleeding babes depending at her side,
Whose panting vitals, warm with life, she draws,
And in their hearts embrues her cruel claws.
The youths surround her with extended spears;
But brave Chorcæbus in the front appears,
Deep in her breast he plung'd his shining sword,
And hell's dire monster back to hell restor'd.
Th' Inachians view the slain with vast surprise,
Her twisting volumes, and her rolling eyes,
Her spotted breast, and gaping womb embru'd
With livid poison, and our children's blood.
The crowd in stupid wonder fix'd appear,
Pale ev'n in joy, nor yet forget to fear.
Some with vast beams the squalid corpse engage,

And weary all the wild efforts of rage,
The birds obscene, that nightly flock'd to taste,
With hollow screeches fled the dire repast;
And ravenous dogs, allur'd by scented blood,
And starving wolves ran howling to the wood.

But, fir'd with rage, from cleft Parnassus' brow
Avenging Phœbus bent his deadly bow,
And hissing flew the feather'd fates below:
A night of sultry clouds involv'd around
The towers, the fields, and the devoted ground:
And now a thousand lives together fled,
Death with his scythe cut off the fatal thread,
And a whole province in his triumph led.

But Phœbus, ask'd why noxious fires appear,
And raging Sirius blasts the sickly year;
Demands their lives by whom his monster fell,
And dooms a dreadful sacrifice to hell.

Blest be thy dust, and let eternal fame
Attend thy manes, and preserve thy name,
Undaunted hero! who, divinely brave,
In such a cause disdain'd thy life to save:
But view'd the shrine with a superior look,
And its upbraided godhead thus bespoke:

With piety, the soul's securest guard,
And conscious virtue, still its own reward,
Willing I come, unknowing how to fear;
Nor shalt thou, Phœbus, find a suppliant here.
Thy monster's death to me was ow'd alone,
And 'tis a deed too glorious to disown.

Behold him here, for whom, so many days,
Impervious clouds conceal'd thy fullen rays;
For whom, as man no longer claim'd thy care,
Such numbers fell by pestilential air!
But if th' abandon'd race of human kind
From gods above no more compassion find;
If such inclemency in heaven can dwell,
Yet why must unoffending Argos feel
The vengeance due to this unlucky steel?

On me, on me, let all thy fury fall,
Nor err from me, since I deserve it all:
Unless our desert cities please thy fight,
Or funeral flames reflect a grateful light,
Discharge thy shafts, this ready bosom rend,
And to the shades a ghost triumphant send;
But for my country let my fate atone,
Be mine the vengeance, as the crime my own.

Merit distress'd, impartial heaven relieves;
Unwelcome life relenting Phœbus gives;

For not the vengeful power, that glow'd with rage,
With such amazing virtue durst engage.
'The clouds dispers'd, Apollo's wrath expir'd,
And from the wondering god th' unwilling youth retir'd.

Thence we these altars in his temple raise,
And offer annual honours, feasts, and praise;
Those solemn feasts propitious Phœbus please:
These honours, still renew'd, his ancient wrath appease.

But say, illustrious guest! (adjoin'd the king)
What name you bear, from what high race you
spring?

The noble Tydeus stands confess'd and known
Our neighbour prince, and heir of Calydon.
Relate your fortunes, while the friendly night
And silent hours to various talk invite.

The Theban bends on earth his gloomy eyes;
Confus'd and sadly thus at length replies:
Before these altars how shall I proclaim
(Oh generous prince!) my nation or my name,
Or through what veins our ancient blood has roll'd?
Let the sad tale for ever rest untold!

Yet if, propitious to a wretch unknown,
You seek to share in sorrows not your own;
Know then, from Cadmus I derive my race,
Jocasta's son, and Thebes my native place.
To whom the king (who felt his generous breast Touch'd with concern for his unhappy guest)
Replies:—Ah why forbears the son to name
His wretched father, known too well by fame?
Fame, that delights around the world to stray,
Scorns not to take our Argos in her way.
Ev'n those who dwell where furs at distance roll,
In northern wilds, and freeze beneath the pole;
And those who tread the burning Libyan lands;
The faithless Syrtes, and the moving sands;
Who view the western sea's extremest bounds,
Or drink of Ganges in their eastern grounds;
All these the woes of Œdipus have known,
Your fates, your furies, and your haunted town.
If on the sons the parents' crimes descend,
What prince from those his lineage can defend?
Be this thy comfort, that 'tis thine t' efface
With virtuous acts thy ancestor's disgrace,
And be thyself the honour of thy race.
But see! the stars begin to steal away,
And shine more faintly at approaching day.
Now pour the wine; and in your tuneful lays
Once more resound the great Apollo's praise.

Oh father Phœbus! whether Lycia's coast
And snowy mountains thy bright presence boast;
Whether to sweet Castalia thou repair,
And bathe in silver dews thy yellow hair;
Or, pleas'd to find fair Delos float no more,
Delight in Cynthus, and the shady shore;
Or choose thy seat in Ilion's proud abodes,
The shining structures rais'd by labouring gods;
By thee the bow and mortal shafts are borne;
Eternal charms thy blooming youth adorn:
Skill'd in the laws of secret fate above,
And the dark counsels of almighty Jove,
'Tis thine the seeds of future war to know,
The change of sceptres, and impending wo;
Vol. VIII.

When direful meteors spread through glowing air
Long trails of light, and shake their blazing hair,
Thy rage the Phrygian felt, who durst aspire
T' excel the music of thy heavenly lyre;
Thy shafts aveng'd lewd Tityus' guilty flame,
Th' immortal victim of thy mother's fame;
Thy hand slew Python, and the dame who lost
Her numerous offspring for a fatal boast.
In Phlegya's doom thy just revenge appears,
Condemn'd to furies and eternal fears;
He views his food, but dreads, with lifted eye,
The mouldering rock that trembles from on high.

Propitious hear our prayer, O power divine!
And on thy hospitable Argos shine,
Whether the style of Titan please thee more,
Whose purple rays th' Achæmenes adore;
Or great Osiris, who first taught the swain
In Pharian fields, to sow the golden grain;
Or Mitra, to whose beams the Persian bows,
And pays, in hollow rocks, his awful vows;
Mitra, whose head the blaze of light adorns,
Who grasps the struggling heifer's lunar horns.

THE FABLE OF DRYOPE.

From Ovid's Metamorphoses, Book IX.

She said, and for her lost Galanthis sighs,
When the fair consort of her son replies:
Since you a servant's ravish'd form bemoan,
And kindly sigh for sorrows not your own;
Let me (if tears and grief permit) relate
A nearer woe, a sister's stranger fate.
No nymph of all Oechalia could compare
For beauteous form with Dryope the fair,
Her tender mother's only hope and pride
(Myself the offspring of a second bride.)
This nymph compress'd by him who rules the day,
Whom Delphi and the Delian isle obey,
Andræmon lov'd; and bless'd in all those charms
That pleas'd a god, succeeded to her arms.

A lake there was, with shelving banks around,
Whose verdant summit fragrant myrtles crown'd.
These shades, unknowing of the fates, she sought,
And to the Naiads flowery garlands brought;
Her smiling babe (a pleasing charge) she prest
Within her arms, and nourish'd at her breast.
Not distant far, a watery Lotos grows;
The spring was new, and all the verdant boughs
Adorn'd with blossoms, promis'd fruits that vie
In glowing colours with the Tyrian dye:
Of these she cropp'd to please her infant son;
And I myself the same rash act had done,
But lo! I saw (as near her side I stood)
The violated blossoms drop with blood.
Upon the tree I cast a frightful look;
The trembling tree with sudden horror shook.
Lotis the nymph (if rural tales be true),
As from Priapus' lawless lust she flew,
Forsook her form; and fixing here became
A flowery plant, which still preserves her name.

This change unknown, astonish'd at the sight,
 My trembling sister strove to urge her flight,
 And first the pardon of the nymphs implor'd,
 And those offended sylvan powers ador'd :
 But when she backward would have fled, she found
 Her stiffening feet were rooted in the ground :
 In vain to free her fasten'd feet she strove,
 And, as she struggles, only moves above ;
 She feels th' encroaching bark around her grow
 By quick degrees, and cover all below :
 Surpris'd at this, her trembling hand she heaves
 To rend her hair ; her hand is fill'd with leaves :
 Where late was hair, the shooting leaves are seen
 To rise, and shade her with a sudden green.
 The child Amphissus, to her bosom press'd,
 Perceiv'd a colder and a harder breast,
 And found the springs, that ne'er till then deny'd
 Their milky moisture, on a sudden dry'd.
 I saw, unhappy ! what I now relate.
 And stood the helpless witness of thy fate,
 Embrac'd thy boughs, thy rising bark delay'd,
 There wish'd to grow, and mingle shade with shade.

Behold Andraemon and th' unhappy fire
 Appear, and for their Dryope inquire ;
 A springing tree for Dryope they find,
 And print warm kisses on the panting rind ;
 Prostrate, with tears their kindred plant bedew,
 And close embrace as to the roots they grew.
 The face was all that now remain'd of thee,
 No more a woman, nor yet quite a tree ;
 Thy branches hung with humid pearls appear,
 From every leaf distils a trickling tear,
 And strait a voice, while yet a voice remains,
 Thus through the trembling boughs in sighs com-
 plains :

If to the wretched any faith be given,
 I swear by all th' unpitying powers of heaven,
 No wilful crime this heavy vengeance bred ;
 In mutual innocence our lives we led :
 If this be false, let these new greens decay,
 Let sounding axes lop my limbs away,
 And crackling flames on all my honours prey !
 But from my branching arms this infant bear,
 Let some kind nurse supply a mother's care :
 And to his mother let him oft be led,
 Sport in her shades, and in her shades be fed ;
 Teach him, when first his infant voice shall frame
 Imperfect words, and lisp his mother's name,
 To hail this tree ; and say, with weeping eyes,
 Within this plant my hapless parent lies :
 And when in youth he seeks the shady woods,
 Oh, let him fly the crystal lakes and floods,
 Nor touch the fatal flowers ; but, warn'd by me,
 Believe a goddess shrin'd in every tree.
 My fire, my sister, and my spouse, farewell !
 If in your breasts or love or pity dwell,
 Protect your plant, nor let my branches feel
 The browsing cattle, or the piercing steel.
 Farewell ! and since I cannot bend to join
 My lips to yours, advance at least to mine.
 My son, thy mother's parting kiss receive,
 While yet thy mother has a kiss to give.
 I can no more ; the creeping rind invades
 My closing lips, and hides my head in shades :

Remove your hands ; the bark shall soon suffice
 Without their aid to seal these dying eyes.

She ceas'd at once to speak, and ceas'd to be ;
 And all the nymph was lost within the tree ;
 Yet latent life through her new branches reign'd,
 And long the plant a human heat retain'd.

VERTUMNUS AND POMONA.

From Ovid's Metamorphoses, Book IV.

THE fair Pomona flourish'd in his reign ;
 Of all the virgins of the sylvan train,
 None taught the trees a noble race to bear,
 Or more improv'd the vegetable care.
 To her the shady grove, the flowery field,
 The streams and fountains, no delights could yield ;
 'Twas all her joy the ripening fruits to tend,
 And see the boughs with happy burthens bend.
 The hook she bore instead of Cynthia's spear,
 To lop the growth of the luxuriant year,
 To decent form the lawless shoots to bring,
 And teach th' obedient branches where to spring.
 Now the cleft rind inserted grafts receives,
 And yields an offspring more than nature gives ;
 Now sliding streams the thirsty plants renew,
 And feed their fibres with reviving dew.

These cares alone her virgin breast employ,
 Averse from Venus and the nuptial joy.
 Her private orchards, wall'd on every side,
 To lawless sylvans all access deny'd.
 How oft the Satyrs and the wanton Fawns,
 Who haunt the forests, or frequent the lawns,
 The god whose ensign scares the birds of prey,
 And old Silenus, youthful in decay,
 Employ'd their wiles and unavailing care,
 To pass the fences, and surprise the fair !
 Like these, Vertumnus own'd his faithful flame,
 Like these, rejected by the scornful dame.
 To gain her sight a thousand forms he wears :
 And first a reaper from the field appears,
 Sweating he walks, while loads of golden grain
 O'ercharge the shoulders of the seeming swain.
 Oft o'er his back a crooked scythe is laid,
 And wreaths of hay his sun-burnt temples shade :
 Oft in his harden'd hand a goad he bears,
 Like one who late unyok'd the sweating steers,
 Sometimes his pruning-hook corrects the vines,
 And the loose stragglers to their ranks confines.
 Now gathering what the bounteous years allows,
 He pulls ripe apples from the bending boughs.
 A soldier now, he with his sword appears ;
 A fisher next, his trembling angle bears.
 Each shape he varies, and each art he tries,
 On her bright charms to feast his longing eyes.

A female form at last Vertumnus wears,
 With all the marks of reverend age appears,
 His temples thinly spread with silver hairs ;
 Propp'd on his staff, and stooping as he goes ;
 A painted mitre shades his furrow'd brows.
 The god in this decrepit form array'd
 The gardens enter'd, and the fruit survey'd,
 And " Happy you ! " (he this address'd the maid)

" Whose charms as far all other nymphs out-
shine,

" As other gardens are excell'd by thine !"

Then kiss'd the fair : (his kisses warmer grow
Than such as women on their sex bestow ;)
Then plac'd beside her on the flowery ground,
Beheld the trees with autumn's bounty crown'd.
An elm was near, to whose embraces led,
The curling vine her swelling clusters spread ;
He view'd her twining branches with delight,
And prais'd the beauty of the pleasing sight.

Yet his tall elm, but for his vine (he said)
Had stood neglected, and a barren shade ;
And this fair vine, but that her arms surround
Her marry'd elm, had crept along the ground.
Ah,auteous maid ! let this example move
Your mind, averse from all the joys of love.
Deign to be lov'd, and every heart subdue !
What nymph could e'er attract such crowds as you ?

Not she whose beauty urg'd the Centaur's arms,
Ulysses' queen, nor Helen's fatal charms.
Ev'n now, when silent scorn is all they gain,
A thousand court you, though they court in
vain,

A thousand sylvan demigods and gods,
That haunt our mountains, and our Alban woods.
But if you'll prosper, mark what I advise,
Whom age and long experience render wise,
And one whose tender care is far above
All that these lovers ever felt of love.

(Far more than e'er can by yourself be guess'd)
Fix on Vertumnus, and reject the rest.

For his firm faith I dare engage my own ;
Scarce to himself, himself is better known.
To distant lands Vertumnus never roves ;
Like you, contented with his native groves ;

Nor at first sight, like most, admires the fair ;
For you he lives ; and you alone shall share
His last affection, as his early care.

Besides, he's lovely far above the rest,
With youth immortal, and with beauty blest.
Add, that he varies every shape with ease,
And tries all forms that may Pomona please.
But what should most excite a mutual flame,
Your rural cares and pleasures are the same.
To him your orchard's early fruit are due,
(A pleasant offering when 'tis made by you)
He values these ; but yet (alas !) complains,
That still the best and dearest gift remains.

Not the fair fruit that on yon branches glows
With that ripe red th' autumnal sun bestows ;
Nor tasteful herbs that in these gardens rise,
Which the kind soil with milky sap supplies ;
You, only you, can move the god's desire :
Oh, crown so constant and so pure a fire !
Let soft compassion touch your gentle mind ;
Think, 'tis Vertumnus begs you to be kind :
So may no frost, when early buds appear,
Destroy the promise of the youthful year ;
Nor winds, when first your florid orchard blows,
Shake the light blossoms from their blasted boughs.

This when the various god had urg'd in vain,
He strait assum'd his native form again,
Such, and so bright an aspect now he bears,
As when through clouds th' emerging sun appears,
And thence exerting his refulgent ray,
Dispels the darkness and reveals the day.
Force he prepar'd, but check'd the rash design ;
For when, appearing in a form divine,
The nymph surveys him, and beholds the grace
Of charming features, and a youthful face !
In her soft breast consenting passions move,
And the warm maid confess'd a mutual love.

IMITATIONS OF ENGLISH POETS.

DONE BY THE AUTHOR IN HIS YOUTH.

I.—CHAUCER.

WOMEN ben full of ragerie,
Yet swinken nat fans secrecie.
Thilke moral shall ye understond,
From Schoole-boy's Tale of fayre Ireland :
Which to the Fennes hath him betake,
To filch the gray ducke fro the lake.
Right then, there passen by the way
His aunt, and eke her daughters tway.
Ducke in his trowfes hath he hent,
Not to be spied of ladies gent.
" But ho ! our nephew, (crieth one)
" Ho ! quoth another, Cozen John ;"
And stoppen, and lough, and callen out,—
This filly clerk full low doth lout :
They asken that, and talken this,
" Lo here is Coz, and here is Mifs."
But, as he glozeth with speeches foote,
The ducke fore tickleth his erse roote :
Fore-piece and buttons all-to-brest,
Forth thrust a white neck, and red crest.
" Te-he, cry'd ladies ; Clerke nought spake :
Mifs star'd ; and gray Ducke cryeth quake.
" O moder, moder, (quoth the daughter
" Be thilke same thing maids longen a'ter ?
" Bette is to pine on coals and chalke,
" Then trust on mon, whose yerde can talke."

THE ALLEY.

I.

IN every town where Thamys rolls his tyde,
A narrow pass there is, with houses low ;
Where ever and anon, the stream is ey'd,
And many a boat, soft sliding to and fro.
There oft are heard the notes of Infant Woe,
The short thick sob, loud scream, and shriller squall :
How can ye, mothers, vex your children so ?
Some play, some eat, some cack against the wall,
And as they crouchen low, for bread and butter call.

II.

And on the broken pavement, here and there,
Doth many a stinking sprat and herring lie ;
A brandy and tobacco shop is near,
And hens, and dogs, and hogs are feeding by ;

And here a sailor's jacket hangs to dry.
At every door are sun-burnt matrons seen,
Mending old nets to catch the scaly fry,
Now singing shrill, and scolding est between ;
Scolds answer foul-mouth'd scolds ; bad neighbourhood I ween.

III.

The snappish cur (the passengers annoy)
Close at my heel with yelping treble flies ;
The whimp'ring girl, and hoarfer-screaming boy,
Join to the yelping treble, shrilling cries ;
The scolding quean to louder notes doth rise,
And her, full pipes those shrilling cries confound ;
To her full pipes the grunting hog replies ;
The grunting hogs alarm the neighbours round,
And curs, girls, boys, and scolds, in the deep bafe are drown'd.

IV.

Hard by a sty, beneath a roof of thatch,
Dwelt Obloquy, who in her early days
Baskets of fish at Billingsgate did watch,
Cod, whiting, oyster, mackrel, sprat, or plaice :
There learn'd she speech from tongues that never cease.
Slander beside her, like a magpie, chatters,
With Envy, (spitting cat) dread foe to peace ;
Like a curs'd cur, Malice, before her clatters,
And, vexing every wight, tears clothes and all to tatters.

V.

Her dugs were mark'd by every collier's hand,
Her mouth was black as bull dog's at the stall :
She scratched, bit, and spar'd ne lace ne band,
And bitch and rogue her answer was to all ;
Nay, e'en the parts of shame by name would call :
Yea, when she passed by or lane or nook,
Would greet the man who turn'd him to the wall,
And by his hand obscene the porter took,
Nor ever did askance like modest virgin look.

VI.

Such place hath Deptford, navy-building town,
Woolwich and Wapping, smelling strong of pitch ;
Such Lambeth, envy of each band and gown ;
And Twickenham such, which fairer scenes enrich,
Grofs, statues, urns, and Jo—n's dog and bitch.
Ne village is without, on either side,
All up the silver Thames, or all adown ;

Ne Richmond's self, from whose tall front are ey'd
Vales, spires, meandering streams, and Windsor's towerly pride.

III.—WALLER.

OF A LADY SINGING TO HER LUTE.

FAIR charmer, cease, nor make your voice's prize
A heart resign'd the conquest of your eyes :
Well might, alas ! that threaten'd vessel fail,
Which winds and lightning both at once assail.
We were too blest with these enchanting lays,
Which must be heavenly when an angel plays :
But killing charms your lover's death contrive,
Left heavenly music should be heard alive.
Orpheus could charm the trees ; but thus a tree,
Taught by your hand, can charm no less than he :
A poet made the silent wood pursue,
This vocal wood had drawn the poet too.

On a FAN of the Author's design, in which was painted the story of CEPHALUS and PROCRIS, with the motto, AURA VENI.

COME, gentle air ! th' Æolian shepherd said,
While Procris panted in the sacred shade ;
Come, gentle air, the fairer Delia cries,
While at her feet her swain expiring lies.
Lo, the glad gales o'er all her beauties stray,
Breathe on her lips, and in her bosom play !
In Delia's hand this toy is fatal found,
Nor could that fabled dart more surely wound ;
Both gifts destructive to the givers prove ;
Alike both lovers fall by those they love.
Yet guiltless too this bright destroyer lives, [gives ;
At random wounds, nor knows the wound she
She views the story with attentive eyes,
And pities Procris, while her lover dies.

IV.—COWLEY.

THE GARDEN.

FAIN would my muse the flowery treasure sing,
And humble glories of the youthful spring :
Where opening roses breathing sweets diffuse,
And soft carnations shower their balmy dews ;
Where lilies smile in virgin robes of white,
The thin undress of superficial light,
And vary'd tulips show so dazzling gay,
Blushing in bright diversities of day.
Each painted flowret in the lake below
Surveys its beauties, whence its beauties grow ;
And pale Narcissus on the bank, in vain
Transform'd, gazes on himself again.
Here aged trees cathedral walks compose,
And mount the hill in venerable rows ;
There the green infants in their beds are laid,
The garden's hope, and its expected shade.
Here orange trees with blooms and pendants shine,
And vernal honours to their autumn join ;

Exceed their promise in their ripen'd store,
Yet in the rising blossom promise more.
There in bright drops the crystal fountains play,
By laurels shielded from the piercing day :
Where Daphne, now a tree, as once a maid,
Still from Apollo vindicates her shade,
Still turns her beauties from th' invading beam,
Nor seeks in vain for succour to the stream ;
The stream at once preserves her virgin leaves,
At once a shelter from her boughs receives,
Where summer's beauty midst of winter stays,
And winter's coolness spite of summer's rays.

WEEPING.

WHILE Celia's tears make sorrow bright,
Proud grief sits swelling in her eyes :
The sun, next those the fairest light,
Thus from the ocean first did rise :
And thus through mists we see the sun,
Which else we durst not gaze upon.

These silver drops, like morning dew,
Foretell the fervour of the day :
So from one cloud soft showers we view,
And blasting lightnings burst away.
The stars that fall from Celia's eye,
Declare our doom is drawing nigh.

The baby in that sunny sphere
So like a phaeton appears,
That Heav'n, the threaten'd world to spare,
Thought fit to drown him in her tears :
Else might th' ambitious nymph aspire
To set, like him, Heaven too on fire.

V.—E. OF ROCHESTER.

ON SILENCE.

SILENCE ! coeval with eternity,
Thou wert, ere nature's self began to be ;
'Twas one vast nothing, all, and all slept fast in thee.
II. [earth,
Thine was the sway, ere heaven was form'd, or
Ere fruitful thought conceiv'd creation's birth,
Or midwife word gave aid, and spoke the infant forth.

III.
Then various elements, against thee join'd,
In one more various animal combin'd, [kind
And fram'd the clamorous race of busy human.

IV. [low,
The tongue mov'd gently first, and speech was
Till wrangling science taught it noise and show,
And wicked wit arose, thy most abusive foe.

V.
But rebel wit deserts thee oft in vain ;
Lost in the maze of words he turns again,
And seeks a surer state, and courts thy gentle reign.

VI.
Afflicted sense thou kindly dost set free,
Oppress'd with argumental tyranny,
And routed reason finds a safe retreat in thee.

VII.

With thee in private modest dulness lies,
And in thy bosom lurks in thought's disguise;
Thou varnisher of fools, and cheat of all the wise!

VIII.

Yet thy indulgence is by both confess'd;
Folly by thee lies sleeping in the breast,
And 'tis in thee at last that wisdom seeks for rest.

IX.

Silence, the knave's repute, the whore's good
The only honour of the wishing dame; [name,
The very want of tongue makes thee a kind of [fancie.

X.

But couldst thou seize some tongues that now
are free,
How church and state should be oblig'd to thee!
At senate, and at bar, how welcome wouldst thou be!

XI.

Yet speech ev'n there; submissively withdraws,
From rights of subjects, and the poor man's cause: [laws.
Then pompous silence reigns, and stills the noisy

Past services of friends, good deeds of foes,
What favourites gain, and what the nation owes,
Fly the forgetful world, and in thy arms repose.

The country wit, religion of the town,
The courtier's learning, policy o' th' gown,
Are best by thee express'd; and shine in thee alone.

XIV.

The parson's cant, the lawyer's sophistry,
Lord's quibble, critic's jest, all end in thee,
All rest in peace at last, and sleep eternally.

VI.—E. OF DORSET.

ARTEMISIA.

THOUGH Artemisia talks, by fits,
Of councils, classics, fathers, wits;
Reads Malbranche, Boyle, and Locke;
Yet in some things methinks she fails,
'Twere well if she would pare her nails,
And wear a cleaner smock.

Haughty and huge as High-Dutch bride,
Such nastiness, and so much pride,
Are oddly join'd by fate:
On her large squab you find her spread,
Like a fat corpse upon a bed,
That lies and stinks in state.

She wears no colours (sign of grace)
On any part except her face;
All white and black beside:
Dauntless her look, her gesture proud,
Her voice theatrically loud,
And masculine her stride.

So have I seen, in black and white
A prating thing, a magpye hight,

Majestically stalk;
A stately, worthless animal,
That plies the tongue, and wags the tail,
All flutter, pride, and talk.

PHRYNE.

PHRYNE had talents for mankind,
Open she was, and unconfin'd,
Like some free port of trade;
Merchants unloaded here their freight,
And agents from each foreign state
Here first their entry made.

Her learning and good-breeding such,
Whether th' Italian or the Dutch,
Spaniards or French came to her,
To all obliging she'd appear:
'Twas Si Signior, 'twas Yaw Mynheer,
'Twas S' il vous plaist, Monsieur.

Obscure by birth, renown'd by crimes,
Still changing names, religion, climes,
At length she turns a bride:
In diamonds, pearls, and rich brocades,
She shines the first of batter'd jades,
And flutters in her pride.

So have I known those insects fair
(Which curious Germans hold so rare)
Still vary shapes and dyes;
Still gain new titles with new forms;
First grubs obscene, then wriggling worms,
Then painted butterflies.

THE HAPPY LIFE OF A COUNTRY PARSON.

PARSON, these things in thy possessing,
Are better than the bishop's blessing.
A wife that makes conserves; a steed
That carries double when there's need:
October store, and best Virginia,
Tythe pig, and mortuary guinea:
Gazettes sent gratis down, and frank'd,
For which thy patron's weekly thank'd;
A large concordance, bound long since;
Sermons to Charles the First, when prince:
A chronicle of ancient standing;
A Chrysostom to smooth thy band in.
The Polyglott—three parts,—my text,
Howbeit,—likewise—now to my next.
Lo here the Septuagint,—and Paul,
To sum the whole—the close of all.
He that has these, may pass his life,
Drink with the 'squire, and kiss his wife;
On Sundays preach, and eat his fill;
And fast on Fridays—if he will;
Toast church and queen, explain the news,
Talk with church wardens about pews;
Pray heartily for some new gift,
And shake his head at Doctor Swift.

ESSAY ON MAN,

IN FOUR EPISTLES.

TO H. ST. JOHN, LORD BOLINGBROKE.

THE DESIGN.

HAVING propos'd to write some pieces on human life and manners, such as (to use my Lord Bacon's expression) "come home to men's business and bosoms," I thought it more satisfactory to begin with considering man in the abstract, his nature, and his state; since, to prove any moral duty, to enforce any moral precept, or to examine the perfection or imperfection of any creature whatsoever, it is necessary first to know what condition and relation it is placed in, and what is the proper end and purpose of its being.

The science of human nature is, like all other sciences, reduced to a few clear points: There are not many certain truths in this world. It is therefore in the anatomy of the mind as in that of the body more good will accrue to mankind by attending to the large, open, and perceptible parts, than by studying too much such finer nerves and vessels, the conformations and uses of which will for ever escape our observation. The disputes are all upon these last; and I will venture to say, they have less sharpened the wits than the hearts of men against each other, and have diminished the practice, more than advanced the theory of morality. If I could flatter myself that this essay has any merit, it is in steering betwixt the extremes of doctrines seemingly opposite, in passing over terms utterly unintelligible, and in forming a temperate, yet not inconsistent, and a short, yet not imperfect, system of ethics.

This I might have done in prose; but I chose verse, and even rhyme, for two reasons. The one will appear obvious; that principles, maxims, or precepts, so written, both strike the reader more strongly at first, and are more easily retained by him afterwards: The other may seem odd, but it is true; I found I could express them more shortly this way than in prose itself; and nothing is more certain, than that much of the force as well as grace of arguments or instructions, depends on their conciseness. I was unable to treat this part of my subject more in detail, without becoming dry and tedious; or, more poetically, without sacrificing perspicuity to ornament, without wandering from the precision, or breaking the chain of reasoning: If any man can unite all these without diminution of any of them, I freely confess he will compass a thing above my capacity.

What is now published, is only to be considered as a general map of man, marking out no more than the greater parts, their extent, their limits, and their connection, but leaving the particular to be more fully delineated in the charts which are to follow. Consequently these epistles in their progress (if I have health and leisure to make any progress), will be less dry, and more susceptible of poetical ornament. I am here only opening the fountains, and clearing the passage. To deduce the rivers, to follow them in their course, and to observe their effects, may be a task more agreeable.

EPISTLE I.

THE ARGUMENT.

Of the Nature and State of Man with respect to the Universe.

Of man in the abstract.—I. That we can judge only with regard to our own system, being ignorant of the relations of systems and things, ver. 17, &c. II. That man is not to be deemed imperfect, but a being suited to his place and rank in the creation, agreeable to the general order of things, and conformable to ends and relations to him unknown, ver. 35, &c. III. That it is partly upon his ignorance of future events, and partly upon the hope of a future state, that all his happiness in the present depends, ver. 77, &c. IV. The pride of aiming at more knowledge, and pretending to more perfection, the cause of man's error and misery. The impiety of putting himself in the place of God, and judging of the fitness or unfitness, perfection or imperfection, justice or injustice, of his dispensations, ver. 109, &c. V. The absurdity of conceiving himself the final cause of the creation, or expecting that perfection in the moral world, which is not in the natural, ver. 131, &c. VI. The unreasonableness of his complaints against providence, while on the one hand he demands the perfection of the angels, and on the other the bodily qualifications of the brutes; though, to possess any of the sensitive faculties in a higher degree, would render him miserable, ver. 173, &c. VII. That throughout the whole visible world, an universal order and gradation in the sensual and mental faculties is observed, which causes a subordination of creature to creature, and of all creatures to man. The gradations of sense, instinct, thought, reflection, reason; that reason alone countervails all the other faculties, ver. 207. VIII. How much farther this order and subordination of living creatures may extend above and below us; were any part of which broken, not that part only, but the whole connected creation must be destroyed, ver. 233. IX. The extravagance, madness, and pride of such a desire, ver. 250. X. The consequence of all the absolute submission due to providence, both as to our present and future state, ver. 281, &c. to the end.

Awake, my St. John! leave all meaner things
To low ambition, and the pride of kings.
Let us (since life can little more supply
Than just to look about us, and to die),
Expatriate free o'er all this scene of man;
A mighty maze! but not without a plan: [shoot;
A wild, where weeds and flowers promiscuous
Or garden, tempting with forbidden fruit.
Together let us beat this ample field,
Try what the open, what the covert yield; 10
The latent tracts, the giddy heights, explore
Of all who blindly creep, or sightless soar;
Eye nature's walks, shoot folly as it flies,
And catch the manners living as they rise:

Laugh where we must, be candid where we can;
But vindicate the ways of God to man.

I. Say first, of God above, or man below,
What can we reason, but from what we know?
Of man, what see we but his station here,
From which to reason, or to which refer? 20
Through worlds unnumber'd, though the God be known,

'Tis ours to trace him only in our own.
He, who through vast immensity can pierce,
See worlds on worlds compose one universe,
Observe how system into system runs,
What other planets circle other suns,
What vary'd being peoples every star,
May tell why heaven has made us as we are.
But of this frame the bearings and the ties,
The strong connections, nice dependencies, 30
Gradations just, has thy pervading soul
Look'd through? or can a part contain the whole?
Is the great chain, that draws all to agree,
And drawn supports, upheld by God, or thee?

II. Presumptuous man! the reason would'st thou find,

Why form'd so weak, so little, and so blind?
First, if thou canst, the harder reason guess,
Why form'd no weaker, blinder, and no less?
Ask of thy mother earth, why oaks are made
Taller or weaker than the weeds they shade? 40

Or ask of yonder argent fields above,
Why Jove's satellites are less than Jove?
Of systems possible, if 'tis confess'd,
That Wisdom Infinite must form the best,
Where all must fall or not coherent be,
And all that rises, rise in due degree;
Then, in the scale of reasoning life, 'tis plain,
There must be, somewhere, such a rank as man:
And all the question (wrangle e'er so long),
Is only this, if God has plac'd him wrong? 50

Respecting man, whatever wrong we call
May, must be right, as relative to all.
In human works, though labour'd on with pain,
A thousand movements scarce one purpose gain:
In God's, one single can its end produce;
Yet serves to second too some other use.
So man, who here seems principle alone,
Perhaps acts second to some sphere unknown,
Touches some wheel, or verges to some goal;
'Tis but a part we see, and not a whole. 60

When the proud steed shall know why man re-
strains

His fiery course, or drives him o'er the plains;
When the dull ox, why now he breaks the clod,
Is now a victim, and now Egypt's god:
Then shall man's pride and dulness comprehend
His actions', passions', being's, use and end;
Why doing, suffering, check'd, impell'd; and why
This hour a slave, the next a deity.

VARIATIONS.

In the former editions, ver. 64.
Now wears a garland an Egyptian god.
After ver. 68, the following lines in the first edition.
If to be perfect in a certain sphere,
What matter, soon or late, or here, or there?

Then say not man's imperfect, heaven in fault;
Say rather, man's as perfect as he ought: 70
His knowledge measur'd to his state and place;
His time a moment, and a point his space.
If to be perfect in a certain sphere,
What matter, soon or late, or here, or there?
The blest to-day is as completely so,
As who began a thousand years ago.

III. Heaven from all creatures hides the book of fate,
All but the page prescrib'd, their present state:
From brutes what men, from men what spirits
know:

Or who could suffer being here below? 80
The lamb thy riot dooms to bleed to-day,
Had he thy reason, would he skip and play?
Pleas'd to the last, he crops the flowery food,
And licks the hand just rais'd to shed his blood.
Oh, blindness to the future! kindly given,
That each may fill the circle mark'd by heaven:
Who sees with equal eye, as God of all,
A hero perish, or a sparrow fall,
Atoms or systems into ruin hurl'd,
And now a bubble burst, and now a world. 90

Hope humbly then; with trembling pinions soar;
Wait the great teacher death; and God adore.
What future bliss, he gives not thee to know,
But gives that hope to be thy blessing now.
Hope springs eternal in the human breast:
Man never is, but always to be blest:
The soul, uneasy, and confin'd from home,
Rests and expatiates in a life to come.

Lo, the poor Indian! whose untutor'd mind
Sees God in clouds, or hears him in the wind; 100
His soul proud science never taught to stray
Far as the solar walk, or milky way;
Yet simple nature to his hope has given,
Behind the cloud-topp'd hill, an humbler heaven;
Some safer world in depth of woods embrac'd,
Some happier island in the watery waste,
Where slaves once more their native land behold,
No fiends torment, no Christians thirst for gold.
To be, contents his natural desire,
He asks no angel's wing, no seraph's fire; 110
But thinks, admitted to that equal sky,
His faithful dog shall bear him company.

IV. Go, wiser thou! and in thy scale of sense,
Weigh thy opinion against providence;

VARIATIONS.

The blest to-day is as completely so,
As who began ten thousand years ago.
After ver. 88, in the MS. —
No great, no little; 'tis as much decreed
That Virgil's gnat should die as Cæsar bleed.
Ver. 93, in the first folio and quarto.
What bliss above he gives not thee to know,
But gives that hope to be thy bliss below.
After ver. 108, in the first edition.
But does he say the Maker is not good,
Till he's exalted to what state he wou'd;
Himself alone high heaven's peculiar care,
Alone made happy when he will, and where?

Call imperfection what thou fancy'st such;
Say, here he gives too little, there too much:
Destroy all creatures for thy sport or gust,
Yet say, if man's unhappy, God's unjust;
If man alone ingross not heaven's high care,
Alone made perfect here, immortal there: 120
Snatch from his hand the balance and the rod,
Re-judge his justice, be the god of God.
In pride, in reasoning pride, our error lies;
All quit their sphere, and rush into the skies.
Pride still is aiming at the blest abodes,
Men would be angels, angels would be gods.
Aspiring to be gods, if angels fell,
Aspiring to be angels, men rebel:
And who but wishes to invert the laws
Of order, sins against th' eternal cause. 130

V. Ask for what end the heavenly bodies shine, Earth for whose use? Pride answers, " 'Tis for
" mine:

" For me kind nature wakes her genial power;
" Suckles each herb, and spreads out every flower;
" Annual for me, the grape, the rose, renew
" The juice nectareous, and the balmy dew;
" For me, the mine a thousand treasures brings;
" For me, health gushes from a thousand springs;
" Seas roll to waft me, suns to light me rise;
" My foot-stool earth, my canopy the skies." 140
But errs not nature from this gracious end,
From burning suns when livid deaths descend,
When earthquakes swallow, or when tempests
sweep

Towns to one grave, whole nations to the deep?
" No ('tis reply'd) the first Almighty cause
" Acts not by partial, but by general laws;
" Th' exceptions few; some change since all be" gan:

" And what created perfect?"—Why then man?
If the great end be human happiness,
Then nature deviates; and can man do less? 150
As much that end a constant course requires
Of showers and sun-shine, as of man's desires;
As much eternal springs and cloudless skies,
As men for ever temperate, calm, and wise.
If plagues or earthquakes break not heaven's design,
Why then a Borgio, or a Catiline? [forms,
Who knows, but he whose hand the lightning
Who heaves old ocean, and who wings the storms;
Pours fierce ambition in a Cæsar's mind,
Or turns young Ammon loose to scourge man-
kind? 160

From pride, from pride, our very reasoning springs
Account for moral as for natural things:
Why charge we heaven in those, in these acquit?
In both, to reason right, is to submit.

Better for us, perhaps, it might appear,
Were there all harmony, all virtue here;
That never air or ocean felt the wind,
That never passion discompos'd the mind.
But all subsists by elemental strife;
And passions are the elements of life. 170
The general order, since the whole began,
Is kept in nature, and is kept in man.

VI. What would this man? Now upward will he soar,
And, little less than angel, would be more;

Now looking downwards, just as griev'd appears
 To want the strength of bulls, the fur of bears.
 Made for his use all creatures if he call,
 Say what their use, had he the powers of all?
 Nature to these, without profusion, kind,
 The proper organs, proper powers assign'd; 180
 Each seeming want compensated of course,
 Here with degrees of swiftness, there of force;
 All in exact proportion to the state;
 Nothing to add, and nothing to abate
 Each beast, each insect, happy in its own:
 Is heaven unkind to man, and man alone?
 Shall he alone, whom rational we call,
 Be pleas'd with nothing, if not blest with all?

The bliss of man (could pride that blessing find),
 Is not to act or think beyond mankind; 190
 No powers of body or of soul to share,
 But what his nature and his state can bear,
 Why has not man a microscopic eye?
 For this plain reason, man is not a fly.
 Say, what the use, were finer optics given,
 T' inspect a mite, not comprehend the heaven?
 Or touch, if tremblingly alive all o'er,
 To smart and agonise at every pore?
 Or quick effluvia darting through the brain,
 Die of a rose in aromatic pain? 200
 If nature thunder'd in his opening ears,
 And stunn'd him with the music of the spheres,
 How would he wish that heaven had left him still
 The whispering zephyr, and the purling rill!
 Who finds not providence all good and wise,
 Alike in what it gives, and what denies?

VII. Far as creation's ample range extends,
 The scale of sensual, mental powers ascends:
 Mark how it mounts to man's imperial race,
 From the green myriads in the peopled grass: 210
 What modes of sight betwixt each wide extreme,
 The mole's dim curtain, and the lynx's beam;
 Of smell, the headlong lioness between,
 And hound sagacious on the tainted green;
 Of hearing, from the life that fills the flood,
 To that which warbles through the vernal wood!
 The spider's touch, how exquisitely fine!
 Feels at each thread, and lives along the line:
 In the nice bee, what sense so subtly true
 From poisonous herbs extracts the healing dew!
 How instinct varies in the grovelling swine, 221
 Compar'd, half-reasoning elephant, with thine!
 'Twixt that, and reason, what a nice barrier!
 For ever separate, yet for ever near!
 Remembrance and reflection how allied;
 What thin partitions sense from thought divide!
 And middle natures, how they long to join,
 Yet never pass th' insuperable line!
 Without this just gradation, could they be Subjected, these to those, or all to thee? 230
 The powers of all subdued by thee alone,
 Is not thy reason all these powers in one?

VIII. See, through this air, this ocean, and this earth,
 All matter quick, and bursting into birth.
 Above, how high, progressive life may go!
 Around, how wide! how deep extend below!

Vast chain of being! which from God began,
 Natures ethereal, human, angel, man,
 Beast, bird, fish, insect, what no eye can see,
 No glass can reach; from infinite to thee, 240
 From thee to nothing.—On superior powers
 Were we to press, inferior might on ours;
 Or in the full creation leave a void,
 Where, one step broken, the great scale's destroy'd:
 From nature's chain whatever link you strike,
 Tenth, or ten thousandth, breaks the chain alike.

And, if each system in gradation roll
 Alike essential to th' amazing whole,
 The least confusion but in one, not all
 That system only, but the whole must fall. 250
 Let earth unbalanc'd from her orbit fly,
 Planets and suns run lawless through the sky;
 Let ruling angels from their spheres be hurl'd,
 Being on being wreck'd, and world on world;
 Heaven's whole foundations to their centre nod,
 And nature trembles to the throne of God.
 All this dread order break—for whom? for thee?
 Vile worm!—ah, madness! pride! impiety!

IX. What if the foot, ordain'd the dust to tread,
 Or hand, to toil, aspir'd to be the head? 260
 What if the head, the eye, or ear, repin'd
 To serve mere engines to the ruling mind?
 Just as absurd for any part to claim
 To be another, in this general frame:
 Just as absurd, to mourn the tasks or pains
 The great directing mind of all ordains.

All are but parts of one stupendous whole,
 Whose body nature is, and God the soul; [same;
 That, chang'd through all, and yet in all the Great in the earth, as in th' ethereal frame; 270
 Warms in the sun, refreshes in the breeze,
 Glows in the stars, and blossoms in the trees;
 Lives through all life, extends through all extent;
 Spreads undivided, operates unspent;
 Breathes in our soul, informs our mortal part,
 As full, as perfect, in a hair as heart;
 As full, as perfect, in vile man that mourns,
 As the rapt seraph that adores and burns:
 To him no high, no low, no great, no small;
 He fills, he bounds, connects, and equals all. 280

X. Cease then, nor order imperfection name:
 Our proper bliss depends on what we blame.
 Know thy own point: This kind, this due degree
 Of blindness, weakness, heaven bestows on thee.
 Submit.—In this, or any other sphere,
 Secure to be as blest as thou canst bear:
 Safe in the hand of one disposing power,
 Or in the natal, or the mortal hour.
 All nature is but art, unknown to thee;
 All chance, direction, which thou canst not see;
 All discord, harmony not understood; 291
 All partial evil, universal good.
 And, spite of pride, in erring reason's spite,
 One truth is clear, whatever is, is right.

EPISTLE II.

Of the Nature and State of Man, with respect to Himself, as an Individual.

THE ARGUMENT.

I. THE business of man not to pry into God, but to study himself. His middle nature: his powers and frailties, ver. 1. to 19. The limits of his capacity, ver. 19. &c. II. The two principles of man, self-love and reason, both necessary, ver. 53. &c. Self-love the stronger, and why, ver. 67. &c. Their end the same, ver. 81. &c. III. The passions, and their use, ver. 93. to 130. The predominant passion, and its force, ver. 132. to 160. Its necessity, in directing men to different purposes, ver. 165. &c. Its providential use, in fixing our principle, and ascertaining our virtue, ver. 177. IV. Virtue and vice joined in our mixed nature; the limits near, yet the things separate and evident: what is the office of reason, ver. 202. to 216. V. How odious vice in itself, and how we deceive ourselves into it, ver. 217. VI. That, however, the ends of providence and general good are answered in our passions and imperfections, ver. 238, &c. How usefully these are distributed to all orders of men, ver. 241. How useful they are to society, ver. 251. And to individuals, ver. 263. In every state, and every age of life, ver. 273. &c.

I. Know then thyself, presume not God to scan,
The proper study of mankind is man.
Plac'd on this isthmus of a middle state,
A being darkly wise, and rudely great:
With too much knowledge for the sceptic side,
With too much weakness for the stoic's pride,
He hangs between; in doubt to act, or rest;
In doubt to deem himself a god, or beast;
In doubt his mind or body to prefer;
Born but to die, and reasoning but to err;
Alike in ignorance, his reason such,
Whether he thinks too little, or too much:
Chaos of thought and passion, all confus'd;
Still by himself abus'd or disabus'd;
Created half to rise, and half to fall;
Great lord of all things, yet a prey to all;
Sole judge of truth, in endless error hurl'd:
The glory, jest, and riddle of the world!

Go, wondrous creature! mount where science guides.

Go, measure earth, weigh air, and state the tides;
Instruct the planets in what orbs to run,
Correct old time, and regulate the sun;
Go, soar with Plato to th' empyreal sphere,
To the first good, first perfect, and first fair;

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 2. Ed. 1st.

The only science of mankind is man.

After ver. 18, in the MS.

For more perfection than this state can bear
In vain we sigh, heaven made us as we are.

Or tread the mazy round his followers trod,
And quitting sense call imitating God;
As eastern priests in giddy circles run,
And turn their heads to imitate the sun.
Go, teach Eternal Wisdom how to rule—
Then drop into thyself, and be a fool!

30

Superior beings, when of late they saw
A mortal man unfold all nature's law,
Admir'd such wisdom in an earthly shape,
And shew'd a Newton as we shew an ape.

Could he, whose rules the rapid comet bind,
Describe or fix one movement of his mind?
Who saw its fires here rise, and there descend,
Explain his own beginning or his end?
Alas, what wonder! Man's superior part
Uncheck'd may rise, and climb from art to art; 40
But when his own great work is but begun,
What reason weaves, by passion is undone.

Trace science then, with modesty thy guide;
First strip off all her equipage of pride;
Deduct what is but vanity or dress,
Or learning's luxury, or idleness;
Or tricks to show the stretch of human brain,
Mere curious pleasure, or ingenious pain;
Expunge the whole, or lop th' excrescent parts
Of all our vices have created arts; 50
Then see how little the remaining sum,
Which serv'd the past, and must the times to come!

II. Two principles in human nature reign;
Self-love to urge, and reason, to restrain;
Nor this a good, nor that a bad we call,
Each works its end, to move or govern all:
And to their proper operation still,
Ascribe all good, to their improper ill.

Self-love, the spring of motion, acts the soul;
Reason's comparing balance rules the whole. 60
Man, but for that, no action could attend,
And, but for this, were active to no end;
Fix'd like a plant on his peculiar spot,
To draw nutrition, propagate, and rot;

VARIATIONS.

As wisely sure a modest ape might aim
To be like man, whose faculties and frame
He sees, he feels, as you or I to be
An angel thing we neither knew nor see.
Observe now near he edges on our race;
What human tricks! how risible of face!
It must be so—why else have I the sense
Of more than monkey charms and excellence?
Why else to walk on two so oft essay'd?
And why this ardent longing for a maid?
So pug might plead, and call his gods unkind
Till set on end, and married to his mind.
Go, reasoning thing! assume the doctor's chair,
As Plato deep, as Seneca severe:
Fix moral fitness, and to God give rule,
Then drop into thyself, &c.

Ver. 21. Edit. 4th and 5th.

Show by what rules the wandering planets stray,
Correct old time, and teach the sun his way.

Ver. 35, Ed. 1st.

Could he, who taught each planet where to roll,
Describe or fix one movement of the soul?
Who mark'd their points, to rise or to descend,
Explain his own beginning, or his end?

Or, meteor-like, flame lawless through the void,
Destroying others, by himself destroy'd.

Most strength the moving principle requires;
Active its task, it prompts, impels, inspires.
Sedate and quiet the comparing lies.
Form'd but to check, deliberate, and advise. 70
Self-love, still stronger, as its objects nigh;
Reason's at distance, and in prospect lie:
That sees immediate good by present sense;
Reason, the future and the consequence.
Thicker than arguments, temptations throng,
At best more watchful this, but that more strong.
The action of the stronger to suspend,
Reason still use, to reason still attend.
Attention, habit, and experience gains;
Each strengthens reason, and self-love restrains. 80
Let subtle schoolmen teach these friends to fight,
More studious to divide than to unite;
And grace and virtue, sense and reason split,
With all the rash dexterity of wit.

Wits, just like fools, at war about a name,
Have full as oft no meaning, or the same.
Self-love and reason to one end aspire,
Pain their aversion, pleasure their desire;
But greedy that, its object would devour,
This taste the honey, and not wound the flower:
Pleasure, or wrong or rightly understood,
Our greatest evil, or our greatest good. [call;

III. Modes of self-love the passions we may
'Tis real good, or seeming, moves them all:
But since not every good we can divide,
And reason bids us for our own provide;
Passions, though selfish, if their means be fair,
List under reason, and deserve her care;
Those, that imparted, court a nobler aim,
Exalt their kind, and take some virtue's name. 100

In lazy apathy let stoics boast
Their virtue fix'd; 'tis fix'd as in a frost;
Contracted all, retiring to the breast;
But strength of mind is exercise, not rest:
The rising tempest puts in act the soul;
Parts it may ravage, but preserves the whole.
On life's vast ocean diversely we sail,
Reason the card, but passion is the gale;
Nor God alone in the still calm we find,
He mounts the storm and walks upon the wind. 110

Passions, like elements, though born to fight.
Yet, mix'd and soften'd, in his work unite:
These, 'tis enough to temper and employ;
But what composes man, can man destroy?
Suffice that reason keep to nature's road,
Subject, compound them, follow her and God.
Love, hope, and joy, fair pleasure's smiling train;
Hate, fear, and grief, the family of pain;

VARIATIONS.

Of good and evil reason puzzled schools,
Deceiv'd, deceiving, taught—

After. ver. 108, in the MS.

A tedious voyage! where how useless lies
The compass, if no powerful gusts arise!

After ver. 112, in the MS.

The soft reward the virtuous, or invite:
The fierce, the vicious punish or affright.

These mix'd with art, and to due bounds confin'd,
Make and maintain the balance of the mind; 120
The lights and shades, whose well-accorded strife
Gives all the strength and colour of our life.

Pleasures are ever in our hands and eyes;
And, when in act they cease, in prospect rise:
Present to grasp, and future still to find,
The whole employ of body and of mind.
All spread their charms, but charm not all alike;
On different senses, different objects strike;
Hence different passions more or less inflame,
As strong or weak, the organs of the frame; 130
And hence one master passion in the breast,
Like Aaron's serpent, swallows up the rest.

As man, perhaps, the moment of his breath,
Receives the lurking principle of death;
The young disease, which must subdue at length,
Grows with his growth, and strengthens with his strength:

So, cast and mingled with his very frame,
The mind's disease, its ruling passion came;
Each vital humour, which should feed the whole,
Soon flows to this, in body and in soul:
Whatever warms the heart, or fills the head,
As the mind opens, and its functions spread,
Imagination plies her dangerous art,
And pours it all upon the peccant part.

Nature its mother, habit is its nurse;
Wit, spirit, faculties, but make it worse;
Reason itself but gives it edge and power;
As heaven's blest beam turns vinegar more four.

We, wretched subjects though to lawful sway,
In this weak queen, some favourite still obey: 150
Ah! if she lend not arms, as well as rules,
What can she more than tell us we are fools?
Teach us to mourn our nature, not to mend;
A sharp accuser, but a helpless friend!
Or from a judge turn pleader, to persuade
The choice we make, or justify it made;
Proud of an easy conquest all along,
She but removes weak passions for the strong:
So, when small humours gather to a gout,
The doctor fancies he has driv'n them out. 160

Yes, nature's road must ever be prefer'd;
Reason is here no guide, but still a guard:
'Tis hers to rectify, not overthrow,
And treat this passion more as friend than foe;
A mightier power the strong direction sends,
And several men impels to several ends:
Like varying winds, by other passions tost,
This drives them constant to a certain coast.
Let power or knowledge, gold or glory, please,
Or (oft more strong than all) the love of ease; 170
Through life 'tis follow'd, ev'n at life's expence;
The merchant's toil, the sage's indolence,
The monk's humility, the hero's pride,
All, all alike, find reason on their side.

Th' eternal art, educating good from ill,
Grafts on this passion our best principle:
'Tis thus the mercury of man is fix'd,
Strong grows the virtue with his nature mix'd;
The dross cements what else were too refin'd,
And in one interest body acts with mind. 180

As fruits, ungrateful to the planter's care,
On savage flocks inserted learn to bear;

The surest virtues thus from passions shoot,
Wild nature's vigour working at the root.
What crops of wit and honesty appear
From spleen, from obstinacy, hate, or fear!
See anger, zeal and fortitude supply;
Ev'n avarice, prudence; sloth, philosophy;
Lust, through some certain strainers well refin'd,
Is gentle love, and charms all womankind; 190
Envy, to which th' ignoble mind 's a slave,
Is emulation in the learn'd or brave;
Nor virtue, male or female, can we name,
But what will grow on pride, or grow on shame.

Thus nature gives us (let it check our pride)
The virtue nearest to our vice ally'd;
Reason the bias turns to good from ill,
And Nero reigns a Titus, if he will.
The fiery soul abhorr'd in Cataline,
In Decius charms, in Curtius is divine: 200
The same ambition can destroy or save,
And makes a patriot as it makes a knave.

This light and darkness in our chaos join'd.
What shall divide? The God within the mind.

Extremes in nature equal ends produce,
In man they join to some mysterious use;
Though each by turns the other's bound invade,
As, in some well-wrought picture, light and shade,
And oft so mix, the difference is too nice
Where ends the virtue, or begins the vice, 210

Fools! who from hence into the notion fall,
That vice or virtue there is none at all.
If white and black blend, soften, and unite
A thousand ways, is there no black or white?
Ask your own heart, and nothing is so plain;
'Tis to mistake them, costs the time and pain.

Vice is a monster of so frightful mien,
As, to be hated, needs but to be seen;
Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace. 220
But where th' extreme of vice, was ne'er agreed:
Ask where's the north; at York, 'tis on the Tweed;

How oft with passion, virtue points her charms!
Then shines the hero, then the patriot warms.

But virtues opposite to make agree,
That, reason! is thy task, and worthy thee,
Hard task, cries Bibulus, and reason weak.

Once, for a whim, persuade yourself to pay
A debt to reason, like a debt at play.
For right or wrong, have mortals suffer'd more?
E—— for his prince, or * * for his whore?
Whose self-denials nature most controul?
His, who would save a sixpence, or his soul?
Web for his health, a Chartreux for his sin,
Contend they not which soonest shall grow thin?
What we resolve, we can: but here's the fault,
We ne'er resolve to do the thing we ought.
After ver. 220, in the first edition followed these:
A cheat! a whore! who starts not at the name,
In all the inns of court or Drury-lane?

In Scotland, at the Orcades; and there,
At Greenland, Zembla, or the Lord knows where,
No creature owns it in the first degree,
But thinks his neighbour further gone than he:
Ev'n those who dwell beneath its very zone,
Or never feel the rage, or never own;
What happier natures shrink at with affright,
The hard inhabitant contends is right. 230

Virtuous and vicious every man must be,
Few in th' extreme, but all in the degree;
The rogue and fool by fits is fair and wise;
And ev'n the best, by fits, what they despise.
'Tis but by parts we follow good or ill;
For, vice or virtue, self directs it still;
Each individual seeks a several goal; [whole.
But heaven's great view, is one, and that the
That counter-works each folly and caprice;
That disappoints th' effect of every vice: 240
That, happy frailties to all ranks apply'd;
Shame to the virgin, to the matron pride;
Fear to the statesman, rashness to the chief;
To kings presumption, and to crowds belief:
That, virtue's ends from vanity can raise,
Which seeks no interest, no reward but praise;
And build on wants, and on defects of mind,
The joy, the peace, the glory of mankind.

Heaven forming each on other to depend,
A master, or a servant, or a friend, 250
Bids each on other for assistance call,
Till one man's weakness grows the strength of all.
Wants, frailties, passions, closer still ally
The common interest, or endear the tie.
To these we owe true friendship, love sincere,
Each home-felt joy that life inherits here;
Yet from the same we learn, in its decline,
Those joys, those loves, those interests, to resign;
Taught half by reason, half by mere decay,
To welcome death, and calmly pass away. 260

Whate'er the passion, knowledge, fame, or pelf,
Not one will change his neighbour with himself.
The learn'd is happy nature to explore,
The fool is happy that he knows no more;
The rich is happy in the plenty given,
The poor contents him with the care of heaven.
See the blind beggar dance, the cripple sing,
The sot a hero, lunatic a king;
The starving chemist in his golden views,
Supremely blest, the poet in his muse. 270

See some strange comfort every state attend,
And pride bestow'd on all, a common friend:
See some fit passion every age supply;
Hope travels through, nor quits us when we die.
Behold the child, by nature's kindly law,
Pleas'd with a rattle, tickled with a straw:

VARIATIONS.

After ver. 226, in the MS.

The colonel swears the agent is a dog;
The scrivener vows th' attorney is a rogue.
Against the thief th' attorney loud inveighs,
For whose ten pounds the country twenty pays.
The thief damns judges, and the knaves of state;
And dying, mourns small villains hang'd by great

Some livelier plaything gives his youth delight,
 A little louder, but as empty quite;
 Scarfs, garters, gold, amuse his riper stage,
 And heads and prayer-books are the toys of age: 280
 Pleas'd with this bauble still, as that before;
 Till tir'd he sleeps, and life's poor play is o'er.
 Meanwhile opinion gilds with varying rays
 Those painted clouds that beautify our days;
 Each want of happiness by hope supply'd,
 And each vacuity of sense by pride:
 These build as fast as knowledge can destroy;
 In folly's cup still laughs the bubble, joy;
 One prospect lost, another still we gain;
 And not a vanity is giv'n in vain; 290
 Ev'n mean self-love becomes, by force divine,
 Those able to measure others wants by thine.
 See! and confess, one comfort still must rise;
 'Tis this, Though man's a fool, yet God is wise.

EPISTLE III.

THE ARGUMENT.

Of the Nature and State of Man with respect to Society.

- I. THE whole universe one system of society, ver. 7, &c. Nothing made wholly for itself, nor yet wholly for another, ver. 27. The happiness of animals mutual, ver. 49. II. Reason or instinct operate alike to the good of each individual, ver. 79. Reason or instinct operate also to society in all animals, ver. 109. III. How far society carried by instinct, ver. 115. How much farther by reason, ver. 128. IV. Of that which is called the state of nature, ver. 144. Reason instructed by instinct in the invention of arts, ver. 166. and in the forms of society, ver. 176. V. Origin of political societies, ver. 196. Origin of monarchy, ver. 207. Patriarchal government, ver. 212.—VI. Origin of true religion and government, from the same principle, of love, ver. 231, &c. Origin of superstition and tyranny, from the same principle, of fear, ver. 237, &c. The influence of self-love operating to the social and public good, ver. 266. Restoration of true religion and government on their first principle, ver. 285. Mixed government, ver. 288. Various forms of each, and the true end of all, ver. 300, &c.

HERE then we rest; "the universal cause
 "Acts to one end, but acts by various laws."

VARIATIONS.

Ver. I. In several edit. in 4to.

Learn, dulness, learn! "The universal cause," &c.

After ver. 46, in the former editions,
 What care to tend, to lodge, to cram, to treat him!
 All this he knew; but not that 'twas to eat him.
 As far as goose could judge, he reason'd right;
 But as to man, mistook the matter quite.

In all the madness of superfluous health,
 The train of pride, the impudence of wealth,
 Let this great truth be present night and day; 5
 But most be present, if we preach or pray.

Look round our world; behold the chain of love
 Combining all below, and all above.

See plastic nature working to this end,
 The single atoms each to other tend, 10
 Attract, attracted to, the next in place
 Form'd and impell'd its neighbour to embrace.
 See matter next, with various life endued,
 Press to one centre still, the general good.
 See dying vegetables life sustain,
 See life dissolving vegetate again:

All forms that perish other forms supply,
 (By turns we catch the vital breath, and die)
 Like bubbles on the sea of matter borne,
 They rise, they break, and to that sea return. 20
 Nothing is foreign; parts relate to whole;
 One all extending, all-preserving soul
 Connects each being, greatest with the least;
 Made beast in aid of man, and man of beast;
 All serv'd, all serving: nothing stands alone;
 The chain holds on, and where it ends, unknown.

Has God, thou fool! work'd solely for thy good,
 Thy joy, thy pastime, thy attire, thy food!

Who for thy table feeds the wanton fawn,
 For him as kindly spread the flowery lawn: 30
 Is it for thee the lark ascends and sings!

Joy tunes his voice, joy elevates his wings.
 Is it for thee the linnet pours his throat?

Loves of his own and raptures swell the note.
 The bounding steed you pompously bestride,
 Shares with his lord the pleasure and the pride.

Is thine alone the seed that strews the plain?
 The birds of heaven shall vindicate their grain.
 Thine the full harvest of the golden year?

Part pays, and justly, the deserving steer: 40
 The hog, that ploughs not, nor obeys thy call,
 Lives on the labours of this lord of all.

Know, nature's children all divide her care;
 The fur that warms a monarch, warm'd a bear.
 While man exclaims, See all things for my use!"

"See man for mine!" replies a pamper'd goose:
 And just as short of reason he must fall,
 Who thinks all made for one, not one for all,

Grant that the powerful still the weak controul;
 Be man the wit and tyrant of the whole: 50
 Nature that tyrant checks; he only knows,

And helps another creature's wants and woes.
 Say, will the falcon, stooping from above,
 Smit with her varying plumage, spare the dove?

Admires the jay the insects gilded wings?
 Or hears the hawk when Philomela sings?

Man cares for all: to birds he gives his woods,
 To beasts his pastures, and to fish his floods:
 For some his interest prompts him to provide,

For more his pleasure, yet for more his pride, 60
 All feed on one vain patron, and enjoy
 Th' extensive blessing of his luxury.

That very life his learned hunger craves,
 He saves from famine, from the savage saves;
 Nay, feasts the animal he dooms his feast,

And, till he ends the being, makes it blest:
 Which sees no more the stroke, or feels the pain,
 Than favour'd man by touch ethereal slain.

The creature had his feast of life before ;
Thou too must perish, when thy feast is o'er ! 70
To each unthinking being, heaven a friend,
Gives not the useless knowledge of its end :
To man imparts it ; but with such a view
As, while he dreads it, makes him hope it too :
The hour conceal'd, and so remote the fear,
Death still draws nearer, never seeming near.
Great standing miracle ! that heaven assign'd
Its only thinking thing this turn of mind.

II. Whether with reason, or with instinct blest, Know, all enjoy that power which suits them best ;

To bliss alike by that direction tend, 81
And find the means proportion'd to their end.
Say, where full instinct is th' unerring guide,
What pope or council can they need beside ?
Reason, however able, cool at best,
Cares not for service, or but serves when prest,
Stays till we call, and then not often near ;
But honest instinct comes a volunteer,
Sure never to o'ershoot, but just to hit ;
While still too wide or short is human wit ; 90
Sure by quick nature happiness to gain,
Which heavier reason labours at in vain.

This too serves always, reason never long :
One must go right, the other may go wrong.
See then the acting and comparing powers
One in their nature, which are now in ours !
And reason raise o'er instinct as you can,
In this 'tis God directs, in that 'tis man.

Who taught the nations of the field and wood
To shun their poison, and to choose their food ? 100
Prescient, the tides or tempests to withstand,
Build on the wave, or arch beneath the sand ?
Who made the spider parallels design,
Sure as De Moivre, without rule or line ?
Who bid the stork, Columbus-like, explore
Heavens not his own, and worlds unknown before ?
Who calls the council, states the certain day ?
Who forms the phalanx, and who points the way ?

III. God, in the nature of each being, founds
Its proper bliss, and sets it proper bounds : 110
But as he fram'd a whole, the whole to bless,
On mutual wants built mutual happiness :
So from the first, ETERNAL ORDER ran,
And creature link'd to creature, man to man.
Whate'er of life all-quickening æther keeps,
Or breathes through air, or shoots beneath the deeps,

Or pours profuse on earth, one nature feeds
The vital flame, and swells the genial seeds,
Not man alone, but all that roam the wood,
Or wing the sky, or roll along the flood, 120
Each loves itself, but not itself alone,
Each sex desires alike, till two are one.

VARIATIONS.

After ver. 84. in the MS.

While man, with opening views of various ways,
Confounded, by the aid of knowledge strays ;
Too weak to choose, yet choosing still in haste,
One moment gives the pleasure and distaste.

Nor ends the pleasure with the fierce embrace ;
They love themselves, a third time, in their race.
Thus beast and bird their common charge attend,
The mothers nurse it, and the fires defend ;
The young dismiss'd to wander earth or air,
There stops the instinct, and there ends the care ;
The link dissolves, each seeks a fresh embrace,
Another love succeeds, another race. 130

A longer care man's helpless kind demands ;
That longer care contracts more lasting bands :
Reflection, reason, still the ties improve,
At once extend the interest, and the love :
With choice we fix, with sympathy we burn ;
Each virtue in each passion takes its turn ;
And still new needs, new helps, new habits rise,
That graft benevolence on charities.
Still as one brood, and as another rose,
These natural love maintain'd, habitual those :
The last, scarce ripen'd into perfect man, 141
Saw helpless him from whom their life began :
Memory and forecast just returns engage,
That pointed back to youth, this on to age ;
While pleasure, gratitude, and hope, combin'd,
Still spread the interest, and preserve the kind.

IV. Nor think, in nature's state they blindly trod ;

The state of nature was the reign of God :
Self-love and social at her birth began,
Union the bond of all things, and of man. 150
Pride then was not ; nor arts, that pride to aid ;
Man walk'd with beast, joint tenant of the shade ;
The same his table, and the same his bed ;
No murder cloth'd him, and no murder fed.
In the same temple, the resounding wood,
All vocal beings hymn'd their equal God :
The shrine with gore unstain'd, with gold un-
dress'd,

Unbrib'd, unbloody, stood the blameless priest :
Heaven's attribute was universal care,
And man's prerogative, to rule, but spare. 160
Ah ! how unlike the man of times to come !
Of half that live the butcher and the tomb ;
Who, foe to nature, hears the general groan,
Murders their species, and betrays his own.
But just disease to luxury succeeds,
And every death its own avenger breeds ;
The fury-passions from that blood began,
And turn'd on man, a fiercer savage, man.

See him from nature rising slow to art !
To copy instinct then was reason's part : 170
Thus then to man the voice of nature spake—
" Go, from the creatures thy instructions take :
" Learn from the birds what food the thickets
" yield ;
" Learn from the beasts the physic of the field ;
" Thy arts of building from the bee receive ;
" Learn of the mole to plough, the worm to weave ;
" Learn of the little Nautilus to sail,
" Spread the thin oar, and catch the driving gale.
" Here too all forms of social union find,
" And hence let reason, late, instruct mankind :
" Here subterranean works and cities see ; 181
" There towns aerial on the waving tree.
" Learn each small people's genius, policies,
" The ant's republic, and the realm of bees ;

"How those in common all their wealth bestow,
 "And anarchy without confusion know;
 "And these for ever, though a monarch reign,
 "Their separate cells and properties maintain.
 "Mark what unvary'd laws preserve each state,
 "Laws wise as nature, and as fix'd as fate. 190
 "In vain thy reason finer webs shall draw,
 "Entangle justice in her net of law,
 "And right, too rigid, harden into wrong;
 "Still for the strong too weak, the weak too strong.
 "Yet go! and thus o'er all the creatures sway,
 "Thus let the wiser make the rest obey:
 "And for those arts mere instinct could afford,
 "Be crown'd as monarchs, or as gods ador'd."

V. Great Nature spoke; observant man obey'd;
 Cities were built, societies were made: 200
 Here rose one little state; another near [fear.
 Grew by like means, and join'd, through love or
 Did here the trees with ruddier burdens bend,
 And there the streams in purer rills descend?
 What war could ravish, commerce could bestow;
 And he return'd a friend, who came a foe.
 Converse and love mankind might strongly draw,
 When love was liberty, and nature law.
 Thus states were form'd; the name of king unknown,

Till common interest plac'd the sway in one. 210
 'Twas virtue only (or in arts or arms, Diffusing blessings, or averting harms)
 The same which in a fire the sons obey'd,
 A prince the father of a people made.

VI. Till then, by nature crown'd, each patriarch sat,
 King, priest, and parent, of his growing state:
 On him, their second providence, they hung,
 Their law his eye, their oracle his tongue.
 He from the wondering furrow call'd the food,
 Taught to command the fire, controul the flood,
 Draw forth the monsters of th' abyfs profound,
 Or fetch th' aerial eagle to the ground. 222
 Till dropping, sickening, dying, they began
 Whom they rever'd as God to mourn as man:
 Then, looking up from fire to fire, explor'd
 One great First Father, and that first ador'd.
 Or plain tradition that this All begun,
 Convey'd unbroken faith from fire to son;

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 197, in the first editions,
 Who for those arts they learn'd of brutes before,
 As kings shall crown them, or as gods adore.

Ver. 201. Here rose one little state, &c.] In the
 MS. thus:

The neighbours leagu'd to guard their common spot;
 And love was nature's dictate; murder, not.
 For want alone each animal contends;
 Tigers with tigers, that remov'd, are friends.
 Plain nature's wants the common mother crown'd,
 She pour'd her acorns, herbs, and streams around.
 No treasure then for rapine to invade,
 What need to fight for sun-shine or for shade?
 And half the cause of contest was remov'd,
 When beauty could be kind to all who lov'd.

The worker from the work distinct was known,
 And simple reason never sought but one: 230
 Ere wit oblique had broke that steady light,
 Man, like his Maker, saw that all was right;
 To virtue, in the paths of pleasure trod,
 And own'd a father when he own'd a God.
 Love all the faith, and all th' allegiance then;
 For nature knew no right divine in men,
 No ill could fear in God; and understood
 A sovereign being, but a sovereign good.
 True faith, true policy, united ran;
 That was but love of God, and this of man. 240
 Who first taught souls enslav'd, and realms undone,

Th' enormous faith of many made for one;
 That proud exception to all nature's laws,
 T' invert the world, and counter-work its cause?
 Force first made conquest, and that conquest, law;
 Till superstition taught the tyrant awe,
 Then shar'd the tyranny, then lent it aid,
 And gods of conquerors, slaves of subjects made:
 She 'midst the lightning's blaze, and thunder's sound,

When rock'd the mountains, and when groan'd
 the ground, 250

She taught the weak to bend, the proud to pray,
 To power unseen, and mightier far than they:
 She, from the rending earth, and bursting skies,
 Saw gods descend, and fiends infernal rise:
 Here fix'd the dreadful, there the blest abodes;
 Fear made her devils, and weak hope her gods;
 Gods partial, changeful, passionate, unjust,
 Whose attributes were rage, revenge, or lust;
 Such as the souls of cowards might conceive,
 And, form'd like tyrants, tyrants would believe.
 Zeal then, not charity, became the guide; 260
 And hell was built on spite, and heaven on pride.
 Then sacred seem'd th' ethereal vault no more;
 Altars grew marble then, and reek'd with gore:
 Then first the Flamen tasted living food;
 Next his grim idol smear'd with human blood;
 With heaven's own thunders shook the world below,

And play'd the God an engine on his foe.

So drives self-love, through just, and through unjust,

To one man's power, ambition, lucre, lust: 270

The same self-love, in all, becomes the cause
 Of what restrains him, government and laws.
 For, what one likes, if others like as well,
 What serves one will, when many wills rebel?
 How shall he keep, what, sleeping or awake,
 A weaker may surprise, a stronger take?
 His safety must his liberty restrain:

All join to guard what each desires to gain.
 Forc'd into virtue thus, by self-defence,
 Ev'n kings learn'd justice and benevolence: 280
 Self-love forsook the path it first pursued,
 And found the private in the public good.

'Twas then the studious head or generous mind,
 Follower of God, or friend of human kind,
 Poet or patriot, rose but to restore
 The faith and moral, nature gave before;
 Relum'd her ancient light, not kindled new;
 If not God's image, yet his shadow drew:

Taught power's due use to people and to kings,
Taught nor to slack nor strain its tender strings,
The less, or greater, set so justly true, 291
That touching one must strike the other too;
Till jarring interests of themselves create
Th' according music of a well-mix'd state.
Such is the world's great harmony, that springs
From order, union, full consent of things:
Where small and great, where weak and mighty,
made

To serve, not suffer, strengthen, not invade;
More powerful each as needful to the rest,
And, in proportion as it blesses, blest; 300
Draw to one point, and to one centre bring
Beast, man, or angel, servant, lord, or king.

For forms of government let fools contest;
Whate'er is best administer'd is best:
For modes of faith, let graceless zealots fight;
His can't be wrong whose life is in the right;
In faith and hope the world will disagree,
But all mankind's concern is charity:
All must be false that thwarts this one great end;
And all of God, that bless mankind, or mend. 310
Man, like the generous vine, supported lives:
The strength he gains is from th' embrace he gives.
On their own axis as the planets run.
Yet make at once their circle round the sun;
So two consistent motions act the soul;
And one regards itself, and one the whole.

Thus God and nature link'd the general frame,
And bade self-love and social be the same.

EPISTLE IV.

Of the Nature and State of Man with respect to Happiness.

THE ARGUMENT.

I. FALSE notions of happiness, philosophical and popular, answered from ver. 19 to 77. II. It is the end of all men, and attainable by all, ver. 30. God intends happiness to be equal; and to be so, it must be social, since all particular happiness depends on general, and since he governs by general, not particular laws, ver. 37. As it is necessary for order, and the peace and welfare of society, that external goods should be unequal, happiness is not made to consist in these, ver. 51. But, notwithstanding that inequality, the balance of happiness among mankind is kept even by providence, by the two passions of hope and fear, ver. 70. III. What the happiness of individuals is, as far as is consistent with the constitution of this world; and that the good man has here the advantage, ver. 77. The error of imputing to virtue what are only the calamities of nature, or of fortune, ver. 94. IV. The folly of expecting that God should alter his general laws in favour of particulars, ver. 121. V. That we are not judges who are good; but that, whoever they are, they must be happiest, ver. 133, &c. VI. That external goods are not the proper rewards, but often inconsistent with, or destructive of virtue, ver. 167. That even these can make no man happy without virtue: Instanced in riches, ver. 185. Honours, ver. 193. Nobility, ver. 205. Greatness, ver. 217. Fame, ver. 237. Superior talents, ver. 257, &c. With pictures of human infelicity in men, possessed of them all, ver. 269, &c. VII. That virtue only constitutes a happiness, whose object is universal, and whose prospect eternal, ver. 307. That the perfection of virtue and happiness consists in a conformity to the Order of Providence here, and a resignation to it here and hereafter, ver. 326, &c.

VOL. VIII.

Oh Happiness! our being's end and aim!
Good, pleasure, ease, content! whate'er thy name:
That something still which prompts th' eternal sigh,

For which we bear to live, or dare to die,
Which still so near us, yet beyond us lies,
O'erlook'd, seen double, by the fool and wise:
Plant of celestial seed; if dropp'd below,
Say, in what mortal soil thou deign'st to grow?
Fair opening to some court's propitious shine,
Or deep with diamonds in the flaming mine? 10
Twin'd with the wreaths Parnassian laurels yield,
Or reap'd in iron harvests of the field?
Where grows? where grows it not? If vain our toil,

We ought to blame the culture, not the soil:
Fix'd to no spot is happiness sincere,

'Tis no where to be found, or every where:

'Tis never to be bought, but always free,

And fled from monarchs, St. John! dwells with thee. [blind:]

Ask of the learn'd the way? The learn'd are
This bids to serve, and that to shun mankind; 20
Some place the bliss in action, some in ease,
Those call it pleasure, and contentment these:
Some, sunk to beasts, find pleasure end in pain;
Some, swell'd to gods, confess ev'n virtue vain;
Or, indolent, to each extreme they fall,
To trust in ev'ry thing, or doubt of all.

Who thus define it, say they more or less,
Than this, that happiness is happiness?

Take nature's path, and mad opinion's leave;
All states can reach it, and all heads conceive: 30
Obvious her goods, in no extreme they dwell;
There needs but thinking right, and meaning well;
And, mourn our various portions as we please,
Equal is common sense, and common ease.

Remember, man, "the Universal Cause
"Acts not by partial, but by gen'ral laws,"
And makes what happiness we justly call,
Subsist not in the good of one, but all.

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 1. Oh happiness, &c.] in the MS. thus:
Oh happiness, to which we all aspire,
Wing'd with strong hope, and borne by full defire;
That ease, for which in want, in wealth we sigh;
That ease, for which we labour, and we die.

G

There's not a blessing individuals find,
 But some way leans and hearkens to the kind : 40
 No bandit fierce, no tyrant mad with pride,
 No cavern'd hermit, rests self-satisfy'd :
 Who most to shun of hate mankind pretend,
 Seek an admirer, or would fix a friend :
 Abstract what others feel, what others think,
 All pleasures sicken, and all glories sink :
 Each has his share ; and who would more obtain,
 Shall find, the pleasure pays not half the pain.

Order is Heaven's first law ; and this confess,
 Some are, and must be, greater than the rest, 50
 More rich, more wise ; but who infers from hence
 That such are happier, shocks all common sense.
 Heaven to mankind impartial we confess,
 If all are equal in their happiness :
 But mutual wants this happiness increase ;
 All nature's difference keeps all nature's peace.
 Condition, circumstance, is not the thing ;
 Bliss is the same in subject or in king,
 In who obtain defence, or who defend,
 In him who is, or him who finds a friend : 60
 Heaven breathes through every member of the whole

One common blessing, as one common soul.
 But fortune's gifts if each alike possess.
 And each were equal, must not all contest ?
 If then to all men happiness was meant,
 God in externals could not place content.

Fortune her gifts may variously dispose,
 And these be happy call'd, unhappy those ;
 But heaven's just balance equal will appear,
 While those are plac'd in hope, and these in fear : 70

Not present good or ill, the joy or curse,
 But future views of better, or of worse.

Oh, sons of earth ! attempt ye still to rise,
 By mountains pil'd on mountains, to the skies ?
 Heaven still with laughter the vain toil surveys,
 And buries madmen in the heaps they raise.

Know, all the good that individuals find,
 Or God and nature meant to mere mankind,
 Reason's whole pleasure, all the joys of sense,
 Lie in three words, Health, Peace, and Competence. 80

But Health consists with temperance alone ;
 And Peace, oh virtue ! Peace is all thy own.
 The good or bad the gifts of Fortune gain ;
 But these less taste them, as they worse obtain.

VARIATIONS.

After ver. 52, in the MS.

Say not, " Heaven's here profuse, there poorly
 " saves,

" And for one monarch makes a thousand slaves "
 You'll find, when causes and their ends are known,
 'Twas for the thousand Heaven has made that one.

After ver. 66, in the MS.

'Tis peace of mind alone is at a stay :
 The rest mad fortune gives or takes away.
 All other bliss by accident's debarr'd ;
 But virtue's, in the instant, a reward ;
 In hardest trials operates the best,
 And more is relish'd as the more distress.

Say, in pursuit of profit or delight, [right ?
 Who risk the most, that take wrong means, or
 Of vice or virtue, whether blest or curst,
 Which meets contempt, or which compassion first ?
 Count all th' advantage prosperous vice attains,
 'Tis but what virtue flies from and disdains : 90
 And grant the bad what happiness they would,
 One they must want, which is, to pass for good.
 Oh blind to truth, and God's whole scheme below,
 Who fancy bliss to vice, to virtue woe !
 Who sees and follows that great scheme the best,
 Best knows the blessing, and will most be blest.
 But fools, the good alone, unhappy call,
 For ills or accidents that chance to all.
 See Falkland dies, the virtuous and the just !
 See godlike Turenne prostrate on the dust ! 100
 See Sidney bleeds amid the martial strife !
 Was this their virtue, or contempt of life ?
 Say, was it virtue, more though heaven ne'er gave,

Lamented Digby ! sunk thee to the grave ?

Tell me, if virtue made the son expire,

Why, full of days and honour, lives the sire ?

Why drew Marseilles' good bishop purer breath,
 When nature sicken'd, and each gale was death ?

Or why so long (in life if long can be)

Lent heaven a parent to the poor and me ? 110

What makes all physical or moral ill ?

There deviates nature, and here wanders will,

God sends not ill ; if rightly understood,

Or partial ill is universal good,

Or change admits, or nature lets it fall,

Short, and but rare, till man improv'd it all.

We just as wisely might of heaven complain

That righteous Abel was destroy'd by Cain,

As that the virtuous son is ill at ease

When his lewd father gave the dire disease. 120

Think we, like some weak prince, th' Eternal Cause

Prone for his favourites to reverse his laws ?

Shall burning Ætna, if a sage requires,

Forget to thunder, and recal her fires ?

On air or sea new motions be impress,

Oh blameless Bethel ! to relieve thy breast ?

When the loose mountain trembles from on high,

Shall gravitation cease, if you go by ?

Or some old temple, nodding to its fall,

For Chartres' head reserve the hanging wall ? 130

But still this world (so fitted for the knave)

Contents us not, A better shall we have ?

A kingdom of the just then let it be :

But first consider how those just agree.

The good must merit God's peculiar care ;

But who, but God, can tell us who they are ?

One thinks on Calvin heaven's own spirit sell ;

Another deems him instrument of hell ;

VARIATIONS.

After ver. 92, in the MS.

Let sober moralists correct their speech,

No bad man's happy ; he is great, or rich.

After ver. 116, in the MS.

Of every evil, since the world began,

The real source is not in God, but man.

If Calvin feel heaven's blessing, or its rod,
 This cries there is, and that, there is no God. 140
 What shocks one part, will edify the rest,
 Nor with one system can they all be blest.
 The very best will variously incline,
 And what rewards your virtue, punish mine.
Whatever is, is right. This world, 'tis true,
 Was made for Cæsar—but for Titus too;
 And which more blest? who chain'd his country,
 say,
 Or he whose virtue sigh'd to lose a day?
 "But sometimes virtue starves, while vice is fed."
 What then? Is the reward of virtue bread? 150
 That, vice may merit, 'tis the price of toil;
 The knave deserves it, when he tills the soil;
 The knave deserves it, when he tempts the main,
 Where folly fights for kings, or dives for gain.
 The good man may be weak, be indolent;
 Nor is his claim to plenty, but content.
 But grant him riches, your demand is o'er?
 "No—shall the good want health, the good want
 "power?"
 Add health and power, and every earthly thing,
 "Why bounded power? why private? why no
 "king?" 160
 Nay, why external for internal given?
 Why is not man a god, and earth a heaven?
 Who ask and reason thus, will scarce conceive
 God gives enough, while he has more to give;
 Immense the power, immense were the demand;
 Say, at what part of nature will they stand?
 What nothing earthly gives, or can destroy,
 The soul's calm sun shine, and the heart-felt joy,
 Is virtue's prize: A better would you fix?
 Then give Humility a coach and six, 170
 Justice a conqueror's sword, or Truth a gown,
 Or Public Spirit its great cure, a crown.
 Weak, foolish man! will Heaven reward us there
 With the same trash mad mortals wish for here?
 The boy and man an individual makes,
 Yet sigh'st thou now for apples and for cakes?
 Go, like the Indian, in another life
 Expect thy dog, thy bottle, and thy wife;
 As well as dream such trifles are assign'd,
 As toys and empires, for a godlike mind. 180
 Rewards, that either would to virtue bring
 No joy, or be destructive of the thing;
 How oft by these at sixty are undone
 The virtues of a saint at twenty-one!
 To whom can riches give repute, or trust,
 Content, or pleasure, but the good and just?
 Judges and senates have been bought for gold;
 Esteem and love were never to be sold.

VARIATIONS.

After ver. 142, in some editions,
 Give each a system, all must be at strife;
 What different systems for a man and wife!
 The joke, though lively, was ill placed, and therefore struck out of the text.
 After ver. 172, in the MS.
 Say, what rewards this idle world imparts,
 Or fit for searching heads or honest hearts.

Oh fool! to think God hates the worthy mind,
 The lover and the love of human kind, 190
 Whose life is healthful, and whose conscience clear
 Because he wants a thousand pounds a-year.
 Honour and shame from no condition rise;
 Act well your part, there all the honour lies.
 Fortune in men has some small difference made,
 One flaunts in rags, one flutters in brocade;
 The cobbler apron'd, and the parson gown'd.
 The friar hooded, and the monarch crown'd.
 "What differ more (you cry) than crown and
 "cowl."
 I'll tell you, friend! a wise man and a fool. 200
 You'll find, if once the monarch acts the monk,
 Or, cobbler-like, the parson will be drunk,
 Worth makes the man, and want of it the fellow:
 The rest is all but leather or prunella.
 Stuck o'er with titles and hung round with strings,
 That thou mayst be by kings, or whores of kings.
 Boast the pure blood of an illustrious race,
 In quiet flow from Lucrece to Lucrece:
 But by your fathers' worth if yours you rate,
 Count me those only who were good and great.
 Go! if your ancient, but ignoble blood 210
 Has crept through scoundrels ever since the flood,
 Go! and pretend your family is young;
 Nor own your fathers have been fools so long.
 What can ennoble sots, or slaves, or cowards?
 Alas! not all the blood of all the Howards. [lies:
 Look next on greatness; say where greatness
 "Where, but among the heroes and the wise?"
 Heroes are much the same, the point's agreed,
 From Macedonia's madman to the Swede; 220
 The whole strange purpose of their lives, to find,
 Or make, an enemy of all mankind!
 Not one looks backward, onward still he goes,
 Yet ne'er looks forward further than his nose.
 No less alike the politic and wise:
 All fly flow things, with circumspective eyes:
 Men in their loose unguarded hours they take,
 Not that themselves are wise, but others weak.
 But grant that those can conquer, these can cheat;
 'Tis phrase absurd to call a villain great: 230
 Who wickedly is wise, or madly brave,
 Is but the more a fool, the more a knave.
 Who noble ends by noble means obtains,
 Or failing, smiles in exile or in chains,
 Like good Aurelius let him reign, or bleed
 Like Socrates, that man is great indeed.
 What's fame? a fancy'd life in others' breath,
 A thing beyond us, ev'n before our death.
 Just what you hear, you have; and what's un-
 known,
 The same (my lord) if Tully's, or your own. 240

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 207. Boast the pure blood, &c.] In the
 MS. thus:
 The richest blood, right-honourably old,
 Down from Lucretia to Lucretia roll'd,
 May swell thy heart and gallop in thy breast,
 Without one dash of usher or of priest:
 Thy pride as much despise all other pride,
 As Christ Church once all colleges beside.
 G ij

All that we feel of it begins and ends
 In the small circle of our foes or friends;
 To all beside as much an empty shade
 An Eugene living, as a Cæsar dead;
 Alike or when, or where they shone, or shine,
 Or on the Rubicon, or on the Rhine.
 A wit's a feather, and a chief a rod;
 An honest man's the noblest work of God.
 Fame but from death a villain's name can save,
 As justice tears his body from the grave; 250
 When what t' oblivion better were resign'd,
 Is hung on high to poison half mankind.
 All fame is foreign, but of true desert;
 Plays round the head, but comes not to the heart:
 One self-approving hour whole years out-weighs
 Of stupid starers, and of loud huzzas;
 And more true joy Marcellus exil'd feels,
 Than Cæsar with a senate at his heels.

In parts superior what advantage lies?
 Tell (for you can) what is it to be wise? 260
 'Tis but to know how little can be known!
 To see all others faults, and feel our own:
 Condemn'd in business or in arts to drudge,
 Without a second, or without a judge:
 Truths would you teach, or save a sinking land?
 All fear, none aid you, and few understand.
 Painful pre-eminence! yourself to view
 Above life's weakness, and its comforts too.

Bring then these blessings to a strict account;
 Make fair deductions; see to what they mount:
 How much of other each is sure to cost; 271
 How much for other oft is wholly lost;
 How inconsistent greater goods with these;
 How sometimes life is risk'd, and always ease:
 Think, and if still the things thy envy call,
 Say, wouldst thou be the man to whom they fall?

To sigh for ribbands if thou art so silly,
 Mark how they grace Lord Umbra, or Sir Billy.
 Is yellow dirt the passion of thy life;
 Look but on Gripus, or on Gripus' wife, 280
 If parts allure thee, think how Bacon shin'd,
 The wisest, brightest, meanest of mankind:
 Or ravish'd with the whistling of a name,
 See Cromwell, damn'd to everlasting fame!
 If all, united, thy ambition call,
 From ancient story, learn to scorn them all,
 There, in the rich, the honour'd, fam'd, and great,
 See the false scale of happiness complete!
 In hearts of kings, or arms of queens who lay,
 How happy! those to ruin, these betray, 290
 Mark by what wretched steps their glory grows,
 From dirt and sea-weed as proud Venice rose;
 In each how guilt and greatness equal ran,
 And all that rais'd the hero, sunk the man:
 Now Europe's laurels on their brows behold,
 But stain'd with blood, or ill exchang'd for gold:
 Then see them broke with toils, or sunk in ease,
 Or infamous for plunder'd provinces.

O! wealth ill-fated! which no act of fame
 E'er taught to shine, or sanctify'd from shame! 300
 What greater bliss attends their close of life?
 Some greedy minion, or imperious wife,
 The trophy'd arches, story'd halls invade,
 And haunt their slumbers in the pompous shade.

Alas! not dazzled with their noon-tide ray,
 Compute the morn and evening to the day;
 The whole amount of that enormous fame,
 A tale, that blends their glory with their shame!
 Know then this truth (enough for man to know)

"Virtue alone is happiness below." 310
 The only point where human bliss stands still,
 And tastes the good without the fall to ill;
 Where only merit constant pay receives,
 Is blest in what it takes, and what it gives;
 The joy unequal'd, if its end it gain,
 And if it lose, attended with no pain:
 Without satiety, though e'er so blest'd,
 And but more relish'd as the more distress'd:
 The broadest mirth unfeeling folly wears,
 Less pleasing far than virtue's very tears: 320
 Good, from each object, from each place acquir'd,
 For ever exercis'd, yet never tir'd;
 Never elated, while one man's oppress'd;
 Never dejected, while another's blest;
 And where no wants, no wishes can remain,
 Since but to wish more virtue, is to gain.

See the sole bliss heaven could on all bestow!
 Which who but feels can taste, but thinks can
 know:

Yet poor with fortune, and with learning blind,
 The bad must miss; the good, untaught, will find;
 Slave to no sect, who takes no private road, 331
 But looks through nature, up to nature's God;
 Pursues that chain which links th' immense design,

Joins heaven and earth, and mortal and divine;
 Sees, that no being any bliss can know,
 But touches some above, and some below;
 Learns from this union of the rising whole,
 The first, last purpose of the human soul;
 And knows where faith, law, morals, all began,
 All end, in love of God, and love of man. 340
 For him alone, hope leads from goal to goal,
 And opens still, and opens on his soul;
 Till lengthen'd on to faith, and unconfin'd,
 It pours the bliss that fills up all the mind.
 He sees, why Nature plants in man alone
 Hope of known bliss, and faith in bliss unknown:
 (Nature, whose dictates to no other kind
 Are given in vain, but what they seek they find),
 Wise is her present; she connects in this
 His greatest virtue with his greatest bliss; 350
 At once his own bright prospect to be blest,
 And strongest motive to assist the rest.

Self-love thus push'd to social, to divine,
 Gives thee to make thy neighbour's blessing thine.
 Is this too little for the boundless heart?
 Extend it, let thy enemies have part;

VARIATIONS.

After ver. 316, in the MS.
 Ev'n while it seems unequal to dispose,
 And chequers all the good man's joys with woes,
 'Tis but to teach him to support each state,
 With patience this, with moderation that;
 And raise his base on that one solid joy,
 Which conscience gives, and nothing can destroy.

Grasp the whole worlds of reason, life, and sense,
In one close system of benevolence :
Happier as kinder, in whate'er degree,
And height of bliss but height of charity. 360

God loves from whole to parts : but human soul
Must rise from individual to the whole.
Self-love but serves the virtuous mind to wake,
As the small pebble stirs the peaceful lake ;
The centre mov'd, a circle straight succeeds,
Another still, and still another spreads ;
Friend, parent, neighbour, first it will embrace ;
His country next ; and next all human race ;
Wide and more wide, th' o'erflowings of the mind
Take every creature in, of every kind ; 370
Earth smiles around, with boundless bounty blest,
And heaven beholds its image in his breast.

Come, then, my friend ! my genius ! come along ;
Oh, master of the poet, and the song !

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 373. Come then, my friend ! &c.] In the MS. thus :

And now transported o'er so vast a plain,
While the wing'd courser flies with all her rein,
While heaven-ward now her mounting wing she feels,
Now scatter'd fools fly trembling from her heels,
Wilt thou, my St. John ! keep her course in sight,
Confinè her fury, and assist her flight ?

And while the muse now stoops, or now ascends,
To man's low passions, or their glorious ends,
Teach me, like thee, in various nature wise,
To fall with dignity, with temper rise ;
Form'd by thy converse, happily to steer,
From grave to gay, from lively to severe ; 380
Correct with spirit, eloquent with ease,
Intent to reason, or polite to please.
Oh ! while along the stream of time thy name
Expanded flies, and gathers all its fame ;
Say, shall my little bark attendant sail,
Pursue the triumph, and partake the gale ?
When statesmen, heroes, kings, in dust repose,
Whose sons shall blush their fathers were thy foes,
Shall then this verse to future age pretend
Thou wert my guide, philosopher, and friend ? 390
That, urg'd by thee, I turn'd the tuneful art,
From sounds to things, from fancy to the heart ;
For wit's false mirror held up nature's light ;
Shew'd erring pride, Whatever is, is right ;
That reason, passion, answer one great aim ;
That true self-love and social are the same ;
That virtue only makes our bliss below ;
And all our knowledge is, Ourselves to know.

VARIATIONS.

Ver 397. That virtue only, &c] In the MS. thus ;
That just to find a God is all we can,
And all the study of mankind is man,

THE UNIVERSAL PRAYER.

DEO OPT. MAX.

It may be proper to observe, that some passages, in the preceding Essay, having been unjustly suspected of a tendency towards fate and naturalism, the author composed this Prayer as the sum of all, to show that his system was founded in free-will, and terminated in piety: That the First Cause was as well the Lord and Governor of the Universe as the Creator of it; and that, by submission to his will (the great principle enforced throughout the Essay) was not meant the suffering ourselves to be carried along by a blind determination, but the resting in a religious acquiescence, and confidence full of hope and immortality. To give all this the greater weight, the poet chose for his model the Lord's Prayer, which, of all others, best deserves the title prefixed to this Paraphrase.

DR. WARBURTON.

FATHER of all! in every age,
In every clime ador'd,
By faint, by savage, and by sage,
Jehovah, Jove, or Lord!

Thou Great First Cause, least understood;
Who all my sense confin'd
To know but this, that thou art good,
And that myself am blind;

Yet gave me, in this dark estate,
To see the good from ill;
And, binding nature fast in fate,
Left free the human will:

What conscience dictates to be done,
Or warns me not to do,
This, teach me more than hell to shun,
That, more than heaven pursue.

What blessings thy free bounty gives,
Let me not cast away;
For God is paid when man receives,
T' enjoy is to obey.

Yet not to earth's contracted span
Thy goodness let me bound,
Or think thee Lord alone of man,
When thousand worlds are round:

Let not this weak, unknowing hand
Presume thy bolts to throw,

And deal damnation round the land,
On each I judge thy foe.

If I am right, thy grace impart,
Still in the right to stay:
If I am wrong, oh, teach my heart
To find that better way!

Save me alike from foolish pride,
Or impious discontent,
At aught thy wisdom has deny'd,
Or aught thy goodness lent.

Teach me to feel another's woe,
To hide the fault I see;
That mercy I to others show,
That mercy show to me.

Mean though I am, not wholly so,
Since quicken'd by thy breath;
O, lead me wheresoe'er I go,
Through this day's life or death.

This day, be bread and peace my lot:
All else beneath the sun,
Thou know'st if best bestow'd or not,
And let thy will be done.

To thee, whose temple is all space,
Whose altar, earth, sea, skies!
One chorus let all being raise!
All nature's incense rise!

ADVERTISEMENT.

THE Essay on Man was intended to have been comprised in four books.

The first of which, the author has given us under that title, in four epistles.

The second was to have consisted of the same number : 1. Of the extent and limits of human reason. 2. Of those arts and sciences, and of the parts of them, which are useful, and therefore attainable, together with those which are unuseful, and therefore unattainable. 3. Of the nature, ends, use, and application of the different capacities of men. 4. Of the use of learning, of the science of the world, and of wit; concluding with a satire against a misapplication of them, illustrated by pictures, characters, and examples.

The third book regarded civil regimen, or the science of politics, in which the several forms of a republic were to be examined and explained; together with the several modes of religious worship, as far forth as they affect society; between which the author always supposed there was the most interesting relation, and closest connection; so that this part would have treated of civil and religious society in their full extent.

The fourth and last book concerned private ethics, or practical morality, considered in all the circumstances, orders, professions, and stations of human life.

The scheme of all this had been maturely digested, and communicated to Lord Bolingbroke, Dr. Swift, and one or two more; and was intended for the only work of his riper years; but was, partly through ill health, partly through discouragements from the depravity of the times, and partly on prudential and other considerations, interrupted, postponed, and, lastly, in a manner laid aside.

But as this was the author's favourite work, which more exactly reflected the image of his strong capacious mind, and as we can have but a very imperfect idea of it from the "disjecta membra Poetæ," that now remain, it may not be amiss to be a little more particular concerning each of these projected books.

The first, as it treats of man in the abstract, and considers him in general under every of his relations, becomes the foundation, and furnishes out the subjects, of the three following; so that

The second book was to take up again the first and second epistles of the first book, and treats of man in his intellectual capacity at large, as has been explained above. Of this only a small part of the conclusion (which, as we said, was to have contained a satire against the misapplication of wit and learning), may be found in the fourth book of the Dunciad, and up and down, occasionally, in the other three.

The third book, in like manner, was to re-assume the subject of the third epistle of the first, which treats of man in his social, political, and religious capacity. But this part the poet afterwards conceived might be best executed in an Epic Poem, as the action would make it more animated, and the fable less invidious; in which all the great principles of true and false governments and religions should be chiefly delivered in feigned examples.

The fourth and last book was to pursue the subject of the fourth epistle of the first, and treats of ethics, or practical morality; and would have consisted of many members; of which the four following epistles were detached portions: the two first, on the characters of men and women, being the introductory part of this concluding book.

EPISTLE I.

TO SIR RICHARD TEMPLE, LORD COBHAM.

Of the Knowledge and Characters of Men.

THE ARGUMENT.

I. THAT it is not sufficient for this knowledge to consider man in the abstract: books will not serve the purpose, nor yet our own experience singly, ver. 1. General maxims, unless they be formed upon both, will but be notional, ver. 10. Some peculiarity in every man, characteristic to himself, yet varying from himself, ver. 15. Difficulties arising from our own passions, fancies, faculties, &c. ver. 31. The shortness of life to observe in, and the uncertainty of the principles of action in men to observe by, ver. 37, &c. Our own principle of action often hid from ourselves, ver. 41. Some few characters plain, but in general confounded, dissembled, or inconsistent, ver. 51. The same man utterly different in different places and seasons, ver. 71. Unimaginable weaknesses in the greatest, ver. 70. &c. Nothing constant and certain but God and nature, ver. 95. No judging of the motives from the actions; the same actions proceeding from contrary motives, and the same motives influencing contrary actions, ver. 100. II. Yet, to form characters, we can only take the strongest actions of a man's life, and try to make them agree: the utter uncertainty of this, from nature itself, and from policy, ver. 120. Characters given according to the rank of men of the world, ver. 135. And some reason for it, ver. 140. Education alters the nature, or at least character, of many, ver. 149. Actions, passions, opinions, manners, humours, or principles, all subject to change. No judging by nature, from ver. 158. to ver. 178. III. It only remains to find (if we can) his ruling passion: that will certainly influence all the rest, and can reconcile the seeming or real inconsistency of all his actions, ver. 175. Instanced in the extraordinary character of Clodio, ver. 179. A caution against mistaking second qualities for first, which will destroy all possibility of the knowledge of mankind, ver. 210. Examples of the strength of the ruling passion, and its continuation to the last breath, ver. 222, &c.

YES, you despise the man to books confin'd,
Who from his study rails at human kind;
Though what he learns he speaks, and may advance

Some general maxims, or be right by chance.
The coxcomb bird, so talkative and grave,
That from his cage cries cuckold, whore, and knave,
Though many a passenger he rightly call,
You hold him no philosopher at all.

And yet the fate of all extremes is such,
Men may be read, as well as books, too much. 10
To observations which ourselves we make,
We grow more partial for th' observer's sake;
To written wisdom, as another's, less:
Maxims are drawn from notions, these from guests.

There's some peculiar in each leaf and grain,
Some unmark'd fibre, or some varying vein:
Shall only man be taken in the gross?
Grant but as many sorts of mind as moss.

That each from other differs, first confess;
Next, that he varies from himself no less; 20
Add nature's, custom's, reason's, passion's strife,
And all opinion's colours cast on life.

Our depths who fathoms, or our shallows finds,
Quick whirls, and shifting eddies, of our minds?
On human actions reason though you can,
It may be reason, but it is not man:
His principle of action once explore,
That instant 'tis his principle no more.
Like following life through creatures you dissect,
You lose it in the moment you detect. 30

Yet more; the difference is as great between
The optics seeing, as the objects seen.
All manners take a tincture from our own;
Or come discolour'd through our passions shown.
Or fancy's beam enlarges, multiplies,
Contracts, inverts, and gives ten thousand dyes.
Nor will life's stream for observation stay,
It hurries all too fast to mark their way:
In vain sedate reflections we would make, [take.
When half our knowledge we must snatch, not Oft, in the passion's wild rotation tost, 40
Our spring of action to ourselves is lost:
Tir'd, not determin'd, to the last we yield,
And what comes then is master of the field.

As the last image of that troubled heap,
When sense sublides and fancy sports in sleep,
(Though past the recollection of the thought),
Becomes the stuff of which our dream is wrought:
Something as dim to our internal view,
Is thus, perhaps, the cause of most we do. 50

True, some are open, and to all men known;
Others, so very close, they're hid from none;
(So darkness strikes the sense no less than light),
Thus gracious Chandos is belov'd at sight;
And every child hates Shylock, though his soul
Still sits at squat, and peeps not from its hole.
At half mankind when generous Manly raves,
All know 'tis virtue, for he thinks them knaves:
When universal homage Umbra pays,
All see 'tis vice, and itch of vulgar praise. 60
When flattery glares, all hate it in a queen,
While one there is who charms us with his spleen.

But these plain characters we rarely find:
Though strong the bent, yet quick the turns of mind:

Or puzzling contraries confound the whole;
Or affectations quite reverse the soul.
The dull, flat falsehood serves, for policy;
And in the cunning, truth itself's a lie:
Unthought-of frailties cheat us in the wise;
The fool lies hid in inconsistencies. 70

See the same man, in vigour, in the gout;
Alone, in company; in place, or out;
Early at business, and at hazard late;
Mad at a fox-chase, wise at a debate;
Drunk at a borough, civil at a ball;
Friendly at Hackney, faithless at Whitehall.

Catius is ever moral, ever grave,
Thinks who endures a knave, is next a knave.

Save just at dinner—then prefers, no doubt,
A rogue with venison to a saint without. 80

Who would not praise Patricio's high desert,
His hand unstain'd, his uncorrupted heart,
His comprehensive head! all interests weigh'd,
All Europe sav'd, yet Britain not betray'd.
He thanks you not, his pride is in picquette,
Newmarket fame, and judgment at a bett.

What made (say, Montagne, or more sage Charron!)

Otho a warrior, Cromwell a buffoon?
A perjur'd prince a leaden saint revere,
A godless regent tremble at a star? 90
The throne a bigot keep, a genius quit,
Faithless through piety, and dup'd through wit?
Europe a woman, child, or dotard rule,
And just her wisest monarch made a fool?

Know, God and nature only are the same:
In man, the judgment shoots at flying game;
A bird of passage! gone as soon as found,
Now in the moon perhaps, now under ground.

In vain the sage, with retrospective eye,
Would from th' apparent What conclude the Why,
Infer the motive from the deed, and show, 101
That what we chanc'd was what we meant to do.
Behold if fortune or a mistress frowns,
Some plunge in business, others shave their crowns:
To ease the soul of one oppressive weight,
This quits an empire, that embroils a state:
The same adust complexion has impell'd
Charles to the convent, Philip to the field.

Not always actions show the man: we find
Who does a kindness is not therefore kind: 110
Perhaps prosperity becalm'd his breast,
Perhaps the wind just shifted from the east:
Not therefore humble he who seeks retreat,
Pride guides his steps, and bids him shun the great:
Who combats bravely is not therefore brave,
He dreads a death-bed like the meanest slave:
Who reasons wisely is not therefore wise,
His pride in reasoning, not in acting, lies.

But grant that actions best discover man; 119
Take the most strong, and sort them as you can.
The few that glare, each character must mark,
You balance not the many in the dark.
What will you do with such as disagree?
Suppress them, or miscall them policy?
Must then at once (the character to save)
The plain rough hero turn a crafty knave?
Alas! in truth the man but chang'd his mind,
Perhaps was sick, in love, or had not din'd.
Ask why from Britain Cæsar would retreat?
Cæsar himself might whisper, he was beat. 130

VARIATIONS.

After ver. 86. in the former editions.
Triumphant leaders at an army's head,
Hemm'd round with glories, pilfer cloth or bread;
As meanly plunder as they bravely fought,
Now save a people, and now save a groat.

Ver. 129. in the former editions:
Ask why from Britain Cæsar made retreat?
Cæsar himself would tell you he was beat.

Why risk the world's great empire for a punk?
Cæsar perhaps might answer, he was drunk.
But, sage historians! 'tis your task to prove
One action, conduct; one, heroic love.

'Tis from high life high characters are drawn:
A saint in crape is twice a saint in lawn;
A judge is just, a chancellor juster still;
A gownman, learn'd; a bishop, what you will;
Wife, if a minister; but, if a king,
More wise, more learn'd, more just, more every thing. 140

Court-virtues bear, like gems, the highest rate,
Born where heaven's influence scarce can penetrate:
In life's low vale, the foil the virtues like,
They please as beauties, here as wonder strike.
Though the same sun with all-diffusive rays
Blush in the rose, and in the diamond blaze,
We prize the stronger effort of his power,
And justly set the gem above the flower.

'Tis education forms the common mind;
Just as the twig is bent, the tree's inclin'd. 150
Boastful and rough, your first son is a 'squire;
The next a tradesman, meek, and much a liar;
Tom struts a soldier, open, bold, and brave;
Will sneaks a scrivener, an exceeding knave:
Is he a churchman? then he's fond of power:
A Quaker? fly: A Presbyterian? sour:
A smart Free-thinker? all things in an hour. }

Ask men's opinions: Scoto now shall tell
How trade increases, and the world goes well;
Strike off his pension, by the setting sun, 160
And Britain, if not Europe, is undone.

That gay Free-thinker, a fine talker once,
What turns him now a stupid, silent dunce?
Some god, or spirit, he has lately found;
Or chanc'd to meet a minister that frown'd.

Judge we by nature? Habit can efface,
Interest o'ercome, or policy take place:
By action? those uncertainty divides!
By passions? these dissimulation hides:
Opinions? they still take a wider range: 170
Find, if you can, in what you cannot change.

Manners with fortunes, humour turn with climes,
Tenets with books, and principles with times.

Search then the ruling passion: There, alone,
The wild are constant, and the cunning known;
The fool consistent, and the false sincere;
Priests, princes, women, no dissemblers here.
This clue once found, unravels all the rest,
The prospect clears, and Wharton stands confess'd.
Wharton, the scorn and wonder of our days, 180
Whose ruling passion was the lust of praise:
Born with whate'er could win it from the wise,
Women and fools must like him, or he dies:

VARIATIONS.

The mighty Czar what mov'd to wed a punk?
The mighty Czar would tell you he was drunk
Altered as above, because Cæsar wrote his Commentaries of this war, and does not tell you he was beat. As Cæsar too afforded an instance of both cases, it was thought better to make him the single example.

Though wondering senates hung on all he spoke,
 The club must hail him master of the joke.
 Shall parts so various aim at nothing new?
 He'll shine a Tully and a Wilmot too.
 Then turns repentant, and his God adores
 With the same spirit that he drinks and whores:
 Enough if all around him but admire, 190
 And now the punk applaud, and now the friar.
 Thus with each gift of nature and of art,
 And wanting nothing but an honest heart;
 Grown all to all, from no one vice exempt;
 And most contemptible, to shun contempt;
 His passion still, to covet general praise;
 His life, to forfeit it a thousand ways;
 A constant bounty, which no friend has made;
 An angel tongue, which no man can persuade;
 A fool, with more of wit than half mankind, 200
 Too rash for thought, for action too refin'd:
 A tyrant to the wise his heart approves;
 A rebel to the very king he loves;
 He dies, sad outcast of each church and state,
 And, harder still! flagitious, yet not great.
 Ask you why Wharton broke through every rule?
 'Twas all for fear the knaves should call him fool.

Nature well known, no prodigies remain,
 Comets are regular, and Wharton plain.

Yet, in this search, the wisest may mistake, 210
 If second qualities for first they take.

When Catiline by rapine swell'd his store;
 When Cæsar made a noble dame a whore;
 In this the lust, in that the avarice,
 Were means, not ends; ambition was the vice.

That very Cæsar, born in Scipio's days,
 Had aim'd like him, by chastity, at praise.
 Lucullus, when frugality could charm,
 Had roasted turnips in the Sabine farm.

In vain th' observer eyes the builder's toil, 220
 But quite mistakes the scaffold for the pile.

In this one passion man can strength enjoy,
 As fits give vigour, just when they destroy.
 Time, that on all things lays his lenient hand,
 Yet tames not this; it sticks to our last sand.
 Consistent in our follies and our sins,
 Here honest nature ends as she begins.

Old politicians chew on wisdom past,
 And totter on in business to the last;
 As weak, as earnest; and as gravely out, 230
 As sober Laneſborow dancing in the gout.

Behold a reverend sire, whom want of grace
 Has made the father of a nameless race,
 Shov'd from the wall perhaps, or rudely press'd
 By his own son, that passes by unblest:
 Still to his wench he crawls on knocking knees,
 And envies every sparrow that he sees.

A salmon's belly, Helluo, was thy fate;
 The doctor call'd, declares all help too late:
 "Mercy! cries Helluo, mercy on my soul! 240
 "Is there no hope?—Alas!—then bring the jowl."

VARIATIONS.

In the former editions, ver. 208.

Nature well known, no miracles remain.
 Altered, as above, for very obvious reasons.

The frugal Crone, whom praying priests attend,
 Still strives to save the hallow'd taper's end,
 Collects her breath, as ebbing life retires,
 For one puff more, and in that puff expires.

"Odious! in woollen! 'twould a saint provoke,
 (Were the last words that poor Narcissa spoke)

"No, let a charming chintz, and Brussels lace,
 "Wrap my cold limbs, and shade my lifeless face:

"One would not, sure, be frightful when one's
 "dead— 250

"And—Betty—give this cheek a little red."

The courtier smooth, who forty years had shin'd
 An humble servant to all human kind, [sir,

Just brought out this, when scarce his tongue could
 "If—where I'm going—I could serve you, Sir!"

"I give and I devise (old Euclio said,
 And sigh'd) "my lands and tenements to Ned."

Your money, Sir?—"My money, Sir! what all?
 "Why—if I must—(then wept) I give it Paul."

The manor, Sir?—"The manor! hold, he
 cry'd. 260

"Not that,—I cannot part with that"—and dy'd.

And you! brave Cobham, to the latest breath,
 Shall feel your ruling passion strong in death:

Such in those moments as in all the past,

"Oh, save my country, Heaven!" shall be your last.

EPISTLE II.

TO A LADY.

Of the Characters of Women.

THERE is nothing in Mr. Pope's works more highly finished than this epistle: Yet its success was in no proportion to the pains he took in composing it. Something he chanced to drop in a short advertisement prefixed to it, on its first publication, may perhaps account for the small attention given to it. He said that no one character in it was drawn from the life. The public believed him on his word, and expressed little curiosity about a satire, in which there was nothing personal.

NOTHING so true as what you once let fall,

"Most women have no characters at all."

Matter too soft a lasting mark to bear,

And best distinguish'd by black, brown, or fair.

How many pictures of one nymph we view,
 All how unlike each other, all how true!

Arcadia's Countess, here, in ermin'd pride,
 Is there, Pastora by a fountain side.

Here Fannia, leering on her own good man,
 And there, a naked Leda with a swan. 10

Let then the fair one beautifully cry,

In Magdalene's loose hair, and lifted eye,

Or dress'd in smiles of sweet Cecilia shine,

With simpering angels, palms, and harps divine;

Whether the charmer sinner it, or saint it.

If folly grow romantic, I must paint it.

Come then, the colours, and the ground prepare!

Dip in the rainbow, trick her off in air;

Choose a firm cloud, before it fall, and in it 19
Catch, ere she change, the Cynthia of this minute.

Rufa, whose eye, quick glancing o'er the Park,
Attracts each light gay meteor of a spark,
Agrees as ill with Rufa studying Locke,
As Sappho's diamonds with her dirty smock;
Or Sappho at her toilet's greasy task,
With Sappho fragrant at an evening mask:
So morning insects, that in muck begun,
Shine, buzz, and fly-blow in the setting sun.

How soft is Silia! fearful to offend; 29
The frail one's advocate, the weak one's friend.
To her Calista prov'd her conduct nice;
And good Simplicius asks of her advice.
Sudden, she storms! she raves! You tip the wink,
But spare your censure; Silia does not drink.
All eyes may see from what the change arose,
All eyes may see—a pimple on her nose.

Papilla, wedded to her amorous spark,
Sighs for the shades—"How charming is a park!"
A park is purchas'd, but the fair he sees 39
All bath'd in tears—"Oh odious, odious trees!"

Ladies, like variegated tulips, shew,
'Tis to their changes half their charms we owe;
Fine by defect, and delicately weak,
Their happy spots the nice admirer take.
'Twas thus Calypso once each heart alarm'd,
Aw'd without virtue, without beauty charm'd;
Her tongue bewitch'd as oddly as her eyes,
Less wit than mimic, more a wit than wise;
Strange graces still, and stranger flights she had,
Was just not ugly, and was just not mad; 50
Yet ne'er so sure our passion to create,
As when she touch'd the brink of all we hate.

Narcissa's nature, tolerably mild,
To make a wash, would hardly stew a child;
Has ev'n been prov'd to grant a lover's prayer,
And paid a tradesman once to make him stare;
Gave alms at Easter, in a Christian trim;
And made a widow happy, for a whim.
Why then declare good nature is her scorn,
When 'tis by that alone she can be borne? 60
Why pique all mortals, yet affect a name?
A fool to pleasure, yet a slave to fame:
Now deep in Taylor and the Book of Martyrs,
Now drinking citron with his Grace and Chartres;
Now conscience chills her, and now passion burns;
And atheism and religion take their turns;
A very Heathen in the carnal part,
Yet still a sad good Christian at her heart.

See sin in state, majestically drunk,
Proud as a peeress, prouder as a punk; 70
Chaste to her husband, frank to all beside,
A teeming mistress, but a barren bride.
What then? let blood and body bear the fault,
Her head's untouch'd, that noble seat of thought:
Such this day's doctrine—in another fit
She sins with poets through pure love of wit.
What has not fir'd her bosom or her brain?
Cæsar and Tall-boy, Charles and Charlemagne.

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 77. What has not fir'd, &c.] In the MS.
In whose mad brain the mix'd ideas roll,
Of Tall-boy's breeches, and of Cæsar's foul.

As Helluo, late dictator of the feast,
The nose of Haut-gout, and the tip of taste, 80
Critiqu'd your wine, and analyz'd your meat,
Yet on plain pudding deign'd at home to eat:
So Philomedè, lecturing all mankind
On the soft passion, and the taste refin'd,
Th' address, the delicacy—stoops at once,
And makes her hearty meal upon a dunce.

Flavia's a wit, has too much sense to pray;
To toast our wants and wishes is her way;
Nor asks of God, but of her stars, to give
The mighty blessing, "while we live, to live," 90
Then all for death, that opiate of the soul!
Lucretia's dagger, Rosamonda's bowl.
Say, what can cause such impotence of mind?
A spark too fickle, or a spouse too kind.
Wife wretch! with pleasures too refin'd to please;
With too much spirit to be e'er at ease;
With too much quickness ever to be taught;
With too much thinking to have common thought:
You purchase pain with all that joy can give,
And die of nothing but a rage to live. 100

Turn then from wits; and look on Simo's mate,
No ass so meek, no ass so obstinate.
Or her, that owns her faults, but never mends,
Because she's honest, and the best of friends.
Or her, whose life the church and scandal share,
For ever in a passion, or a prayer,
Or her, who laughs at hell, (but like her Grace) Cries, "Ah! how charming, if there's no such place!"

Or who in sweet vicissitude appears
Of mirth and opium, ratafie and tears, 110
The daily anodyne, and nightly draught,
To kill those foes to fair ones, time and thought.
Woman and fool are two hard things to hit;
For true no-meaning puzzles more than wit.

But what are these to great Atossa's mind?
Scarce once herself, by turns all womankind!
Who, with herself, or others, from her birth
Finds all her life one warfare upon earth:
Shines in exposing knaves, and painting fools,
Yet is, whate'er she hates and ridicules. 120
No thought advances, but her eddy brain
Whisks it about, and down it goes again.
Full sixty years the world has been her trade,
The wisest fool much time has ever made.
From loveless youth to unrespected age,
No passion gratify'd, except her rage,
So much the fury still out-ran the wit,
The pleasure miss'd her, and the scandal hit.
Who breaks with her, provokes revenge from hell,
But he's a bolder man who dares be well. 130
Her every turn with violence pursued,
Nor more a storm her hate than gratitude:
To that each passion turns, or soon or late;
Love, if it makes her yield, must make her hate:
Superiors? death! and equals? what a curse!
But an inferior not dependant? worse.

VARIATIONS.

After ver. 122, in the MS.
Oppress'd with wealth and wit, abundance sad!
One makes her poor, the other makes her mad.

Offend her, and she knows not to forgive;
 Oblige her, and she'll hate you while you live:
 But die, and she'll adore you—then the bust
 And temple rise—then fall again to dust. 140
 Last night her lord was all that's good and great;
 A knave this morning, and his will a cheat.
 Strange! by the means defeated of the ends,
 By spirit robb'd of power, by warmth of friends,
 By wealth of followers! without one distress
 Sick of herself, through very selfishness!
 Atossa, curs'd with every granted prayer,
 Childless with all her children, wants an heir.
 To heirs unknown descends th' unguarded store,
 Or wanders, heaven-directed, to the poor. 150

Pictures, like these, dear madam, to design,
 Asks no firm hand, and no unerring line;
 Some wandering touches, some reflected light,
 Some flying stroke alone can hit them right:
 For how should equal colours do the knack?
 Chameleons who can paint in white and black?
 "Yet Chloe sure was form'd without a spot."—
 Nature in her then err'd not, but forgot.
 "With every pleasing, every prudent part,
 "Say, what can Chloe want?"—She wants a heart. 160

She speaks, behaves, and acts just as she ought;
 But never, never, reach'd one generous thought.
 Virtue she finds too painful an endeavour,
 Content to dwell in decencies for ever.
 So very reasonable, so unmov'd,
 As never yet to love, or to be lov'd.
 She, while her lover pants upon her breast,
 Can mark the figures on an Indian chest;
 And when she sees her friend in deep despair,
 Observes how much a chintz exceeds mohair. 170
 Forbid it, heaven, a favour or a debt
 She e'er should cancel—but she may forget.
 Safe is your secret still in Chloe's ear;
 But none of Chloe's shall you ever hear.
 Of all her dears she never slander'd one,
 But cares not if a thousand are undone.
 Would Chloe know if you're alive or dead?
 She bids her footman put it in her head.
 Chloe is prudent—would you too be wise?
 Then never break your heart when Chloe dies. 180

One certain portrait may (I grant) be seen,
 Which heaven has varnish'd out, and made a
 queen:

The same for ever! and describ'd by all
 With truth and goodness, as with crown and ball.
 Poets heap virtues, painters gems at will,
 And show their zeal, and hide their want of skill.
 'Tis well—but, artists! who can paint or write,
 To draw the naked is your true delight.
 That robe of quality so struts and swells.
 None see what parts of nature it conceals: 190
 Th' exactest traits of body or of mind,
 We owe to models of an humble kind.

VARIATIONS.

After ver. 148, in the MS.

This death decides; nor lets the blessing fall
 On any one she hates, but on them all.
 Curs'd chance! this only could afflict her more,
 If any part should wander to the poor.

If Queensberry to strip there's no compelling;
 'Tis from a handmaid we must take a Helen.
 From peer or bishop 'tis no easy thing
 To draw the man who loves his God, or king:
 Alas! I copy (or my draught would fail),
 From honest Mah'met, or plain Parson Hale.

But grant, in public men sometimes are shown,
 A woman's seen in private life alone: 200
 Our bolder talents in full light display'd;
 Your virtues open fairest in the shade.
 Bred to disguise, in public 'tis you hide;
 There, none distinguish 'twixt your shame or pride,
 Weakness or delicacy; all so nice,
 That each may seem a virtue, or a vice.

In men we various ruling passions find;
 In women, two almost divide the kind;
 Those, only fix'd, they first or last obey,
 The love of pleasure, and the love of sway. 210

That, nature gives; and where the lesson taught
 Is but to please, can pleasure seem a fault?
 Experience, this; by man's oppression curst,
 They seek the second not to lose the first.

Men, some to business, some to pleasure take;
 But every woman is at heart a rake:
 Men, some to quiet, some to public strife;
 But every lady would be queen for life.

Yet mark the fate of a whole sex of queens:
 Power all their end, but beauty all the means: 220
 In youth they conquer with so wild a rage,
 As leaves them scarce a subject in their age:
 For foreign glory, foreign joy, they roam;
 No thought of peace or happiness at home.
 But wisdom's triumph is well-tim'd retreat,
 As hard a science to the fair as great!
 Beauties, like tyrants, old and friendless grown,
 Yet hate repose, and dread to be alone,
 Worn-out in public, weary every eye,
 Nor leave one sigh behind them when they die.

Pleasures the sex, as children birds, pursue, 230
 Still out of reach, yet never out of view;
 Sure, if they catch, to spoil the toy at most,
 To covet flying, and regret when lost:
 At last, to follies youth could scarce defend,
 It grows their age's prudence to pretend;
 Asham'd to own they gave delight before,
 Reduc'd to feign it, when they give no more:
 As hags hold Sabbaths, less for joy than spite,
 So these their merry, miserable night; 240
 Still round and round the ghosts of beauty glide,
 And haunt the places where their honour dy'd.

VARIATIONS.

After ver. 198, in the MS.

Fain I'd in Fulvia spy the tender wife;
 I cannot prove it on her for my life:
 And, for a noble pride, I blush no less,
 Instead of Berenice to think on Bess.
 Thus while immortal Cibber only sings [kings,
 (As Clarke and Hoadly preach) for queens and
 The nymph that ne'er read Milton's mighty line,
 May, if the love and merit verse, have mine.

Ver. 207, in the first edition:

In several men we several passions find;
 In women, two almost divide the kind.

See how the world its veterans rewards !
A youth of frolics, an old age of cards ;
Fair to no purpose, artful to no end ;
Young without lovers, old without a friend ;
A fop their passion, but their prize a sot ;
Alive, ridiculous ; and dead, forgot !

Ah ! friend ! to dazzle let the vain design ; 249
To raise the thought, and touch the heart, be thine !
That charm shall grow, while what fatigues the ring,

Flaunts and goes down, an unregarded thing ;
So when the sun's broad beam has tir'd the sight,
All mild ascends the moon's more sober light,
Serene in virgin modesty she shines,
And unobserv'd the glaring orb declines.

Oh ! blest with temper, whose unclouded ray
Can make to-morrow cheerful as to-day :
She, who can love a sister's charms, or hear
Sighs for a daughter with unwounded ear ; 260
She who ne'er answers till a husband cools,
Or, if she rules him, never shows she rules ;
Charms by accepting, by submitting sways,
Yet has her humour most, when she obeys ;
Let fops or fortune fly which way they will,
Disdains all loss of tickets, or codille ;
Spleen, vapours, or small-pox, above them all,
And mistress of herself, though China fall.

And yet, believe me, good as well as ill,
Woman's at best a contradiction still. 270
Heaven when it strives to polish all it can
Its last best work, but forms a softer man ;
Picks from each sex, to make the favourite blest.
Your love of pleasure, our desire of rest :
Blends, in exception to all general rules,
Your taste of follies, with our scorn of fools :
Reserve with frankness, art with truth ally'd,
Courage with softness, modesty with pride ;
Fix'd principles, with fancy ever new ;
Shakes all together, and produces—You. 280

Be this a woman's fame ! with this unblest,
Toasts live a scorn, and queens may die a jest.
This Phœbus promis'd (I forget the year)
When those blue eyes first open'd on the sphere ;
Ascendant Phœbus watch'd that hour with care,
Averted half your parents' simple prayer ;
And gave you beauty, but deny'd the pelf
That buys your sex a tyrant o'er itself.
The generous God, who wit and gold refines,
And ripens spirits as he ripens mines, 290
Kept dross for duchesses, the world shall know it,
To you gave sense, good humour, and a poet.

EPISTLE III.

TO ALLEN, LORD BATHURST.

Of the Use of Riches.

THE ARGUMENT.

THAT it is known to few, most falling into one of the extremes, avarice or profusion, ver. 1, &c.
The point discussed, whether the invention of money has been more commodious or pernicious to mankind. ver. 21 to 77. That riches, either to the avaricious or the prodigal, cannot afford happiness, scarcely necessities, ver. 89 to 160.

That avarice is an absolute frenzy, without an end or purpose, ver. 113, &c. 152. Conjectures about the motives of avaricious men, ver. 121 to 153. That the conduct of men, with respect to riches, can only be accounted for by the order of Providence, which works the general good out of extremes, and brings all to its great end by perpetual revolutions, ver. 161 to 178. How a miser acts upon principles which appear to him reasonable, ver. 179. How a prodigal does the same, ver. 199. The due medium, and true use of riches, ver. 219. The man of Ross, ver.
250. The fate of the profuse and the covetous, in two examples ; both miserable in life and in death, ver. 300, &c. The story of Sir Balaam,
ver. 339 to the end.

THIS epistle was written after a violent outcry against our Author, on a supposition that he had ridiculed a worthy nobleman merely for his wrong taste. He justified himself upon that article in a letter to the Earl of Burlington ; at the end of which are these words : " I have " learnt that there are some who would rather
" be wicked than ridiculous : and therefore it
" may be safer to attack vices than follies. I
" will therefore leave my betters in the quiet
" possession of their idols, their groves, and their " high-places ; and change my subject from their
" pride to their meanness, from their vanities
" to their miseries ; and as the only certain way
" to avoid misconstructions, to lessen offence, and " not to multiply ill-natured applications, I may
" probably in my next, make use of real names
" instead of fictitious ones."

P. Who shall decide, when doctors disagree,
And soundest casuists doubt, like you and me ?
You hold the word, from Jove to Momus given,
That man was made the standing jest of Heaven :

And gold but sent to keep the fools in play,
For some to heap, and some to throw away.

But I, who think more highly of our kind,
(And, surely, Heaven and I are of a mind)
Opine, that nature, as in duty bound,
Deep hid the shining mischief under ground : 10
But when, by man's audacious labour won,
Flam'd forth this rival too, its fire, the sun,
Then careful Heaven supply'd twoforts of men,
To squander these, and those to hide again.

Like doctors thus, when much dispute has past,

We find our tenets just the same at last.
Both fairly owning, riches, in effect,
No grace of Heaven or token of th' elect ;
Given to the fool, the mad, the vain, the evil,
To Ward, to Waters, Chartres, and the Devil. 20
B. What nature wants, commodious gold be-flows ;

'Tis thus we eat the bread another sows.

P. But how unequal it bestows, observe;
 'Tis thus we riot, while, who sow it, starve:
 What nature wants (a phrase I must distrust)
 Extends to luxury, extends to lust:
 Useful, I grant, it serves what life requires,
 But dreadful too, the dark assassin hires.
B. Trade it may help, society extend:
P. But lures the pirate, and corrupts the friend. 30
B. It raises armies in a nation's aid:
P. But bribes a senate, and the land's betray'd.
 In vain may heroes fight, and patriots rave,
 If secret gold sap on from knave to knave.
 Once, we confess, beneath the patriot's cloak,
 From the crack'd bag the dropping guinea spoke,
 And jingling down the back-stairs, told the crew,
 "Old Cato is as great a rogue as you."
 Blest paper-credit! last and best supply!
 That lends corruption lighter wings to fly! 40
 Gold, imp'd by thee, can compass hardest things,
 Can pocket states, can fetch or carry kings;
 A single leaf shall waft an army o'er,
 Or ship off senates to some distant shore;
 A leaf, like Sibyl's, scatter to and fro
 Our fates and fortunes, as the wind shall blow:
 Pregnant with thousands flits the scrap unseen,
 And silent sells a king, or buys a queen.
 Oh! that such bulky bribes as all might see,
 Still, as of old, encumber'd villainy! 50
 Could France or Rome divert our brave designs,
 With all their brandies, or with all their wines?
 What could they more than knights and 'squires
 confound,
 Or water all the quorum ten miles round?
 A statesman's slumbers how this speech would spoil!
 "Sir, Spain has sent a thousand jars of oil;
 "Huge bales of British cloth blockade the door:
 "A hundred oxen at your levee roar."
 Poor avarice one torment more would find;
 Nor could profusion squander all in kind. 60
 Astride his cheese Sir Morgan might we meet:
 And Worldly crying coals from street to street,
 Whom, with a wig so wild, and mien so maz'd,
 Pity mistakes for some poor tradesman craz'd.
 Had Colepepper's whole wealth been hops and hogs,
 Could he himself have sent it to the dogs?
 His Grace will game: to White's a bull be led,
 With spurning heels and with a butting head.
 To White's be carry'd as to ancient games,
 Fair courfers, vases, and alluring dames. 70
 Shall then Uxorio, if the stakes he sweep,
 Bear him six whores, and make his lady weep?
 Or soft Adonis, so perfum'd and fine,
 Drive to St. James's a whole herd of swine?
 Oh filthy check on all industrious skill,
 To spoil the nation's last great trade, quadrille!

VARIATIONS.

After ver. 50, in the MS.
 To break a trust were Peter brib'd with wine,
 Peter! 'twould pose as wise a head as thine,

Since then, my Lord, on such a world we fall,
 What say you? B. Say? Why take it, Gold and all.

P. What riches give us, let us then inquire?
 Meat, fire, and clothes. B. What more? P. Meat, clothes, and fire. 80

Is this too little? would you more than live?
 Alas! 'tis more than Turner finds they give.
 Alas! 'tis more than (all his visions past)
 Unhappy Wharton, waking, found at last!
 What can they give? to dying Hopkins, heirs;
 To Chartres, vigour; Japhet, nose and ears?
 Can they, in gems bid pallid Hippia glow,
 In Fulvia's buckle ease the throbs below;
 Or heal, old Narses, thy obscener ail,
 With all th' embroidery plaister'd at thy tail? 90
 They might (were Harpax not too wise to spend)
 Give Harpax self the blessing of a friend;
 Or find some doctor that would save the life
 Of wretched Shylock, spite of Shylock's wife:
 But thousands die, without or this or that,
 Die, and endow a college, or a cat.
 To some, indeed, Heaven grants the happier fate,
 T' enrich a bastard, or a son they hate.

Perhaps you think the poor might have their part;
 Bond damns the poor, and hates them from his heart: 100

The grave Sir Gilbert holds it for a rule
 That every man in want is knave or fool:
 "God cannot love (says Blunt, with tearless eyes)
 "The wretch he starves"—and piously denies:
 But the good bishop, with a meeker air,
 Admits, and leaves them, Providence's care.
 Yet to be just to these poor men of pelf,
 Each does but hate his neighbour as himself:
 Damn'd to the mines, an equal fate betides
 The slave that digs it, and the slave that hides. 110
B. Who suffer thus, mere charity should own,
 Must act on motives powerful, though unknown.
P. Some war, some plague, or famine, they foresee,

Some revelation hid from you and me.
 Why Shylock wants a meal, the cause is found;
 He thinks a loaf will rise to fifty pound.
 What made directors cheat in South-Sea year?
 To live on venison when it sold dear.
 Ask you why Phryne the whole auction buys?
 Phryne foresees a general excise. 120
 Why she and Sappho raise that monstrous sum?
 Alas! they fear a man will cost a plum.

Wise Peter sees the world's respect for gold,
 And therefore hopes this nation may be sold:
 Glorious ambition! Peter, swell thy store,
 And be what Rome's great Didius was before.

The crown of Poland, venal twice an age,
 To just three millions stinted modest Gage.
 But nobler scenes, Maria's dreams unfold,
 Hereditary realms, and worlds of gold. 130

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 77. Since then, &c.] In the former Ed.
 Well then, since with the world we stand or fall,
 Come take it, as we find it, gold and all.

Congenial souls; whose life one avarice joins,
And one fate buries in th' Austrian mines.
Much-injur'd Blunt! why bears he Britain's hate?

A wizard told him in these words our fate:
"At length corruption, like a general flood,
" (So long by watchful ministers withstood)
" Shall deluge all; and avarice, creeping on,
" Spread like a low-borne mist, and blot the sun;
" Statesman and patriot ply alike the stocks,
" Peerefs and butler there alike the box. 140
" And judges job, and bishops bite the town,
" And mighty dukes pack cards for half a crown.
" See Britain sunk in lucre's fordid charms,
" And France reveng'd of Anne's and Edward's
" arms!" [brain,

'Twas no court badge, great scrivener, fir'd thy
Nor lordly luxury, nor city gain:
No, 'twas thy righteous end, asham'd to see
Senates degenerate, patriots disagree,
And nobly wishing party-rage to cease,
To buy both sides, and give thy country peace.

"All this is madness," cries a sober sage: 151
But who, my friend, has reason in his rage?
"The ruling passion, be it what it will,
"The ruling passion conquers reason still."
Lefs mad the wildest whimsey we can frame,
Than even that passion, if it has no aim;
For though such motives folly you may call,
The folly's greater to have none at all.

Hear then the truth: "'Tis Heaven each passion sends,

"And different men directs to different ends.
"Extremes in nature equal good produce, 161
"Extremes in man concur to general use."

Ask we what makes one keep, and one bestow?
That power who bids the ocean ebb and flow,
Bids seed-time, harvest, equal course maintain,
Through reconcil'd extremes of drought and rain,
Builds life on death, on change duration founds,
And gives th' eternal wheels to know their rounds.

Riches, like insects, when conceal'd they lie,
Wait but for wings, and in their season fly. 170
Who sees pale Mammon pine amidst his store,
Sees but a backward steward for the poor;
This year a reservoir, to keep and spare;
The next a fountain, spouting through his heir,
In lavish streams to quench a country's thirst,
And men and dogs shall drink him till they burst.

Old Cotta sham'd his fortune and his birth,
Yet was not Cotta void of wit or worth:
What though (the use of barbarous spits forgot)
His kitchen vied in coolness with his grot? 180
His court with nettles, moats with cresses stor'd,
With soups unbought and fallads blest'd his board?
If Cotta liv'd on pulse, it was no more
Than Bramins, saints, and sages did before;
To cram the rich, was prodigal expence,
And who would take the poor from Providence?
Like some lone Chartreux stands the good old hall,
Silence without, and fasts within the wall;
No rafter'd roofs with dance and tabor sound,
No noontide bell invites the country round: 190
Tenants with sighs the smokeless towers survey,
And turn th' unwilling steeds another way:

Benighted wanderers, the forest o'er,
Curse the sav'd candle, and unopening door;
While the gaunt mastiff, growling at the gate,
Affrights the beggar whom he longs to eat.

Not so his son: he mark'd this oversight,
And then mistook reverse of wrong for right.
(For what to shun, will no great knowledge need:
But what to follow, is a task indeed), 200
Yet sure, of qualities deserving praise,
More go to ruin fortunes, than to raise.
What slaughter'd hecatombs, what floods of wine,
Fill the capacious 'squire, and deep divine!
Yet no mean motives this profusion draws,
His oxen perish in his country's cause;
'Tis George and Liberty that crowns the cup,
And zeal for that great house which eats him up.
The woods recede around the naked seat, 209
The Sylvans groan—no matter—for the fleet:
Next goes his wool—to clothe our valiant bands:
Last, for his country's love, he sells his lands.
To town he comes, completes the nation's hope,
And heads the bold train-bands, and burns a Pope:
And shall not Britain now reward his toils,
Britain, that pays her patriots with her spoils?
In vain at court the bankrupt pleads his cause,
His thankless country leaves him to her laws.

The sense to value riches, with the art
T' enjoy them, and the virtue to impart, 220
Not meanly, nor ambitiously pursued,
Not sunk by sloth, not rais'd by servitude;
To balance fortune by a just expence,
Join with æconomy, magnificence;
With splendour, charity; with plenty, health;
Oh teach us, Bathurst! yet unspoil'd by wealth!
That secret rare, between th' extremes to move
Of mad good-nature, and of mean self-love.

B. To worth or want well-weigh'd, be bounty given,

And ease, or emulate, the care of Heaven; 230
(Whose measure full o'erflows on human race)
Mend fortune's fault, and justify her grace.
Wealth in the gross is death, but life diffus'd;
As poison heats, in just proportion us'd:
In heaps, like ambergris, a stink it lies,
But well dispers'd, is incense to the skies.

P. Who starves by nobles, or with nobles eats?
The wretch that trusts them, and the rogue that cheats.

Is there a lord, who knows a cheerful noon
Without a siddler, flatterer, or buffoon! 240

VARIATIONS.

After ver. 218, in the MS.

Where one lean herring furnish'd Cotta's board,
And nettles grew, fit porridge for their lord;
Where mad good-nature, bounty misapply'd,
In lavish Curio blaz'd a while and dy'd;
There Providence once more shall shift the scene,
And shewing H—y, teach the golden mean.

After ver. 226, in the MS.

*The secret rare, which affluence hardly join'd,
Which W—n lost, yet B—y ne'er could find:
Still miss'd by vice, and scarce by virtue hit,
By G—'s goodness, or by S—'s wit,

Whose table, wit, or modest merit share,
Un-elbow'd by a gamester, pimp, or player?
Who copies your's, or Oxford's better part,
To ease th' oppress'd, and raise the sinking heart?
Where'er he shines, oh fortune, gild the scene,
And angels guard him in the golden mean!
There, English bounty yet a while may stand,
And honour linger ere it leaves the land.

But all our praises why should lords engross!
Rise, honest muse; and sing the Man of Rofs: 250
Pleas'd Vaga echoes through her winding bounds,
And rapid Severn hoarse applause resounds.
Who hung with woods yon mountain's sultry brow?

From the dry rock who bade the waters flow?
Not to the skies in useless columns tost,
Or in proud falls magnificently lost,
But clear and artless, pouring through the plain
Health to the sick, and solace to the swain.
Whose causeway parts the vale with shady rows?
Whose seats the weary traveller repose? 260
Who taught that heaven-directed spire to rise!
"The Man of Rofs," each lisping babe replies.
Behold the market-place with poor o'erspread!
The Man of Rofs divides the weekly bread:
He feeds yon alms-house, neat, but void of state,
Where age and want sit smiling at the gate;
Him portion'd maids, apprentic'd orphans blest,
The young who labour, and the old who rest.
Is any sick? the Man of Rofs relieves, 269
Prescribes, attends, the medicine makes, and gives.
Is there a variance? enter but his door,
Bl'k'd are the courts, and contest is no more.
Despairing quacks with curses fled the place,
And vile attorneys, now an useless race.

B. Thrice happy man! enabled to pursue
What all so wish, but want the power to do!
Oh say, what sums that generous hand supply?
What mines to swell that boundless charity!

P. Of debts and taxes, wife and children clear,
This man possess—five hundred pounds a-year.
Blush, grandeur, blush! proud courts, withdraw your blaze! 281
Ye little flats! hide your diminish'd rays.

B. And what! no monument, inscription, stone?
His race, his form, his name almost unknown?

P. Who builds a church to God, and not to fame,
Will never mark the marble with his name:
Go, search it there, where to be born and die,
Of rich and poor makes all the history;
Enough, that virtue fill'd the space between;
Prov'd by the ends of being, to have been. 290
When Hopkins dies, a thousand lights attend
The wretch, who living sav'd a candle's end;

VARIATIONS.

After ver. 250, in the MS.

Trace humble worth beyond Sabrina's shore,
Who sings not him, oh may he sing no more!

Ver. 287. Thus in the MS.

The register inrolls him with his poor,
Tells he was born, and dy'd, and tells no more.
Just as he ought, he fill'd the space between;
Then stole to rest, unheeded and unseen.

Shouldering God's altar a vile image stands,
Belies his features, nay extends his hands;
That live-long wig, which Gorgon's self might own,
Eternal buckle takes in Parian stone.

Behold what blessings wealth to life can lend!
And see, what comfort it affords our end.
In the worst inn's worst room, with mat half-hung,
The floors of plaster, and the walls of dung, 300
On once a flock-bed, but repair'd with straw,
With tape-ty'd curtains, never meant to draw,
The George and Garter dangling from that bed
Where tawdry yellow strove with dirty red,
Great Villers lies—alas! how chang'd from him,
That life of pleasure, and that soul of whim!
Gallant and gay, in Cliveden's proud alcove,
The bower of wanton Shrewsbury and love;
Or just as gay, at council, in a ring
Of mimic'd statesmen, and their merry king. 310
No wit to flatter, left of all his store!

No fool to laugh at, which he valued more.
There, victor of his health, of fortune, friends,
And fame, this lord of useless thousands ends.

His Grace's fate sage Cutler could foresee,
And well (he thought) advis'd him, "Live like me!"

As well his Grace reply'd, "Like you, Sir John?"
"That I can do, when all I have is gone."
Resolve me, reason, which of these are worse,
Want with a full, or with an empty purse? 320
Thy life more wretched, Cutler, was confess'd,
Arise, and tell me, was thy death more blest'd?
Cutler saw tenants break, and houses fall,
For very want; he could not build a wall.
His only daughter in a stranger's power,
For very want; he could not pay a dower.
A few grey hairs his reverend temples crown'd,
'Twas very want that sold them for two pound.
What! even deny'd a cordial at his end,
Banish'd the doctor, and expell'd the friend? 330
What but a want, which you perhaps think mad,
Yet numbers feel, the want of what he had!
Cutler and Brutus dying, both exclaim,
"Virtue! and wealth! what are ye but a name!"

Say, for such worth are other worlds prepar'd?
Or are they both, in this, their own reward?
A knotty point! to which we now proceed.
But you are tir'd—I'll tell a tale—B. Agreed.

P. Where London's column, pointing at the skies
Like a tall bully, lifts the head, and lies; 340
There dwelt a citizen of sober fame,
A plain good man, and Balaam was his name;
Religious, punctual, frugal, and so forth;
His word would pass for more than he was worth.
One solid dish his week-day meal affords,
An added pudding solemniz'd the Lord's: [sure,
Constant at church, and Change; his gains were
His givings rare, save farthings to the poor.

The devil was piqu'd such faintship to behold,
And long'd to tempt him, like good Job of old: 350

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 337. In the former editions.

That knotty point, my Lord, shall I discuss,
Or tell a tale?—A tale—it follows thus.

But Satan now is wiser than of yore,
And tempts by making rich, not making poor.
Rouz'd by the Prince of Air, the whirlwinds
sweep

The surge, and plunge his father in the deep;
Then full against his Cornish lands they roar,
And two rich shipwrecks bless the lucky shore.

Sir Balaam now, he lives like other folks,
He takes his chirping pint, and cracks his jokes:
"Live like yourself," was soon my lady's word;
And lo! two puddings smok'd upon the board.

Asleep and naked as an Indian lay, 361
An honest factor stole a gem away:
He pledg'd it to the knight, the knight had wit,
So kept the diamond, and the rogue was bit.
Some scruple rose, but thus he eas'd his thought,
"I'll now give sixpence where I gave a groat;
"Whereonce I went to church, I'll now go twice—
"And am so clear too of all other vice."

The tempter saw his time: the work he ply'd;
Stocks and subscriptions pour on every side, 370
Till all the dæmon makes his full descent
In one abundant shower of cent per cent,
Sinks deep within him, and possesses whole,
Then dubs director, and secures his soul.

Behold Sir Balaam, now a man of spirit,
Ascribes his gettings to his parts and merit;
What late he call'd a blessing now is wit,
And God's good providence a lucky hit.
Things change their titles, as our manners turn:
His counting-house employ'd the Sunday morn:
Seldom at church, ('twas such a busy life) 381
But duly sent his family and wife.

There (so the devil ordain'd) one Christmas tide
My good old lady catch'd a cold, and dy'd.

A nymph of quality admires our knight;
He marries, bows at Court, and grows polite;
Leaves the dull cits, and joins (to please the fair)
The well-bred cuckolds in St. James's air:
First, for his son a gay commission buys,
Who drinks, whores, fights, and in a duel dies: 390
His daughter flaunts a viscount's tawdry wife;
She bears a coronet and p--x for life.
In Britain's senate he a seat obtains,
And one more pensioner St. Stephen gains.
My lady falls to play: so bad her chance,
He must repair it; takes a bribe from France;
The House impeach him, Coningsby harangues;
The Court forsake him, and Sir Balaam hangs:
Wife, son, and daughter, Satan! are thy own,
His wealth, yet dearer, forfeit to the crown; 400
The devil and the king divide the prize,
And sad Sir Balaam curses God and dies.

EPISTLE IV.

TO RICHARD BOYLE, EARL OF BURLINGTON.

Of the Use of Riches.

THE ARGUMENT.

THE vanity of expence in people of wealth and quality. The abuse of the word taste, ver. 15.
VOL. VIII.

That the first principle and foundation in this, as in every thing else, is good sense, ver. 40. The chief proof of it is to follow Nature, even in works of mere luxury and elegance. Instanced in architecture and gardening, where all must be adapted to the genius and use of the place, and the beauties not forced into it, but resulting from it, ver. 50. How men are disappointed in their most expensive undertakings, for want of this true foundation, without which nothing can please long, if at all; and the best examples and rules will be perverted into something burdensome and ridiculous, ver. 65, &c. to 92. A description of the false taste of magnificence; the first grand error of which is, to imagine that greatness consists in the size and dimension, instead of the proportion and harmony of the whole, ver. 97. and the second, either in joining together parts incoherent, or too minutely resembling, or in the repetition of the same too frequently, ver. 105, &c. A word or two of false taste in books, in music, in painting, even in preaching and prayer; and, lastly, in entertainments, ver. 133, &c. Yet Providence is justified in giving wealth to be squandered in this manner, since it is dispersed to the poor and laborious part of mankind, ver. 169, &c. [recurring to what is laid down in the first Book, Ep. ii. and in the Epistle preceding this, ver. 159, &c.] What are the proper objects of magnificence, and a proper field for the expence of great men, ver. 177, &c. and finally the great and public works which become a prince, ver. 191, to the end.

The extremes of avarice and profusion being treated of in the foregoing epistle; this takes up one particular branch of the latter, the vanity of expence in people of wealth and quality; and is therefore a corollary to the preceding, just as the Epistle on the Characters of Women is to that of the Knowledge and Characters of Men. It is equally remarkable for exactness of method with the rest. But the nature of the subject, which is less philosophical, makes it capable of being analyzed in a much narrower compass.

'Tis strange, the miser should his cares employ
To gain those riches he can ne'er enjoy:
Is it less strange, the prodigal should waste
His wealth, to purchase what he ne'er can taste?
Not for himself he sees, or hears, or eats;
Artists must choose his pictures, music, meats;
He buys for Topham drawings and designs;
For Pembroke statues, dirty gods, and coins;
Rare monkish manuscripts for Hearne alone,
And books for Mead, and butterflies for Sloane.
Think we all these are for himself? no more 11
Than his fine wife, alas! or finer whore.

For what has Virro painted, built, and planted:
Only to show, how many tastes he wanted.
What brought Sir Visto's ill-got wealth to waste?
Some dæmon whisper'd, "Visto! have a taste."
Heaven visits with a taste the wealthy fool,
And needs no rod but Ripley with a rule.

H

See! sportive fate, to punish aukward pride,
Bids Bubo build, and sends him such a guide : 20
A standing sermon, at each year's expence,
That never coxcomb reach'd magnificence!

You show us Rome was glorious, not profuse,
And pompous buildings once were things of use.
Yet shall (my lord) your just, your noble rules
Fill half the land with imitating fools;
Who random drawings from your sheets shall take,

And of one beauty many blunders make;
Load some vain church with old Theatric state,
Turn arts of triumph to a garden gate; 30
Reverse your ornaments, and hang them all
On some patch'd dog-hole ek'd with ends of wall;
Then clap four slices of pilaster on't,
That, lac'd with bits of rustic, makes a front.
Shall call the winds through long arcades to roar,
Proud to catch cold at a Venetian door;
Conscious they act a true Palladian part,
And if they starve, they starve by rules of art.

Oft have you hinted to your brother peer,
A certain truth, which many buy too dear : 40
Something there is more needful than expence,
And something previous ev'n to taste—'tis sense:
Good sense, which only is the gift of Heaven,
And though no science, fairly worth the seven:
A light, which in yourself you must perceive;
Jones and Le Nôtre have it not to give.

To build, to plant, whatever you intend,
To rear the column, or the arch to bend,
To swell the terrace, or to sink the grot; 50
In all, let nature never be forgot.
But treat the goddess like a modest fair,
Nor over dress, nor leave her wholly bare;
Let not each beauty every where be spy'd,
Where half the skill is decently to hide.
He gains all points, who pleasingly confounds,
Surprises, varies, and conceals the bounds.

Consult the genius of the place in all;
That tells the waters or to rise or fall;
Or helps th' ambitious hill the heavens to scale,
Or scoops in circling theatres the vale; 60
Calls in the country, catches opening glades,
Joins willing woods, and varies shades from shades;
Now breaks, or now directs th' intending lines;
Paints as you plant, and, as you work, designs.

Still follow sense, of every art the soul,
Parts answering parts shall slide into a whole,
Spontaneous beauties all around advance,
Start ev'n from difficulty, strike from chance;
Nature shall join you; time shall make it grow
A work to wonder at—perhaps a Stow. 70

Without it, proud Versailles thy glory falls;
And Nero's terraces desert their walls:
The vast parterres a thousand hands shall make,
Lo! Cobham comes, and floats them with a lake:

VARIATIONS.

After ver. 22, in the MS.

Must bishops, lawyers, statesmen have the skill
To build, to plant, judge paintings, what you will?
Then why not Kent as well our treaties draw,
Bridgman explain the gospel, Gibbs the law?

Or cut wide views through mountains to the plain,
You'll wish your hill or shelter'd seat again.

Ev'n in an ornament its place remark,
Nor in an hermitage set Dr. Clarke.
Behold Villario's ten years toil complete;
His quincunx darkens, his espaliers meet; 80
The wood supports the plain, the parts unite,
And strength of shade contends with strength of
light;

A waving glow the bloomy beds display,
Blushing in bright diversities of day,
With silver-quivering rills meander'd o'er—
Enjoy them, you! Villario can no more;
Tir'd of the scene parterres and fountains yield,
He finds at last he better likes a field.

Through his young woods how pleas'd Sabinus
stray'd,

Or fate delighted in the thickening shade, 90
With annual joy the reddening shoots to greet,
Or see the stretching branches long to meet!
His son's fine taste an opener vista loves,
Foe to the Dyrads of his father's groves;
One boundless green, or flourish'd carpet views,
With all the mournful family of yews:
The thriving plants ignoble broomsticks made,
Now sweep those alleys they were born to shade.

At Timon's villa let us pass a day,
Where all cry out, "What sums are thrown away!"

So proud, so grand; of that stupendous air,
Soft and agreeable come never there.
Greatness, with Timon, dwells in such a draught.
As brings all Brobdignag before your thought.
To compass this, his building is a town,
His pond an ocean, his parterre a down:
Who but must laugh, the master when he sees,
A puny insect, shivering at a breeze!
Lo, what huge heaps of littleness around!
The whole, a labour'd quarry above ground, 110
Two Cupids squirt before: a lake behind
Improves the keenness of the northern wind.
His gardens next your admiration call,
On every side you look, behold the wall!

No pleasing intricacies intervene,
No artful wildness to perplex the scene;
Grove nods at grove, each alley has a brother,
And half the platform just reflects the other.
The suffering eye inverted nature sees,
Trees cut to statues, statues thick as trees; 120
With here a fountain, never to be play'd;
And there a summer-house that knows no shade;
Here Amphitrite sails through myrtle bowers;
There gladiators fight, or die in flowers;
Unwater'd see the drooping sea-horse mourn,
And swallows roost in Nilus' dusty urn.

My lord advances with majestic mien,
Smit with the mighty pleasure to be seen:
But soft—by regular approach—not yet— 129
First through the length of yon hot terrace sweat;
And when up ten steep slopes you've dragg'd your
Just at his study-door he'll bless your eyes [thighs,
His study! with what authors is it stor'd?
In books, not authors, curious is my lord;
To all their dated backs he turns you round;
These Aldus printed, those Du Sueil has bound,

Lo some are vellum, and the rest as good
For all his lordship knows, but they are wood.
For Locke or Milton, 'tis in vain to look,
These shelves admit not any modern book. 140

And now the chapel's silver bell you hear,
That summons you to all the pride of prayer;
Light quirks of music, broken and uneven,
Make the soul dance upon a jig to heaven.
On painted ceilings you devoutly stare,
Where sprawl the saints of Verrio or Laguerre,
Or gilded clouds in fair expansion lie,
And bring all paradise before your eye.
To rest, the cushion and soft dean invite,
Who never mentions hell to ears polite. 150

But hark! the chiming clocks to dinner call;
A hundred footsteps scrape the marble hall:
The rich buffet well-coloured serpents grace,
And gaping Tritons spew to wash your face.
Is this a dinner? this a genial room?
No, 'tis a temple, and a hecatomb.
A solemn sacrifice perform'd in state,
You drink by measure, and to minutes eat.
So quick retires each flying course, you'd swear
Sancho's dread doctor and his wand were there. 160
Between each act the trembling salvers ring,
From soup to sweet-wine, and God blebs the King.

In plenty starving, tantaliz'd in state,
And complaisantly help'd to all I hate,
Treated, caress'd, and tir'd, I take my leave,
Sick of his civil pride from morn to eve;
I curse such lavish cost, and little skill,
And swear no day was ever past so ill.

Yet hence the poor are cloth'd, the hungry fed;
Health to himself, and to his infants bread, 170
The labourer bears: What his hard heart denies,
His charitable vanity supplies.

Another age shall see the golden ear
Imbrown the slope, and nod on the parterre,
Deep harvest bury all his pride has plann'd,
And laughing Ceres re-assume the land.

Who then shall grace, or who improve the soil?
Who plants like Bathurst, or who builds like Boyle.
'Tis use alone but sanctifies expence,
And splendor borrows all her rays from sense. 180

His father's acres who enjoys in peace,
Or makes his neighbours glad, if he increase:
Whose cheerful tenants blebs their yearly toil,
Yet to their lord owe more than to the soil;
Whose ample lawns are not asham'd to feed
The milky heifer and deserving steed;
Whose rising forests, not for pride or show,
But future buildings, future navies, grow:
Let his plantations stretch from down to down,
First shade a country, and then raise a town. 190

You too proceed! make falling arts your care,
Erect new wonders, and the old repair;
Jones and Palladio to themselves restore,
And be whate'er Vitruvius was before:
Till kings call forth th' ideas of your mind.
(Proud to accomplish what such hands design'd)
Bid harbours open, public ways extend,
Bid temples worthier of the god ascend;
Bid the broad arch the dangerous flood contain,
The mole projected break the roaring main; 200

Back to his bounds their subject sea command,
And all obedient rivers through the land;
These honours, peace to happy Britain brings;
These are imperial works, and worthy kings.

EPISTLE V.

TO MR. ADDISON,

Occasioned by his Dialogues on Medals.

THIS was originally written in the year 1715, when
Mr. Addison intended to publish his book of Medals; it was some time before he was Secretary of State; but not published till Mr. Tickell's edition of his works; at which time the verses on Mr. Craggs, which conclude the poem, were added, viz. in 1720.

As the third Epistle treated of the extremes of avarice and profusion; and the fourth took up one particular branch of the latter, namely, the vanity of expence in people of wealth and quality, and was therefore a corollary to the third; so this treats of one circumstance of that vanity, as it appears in the common collectors of old coins; and is, therefore, a corollary to the fourth.

SEE the wild waste of all-devouring years!
How Rome her own sad sepulchre appears,
With nodding arches, broken temples spread!
The very tombs now vanish'd like their dead;
Imperial wonders rais'd on nations spoil'd, [toil'd:
Where mix'd with slaves the groaning martyr
Huge theatres, that now unpeopled woods,
Now drain'd a distant country of her floods:
Fanes, which admiring gods with pride survey;
Statues of men, scarce less alive than they! 10
Some felt the silent stroke of mouldering age,
Some hostile fury, some religious rage.
Barbarian blindness, Christian zeal conspire,
And Papal piety, and Gothic fire.
Perhaps, by its own ruins sav'd from flame,
Some bury'd marble half preserves a name;
That name the learn'd with fierce disputes pursue,
And give to Titus old Vespasian's due.

Ambition sigh'd: she found in vain to trust
The faithless column and the crumbling bust: 20
Huge moles, whose shadow stretch'd from shore to shore,

Their ruins perish'd, and their place no more!
Convinc'd she now contracts her vast design,
And all her triumphs shrink into a coin.
A narrow orb each crowded conquest keeps,
Beneath her palm here sad Judea weeps.
Now scantier limits the proud arch confine,
And scarce are seen the prostrate Nile or Rhine;
A small Euphrates through the piece is roll'd,
And little eagles wave their wings in gold. 30

The medal, faithful to its charge of fame,
Through climes and ages bears each form and name;
In one short view subjected to our eye
Gods, emperors, heroes, sages, beauties, lie.
With sharpen'd sight pale antiquaries pore,
Th' inscription value, but the rust adore.

This the blue varnish, that the green endears,
The sacred rust of twice ten hundred years!
To gain Pescennius one employs his schemes,
One grasps a Cecrops in ecstatic dreams. 40
Poor Vadius, long with learned spleen devour'd,
Can taste no pleasure since his shield was scour'd:
And Curio, restless by the fair-one's side,
Sighs for an Otho, and neglects his bride.

Theirs is the vanity, the learning thine:
Touch'd by thy hand, again Rome's glories shine:
Her gods and godlike heroes rise to view,
And all her faded garlands bloom anew.
Nor blush, these studies thy regard engage;
These pleas'd the fathers of poetic rage: 50
The verse and sculpture bore an equal part,
And art reflected images to art.

Oh, when shall Britain, conscious of her claim,
Stand emulous of Greek and Roman fame?

In living medals see her wars enroll'd,
And vanquish'd realms supply recording gold?
Here, rising bold, the patriot's honest face;
There, warriors frowning in historic bras:
Then future ages with delight shall see
How Plato's, Bacon's, Newton's looks agree; 60
Or in fair series laurel'd bards be shown,
A Virgil there, and here an Addison.
Then shall thy Craggs (and let me call him mine)
On the cast ore, another Pollio, shine:
With aspect open shall erect his head,
And round the orb in lasting notes be read,
"Statesman, yet friend to truth! of soul sincere,
"In action faithful, and in honour clear;
"Who broke no promise, serv'd no private end,
"Who gain'd no title, and who lost no friend; 70
"Ennobled by himself, by all approv'd,
"And prais'd, unenvy'd, by the muse he lov'd."

EPISTLE TO DR. ARBUTHNOT:

BEING THE

PROLOGUE TO THE SATIRES.

Advertisement to the first Publication of this Epistle.

THIS paper is a sort of bill of complaint, begun many years since, and drawn up by snatches, as the several occasions offered. I had no thoughts of publishing it, till it pleased some persons of rank and fortune [the authors of verses to the imitator of Horace, and of an epistle to a Doctor of Divinity from a nobleman at Hampton-Court] to attack, in a very extraordinary manner, not only my writings (of which, being public, the public is judge) but my person, morals, and family, whereof, to those who know me not, a truer information may be requisite. Being divided between the necessity to say something of myself, and my own laziness to undertake so awkward a task, I thought it the shortest way to put the last hand to this epistle. If it have any thing pleasing, it will be that by which I am most desirous to please, the truth and the sentiment; and if any thing offensive, it will be only to those I am least sorry to offend, the vicious or the ungenerous.

Many will know their own pictures in it, there being not a circumstance but what is true: but I have, for the most part, spared their names; and they may escape being laughed at, if they please. I would have some of them to know, it was owing to the request of the learned and candid friend to whom it is inscribed, that I make not as free use of theirs as they have done of mine. However, I shall have this advantage and honour on my side, that whereas, by their proceeding, any abuse may be directed at any man, no injury can possibly be done by mine, since a nameless character can never be found out, but by its truth and likeness.

P. SHUT, shut the door, good John! fatigu'd I said,
Tie up the knocker, say I'm sick, I'm dead.
The dog-star rages! nay, 'tis past a doubt,
All Bedlam, or Parnassus, is let out:
Fire in each eye, and papers in each hand,
They rave, recite, and madden round the land.

What walls can guard me, or what shades can hide?

They pierce my thickets, through my grot they glide.
By land, by water, they renew the charge;
They stop the chariot, and they board the barge. 10
No place is sacred, not the church is free,
Ev'n Sunday shines no Sabbath day to me;
Then from the mint walks forth the man of rhyme,
Happy! to catch me, just at dinner-time.

Is there a parson, much bemus'd in beer,
A maudlin poetess, a rhyming peer,
A clerk, foredoom'd his father's soul to cross,
Who pens a stanza, when he should engross?
Is there, who, lock'd from ink and paper, scrawls
With desperate charcoal round his darken'd walls?
All fly to Twit'nam, and in humble strain 21
Apply to me, to keep them mad or vain.

VARIATIONS.

After ver. 20, in the MS.

Is there a bard in durance? turn them free,
With all their brandish'd reams they run to me:
Is there a 'prentice, having seen two plays,
Who would do something in his sempstress' praise—

Arthur, whose giddy son neglects the laws,
Imputes to me and my damn'd works the cause :
Poor Cornus sees his frantic wife elope,
And curses wit, and poetry, and Pope.

Friend to my life ! (which did you not prolong,
The world had wanted many an idle song),
What drop or nostrum can this plague remove ?
Or which must end me, a fool's wrath or love ? 30
A dire dilemma ? either way I'm sped ;
If foes, they write, if friends, they read me dead.
Seiz'd and ty'd down to judge, how wretched I ?
Who can't be silent, and who will not lie :
To laugh, were want of goodness and of grace ;
And to be grave, exceeds all power of face.
I sit with sad civility ; I read

With honest anguish, and an aching head ;
And drop at last, but in unwilling ears, 39
This saving counsel, "Keep your piece nine years"

Nine years cries he, who high in Drury-lane,
Lull'd by soft zephyrs through the broken pane,
Rhymes e'er he wakes, and prints before term ends,
Oblig'd by hunger, and request of friends :

"The piece, you think, is incorrect ? why take it ;
"I'm all submission ; what you'd have it, make it."

Three things another's modest wishes bound,
My friendship, and a prologue, and ten pound.

Pitholeon sends to me : "You know his grace ;

"I want a patron ; ask him for a place." 50

Pitholeon libell'd me—"but here's a letter

"Informs you, Sir, 'twas when he knew no better.

"Dare you refuse him ? Curll invites to dine,

"He'll write a journal, or he'll turn divine."

Bless me ! a packet—" 'Tis a stranger sues,

"A virgin tragedy, an orphan muse."

If I dislike it, "furies, death and rage !"

If I approve, "commend it to the stage."

There (thank my stars) my whole commission ends,
The players and I are, luckily, no friends. 60

Fir'd that the house reject him, " 'Sdeath ! I'll
"print it,

"And shame the fools—your interest, Sir, with Lintot."

Lintot, dull rogue ! will think your price too much :

"Not, Sir, if you revise it, and retouch."

All my demurs but double his attacks :

At last he whispers, "Do ; and we go snacks."

Glad of a quarrel, straight I clap the door,

"Sir, let me see your works and you no more."

'Tis sung, when Midas' ears began to spring.
(Midas, a sacred person and a king), 70

His very minister, who spy'd them first,

Some say his queen), was forc'd to speak, or burst.

And is not mine, my friend, a sorer case,

When every coxcomb perks them in my face ?

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 29, in the 1st Ed.

Dear doctor, tell me, is not this a curse ?

Say, is their anger, or their friendship worse ?

Ver. 33, in the MS.

If you refuse, he goes, as fates incline,

To plague Sir Robert, or to turn divine.

Ver. 60, in the former Ed.

Cibber and I are luckily no friends,

A. Good friend, forbear ! you deal in dangerous things ;
I'd never name queens, ministers, or kings ;
Keep close to ears, and those let asses prick,
'Tis nothing—P. Nothing ? if they bite and kick ?
Out with it, Dunciad ! let the secret pass,
That secret to each fool, that he's an ass : 80
The truth once told (and wherefore should we lie ?)
The queen of Midas slept, and so may I.

You think this cruel ? Take it for a rule,
No creature smarts so little as a fool.
Let peals of laughter, Codrus ! round thee break,
Thou unconcern'd canst hear the mighty crack :
Pit, box, and gallery, in convulsions hurl'd,
Thou stand'st unshook amidst a bursting world.
Who shames a scribbler ? Break one cobweb through,
He spins the flight, self-pleasing thread anew : 90

Destroy his fib or sophistry, in vain,
The creature's at his dirty work again,
Thron'd on the centre of his thin designs,
Proud of a vast extent of flimsy lines :

Whom have I hurt ? has poet yet, or peer,

Lost the arch'd eyebrow, or Parnassian sneer ?

And has not Colly still his lord, and whore ?

His butchers Henley, his Free-masons Moor ?

Does not one table Bavius still admit ? 99

Still to one bishop Philips seem a wit ? [send,

Still Sappho—A. Hold : for God's sake—you'll of-

No names—be calm—learn prudence of a friend :

I too could write, and I am twice as tall ; [all.

But foes like these—P. One flatterer's worse than

Of all mad creatures, if the learn'd are right,

It is the flaver kills, and not the bite.

A fool quite angry is quite innocent :

Alas ! 'tis ten times worse when they repent.

One dedicates in high heroic prose,
And ridicules beyond a hundred foes : 110

One from all Grub-street will my fame defend,

And, more abusive, calls himself my friend.

This prints my letters, that expects a bribe,

And others roar aloud, "Subscribe, subscribe !"

There are, who to my person pay their court :

I cough like Horace, and, though lean, am short.

Ammon's great son one shoulder had too high,

Such Ovid's nose, and, "Sir ! you have an eye."—

Go on, obliging creature, make me see

All that disgrac'd my betters, met in me. 120

Say for my comfort, languishing in bed,

"Just so immortal Maro held his head ;"

And when I die, be sure you let me know

Great Homer dy'd three thousand years ago.

Why did I write ? what sin to me unknown

Dipp'd me in ink, my parents', or my own ?

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 111, in the MS.

For song, for silence some expect a bribe :

And others roar aloud, "Subscribe, subscribe !"

Time, praise, or money, is the least they crave ;

Yet each declares the other fool or knave.

After ver. 124, in the MS.

But, friend, this shape, which you and Curll * admire,

Came not from Ammon's son, but from my fire † ;

* Curll set up his head for a sign.

† His father was crooked.

As yet a child, nor yet a fool to fame,
I lisp'd in numbers, for the numbers came.
I left no calling for this idle trade,
No duty broke, no father disobey'd : 130
The muse but serv'd to ease some friend, not wife;
To help me through this long disease, my life;
To second, Arbuthnot : thy art and care,
And teach, the being you preserv'd, to bear.
But why then publish ? Granville the polite,
And knowing Walsb, would tell me I could write ;
Well-natur'd Garth inflam'd with early praise,
And Congreve lov'd, and Swift endur'd my lays ;
The courtly Talbot, Somers, Sheffield read,
Ev'n mitred Rochester would nod the head. 140
And St. John's self (great Dryden's friends before),
With open arms receiv'd one poet more.
Happy my studies, when by these approv'd !
Happier their author, when by these belov'd !
From these the world will judge of men and books,

Not from the Burnets, Oldmixons, and Cooks.
Soft were my numbers : who could take offence
While pure description held the place of sense ?
Like gentle Fanny's was my flowery theme,
A painted mistress, or a purling stream. 150
Yet then did Gildon draw his venal quill ;
I wish'd the man a dinner, and sate still.
Yet then did Dennis rave in furious fret ;
I never answer'd, I was not in debt.
If want provok'd, or madæss made them print,
I wag'd no war with bedlam or the mint.

Did some more sober critic come abroad ;
If wrong, I smil'd ; if right, I kiss'd the rod.
Pains, reading, study, are their just pretence,
And all they want is spirit, taste, and sense. 160
Commas and points they set exactly right,
And 'twere a sin to rob them of their mite.
Yet ne'er one sprig of laurel grac'd these ribalds,
From flasting Bentley down to piddling Tibalds :
Each wight, who reads not, and but scans and spells,
Each word-catcher, that lives on syllables,
Ev'n such small critics some regard may claim,
Preserv'd in Milton's or in Shakspeare's name.
Pretty ! in amber to observe the forms
Of hairs, or straws, or dirt, or grubs, or worms !
The things we know are neither rich nor rare, 171
But wonder how the devil they got there.

Were others angry : I excus'd them too ;
Well might they rage, I gave them but their due.
A man's true merit 'tis not hard to find ;
But each man's secret standard in his mind,
That casting-weight pride adds to emptiness,
This, who can gratify ? for who can guess ?
The bard whom pilfer'd pastorals renown,
Who turns a Persian tale for half a crown, 180

VARIATIONS.

And for my head, if you'll the truth excuse,
I had it from my mother, not the muse.
Happy, if he, in whom these frailties join'd,
Had heir'd as well the virtues of the mind.

* His mother was much afflicted with headaches.

Just writes to make his barrenness appear,
And strains from hard-bound brains, eight lines
a-year ;

He, who, still wanting, though he lives on theft,
Steals much, spends little, yet has nothing left :
And he, who, now to sense, now nonsense leaning,
Means not, but blunders round about a meaning :
And he, whose fustian's so sublimely bad,
It is not poetry, but prose run mad :
All these, my modest satire bad translate,
And own'd that nine such poets made a Tate. 190
How did they fume, and stamp, and roar, and chafe !

And swear, not Addison himself was safe.
Peace to all such : but were there one whose fire
True genius kindles, and fair fame inspires ;
Blest with each talent and each art to please,
And born to write, converse, and live with ease :
Should such a man, too fond to rule alone,
Bear, like the Turk, no brother near the throne,
View him with scornful, yet with jealous eyes,
And hate for arts that caus'd himself to rise ; 200
Damn with faint praise, assent with civil leer,
And, without sneering, teach the rest to sneer ;
Willing to wound, and yet afraid to strike,
Just hint a fault, and hesitate dislike ;
Alike reserv'd to blame, or to commend,
A timorous foe, and a suspicious friend ;
Dreading ev'n fools, by flatterers besieg'd,
And so obliging, that he ne'er oblig'd ;
Like Cato, give his little senate laws,
And sit attentive to his own applause ; 210
While wits and templars every sentence raise,
And wonder with a foolish face of praise—
Who but must laugh, if such a man there be ?
Who would not weep, if Atticus were he !

What though my name stood rubric on the walls,
Or plaster'd posts, with claps, in capitals ?
Or smoking forth, a hundred hawkers load,
On wings of winds came flying all abroad ?
I sought no homage from the race that write ;
I kept, like Asian monarchs, from their sight : 220
Poems I heeded (now berhym'd so long) [song:
No more than thou, great George ! a birth-day
I ne'er with wits or witlings pass'd my days,
To spread about the itch of verse and praise ;
Nor, like a puppy, daggled through the town,
To fetch and carry sing-song up and down ;
Nor at rehearsals sweat, and mouth'd, and cry'd,
With handkerchief and orange at my side ;
But, sick of fops, and poetry, and prate,
To Bufo left the whole Castalian state. 230
Proud as Apollo on his forked hill,
Sate full-blown Bufo, puff'd by every quill ;
Fed with soft dedication all day long,
Horace and he went hand and hand in song.

VARIATIONS.

After ver. 208, in the MS.
Who, if two wits on rival themes contest,
Approves of each, but likes the worst the best.
Alluding to Mr. Pope's and Tickell's translation of the first book of the Iliad.

His library (where busts of poets dead
And a true Pindar stood without a head),
Receiv'd of wits an undistinguish'd race,
Who first his judgment ask'd, and then a place;
Much they extoll'd his pictures, much his seat,
And flatter'd every day, and some days eat; 240
Till, grown more frugal in his riper days, [praise,
He paid some bards with port, and some with
To some a dry rehearsal was assign'd,
And others (harder still) he paid in kind.
Dryden alone (what wonder!) came not nigh,
Dryden alone escap'd this judging eye:
But still the great have kindness in reserve,
He help'd to bury whom he help'd to starve.

May some choice patron bless each grey goose quill!

May every Bavius have his Bufo still! 250

So when a statesman wants a day's defence,
Or envy holds a whole week's war with sense,
Or simple pride for flattery makes demands,
May dunce by dunce be whistled off my hands!
Blest be the great! for those they take away,
And those they left me; for they left me Gay:
Left me to see neglected genius bloom,
Neglected die, and tell it on his tomb:
Of all thy blameless life the sole return
My verse, and Queensberry weeping o'er thy urn!

Oh, let me live my own, and die so too! 261
(To live and die is all I have to do:)

Maintain a poet's dignity and ease, [please:
And see what friends, and read what books I
Above a patron, though I condescend
Sometimes to call a minister my friend.

I was not born for courts or great affairs;
I pay my debts, believe, and say my prayers;
Can sleep without a poem in my head,
Nor know, if Dennis be alive or dead. 270

Why am I ask'd what next shall see the light?
Heavens! was I born for nothing but to write?

Has life no joys for me? or (to be grave)
Have I no friend to serve, no soul to save?

"I found him close with Swift—indeed? no doubt
"(Cries prating Balbus) something will come out."

"'Tis all in vain, deny it as I will.
"No, such a genius never can lie still;"

And then for mine obligingly mistakes
The first lampoon Sir Will or Bubo makes. 280

Poor, guiltless I! and can I choose but smile,
When every coxcomb knows me by my style?

Curst be the verse, how well soe'er it flow,
That tends to make one worthy man my foe,

Give virtue scandal, innocence a fear,
Or from the soft-ey'd virgin steal a tear!
But he who hurts a harmless neighbour's peace,
Insults fall'n worth, or beauty in distress,
Who loves a lie, lame slander helps about,
Who writes a libel, or who copies out: 290

That sop, whose pride affects a patron's name,
Yet absent, wounds an author's honest fame:

Who can your merit selfishly approve,
And show the sense of it without the love;

Who has the vanity to call you friend,
Yet wants the honour, injur'd, to defend;

Who tells whate'er you think, whate'er you say,
And, if he lie not, must at least betray:

Who to the Dean and silver Bell can swear,
And sees at Cannons what was never there; 300

Who reads but with a lust to misapply,
Make satire a lampoon, and fiction lie.

A lash like mine no honest man shall dread,
But all such babbling blockheads in his stead.

Let Sporus tremble—A. What? that thing of filk,

Sporus, that mere white curd of ass's milk?
Satire of sense, alas! can Sporus feel?

Who breaks a butterfly upon a wheel?
P. Yet let me flap this bug with gilded wings,

This painted child of dirt, that stinks and stings;
Whose buzz the witty and the fair annoys, 310

Yet wit ne'er tastes, and beauty ne'er enjoys:
So well-bred spaniels civilly delight

In mumbling of the game they dare not bite.
Eternal smiles his emptiness betray,

As shallow streams run dimpling all the way.
Whether in florid impotence he speaks,

And, as the prompter breathes, the puppet squeaks;
Or at the ear of Eve, familiar toad,

Half froth, half venom, spits himself abroad, 320
In puns, or politics, or tales, or lies,

Or spite, or smut, or rhymes, or blasphemies.
His wit all see-saw, between that and this,

Now high, now low, now master up, now miss, }
And he himself one vile antithesis.

Amphibious thing! that, acting either part,
The trifling head! or the corrupted heart,

Fop at the toilet, flatterer at the board,
Now trips a lady, and now struts a lord.

Eve's tempter thus the Rabbins have express'd, 330
A cherub's face, a reptile all the rest.

Beauty that shocks you, parts that none will trust,
Wit that can creep, and pride that licks the dust.

Not fortune's worshipper, nor fashion's fool,
Not lucre's madman, nor ambition's tool,

VARIATIONS.

After ver. 234, in the MS.
To bards reciting he vouchsaf'd a nod,
And snuff'd their incense like a gracious God.

After ver. 270, in the MS. [still:
Friendships from youth I sought, and seek them
Fame, like the wind, may breathe where'er it will.
The world I knew, but made it not my school,
And in a course of flattery liv'd no fool.

After ver. 282, in the MS.
P. What if I sing Augustus great and good?
A. You did so lately, was it understood?

VARIATIONS.

Be nice no more, but, with a mouth profound,
As rumbling Dennis or a Norfolk hound;
With George and Frederic roughen every verse,
Then smooth up all, and Caroline rehearse.

P. No—the high task to lift up kings to gods,
Leave to court sermons, and to birth-day odes.
On themes like these, superior far to thine,
Let laurel'd Cibber and great Arnauld shine.

Why write at all?—A. Yes, silence if you keep,
The town, the court, the wits, the dunces weep.

Not proud, nor servile; be one poet's praise.
 That, if he pleas'd, he pleas'd by manly ways:
 That flattery, ev'n to kings, he held a shame,
 And thought a lie in verse or prose the same;
 That not in fancy's maze he wander'd long, 340
 But stoop'd to truth, and moraliz'd his song:
 That not for fame, but virtue's better end,
 He stood the furious foe, the timid friend,
 The damning critic, half-approving wit,
 The coxcomb hit, or fearing to be hit;
 Laugh'd at the loss of friends he never had,
 The dull, the proud, the wicked, and the mad;
 The distant threats of vengeance on his head,
 The blow unfelt, the tear he never shed;
 The tale reviv'd, the lie so oft o'erthrown, 350
 Th' imputed trash, and dulness not his own;
 The morals blacken'd when the writings 'scape,
 The libel'd person, and the pictur'd shape;
 Abuse, on all he lov'd, or lov'd him, spread,
 A friend in exile, or a father dead;
 The whisper, that, to greatness still too near,
 Perhaps, yet vibrates on his sovereign's ear—
 Welcome for thee, fair virtue! all the past:
 For thee, fair virtue! welcome ev'n the last!

A. But why insult the poor, affront the great?

P. A knave's a knave, to me, in every state: 361
 Alike my scorn, if he succeed or fail.
 Sporus at court, or Japhet in a jail;
 A hireling scribbler, or a hireling peer,
 Knight of the post corrupt, or of the shire;
 If on a pillory, or near a throne,
 He gain his prince's ear, or lose his own.

Yet soft by nature, more a dupe than wit,
 Sappho can tell you how this man was bit:
 This dreaded fat'rist Dennis will confess 370
 Foe to his pride, but friend to his distress:
 So humble, he has knock'd at Tibbald's door,
 Has drunk with Cibber, nay, has rhym'd for Moor.
 Full ten years slander'd, did he once reply?
 Three thousand suns went down on Welsted's lie.
 To please his mistress one aspers'd his life;
 He lash'd him not, but let her be his wife:
 Let Budgell charge low Grub-street on his quill,
 And write whate'er he pleas'd, except his will;

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 368, in the MS.

Once, and but once, his heedless youth was bit,
 And lik'd that dangerous thing, a female wit;
 Safe as he thought, though all the prudent chid;
 He writ no libels, but my lady did:
 Great odds in amorous or poetic game,
 Where woman's is the sin, and man's the shame.

Let the two Curlls of town and court, abuse 380
 His father, mother, body, soul, and muse.
 Yet why? that father held it for a rule,
 It was a sin to call our neighbour fool:
 That harmless mother thought no wife a whore:
 Hear this, and spare his family, James Moore!
 Unspotted names, and memorable long!
 If there be force in virtue, or in song.

Of gentle blood (part shed in honour's cause,
 While yet in Britain honour had applause)
 Each parent sprung—A. What, fortune, pray?—
P. Their own,

And better got, than Bestia's from the throne.
 Born to no pride, inheriting no strife,
 Nor marrying discord in a noble wife,
 Stranger to civil and religious rage,
 The good man walk'd innoxious through his age.

No courts he saw, no suits would ever try,
 Nor dar'd an oath, nor hazarded a lie,
 Unlearn'd, he knew no schoolmen's subtle art,
 No language, but the language of the heart.
 By nature honest, by experience wise; 400
 Healthy by temperance, and by exercise;
 His life, though long, to sickness past unknown,
 His death was instant, and without a groan.
 O grant me thus to live, and thus to die!
 Who sprung from kings shall know less joy than I.

O friend! may each domestic bliss be thine!
 Be no unpleasing melancholy mine:
 Me, let the tender office long engage.
 To rock the cradle of reposing age,
 With lenient arts extend a mother's breath, 410
 Make languor smile, and smooth the bed of death,
 Explore the thought, explain the asking eye,
 And keep a while one parent from the sky!
 On cares like these if length of days attend,
 May Heaven, to bless those days, preserve my friend,
 Preserve him social, cheerful, and serene,
 And just as rich as when he serv'd a queen!
A. Whether that blessings be deny'd or given,
 Thus far was right, the rest belongs to Heaven.

VARIATIONS.

After ver. 405, in the MS.

And of myself, too, something must I say!
 Take then this verse, the trifle of a day.
 And if it live, it lives but to commend
 The man whose heart has ne'er forgot a friend,
 Or head, an author; critic, yet polite,
 And friend to learning, yet too wise to write.

SATIRES AND EPISTLES

OF HORACE IMITATED.

ADVERTISEMENT.

THE occasion of publishing these Imitations was the clamour raised on some of my epistles. An answer from Horace was both more full, and of more dignity, than any I could have made in my own person; and the example of much greater freedom in so eminent a divine as Dr. Donne, seemed a proof with what indignation and contempt a Christian may treat vice or folly, in ever so low, or ever so high a station. Both these authors were acceptable to the Princes and Ministers under whom they lived. The satires of Dr. Donne I versified, at the desire of the Earl of Oxford while he was Lord Treasurer, and of the Duke of Shrewsbury, who had been Secretary of State: neither of whom looked upon a satire on vicious courts as any reflection on those they served in. And indeed there is not in the world a greater error, than that which fools are so apt to fall into, and knaves with good reason to encourage, the mistaking a satirist for a libeller; whereas to a true satirist nothing is so odious as a libeller, for the same reason as to a man truly virtuous, nothing is so hateful as a hypocrite.

“Uni aequus Virtuti atque ejus Amicis.”

BOOK II. SATIRE I.

TO MR. FORTESCUE.

P. THERE are (I scarce can think it, but am told)
(a) There are, to whom my satire seems too bold:
Scarce to wife Peter complaisant enough,
And something said of Chartres much too rough.
(b) The lines are weak, another's pleas'd to say,
Lord Fanny spins a thousand such a day,

HORATIUS.—TREBATIUS.

HORATIUS.

Timorous by nature, of the rich in awe,

You'll give me, like a friend both sage and free,
Advice; and (as you use) without a fee.

F. (d) I'd write no more.

P. Not write? but then I think,

I nod in company, I wake at night,
Fools rush into my head, and so I write. [life.

Lettuce and cowslip wine; "Probatum est."
But talk with Celsus, Celsus will advise
Hartshorn, or something that shall close your eyes,
(g) Or, if you needs must write, write Cæsar's
praise,

(b) You'll gain at least a knighthood, or the bays.

P. What? like Sir (i) Richard, rumbling, rough, and fierce,

With arms and George and Brunswick crowd the verse,

Rend with tremendous sound your ears asunder,
With gun, drum, trumpet, blunderbuss, and thunder?

Or nobly wild, with Budgell's fire and force,
Paint angels trembling round his falling horse?

F. (k) Then all your muse's softer art display,
Let Carolina smooth the tuneful lay,
Lull with Amelia's liquid name the Nine,
And sweetly flow through all the royal line.

P. (l) Alas! few verses touch their nicer ear;
They scarce can bear their laureate twice a year;
And justly Cæsar scorns the poet's lays,
It is to history he trusts for praise.

F. (m) Better be Cibber, I'll maintain it still,
Than ridicule all taste, blaspheme quadrille,
Abuse the city's best good men in metre,
And laugh at peers that put their trust in Peter.

(n) Ev'n those you touch not, hate you.

P. What should ail 'em?

P. A hundred smart in Fimon and in Balaam:
The fewer still you name, you wound the more;
Bond is but one, but Harpax is a score. [deny

P. (o) Each mortal has his pleasure: none
Scarfsdale his bottle, Darty his ham pie!
Ridotta sips and dances, till she see

Agmina, nec fracta pereuntes cuspide Gallos,
Aut labentis equo describat vulnera Parthi.

Scipiadam ut sapiens Lucilius.

H. Haud mihi deero,

Cum res ipsa feret: (l) nisi dextro tempore, Flacci
Verba per attentam non ibunt Cæsar's aurem:
Cui male si palpere, recalcitrat undique tutus.

T. (m) Quanto rectius hoc, quam tristi lædere versu
Pantolabum scurræ, Nomentanumve nepotem?

(n) Cum sibi quisque timet, quamquam est intactus,

H. (o) Quid faciam? saltat Milonius ut semel icto
Accessit fervor capiti, numerusque lucernis.

(p) Castor gaudet equis; ovo prognatus eodem,

(q) I love to pour out all myself, as plain
As downright Shippen, or as old Montange:
In them, as certain to be lov'd as seen,
The soul stood forth, nor kept a thought within;
In me what spots (for spots I have) appear,
Will prove at least the medium must be clear.

In this impartial glass, my muse intends
Fair to expose myself, my foes, my friends;
Publish the present age; but where my text
Is vice too high, reserve it for the next;
My foes shall wish my life a longer date,
And every friend the less lament my fate.

My head and heart thus flowing through my quill,
(r) Verseman or proseman, term me what you
will,

Papist or Protestant, or both between,
Like good Erasmus in an honest mean,
In moderation placing all my glory,
While Tories call me Whig, and Whigs a Tory.

(s) Satire's my weapon, but I'm too discreet
To run a-muck, and tilt at all I meet;

(t) I only wear it in a land of Hectors,
Thieves, supercargoes, sharpers, and directors.

(u) Save but our army: and let Jove incrust
Swords, pikes, and guns, with everlasting rust!

(v) Peace is my dear delight—not Fleury's
more:

But touch me, and no minister so sore.

(x) Slides into verse, and hitches in a rhyme,
Sacred to ridicule his whole life long,
And the sad burden of some merry song.

Hard words or hanging, if your judge be Page.
From furious Sappho scarce a milder fate,

Canidia Albuti, quibus est inimica, venenum:
Grande malum Turius, si quid se judice certes;

(z) Its proper power to hurt, each creature feels;
Bulls aim their horns, and asses lift their heels;
'Tis a bear's talent not to kick, but hug;
And no man wonders he's not stung by pug.

(a) So drink with Walters, or with Chartres eat,
They'll never poison you, they'll only cheat.

(b) Then, learned Sir! (to cut the matter short)
Whate'er my fate, or well or ill at court;
Whether old-age, with faint but cheerful ray,
Attends to gild the evening of my day,
Or death's black wing already be display'd,
To wrap me in the universal shade;
Whether the darken'd room to muse invite,
Or whiten'd wall provoke the skewer to write:
In durance, exile, bedlam, or the mint,

(c) Like Lee or Budgell, I will rhyme and print.

F. (d) Alas, young man! your days can ne'er
be long,

In flower of age you perish for a song!
Plums and directors, Shylock and his wife,
Will club their testers, now, to take your life!

P. (e) What? arm'd for virtue when I point
the pen,

Brand the bold front of shameless guilty men;
Dash the proud gamester in his gilded car;
Bare the mean heart that lurks beneath a star;
Can there be wanting, to defend her cause,
Lights of the church, or guardians of the laws?
Could pension'd Boileau lash in honest strain
Flatterers and bigots ev'n in Louis' reign?
Could laureate Dryden Pimp and Friar engage,
Yet neither Charles nor James be in a rage?
And I not (f) strip the gilding off a knave,
Unplac'd, unpension'd, no man's heir or slave?
I will, or perish in the generous cause:
Hear this, and tremble! you, who 'scape the laws.
Yes, while I live, no rich or noble knave
Shall walk the world, in credit, to his grave.

(z) Ut, quo quisque valet, suspectos terreat, utque
Imperet hoc Natura potens, sic collige mecum.
Dente lupus, cornu taurus petit; unde, nisi intus

Matrem; nil faciet sceleris pia dextra (mirum?
Ut neque calce lupus quemquam, neque dento petit

Sed mala tollet anum vitiato melle cicuta.

(b) Ne longum faciam: seu metranquilla senectus
Epectat, seu mors atris circumvolat alis;
Dives, inops; Romae, seu fors ita jusserit, exsul;
(c) Quisquis erit vitae, scribam, color.

T. (d) O puer, ut sis
Vitalis metuo; et majorum ne quis amicus
Frigore te feriat.

H. (e) Quid? cum est Lucilus ausus
Primus in hunc operis componere carmina morem,
(f) Detrahare et pellem, nitidus qua quisque per ora

Cederet, introrsum turpis; num Laelius, aut qui Duxit ab oppressa meritum Carthagine nomen,
Ingenio offensi? aut laeso doluere Metello,
Famosisque Lupo cooperto versibus? atqui
Primores populi arripuit, populumque tributim;

(g) To virtue only and her friends a friend,
The world beside may murmur, or commend,
Know, all the distant din that world can keep,
Rolls o'er my grotto, and but soothes my sleep.
(b) There, my retreat the best companions grace,
Chiefs out of war, and statesmen out of place.
There St. John mingles with my friendly bowl
The feast of reason and the flow of soul:
And he, whose lightning pierc'd th' Iberian lines,
Now forms my quincunx, and now ranks my
vines;

Or tames the genius of the stubborn plain,
Almost as quickly as he conquer'd Spain.

(i) Envy must own, I live among the great,
No pimp of pleasure, and no spy of state!
With eyes that pry not, tongue that ne'er repeats;
Fond to spread friendships, but to cover heats;
To help who want, to forward who excel;
This, all who know me, know; who love me, tell;
And who unknown defame me, let them be
Scribblers or peers, alike are mob to me.
This is my plea, on this I rest my cause—

(k) What faith my council, learned in the laws?

F. (l) Your plea is good; but still I say, beware

Laws are explain'd by men—so have a care.
It stands on record, that in Richard's times
A man was hang'd for very honest rhymes;
(m) Consult the statute, "quart." I think, it is,
"Edwardi sext." or "prim. et quint. Eliz."
See libels, satires—here you have it—read.

P. (n) Libels and satires lawless things indeed!
But brave epistles, bringing vice to light,
Such as a king might read, a bishop write,
Such as Sir Robert would approve—

F. Indeed?

The case is alter'd—you may then proceed;
(o) In such a case the plaintiff will be hiss'd,
My lords the judges laugh, and you're dismiss'd.

Scilicet (g) Uni aequus virtuti atque ejus Amicis.
(b) Quin ubi se a vulgo et scena in secreta remorant
Virtus Scipiadae et mitis sapientia Laeli,
Nugari cum illo, et discincti ludere, donec
Decoqueretur olus, soliti.

Quidquid sum ego, quamvis
Infra Lucili censum, ingeniumque; tamen me
(i) Cum magnis vixisse invita satebitur usque
Invidia; et fragili quaerens illidere dentem,
Offendet solido:

(k) nisi quid tu, docte Trebati,
Dissentis.

T. (l) Equidem nihil hinc diffingere possum.
Sed tamen ut monitus caveas, ne forte negoti
Incutiat tibi quid sanctarum incitiae legum:

"(m) Si mala condiderit in quem quis carmina, jus est
"Judiciumque."

H. Esto, si quis (n) mala: sed bona si quis
Judice condiderit laudatur Caesare. si quis
Opprobriis dignum laceraverit, integer ipse.
T. (o) Solventur risu tabulae: tu missus abibis.

BOOK II. SATIRE II.

TO MR. BETHEL.

(a) WHAT, and how great, the virtue and the art
To live on little with a cheerful heart;
(b) (A doctrine sage, but truly none of mine)
Let's talk, my friends, but talk (c) before we dine.
(d) Not when a gilt buffet's reflected pride
Turns you from sound philosophy aside;
Not when from plate to plate your eye-balls roll,
And the brain dances to the mantling bowl.

Hear Bethel's sermon, one not vers'd in schools,
(e) But strong in sense, and wise without the rules.

(f) Go work, hunt, exercise! (he thus began)
Then scorn a homely dinner, if you can.
(g) Your wine lock'd up, your Butler stroll'd abroad,
Or fish deny'd (the river yet unthaw'd),
If then plain bread and milk will do the feat,
The pleasure lies in you, and not the meat.

(h) Preach as I please, I doubt our curious men
Will choose a pheasant still before a hen;
Yet hens of Guinea full as good I hold,
Except you eat the feathers green and gold.

Yet for small turbots such esteem profess?
Because God made these large, the other less.

Cries, "Send me, gods! a whole hog barbecued!"
Oh blast it, (l) south winds! till a stench exhale
Rank as the ripeness of a rabbit's tail.
By what criterion do you eat, d'ye think,
If this is priz'd for sweetness, that for stink?
When the tit'd glutton labours through a treat,
He finds no relish in the sweetest meat,
He calls for something bitter, something sour,
And the rich feast concludes extremely poor:
(m) Cheap eggs, and herbs, and olives, still we see
Thus much is left of old simplicity!
(n) The robin-red-breast till of late had rest,
And children sacred held a martin's nest,
Till beccaficos fold so dev'lish dear
To one that was, or would have been, a peer.

I'll have a party at the Bedford-head;
Or ev'n to crack live crawfish recommend;
I'd never doubt at court to make a friend.

(p) 'Tis yet in vain, I own, to keep a pother
About one vice, and fall into the other:
Between excess and famine lies a mean;
Plain, but not fordid; though not splendid, clean.

(q) Avidien, or his wife, (no matter which,
For him you'll call a (r) dog, and her a bitch)
Sell their presented partridges, and fruits,
And humbly live on rabbits, and on roots:

And is at once their vinegar and wine.

But sowse the cabbage with a bounteous heart.

pose,

Perhaps, young men! our fathers had no nose.

Not so: a buck was then a week's repast,

And 'twas their point, I ween, to make it last;

More pleas'd to keep it till their friends could come,

Than eat the sweetest by themselves at home.

(k) Why had not I in those good times my birth,
Ere coxcomb pyes or coxcombs were on earth?

And always thinks the very thing he ought:

His equal mind I copy what I can,

And as I love, would imitate the man.

In South-Sea days not happier, when surmis'd

In forest planted by a father's hand,

Than in five acres now of rental land.

But (y) ancient friends (though poor, or out of That touch my bell, I cannot turn away. [play])

'Tis true, no (z) turbots dignify my boards,

But gudgeons, flounders, what my Thames affords:

To Hounslow Heath I point, and Bansted Down,

Thence comes your mutton, and these chicks my
own:

(a) From yon old walnut-tree a shower shall fall;

And grapes, long-lingering on my only wall,

And figs from standard and espalier join;

The devil is in you if you cannot dine:

From him whose (m) quills stand quiver'd at his ear,
To him who notches sticks at Westminster.

Faith, I shall give the answer (r) Reynard gave:

"I cannot like, dread sire, your royal cave;

"Because I see, by all the tracks about,

"Full many a beast goes in, but none comes out."

Adieu to virtue, if you're once a slave:

Send her to court, you send her to her grave.

Well, if a king's a lion, at the least
The (b) people are a many-headed beast:

Can they direct what measures to pursue,

Who know themselves so little what to do?

Alike in nothing but one lust of gold,

Just half the land would buy, and half be sold:

Their (c) country's wealth our mightier miser's drain,

Or cross, to plunder provinces, the main;

The rest, some farm the poor-box, some the pews;

Some keep assemblies, and would keep the stews;

Some (d) with fat bucks on childless dotards
fawn;

Some win rich widows by their chine and brawn;

While with the silent growth of ten per cent,

In dirt and darkness, (e) hundreds sink content.

Of all these ways, if each (f) pursues his own,

Satire, be kind, and let the wretch alone:

But show me one who has it in his power

To act consistent with himself an hour.

Sir Job (g) sail'd forth, the evening bright and still,

"No place on earth (he cry'd) like Greenwich
"hill."

(b) Up starts a palace, lo, th' obedient base
Slopes at its foot, the woods its sides embrace,

The silver Thames reflects its marble face.

Now let some whimsey, or that (i) Devil within

Which guides all those who know not what they mean,

But give the knight (or give his lady) spleen;

"Away, away! take all your scaffolds down,

"For snug's the word: my dear! we'll live in "town."

At amorous Flavio is the (k) stocking thrown?
That very night he longs to lie alone.

Did ever (m) Proteus, Merlin, any witch,
Transform themselves so strangely as the rich?
Well, but the (n) poor—The poor have the same itch;

They change their (o) weekly barber, weekly news,
Prefer a new japper, to their shoes;
Discharge their garrats, move their beds, and run
(They know not whither) in a chaise and one;
They (p) hire their sculler, and when once aboard,
Grow sick, and damn the climate—like a lord.

(q) You laugh, half-beau, half-sloven if I stand,
My wig all powder, and all snuff my band;
You laugh, if coat and breeches strangely vary,
White gloves, and linen worthy Lady Mary!
But when (r) no prelate's lawn, with hair-shirt
lin'd,

Is half so incoherent as my mind,
When (each opinion with the next at strife,
One (s) ebb and flow of follies all my life)
I (t) plant, root up; I build, and then confound:
Turn round to square, and square again to round;
(u) You never change one muscle of your face,
You think this madness but a common case,
Nor (v) once to Chancery, nor to Hale apply;
Yet hang your lip, to see a seam awry!

Careless how ill I with myself agree,
Kind to my dress, my figure, not to me.
Is this my (x) guide, philosopher, and friend?
This he, who loves me, and who ought to mend;
Who ought to make me (what he can, or none)
That man divine, whom Wisdom calls her own;
Great without title, without fortune blest;
Rich (y) ev'n when plunder'd, (z) honour'd while oppress'd; [power;

Lov'd (c) without youth, and follow'd without
At home, though exil'd; (b) free though in the tower;

In short, that reasoning, high, immortal thing,
Just (e) less than Jove, and (d) much above a king, Nay, half in heaven—(e) except (what's mighty odd)

A fit of vapours clouds this demi-god!

Quid (n) pauper? ride: mutat (o) coenacula, lectos,
Balnea, (p) tonfores; conducto navigio aequo
Nauseat, ac locuples quem ducit priva triremus.

(u) Insanire putas solennia me, neque rides,
Nec (v) medici credis, nec curatoris egere
A praetore dati; rerum (x) tutela mearum

Praecipue sanus, (e) nisi cum pituita molesta est.

BOOK I. EPISTLE VI.

TO MR. MURRAY.

"Not to admire, is all the art I know,
"To make men happy, and to keep them so."
(Plain truth, dear Murray, needs no flowers of speech,

So take it in the very words of Creech.)

(b) This vault of air, this congregated ball,
Self-centred sun, and stars that rise and fall,
There are, my friend! whose philosophic eyes
Look through and trust the Ruler with his skies,
To him commit the hour, the day, the year,
And view (c) this dreadful all without a fear.

Admire we then what (d) earth's low entrails
Arabian shores, or Indian seas infold; [hold.
All the mad trade of (e) fools and slaves for gold?
Or (f) popularity? or stars and strings?
The mob's applauses, or the gifts of kings?
Say, with what (g) eyes we ought at courts to gaze,
And pay the great our homage of amaze?

If weak the (b) pleasure that from these can
spring,

The fear to want them is as weak a thing;
Whether we dread, or whether we desire,
In either case, believe me, we admire;
Whether we (i) joy or grieve, the same the curse,
Surpris'd at better, or surpris'd at worse.

Thus good or bad, to one extreme betray
Th' unbalanc'd mind, and snatch the man away;
For (k) virtue's self may too much zeal be had;
The worst of madmen is a saint run mad.

(l) Go then, and if you can, admire the state
Of beaming diamonds, and reflected plate;
Procure a taste to double the surprise,
And gaze on (m) Parian charms with learned eyes,
Be struck with bright (n) brocade, or Tyrian dye,
Our birth-day nobles' splendid livery.

EPISTOLA VI.

NIL admirari, prope res est una, Numici,
Solaque quae possit facere et servare beatum.

(b) Hunc solem, et stellas, et decedentia certis
Tempora momentis, sunt qui (c) formidine nulla
Imbuti spectent. (d) quid censes, munera terrae?
Quid, maris extremos Arabas (e) ditantis et Indos?
Ludicra, quid, (f) plausus, et amici dona Quiritis?
Quo spectanda modo, (g) quo sensu credis et ore?

(b) Qui timet his adversa, fere miratur eodem
Quo cupiens pacto: pavor est utrobique molestus;
Improvisa simul species exterret utrumque:

(i) Gaudeat, an doleat; cupiat, metuatne; quid ad
rem,

Si, quidquid vidit melius pejusse sua spe,
Defixis oculis animoque et corpore torpet?

(k) Infani sapiens nomen ferat, aequus iniqui;
Ultra quam satis est, virtutem si petat ipsam.

(l) I nunc, argentum et marmor (m) vetus, aeraque et artes

Suspice: cum gemmis (n) Tyrios mirare colores;

If not so pleas'd, at (o) council board rejoice,
To see their judgments hang upon thy voice;
From (p) morn to night, at senate, rolls, and hall,
Plead much, read more, dine late, or not at all.
But wherefore all this labour, all this strife?
For (q) fame, for riches, for a noble wife? [spir'd
Shall (r) one whom nature, learning, birth con-
To form, not to admire, but be admir'd,
Sigh, while his Chloe blind to wit and worth
Weds the rich dulness of some son of earth?
Yet (s) time ennobles, or degrades each line;
It brighten'd Craggs's, and may darken thine:
And what is fame? the meanest have their day,
The greatest can but blaze, and pass away.
Grac'd as thou art, (t) with all the power of words,
So known, so honour'd, at the House of Lords:
Conspicuous scene! another yet is nigh,
(More silent far) where kings and poets lie;
(u) Where Murray (long enough his country's pride)

Shall be no more than Tully, or than Hyde!

(v) Rack'd with sciatics, martyr'd with the stone,

Will any mortal let himself alone?

See Ward by batter'd beaux invited over,
And desperate misery lays hold on Dover,
The case is easier in the mind's disease;
There all men may be cur'd, when'er they please.
Would ye be (x) blest? despise low joys, low }
Disdain whatever Cornbury disdains; [gains;
Be virtuous, and be happy for your pains. }

(y) But art thou one whom new opinions sway,
One who believes as Tindal leads the way,
Who virtue and a church alike disowns,
Thinks that but words, and this but brick and stones?

Fly (z) then, on all the wings of wild desire,
Admire whate'er the maddest can admire:
Is wealth thy passion? Hence! from pole to pole,
Where winds can carry, or where waves can roll,
For Indian spices, for Peruvian gold,
Prevent the greedy, or outbid the bold:

(a) Advance thy golden mountain to the skies;
On the broad base of fifty thousand rise,

Gaude, quod spectant oculi te (o) mille loquentem:
Gnavus (p) mane forum, et vespertinus pete tec-
tum;

(q) Ne plus frumenti dotilibus emetat agris
Mutus et (indignum; quod sit pejoribus ortus)
(r) Hic tibi sit potius, quam tu mirabilis illi.
(s) Quicquid sub terra est, in apricum proferet aetas
Defodiet condetque nitentia. (t) cum bene notum;
Porticus Agrippae, et via te conspexerit Appi;
Ire tamen restat, Numa (u) quo devenit et Ancus.

(v) Si latus aut renes morbo tentantur acuto,
Quare fugam morbi. (x) vis recte vivere? quis non?
Si virtus hoc una potest dare, fortis omittis.
Hoc age deliciis.

(y) virtutem verba putes, et
Lucum ligna? (z) cave ne portus occupet alter;
Ne Cibyrica, ne Bithyna negotia perdas:
(a) Mille talenta rotundentur, totidem altera, por-ro et

Add one round hundred, and (if that's not fair)
Add fifty more, and bring it to a square.
For, mark th' advantage; just so many score,
Will gain a (b) wife with half as many more,
Procure her beauty, make that beauty chaste,
And then such (c) friends—as cannot fail to last.
A (d) man of wealth is dubb'd a man of worth,
Venus shall give him form, and Anstis birth.
(Believe me, many a (e) German prince is worse,
Who, proud of pedigree, is poor of purse)
His wealth brave (f) Timon gloriously confounds;
Ask'd for a groat, he gives a hundred pounds;
Or if three ladies like a luckless play,
Takes the whole house upon the poet's day.
(g) Now, in such exigencies not to need,
Upon my word, you must be rich indeed;
A noble superfluity it craves,
Not for yourself, but for your fools and knaves;
Something, which for your honour they may cheat,
And which it much becomes you to forget.

(b) If wealth alone then make and keep us blest,
Still, still be getting, never, never rest,

(i) But if to power and place your passion lie,
If in the pomp of life consist the joy;
Then (k) hire a slave, or (if you will) a lord,
To do the honours, and to give the word;
Tell at your levee, as the crowds approach,
To whom (l) to nod, whom take into your coach,
Whom honour with your hand: to make remarks,
Who (m) rules in Cornwall, or who rules in Berks:

“ This may be troublesome, is near the chair:

“ That makes three members, this can choose a mayor.”

Instructed thus, you bow, embrace, protest,
Adopt him, (n) son, or cousin at the least,
Then turn about, and (o) laugh at your own jest. }

Tertia succedant, et quae pars quadret acervum.
Scilicet (b) uxorem cum dote, fidemque, et (c) a-micos,

Et genus, et formam, regina (d) Pecunia donat;
Ac bene nummatum decorat Suadela; Venusque.
Mancipiis locuples, eget aeris (e) Capadocum Rex:

(g) Exilis domus est, ubi non et multa supersunt,
Et dominum fallunt, et profunt furibus. (b) ergo,
Si res sola potest facere et servare beatum,
Hoc primus repetas opus, hoc postremus omittas.

Or if your life be one continued treat,
If (p) to live well means nothing but to eat;
Up, up! cries Gluttony, 'tis break of day,
Go drive the deer, and drag the finny prey;
With hounds and horns go hunt an appetite—
So (q) Ruffel did, but could not eat at night;
Call'd happy dog! the beggar at his door,
And envy'd thirst and hunger to the poor.

Or shall we (r) every decency confound;
Through taverns, stews, and bagnios take our round;
Go dine with Chartres, in each vice outdo,
(s) K—l's lewd cargo, or Ty—y's crew;
From Latian syrens, French Circæan feasts,
Return well travell'd, and transform'd to beasts;
Or for a titled punk, or foreign flame,
Renounce our (t) country, and degrade our name?

If, after all, we must with (u) Wilmot own,
The cordial drop of life is love alone,
And Swift cry wisely, "Vive la Bagatelle!"
The man that loves and laughs, must sure do well.
(v) Adieu—if this advice appear the worst,
E'en take the counsel which I gave you first:
Or better precepts, if you can impart,
Why do, I'll follow them with all my heart.

Si (p) bene qui coenat, bene vivit; lucet: camus

EPISTLE I.

TO AUGUSTUS.

Advertisement.

THE reflections of Horace, and the judgments pass'd in his epistle to Augustus, seem'd so seasonable to the present times, that I could not help applying them to the use of my own country. The author thought them considerable enough to address them to his prince; whom he paints with all the great and good qualities of a monarch, upon whom the Romans depended for the increase of an absolute empire. But to make the poem entirely English, I was willing to add one or two of those which contribute to the happiness of a free people, and are more consistent with the welfare of our neighbours.

This epistle will show the learned world to have fallen into have two mistakes; one, that Augustus was a patron of poets in general; whereas he not only prohibited all but the best writers to name him, but recommended that care even to the civil magistrate: "Admonebat praetores, ne paterebatur nomen suum obsoleverit," &c. The other, that this piece was only a general discourse of poetry; whereas it was an apology for the poets, in order to render Augustus more their patron. Horace here pleads the cause of his contemporaries, first against the taste of the town, whose humour it was to magnify the authors of the preceding age; secondly, against the court and nobility, who encouraged only the writers for the theatre; and lastly, against the emperor himself, who had conceived them of little use to the government. He shows by a view of the progress of learning, and the change of taste among the Romans, that the introduction of the polite arts of Greece had given the writers of his time great advantages over their predecessors; that their morals were much improved, and the licence of those ancient poets restrained; that satire and comedy were become more just and useful; that whatever extravagances were left on the stage, were owing to the ill taste of the nobility; that poets, under due regulations, were, in many respects, useful to the state; and concludes, that it was upon them the emperor himself must depend, for his fame with posterity.

We may farther learn from this epistle, that Horace made his court to this great prince, by writing with a decent freedom towards him, with a just contempt of his low flatterers, and with a manly regard to his own character.

WHILE you, great patron of mankind! (a) sustain

The balanc'd world, and open all the main;
Your country, chief, in arms abroad defend;
At home, with morals, arts, and laws amend;
(b) How shall the muse, from such a monarch steal
An hour, and not defraud the public weal?

(c) Edward and Henry, now the boast of fame,
And virtuous Alfred, a more (d) sacred name,
After a life of generous toils endur'd,
The Gaul subdued, or property secur'd,
Ambition humbled, mighty cities storm'd,
Or laws establish'd, and the world reform'd;
Th' unwilling gratitude of base mankind!

EPISTOLA I.

AD AUGUSTUM.

Cum tot (a) sustineas et tanta negotia solus,
Res Italas armis tuteris, moribus ornes,
Legibus emendes; in (b) publica commoda peccem,
Si longo sermone morer tua tempora, Caesar.

(c) Romulus, et liber pater, et cum Castore
Pollux,

Post ingentia facta, (d) Deorum in templa recepti,
Dum terras hominumque colunt genus, aspera bella
Componunt, agros assignant, oppida condunt;

(e) Ploravere suis non respondere favorem,
Speratum meritis, diram qui contudit Hydram,

All human virtue to its latest breath,
 (f) Finds envy never conquer'd but by death.
 The great Alcides, every labour past,
 Had still this monster to subdue at last.
 (g) Sure fate of all, beneath whose rising ray,
 Each star of meaner merit fades away!
 Oppress'd we feel the beam directly beat,
 Those suns of glory please not till they set.
 To thee, the world its present homage pays,
 The harvest early, (b) but mature the praise:
 Great friend of liberty! in kings a name:
 Above all Greek, above all Roman fame:
 Whose word is truth, as sacred and rever'd,
 (i) As heaven's own oracles from altars heard.
 Wonder of kings! like whom, to mortal eyes
 (k) None e'er has risen, and none e'er shall rise.
 Just in one instance, be it yet confess'd
 Your people, Sir, are partial in the rest:
 Foes to all living worth except your own,
 And advocates for folly dead and gone.
 Authors, like coins, grow dear as they grow old;
 It is the rust we value, not the gold.
 (l) Chaucer's worst ribaldry is learn'd by rote,
 And beastly Skelton heads of houses quote:
 One likes no language but the Faery Queen;
 A Scot will fight for Christ's Kirk o' the Green;
 And each true Briton is to Ben so civil,
 (m) He swears the muses met him at the Devil.
 Though justly (n) Greece her eldest son admires,
 Why should not we be wiser than our fires?
 In every public virtue we excel;
 We build, we plant, (o) we sing, we dance as well;
 And (p) learned Athens to our art must stoop,
 Could she behold us tumbling through a hoop.
 If (q) time improve our wits as well as wine,
 Say at what age a poet grows divine?

Notaque fatali portenta labore subegit,
 Comperit (f) invidiam supremo sine domari,
 (g) Urit enim fulgore suo, qui praegravat artes
 Infra se positus: extinctus amabitur idem.
 (b) Praesenti tibi maturos largimur honores,
 (i) Jurandasque tuum per numen ponimus aras,
 (k) Nil oriturum alias, nil ortum tale fatentes.
 Sed tuus hoc populus sapiens et justus in uno,
 Te nostris ducibus, te Graiis anteferendo,
 Caetera nequaquam simili ratione modoque
 Aestimatur; et, nisi quae terris semota suisque
 Temporibus defuncta videt, fastidit et odit:
 (l) Scilicet fautor veterum, ut tabulas peccare vetantes
 Quas bis quinque viri sanxerunt, foedera regum,
 Vel Gabii vel cum rigidis aquata Sabinis,
 Pontificum libros, annosa volumina Vatum,
 (m) Dictitet Albano Musas in monte locutas.
 Si, quia (n) Graiorum sunt antiquissima quaeque
 Scripta vel optima, Romani pensantur eadem
 Scriptores trutina; non est quod multa loquamur:
 Nil intra est oleum, nil extra est in nuce duri.
 Venimus ad summum fortunae: pingimus, atque
 (o) Psallimus, et (p) luctamur Achivis doctius undique.
 Si (q) meliora dies, ut vina, poemata reddit;
 Scire velim, chartis pretium quotus arroget annus.
 Scriptor ab hinc annos centum qui decidit, inter
 Perfectos veteresque referri debet, an inter
 Viles atque novos? excludat iurgia finis.

Shall we, or shall we not, account him so,
 Who dy'd, perhaps, an hundred years ago?
 End all dispute; and fix the year precise
 When British bards begin to immortalize?
 "Who lasts a (r) century can have no flaw;
 "I hold that wit a classic, good in law."
 Suppose he wants a year, will you compound?
 And shall we deem him (s) ancient, right and sound,
 Or damn to all eternity at once,
 At ninety-nine, a modern and a dunce?
 "We shall not quarrel for a year or two;
 "By (t) courtesy of England, he may do."
 Then, by the rule that made the (u) horse-tail bare,
 I pluck out year by year, as hair by hair,
 And melt (v) down ancients like a heap of snow:
 While you, to measure merits, look in (x) Stowe,
 And, estimating authors by the year,
 Bestow a garland only on a (y) bier.
 (z) Shakspeare (whom you and every playhouse bill style the divine, the matchless, what you will)
 For gain, not glory, wing'd his roving flight,
 And grew immortal in his own despite.
 Ben, old and poor, as little seem'd to heed
 (a) The life to come, in every poet's creed.
 Who now reads (b) Cowley? if he pleases yet,
 His moral pleases, not his pointed wit;
 Forgot his epic, nay Pindaric art,
 But still (c) I love the language of his heart.
 "Yet surely, (d) surely, these were famous men!
 "What boy but hears the saying of old Ben?
 "In all (e) debates where critics bear a part,
 "Not one but nods, and talks of Jonson's art,
 "Of Shakspeare's nature, and of Cowley's wit;
 "How Beaumont's judgment check'd what Fletcher
 "er writ;
 "How Shadwell hasty, Wycherly was slow;
 "But, for the passions, Southerne sure and Rowe.

Est vetus atque probus, (r) centum qui perficit
 annos.
 Quid? qui deperit minor uno mense vel anno,
 Inter quos referendus erit? (s) veteresne poetas,
 An quos et praesens et postera respuat aetas?
 Iste quidem veteres inter ponetur (t) honeste,
 Qui vel mense brevi, vel toto est junior anno.
 Utor permissio, caudaeque pilos ut (u) equinae
 Paulatim vello: et demo unum, demo et idem unum;
 Dum cadat elusus ratione (v) ruentis acervi,
 Qui redivit in (x) fastos, et virtutem aestimat annis,
 Miraturque nihil, nisi quod (y) Libitina sacra vit.
 (z) Ennius et sapiens, et fortis, et alter Homerus,
 Ut critici dicunt, leviter curare videtur
 Quo (a) promissa cadant, et somnia Pythagorea.
 (b) Naevius in manibus non est; at (c) mentibus
 haeret [poema.
 Pene recens: (d) adeo sanctum est vetus omne
 Ambigitur (e) quoties, uter utro sit prior; aufert
 Pacuvius docti famam senis, Accius alti:
 Dicitur Afrani toga convenisse Menandro:
 Plautus ad exemplar Siculi properare Epicharmi
 Vincere Caecilius gravitate, Terentius arte:

"These, (f) only these, support the crowded stage,
"From eldest Heywood down to Cibber's age."

All this may be; (g) the people's voice is odd,
It is, and it is not, the voice of God.

To (b) Gammer Gurton if it give the bays,
And yet deny the Careless Husband praise,
Or say our fathers never broke a rule;

Why then, I say, the public is a fool.

But let them own, that greater faults than we

They had, and greater virtues, I'll agree.

Spenser himself affects the (i) obsolete,

And Sydney's verse halts ill on (k) Roman feet:

Milton's strong pinion now not heaven can bound,

Now serpent-like, in (l) prose he sweeps the
ground,

In quibbles, angel and archangel join,

And God the Father turns a school-divine.

(m) Not that I'd lop the beauties from his book,
Like (n) flashing Bentley with his desperate hook,
Or damn all Shakspeare, like th' affected fool
At court, who hates whate'er he (o) read at school.

But for the wits of either Charles's days,
The mob of gentlemen who wrote with ease;

Sprat, Carew, Sedley, and a hundred more,

(Like twinkling stars the miscellanies o'er)

One simile, that (p) solitary shines

In the dry desert of a thousand lines,

Or (q) lengthen'd thought that gleams through many a page,

Has sanctify'd whole poems for an age.

(r) I lose my patience, and I own it too,

When works are censur'd, not as bad, but new;

While, if our elders break all reason's laws,

These fools demand not pardon, but applause.

(s) On Avon's bank, where flowers eternal blow,

If I but ask if any weed can grow;

One tragic sentence if I dare deride,

Which (t) Betterton's grave action dignify'd,

Hos ediscit, et hos arcto stipata theatro [poetas
Spectat Roma potens; (f) habet hos numeratque
Ad nostrum tempus, Livi scriptoris ab aevo.

(g) Interdum vulgus rectem videt: est ubi peccat.

Si (b) veteres ita miratur laudatque poetas,

Ut nihil anteferat, nihil illis comparet; errat:

Si quaedam nimis (i) antique, si pleraque (k) dure

Dicere credit eos, (l) ignave multa fatetur;

Et sapit, et mecum facit, et Jove judicat aequo.

(m) Non equidem insector, celendaque carmina Livi
Esse reor, memini quae (n) plagosum (o) mihi parvo
Orbium dictare;

sed emendata videri

Pulchraque, et exactis minimum distantia, miror:

Inter quae (p) verbum emicuit si forte decorum,

Si (q) versus paulo concinnior unus et alter;

Injuste totum ducit venditque poema. [crasse

(r) Indignor quidquam reprehendi, non quia

Compositum, illepidè putetur, sed quia nuper;

Nec veniam antiquis, sed honorem et praemia posci.

(s) Recte necne crocum floresque perambulet

Attac

Fabula, si dubitem; clamant periisse pudorem

Cuncti pene patres: ea cum reprehendere coner,

Quae (t) gravis Aesopus, quae doctus Roscius egit.

Or well-mouth'd Booth with emphasis proclaims,
(Though but, perhaps, a muster-roll of names)

How will our fathers rise up in a rage,

And swear, all shame is lost in George's age!

You'd think (u) no fools disgrac'd the former reign,

Did not some grave examples yet remain,

Who scorn a lad should teach his father skill,

And, having once been wrong, will be so still.

He, who to seem more deep than you or I,

Extols old bards, (v) or Merlin's prophecy,

Mistake him not; he envies, not admires,

And, to debase the sons, exalts the fires.

(x) Had ancient times conspir'd to disallow

What then was new, what had been ancient now?

Or what remain'd, so worthy to be read

By learned critics, of the mighty dead?

(y) In days of ease, when now the weary sword

Was sheath'd, and luxury with Charles restor'd;

In every taste of foreign courts improv'd,

"All, by the king's example, liv'd and lov'd."

Then peers grew proud (z) in horsemanship t'
excel,

Newmarket's glory rose, as Britain's fell;

The soldier breath'd the gallantries of France,

And every flowery courtier writ romance.

Then (a) marble, soften'd into life, grew warm,

And yielding metal flow'd to human form:

Lely on (b) animated canvas stole

The sleepy eye, that spoke the melting soul.

No wonder then, when all was love and sport,

The willing muses were debauch'd at court:

On (c) each enervate string they taught the note

To pant, or tremble through an eunuch's throat.

But (d) Britain, changeful as a child at play,

Now calls in princes, and now turns away.

Now Whig, now Tory, what we lov'd we hate;

Now all for pleasure, now for church or state;

Now for prerogative, and now for laws;

Effects unhappy! from a noble cause.

Vel quia nil (u) rectum, nisi quod placuit sibi, ducunt;

Vel quia turpe putant parere minoribus, et quae
Imberbi didicere, senes perdenda fateri.

Jam (v) Saliare Numae carmen qui laudat, et illud,

Quod mecum ignorat, solus vult scire videri;

Ingeniis non ille favet plaudique sepultis,

Nostra sed impugnat, nos nostraque lividus odit.

(x) Quod si tam Graecis novitas invisâ fuisset,
Quam nobis; quid nunc esset vetus? aut quid ha-
beret,

Quod legeret tereretque viritim publicus usus?

(y) Ut primum positis nugari Graccia bellis

Coequit, et in vitium fortuna labiet aequa;

Nunc athletarum studiis, nunc arsit (z) equorum:

(a) Marmoris aut eboris fabros aut aeris amavit;

Suspendit (b) picta vultum mentemque tabella;

Nun (c) tibicinibus, nunc est gavisâ tragoedis:

(d) Sub nutrice puella velut si luderet infans,

Quod cupide petiit, mature plena reliquit.

Quid placet, aut odio est, quod non mutabile credas?

Hoc paces habuere bonae, ventique secundi.

(e) Time was, a sober Englishman would knock
His servants up, and rise by five o'clock,
Instruct his family in every rule,
And send his wife to church, his son to school.
To (f) worship like his fathers, was his care;
To teach their frugal virtues to his heir;
To prove that luxury could never hold;
And place, on good (g) security, his gold.
Now times are chang'd, and one (b) poetic itch
Has seiz'd the court and city, poor and rich:
Sons, fires, and grandfires, all will wear the bays,
Our wives read Milton, and our daughters plays,
To theatres and to rehearsals throng,
And all our grace at table is a song.
E, who so oft renounce the muses, (i) lie,
Not —'s self e'er tells more fibs than I;
When sick of muse, our follies we deplore,
And promise our best friends to rhyme no more;
We wake next morning in a raging fit,
And call for pen and ink to show our wit.

(k) He serv'd a 'prenticeship, who sets up shop;
Ward try'd on puppies, and the poor, his drop;
Ev'n (l) Radcliffe's doctors travel first to France,
Nor dare to practise till they've learn'd to dance.
Who builds a bridge that never drove a pile?
(Should Ripley venture, all the world would smile)
But (m) those who cannot write, and those who can,
All rhyme, and scrawl, and scribble, to a man.

Yet, Sir, (n) reflect, the mischief is not great;
These madmen never hurt the church or state:
Sometimes the silly benefits mankind;
And rarely (o) avarice taints the tuneful mind.
Allow him but his (p) plaything of a pen,
He ne'er rebels, or plots, like other men:
(q) Flight of cashiers, or mobs, he'll never mind;
And knows no losses while the muse is kind.
To (r) cheat a friend, or Ward, he leaves to Peter;
The good man heaps up nothing but mere metre,
Enjoys his garden and his book in quiet;
And then—a perfect hermit in his (s) diet.

(e) *Romae dulce diu fuit et solemne, reclusa
Mane domo vigilare, clienti promere jura;
Scriptos (f) nominibus rectis expendere nummos;
(g) Majores audire, minori dicere, per quae
Crescere res posset, minui damnosa libido.*

*Mutavit mentem populus levis, (b) et calet uno
Scribendi studio: puerique patresque severi
Fronde comas vineti coenant, et carmina dictant.
Ipse ego, qui nullos me affirmo scribere versus,
Invenior (i) Parthis mendacior; et prius orto

Non (r) fraudem socio, puerove incogitat ullam

Of little use the man you may suppose,
Who says in verse what others say in prose:
Yet let me show, a poet's of some weight,
And (t) though no soldier) useful to the state.
(u) What will a child learn sooner than a song?
What better teach a foreigner the tongue?
What's long or short, each accent where to place,
And speak in public with some sort of grace.
I scarce can think him such a worthless thing,
Unless he praise some monster of a king:
Or virtue, or religion turn to sport,
To please a lewd, or unbelieving court.
Unhappy Dryden!—In all Charles's days,
Roscommon only boasts unspotted bays;
And in our own (excuse some courtly stains)
No whiter page than Addison remains;
He, (w) from the taste obscene reclaims our youth,
And sets the passions on the side of truth,
Forms the soft bosom with the gentlest art,
And pours each human virtue in the heart.
Let Ireland tell, how wit upheld her cause,
Her trade supported, and supplied her laws;
And leave on Swift this grateful verse engrav'd,
"The rights a court attack'd, a poet sav'd."
Behold the hand that wrought a nation's cure,
Wretch'd to (x) relieve the idiot and the poor,
Proud vice to brand, or injur'd worth adorn,
And (y) stretch the ray to ages yet unborn.
Not but there are, who merit other palms;
Hopkins and Sternhold glad the heart with psalms:
The (z) boys and girls whom charity maintains,
Implore your help in these pathetic strains:
How could devotion (b) touch the country pews,
Unless the gods bestow'd a proper muse?
Verse cheers their leisure, verse assists their work,
Verse prays for peace, or sings down (c) Pope and Turk.

The silenc'd preacher yields to potent strain,
And feels that grace his prayer besought in vain;
The blessing thrills through all the labouring throng.
And (d) heaven is won by violence of song.

Our (e) rural ancestors, with little blest,
Patient of labour when the end was rest,
Indulg'd the day that hous'd their annual grain,
With feasts, and offerings, and a thankful strain:

(t) *Militiae quanquam piger et malus, utilis urbi;
Si das hoc, parvis quoque rebus magna juvari;
(u) Os tenerum pueri balbumque poeta figurat:
Torquet (w) ab obscenis jam nunc sermonibus
aurem;*

*Mox etiam pectus praeceptis format amicis,
Asperitatis, et invidiae corrector, et irae;
Recte facta refert; (y) orientia tempora notis
Instruit exemplis; (x) inopem solatur et aegrum.
Castis cum (z) pueris ignara puella mariti
Disceret unde (b) preces, vatem ni Musa dedisset?
Poscit opem chorus, et praesentia nomina sentit;
Coelestes implorat aquas, docta prece blandus;
Avertit morbos, (c) metuenda pericula pellit;
Impetrat et pacem, et locupletem frugibus annum.

(e) *Agricolae prisci, sortes, parvoque beati,

The joy their wives, their sons, and servants share,
Ease of their toil, and partners of their care :
The laugh, the jest, attendants on the bowl,
Smooth'd every brow, and open'd every soul :
With growing years the pleasing licence grew,
And (f) taunts alternate innocently flew.
But times corrupt, and (g) nature ill-inclin'd,
Produc'd the point that left a sting behind ;
Till, friend with friend, and families at strife,
Triumphant malice rag'd through private life.
Who felt the wrong, or fear'd it, took th' alarm,
Appeal'd to law, and justice lent her arm. [bound,
At length, by wholesome (h) dread of statutes
The poets learn'd to please, and not to wound :
Most warp'd to (i) flattery's side ; but some, more nice,

Preferv'd the freedom, and forebore the vice.
Hence satire rose, that just the medium hit,
And heals with morals what it hurts with wit.

(k) We conquer'd France, but felt our captive's charms ;

Her arts victorious triumph'd o'er our arms ;
Bain to soft refinements less a foe,
Wit grew polite, and (l) numbers learn'd to flow.
Waller was smooth ; but Dryden taught to join }
The varying verse, the full resounding line, }
The long majestic march, and energy divine. }
Though still some traces of our (m) rustic vein
And splayfoot verse remain'd, and will remain.
Late, very late, correctness grew our care,
When the tir'd nation (n) breath'd from civil war.
Exact (o) Racine, and Corneille's noble fire,
Show'd us that France had something to admire.
Not but the (p) tragic spirit was our own,
And full in Shakspeare, fair in Otway shone :

Corpus et ipsum animum spe finis dura ferentem,
Cum locis operum pueris et conjuge fida,
Tellurem porco, Silvanum lacte piabant,
Floribus, et vino Genium memorem brevis aevi.
Fescennina per hunc inventa licentia morem
(f) Versibus alternis opprobria rustica fudit ;
Libertasque recurrentes accepta per annos
Lusit amabiliter : (g) donec jam saevus apertam
In rabiem coepit verti jocus, et per honestas
Ire domos impune minax, doluere cruento
Denti lacesciti : fuit intactis quoque cura
Conditione super communi : (h) quin etiam lex
Poenaeque lata, malo quae nollet carmine quem-

quam
Describi. vertere modum, formidine fustis
Ad (i) bene dicendum, delectandumque redacti.

(k) Graecia capta ferum victorem cepit, et artes
Intulit agresti Latio. sic horridus ille
Defluxit (l) numerus Saturnius, et grave virus
Munditiae pepulere : sed in longum tamen aevum
Manserunt, hodieque manent, (m) vestigia ruris.
Serus enim Graecis admovit acumina chartis ;
Et post (n) Punica bella quietus quaerere coepit,
Quid (o) Sophocles et Thespis et Aeschylus utile
ferrent :

Tentavit quoque rem, si digne vertere posset :
Et placuit sibi, natura sublimis et acer :
Nam (p) spirat tragicum satis, et feliciter audet :

But Otway fail'd to polish or refine,
And (q) fluent Shakspeare scarce effac'd a line.
Ev'n copious Dryden wanted, or forgot,
The last and greatest art, the art to blot.
Some doubt, if equal pains, or equal fire,
The (r) humbler muse of comedy require.
But in known images of life, I guess
The labour greater, as th' indulgence less (s).
Observe how seldom ev'n the best succeed :
Tell me if (t) Congreve's fools are fools indeed ?
What pert low dialogue has Farquhar writ !
How Van wants grace, who never wanted wit !
The stage how loosely (u) does Astraea tread,
Who fairly puts all characters to bed !
And idle Cibber, how he breaks the laws,
To make poor Pinkey (v) eat with vast applause !
But fill their (x) purse, our poets' work is done,
Alike to them, by pathos or by pun.

O you ! whom (y) vanity's light bark conveys
On fame's mad voyage by the wind of praise,
With what a shifting gale your course you ply,
For ever sunk too low, or borne too high !
Who pants for glory finds but short repose,
A breath revives him, or a breath o'erthrows.
(z) Farewell the stage ! if just as thrives the play,
The silly bard grows fat, or falls away.

(a) There still remains, to mortify a wit,
The many-headed monster of the pit ;
A senseless, worthless, and unhonour'd crew'd :
Who, (b) to disturb their betters mighty proud,
Clattering their sticks before ten lines are spoke,
Call for the farce, (c) the bear, or the black-joke.
What dear delight to Britons farce affords !
Ever the taste of mobs, but now (d) of lords ;
(Taste, that eternal wanderer, which flies
From heads to ears, and now from ears to eyes.)

Sed (q) turpem putat inscite metuitque lituram.

Omnis, ad incertos oculos, et gaudia vana.

Quatuor aut plures aulaca premuntur in horas ;

The play stands still; damn action and discourse,
Back fly the scenes, and enter foot, (s) and horse;
Pageants on pageants, in long order drawn,
Peers, heralds, bishops, ermin, gold and lawn;
The champion too! and, to complete the jest,
Old Edward's armour beams on Cibber's breast.
With (f) laughter sure Democritus had dy'd,
Had he beheld an audience gape so wide.
Let bear or (g) elephant be e'er so white,
The people, sure, the people are the sight!
Ah, luckless (b) poet! stretch thy lungs and roar,
That bear or elephant shall heed thee more;
While all its (i) throats the gallery extends,
And all the thunder of the pit ascends!
Loud as the wolves, on (k) Orca's stormy steep,
Howl to the roarings of the northern deep.
Such is the shout, the long-applauding note,
At Quin's high plume, or Oldfield's (l) petticoat;
Or when from court a birth-day suit bestow'd,
Sinks the (m) lost actor in the tawdry load.
Booth enters—hark! the universal peal!
“But has he spoken?” Not a syllable.
What shook the stage, and made the people stare?
(a) Cato's long wig, flower'd gown, and lacquer'd chair.

Yet, lest you think I rally more than teach,
Or praise malignly arts I cannot reach,
Let me for once presume t' instruct the times,
To know the poet from the man of rhymes:
'Tis he (o) who gives my breast a thousand pains,
Can make me feel each passion that he feigns;
Enrage, compose, with more than magic art;
With pity, and with terror, tear my heart;
And snatch me, o'er the earth, or through the air,
To Thebes, to Athens, when he will, and where.

Dum fugiunt (e) equitum turmae, peditumque ca-
tervae:
Mox trahitur manibus regum fortuna retortis;
Effeda festinant, pilenta, petorrita, naves;
Captivum portatur ebur, captiva Corinthus.
(f) Si foret in terris, rideret Democritus; seu
Diversum confusa genus panthera camelo,
Sive (g) elephas albus vulgi converteret ora.
Spectaret populum ludis attentius ipsis,
Ut sibi praebentem minio spectacula plura:
Scriptores autem (b) narrare putaret asello
Fabellam surdo. nam quae (i) pervincere voces
Evalueret sonum, referunt quem nostra theatra?
(k) Garganum mugire putes nemus, aut mare Tuf-cum.
Tanto cum strepitu ludi spectantur, et artes,
(l) Divitiaeque peregrinae: quibus (m) oblitus actor
Cum stetit in scena, concurrat dextera laevae.
Dixit adhuc aliquid? nil sane. Quid placet ergo?
(n) Lana Tarentino violas imitata veneno.
Ac ne forte putes me, quae facere ipse recusam,
Cum recte tractent alii, laudare maligne:
Ille per extentum funem mihi posse videtur
Ire poeta; (o) meum qui pectus inaniter angit,
Irritat, mulcet, falsis terroribus implet,
Ut magus; et modo me Thebis, modo ponit Athe-
nis.

(p) But not this part of the poetic state
Alone, deserves the favour of the great:
Think of those authors, Sir, who would rely
More on a reader's sense, than gazer's eye.
Or who shall wander where the muses sing?
Who climb their mountain, or who taste their spring?

How shall we fill a (q) library with wit,
When Merliu's cave is half unfurnish'd yet?

My liege! why writers little claim your thought,
I guess; and, with their leave, will tell the fault:

We (r) poets are (upon a poet's word)
Of all mankind, the creatures most absurd:

The (s) season, when to come, and when to go,
To sing, or cease to sing, we never know;

And if we will recite nine hours in ten,
You lose your patience just like other men.

Then too we hurt ourselves, when, to defend
A (t) single verse, we quarrel with a friend;

Repeat (u) unask'd; (v) lament, the wit's too fine
For vulgar eyes, and point out every line;

But most, when, straining with too weak a wing,
We needs will write epistles to the king;

And (x) from the moment we oblige the town,
Expect a place, or pension from the crown;

Or, dubb'd historians by express command,
T' enroll your triumphs o'er the seas and land,

Be call'd to court, to plan some work divine,
As once for Louis, Boileau, and Racine.

Yet (y) think, great Sir! (so many virtues shown)
Ah, think, what poet best may make them known?

Or choose at least some minister of grace,
Fit to bestow the (z) laureat's weighty place.

BOOK II. EPISTLE II.

Ludentis speciem dabit, et torquebitur. HOR.

DEAR Col'nel, Coham's and your country's friend!

You love a verse, take such as I can send.

(b) A Frenchman comes, presents you with his boy,

Bows, and begins—"This lad, Sir, is of Blois;
"Observe his shape how clean! his locks how
"curl'd!

"My only son; I'd have him see the world:

"His French is pure; his voice too—you shall
"hear.

"Sir, he's your slave, for twenty pound a-year.

"Mere wax as yet, you fashion him with ease,

"Your barber, cook, upholsterer, what you please:

"A perfect genius at an opera song—

"To say too much, might do my honour wrong.

"Take him with all his virtues, on my word;

"His whole ambition was to serve a lord:

"But, Sir to you, with what would I not part?

"Though faith, I fear, 'twill break his mother's "heart.

EPISTOLA II.

FLORE, bono claroque fidelis amice Neroni,

(b) Si quis forte velit puerum tibi vendere natum

Tibure vel Gabiis, et tecum sic agat: "Hic et

"Candidus, et talos a vertice pulcher ad imos,

"Fiet eritque tuus nummorum millibus octo;

"Res urget me nulla: meo sum pauper in aere.

"Nemo hoc mangonum faceret tibi: non temere

"Quivis ferret idem: semel hic cessavit, et (ut

"In scalis latuit metuens pendentis habenae:

"Des nummos, excepta nihil te si fuga lædit."

" Once (and but once) I caught him in a lie,
 " And then, unwhipp'd, he had the grace to cry :
 " The fault he has I fairly shall reveal,
 " (Could you o'erlook but that) it is, to steal."

(c) If, after this, you took the graceful lad,
 Could you complain, my friend, he prov'd so bad ?
 Faith, in such case, if you should prosecute,
 I think Sir Godfrey should decide the suit :
 Who sent the thief that stole the cash, away,
 And punish'd him that put it in his way.

(d) Consider then, and judge me in this light ;
 I told you when I went, I could not write ;
 You said the same ; and are you discontent
 With laws, to which you gave your own assent ?
 Nay worse, to ask for verse at such a time !
 D'ye think me good for nothing but to rhyme ?

(e) In Anna's wars, a soldier poor and old
 Had dearly earn'd a little purse of gold :
 Tir'd with a tedious march, one luckless night,
 He slept, poor dog ! and lost it, to a doit,
 This put the man in such a desperate mind,
 Between revenge, and grief, and hunger join'd,
 Against the foe, himself, and all mankind,
 He leap'd the trenches, scal'd a castle wall,
 Tore down a standard, took the fort and all.
 " Prodigious well !" his great commander cry'd,
 Gave him much praise, and some reward beside.
 Next, pleas'd his excellence a town to batter
 (Its name I know not, and 'tis no great matter) ;
 " Go on, my friend, (he cry'd) see yonder walls !
 " Advance and conquer ! go where glory calls !
 " More honours, more rewards, attend the brave."
 Don't you remember what reply he gave ?
 " D'ye think me, noble general, such a sot ?
 " Let him take castles who has ne'er a groat."
 (f) Bred up at home, full early I begun
 To read in Greek the wrath of Peleus' son.

(c) Ille ferat pretium, poenae securus, opinor.
 Prudens emisti vitiosum : dicta tibi est lex.
 Insequeris tamen hunc, et lite moraris iniqua.

(d) Dixi me pigrum proficiscenti tibi, dixi
 Talibus officiis prope mancum ; ne mea saevus
 Jurgares ad te quod epistola nulla veniret.
 Quid tum profeci, mecum facientia jura
 Si tamen attentas ? quereris super hoc etiam, quod
 Expectata tibi non mittam carmina mendax.

(e) Luculli miles collecta viatica multis
 Aerumnis, lassus dum noctu stertit, ac assem
 Perdiderat : post hoc vehemens lupo, et sibi et hosti

Iratu pariter, jejunis dentibus acer,
 Praesidium regale loco dejecit, ut aiunt,
 Semme munito, et multarum divite rerum.
 Clarus ob id factum, donis ornatur honestis,
 Accipit et bis dena super sestertia nummum.
 Forte sub hoc tempus castellum evertere praetor
 Nescio quod cupiens, hortari coepit eundem [tem :
 Verbis, quae timido quoque possent addere men-
 1, bone, quo virtus tua te vocat : i pede fausto,
 Grandia laturus meritorum praemia : quid stas ?
 Post haec ille catus, quantumvis rusticus, " Ibit,
 " Ibit eo, quo vis, qui zonam perdidit, inquit."
 (f) Romae nutui mihi contigit atque doceri,

Besides, my father taught me from a lad,
 The better art to know the good from bad :
 (And little sure imported to remove,
 To hunt for truth in Maudlin's learned grove.)
 But knottier points, we knew not half so well,
 Depriv'd us soon of our paternal cell ;
 And certain laws, by sufferers thought unjust,
 Deny'd all posts of profit or of trust :
 Hopes after hopes of pious Papists fail'd, [vail'd.
 While mighty William's thundering arm pre-
 For right hereditary tax'd and fin'd,
 He stuck to poverty with peace of mind ;
 And me, the muses help'd to undergo it ;
 Convict a Papist he, and I a poet.
 But (thanks to Homer) hence I live and thrive,
 Indebted to no prince or peer alive,
 Sure I should want the care of ten Monroes,
 If I would scribble, rather than repose.

(g) Years following years, steal something every day,

At last they steal us from ourselves away ;
 In one our frolics, one amusements end,
 In one a mistress drops, in one a friend :
 This subtle thief of life, this paltry time,
 What will it leave me, if it snatch my rhyme ?
 If every wheel of that unweary'd mill,
 That turn'd ten thousand verses, now stands still ?

(b) But after all, what would you have me do ?
 When out of twenty I can please not two ;
 When this heroics only deigns to praise,
 Sharp satire that, and that Pindaric lays ?
 One likes the pheasant's wing, and one the leg ;
 The vulgar boil, the learned roast an egg.
 Hard task ! to hit the palate of such guests,
 When Oldfield loves what Dartineus detests.

(i) But grant I may relapse, for want of grace,
 Again to rhyme : can London be the place ?

Iratu Graius quantum nocuisset Achilles.
 Adjecere bonae paulo plus artis Athenae :
 Scilicet ut possem curvo dignoscere rectum,
 Atque inter sylvas academi quaerere verum.
 Dura sed emovere loco me tempora grato ;
 Civilisque rudem belli tulit aestus in arma,
 Caesaris Augusti non responsura lacertis.
 Unde simul primum me demisere Philippi,
 Decisis humilem pennis, inopemque paterni
 Et laris et fundi, paupertas impulit audax
 Ut versus facerem : sed, quod non desit, habentem,
 Quae poterunt unquam satis expurgare cicutae,
 Ni melius dormire putem, quam scribere versus ?

(g) Singula de nobis anni praedantur euntes ;
 Eripuere jocos, venerem, convivia, ludum ;
 Tendunt extorquere poemata. quid faciam vis ?

(b) Denique non omnes eadem mirantur amanti-que.

Carminē tu gaudes : hic delectatur iambis ;
 Ille Bioncis sermonibus, et sale nigro.
 Tres mihi convivae prope dissentire videntur,
 Poscentes vario multum diversa palato. [alter :
 Quid dem ? quid non dem ? renuis quod tu, jubet
 Quod petis, id sane est invisum acidumque duobus.

Who there his muse, or self, or soul attends,
In crowds, and courts, law, business, feasts, and friends?

My counsel sends to execute a deed:

A poet begs me I will hear him read:

In Palace-yard at nine you'll find me there—

At ten, for certain, Sir, in Bloomsbury-square—

Before the Lords at twelve my cause comes on—

There's a rehearsal, Sir, exact at one—

"Oh but a wit can study in the streets,

"And raise his mind above the mob he meets."

Not quite so well however as one ought;

A hackney-coach may chance to spoil a thought;

And then a nodding beam, or pig of lead,

God knows, may hurt the very ablest head.

Have you not seen, at Guildhall's narrow pass,

Two Aldermen dispute it with an ass?

And peers give way, exalted as they are,

Ev'n to their own s-r-v—nce in a car?

(k) Go, lofty poet! and in such a crowd,

Sing thy sonorous verse—but not aloud.

Alas! to grottoes and to groves we run,

To ease and silence, every muse's son:

Blackmore himself, for any grand effort,

Would drink and doze at Tooting or Earl's Court.

How shall I rhyme in this eternal roar?

How match the bards whom none e'er match'd before?

(l) The man, who, stretch'd in Isis' calm retreat,

To books and study gives seven years complete,

See, strow'd with learned dust, his nightcap on,

He walks, an object new beneath the sun!

The boys flock round him, and the people stare:

So stiff, so mute! some statue you would swear,

Stepp'd from its pedestal to take the air!

Scribere posse, inter tot curas totque labores?

Hic sponsum vocat, hic auditum scripta, relictis

Omnibus officiis: cubat hic in colle Quirini,

Hic extremo in Aventino; visendus uterque.

Intervalla vides humane commoda. "Verum

Who deem'd each other oracles of law!

Each had a gravity would make you split,

And shook his head at Murray, as a wit.

No poets there, but Stephen, you, and me.

"My dear Tibullus!" if that will not do,

"Let me be Horace, and be Ovid you!

"Or, I'm content, allow me Dryden's strains,

"And you shall rise up Otway for your pains."

Much do I suffer, much to keep in peace

This jealous, waspish, wrong-head, rhyming race;

And much must flatter, if the whim should bite

To court applause by printing what I write:

But let the fit pass o'er, I'm wise enough

To stop my ears to their confounded stuff.

(o) In vain, bad rhymers all mankind reject,

They treat themselves with most profound respect;

'Tis to small purpose that you hold your tongue,

Each prais'd within, is happy all day long:

But how severely with themselves proceed
The men, who write such verse as we can read?
Their own strict judges, not a word they spare,
That wants or force, or light, or weight, or care,
Howe'er unwillingly it quits its place,
Nay though at Court (perhaps) it may find grace:
Such they'll degrade; and sometimes, in its stead,
(p) In downright charity revive the dead;
Mark where a bold, expressive phrase appears,
Bright through the rubbish of some hundred years;
Command old words that long have slept, to wake,
Words, that wise Bacon, or brave Raleigh spake;
Or bid the new be English, ages hence,
(For use will father what's begot by sense)
Pour the full tide of eloquence along,
Serenely pure, and yet divinely strong,
Rich with the treasures of each foreign tongue! }
Prune the luxuriant, the uncouth refine,
But show no mercy to an empty line:
Then polish all, with so much life and ease,
You think 'tis nature, and a knack to please:
"But ease in writing flows from art, not chance;
"As those move easiest who have learn'd to dance."
(q) If such the plague and pains to write by rule,
Better (say I) be pleas'd, and play the fool;
Call, if you will, bad rhyming a disease,
It gives men happiness, or leaves them ease.
There liv'd in primo Georgii (they record)
A worthy member, no small fool, a lord;
Who, though the house was up, delighted fate,
Heard, noted, answer'd, as in full debate:
In all but this, a man of sober life,
Fond of his friend, and civil to his wife;
Not quite a madman, though a passy fell;
And much too wise to walk into a well.
Him, the damn'd doctors and his friends immur'd,
They bled, they cupp'd, they purg'd; in short,
they cur'd:
Whereat the gentleman began to stare—
My friends! he cry'd, p—x take you for your care!
That from a patriot of distinguish'd note,
Have bled and purg'd me to a simple vote.

(r) Well, on the whole, plain prose must be my fate:
Wisdom (curse on it) will come soon or late.
There is a time when poets will grow dull:
I'll e'en leave verses to the boys at school:
To rules of poetry no more confin'd,
I'll learn to smooth and harmonise my mind,
Teach every thought within its bounds to roll,
And keep the equal measure of the soul.
(s) Soon as I enter at my country door,
My mind resumes the thread it dropp'd before;
Thoughts which at Hyde-park corner I forgot,
Meet and rejoin me, in the pensive grot.
There all alone, and compliments apart,
I ask these sober questions of my heart. [crave,
(t) If, when the more you drink, the more you
You tell the doctor; when the more you have,
The more you want, why not with equal ease
Confess as well your folly, as disease?
The heart resolves this matter in a trice,
"Men only feel the smart, but not the vice."
(u) When golden angels cease to cure the evil,
You give all royal witchcraft to the devil:
When servile chaplains cry, that birth and place
Indue a peer with honour, truth, and grace;
Look in that breast, most dirty Dean! be fair,
Say, can you find out one such lodger there?
Yet still, not heeding what your heart can teach,
You go to church to hear these flatterers preach,
Indeed, could wealth bestow or wit or merit,
A grain of courage, or a spark of spirit,
The wisest man might blush, I must agree,
If D lov'd sixpence, more than he.
(v) If there be truth in law, and use can give
A property, that's yours on which you live.

Delightful Abs-court, if its fields afford
 Their fruits to you, confesses you its lord :
 All (x) Worldly's hens, nay, partridge, fold to town,
 His venison too, a guinea makes your own :
 He bought at thousands, what with better wit
 You purchase as you want, and bit by bit ;
 Now, or long since, what difference will be found ?
 You pay a penny, and he paid a pound.

(y) Heathcote himself, and such large-acred men,
 Lords of fat E'sham, or of Lincoln-fen,
 Buy every stick of wood that lends them heat ;
 Buy every pullet they afford to eat.

Yet these are wights, who fondly call their own
 Half that the devil o'erlooks from Lincoln-town.
 The laws of God, as well as of the land,
 Abhor a perpetuity should stand :

Estates have wings, and hang in fortune's power
 (z) Loose on the point of every wavering hour,
 Ready, by force, or of your own accord,
 By sale, at least by death, to change their lord.
 Man? and for ever? wretch! what wouldst thou have?

Heir urges heir, like wave impelling wave.
 All vast possessions (just the same the case
 Whether you call them villa, park, or chase)
 Alas, my Bathurst! what will they avail?
 Join Cotswood's hills to Saperton's fair dale,
 Let rising granaries and temples here,
 There mingled farms and pyramids appear,
 Link towns to towns with avenues of oak,
 Enclose whole downs in walls, 'tis all a joke!
 Inexorable Death shall level all,

And trees, and stones, and farms, and farmer fall.

*Argentum, vestes Gaetulo murice tinctas,
 Sunt qui non habeant; est qui non curat habere.*

There are who have not—and thank heaven there are,

Who, if they have not, think not worth their care.

(b) Talk what you will of taste, my friend, you'll find

Two of a face, as soon as of a mind.

Why, of two brothers, rich and restless one
 Ploughs, burns, manures, and toils from sun to sun;
 The other flights, for women, sports, and wines,
 All Townshend's turnips, and all Grosvenor's mines:
 Why one like Bu— with pay and scorn content,
 Bows and votes on, in court and parliament;
 One, driven by strong benevolence of soul,
 Shall fly, like Oglethorpe, from pole to pole:
 Is known alone to that Directing Power,
 Who forms the genius in the natal hour;
 That God of Nature, who, within us still,
 Inclines our action, not constrains our will;
 Various of temper, as of face or frame,
 Each individual; his great end the same.

(c) Yes, Sir, how small soever be my heap,
 A part I will enjoy, as well as keep.

My heir may sigh, and think it want of grace
 A man so poor would live without a place:

But sure no statute in his favour says,

How free, or frugal, I shall pass my days:

I, who at some times spend, at others spare,
 Divided between carelessness and care.

'Tis one thing madly to disperse my store;

Another, not to heed to treasure more:

Glad, like a boy, to snatch the first good day,

And pleas'd, if sordid want be far away.

(f) What is 't to me (a passenger God wot)
 Whether my vessel be first-rate or not?

The ship itself may make a better figure;

But I that sail, am neither less nor bigger:

I neither strut with every favouring breath,

Nor strive with all the tempest in my teeth.

In power, wit, figure, virtue, fortune, plac'd

Behind the foremost, and before the last.

(b) *Cur alter fratrum cessare, et ludere, et ungi

Non agimur tumidis velis Aquilone secundo:

Non tamen adversus aetatem ducimus Austris,

(g) "But why all this of avarice? I have none."
 I wish you joy, Sir, of a tyrant gone;
 But does no other lord it at this hour,
 As wild and mad? the avarice of power?
 Does neither rage inflame, nor fear appall?
 Not the black fear of death, that saddens all?
 With terrors round, can reason hold her throne,
 Despise the known, nor trouble at th' unknown?
 Survey both worlds, intrepid and entire,
 In spite of witches, devils, dreams, and fire?
 Pleas'd to look forward, pleas'd to look behind,
 And count each birth-day with a grateful mind?
 Has life no sourness, drawn so near its end;
 Canst thou endure a foe, forgive a friend?

Viribus, ingenio, specie, virtute, loco, re,
 Extremi primorum, extremis usque priores.

(g) Non es avarus: abi. quid? caetera jam simul isto

Cum vitio fugere? caret tibi pectus inani
 Ambitione? caret mortis formidine et ira?

Has age but melted the rough parts away,
 As winter fruits grow mild ere they decay?
 Or will you think, my friend, your business done,
 When, of a hundred thorns, you pull out one?

(b) Learn to live well, or fairly make your will;
 You've play'd, and lov'd, and eat, and drank your fill:

Walk sober off; before a sprightlier age
 Comes tittering on, and shoves you from the stage:
 Leave such to trifle with more grace and ease,
 Whom folly pleases, and whose follies please.

Somnia, terrores magicos, miracula, fagas,
 Nocturnos lemures, portentaque Theffala rides?
 Natales grate numeras? ignoscis amicis?
 Lenior et melior sis accedente senecta?

Quid te extrema levat spinis de pluribus una?

(b) Vivere si recte nescis, decede peritis.

Lufisti fatis, edifti fatis, atque bibifti:
 Tempus abire tibi est: ne potum largius aequo
 Rideat, et pulset lasciva decantius aetas.

THE SATIRES OF DR. JOHN DONNE,

DEAN OF ST. PAUL'S, VERSIFIED.

" Quid vetat et nosmet Lucilli scripta legentes
" Quaerere, num illius, num rerum dura negarit
" Versiculos natura magis factos, et euntes
" Mollius?" HOR.]

SATIRE II.

YES; thank my stars! as early as I knew
This town, I had the sense to hate it too:
Yet here, as ev'n in hell, there must be still
One giant-vice, so excellently ill,
That all beside, one pities, nor abhors;
As who knows Sappho, smiles at other whores.

I grant that poetry's a crying sin;
It brought (no doubt) th' excise and army in:
Catch'd like the plague, or love, the Lord knows
But that the cure is starving, all allow. [how
Yet like the papist's, is the poet's state.

Poor and disarm'd, and hardly worth your hate!

Here a lean bard, whose wit could never give Himself a dinner, makes an actor live:
The thief condemn'd, in law already dead,
So prompts, and saves a rogue who cannot read.
Thus as the pipes of some carv'd organ move,
The gilded puppets dance and mount above.
Heav'd by the breath th' inspiring bellows blow:
Th' inspiring bellows lie and pant below.

One sings the fair: but songs no longer move;
No rat is rhym'd to death, nor maid to love:
In love's, in nature's spite, the siege they hold,
And scorn the flesh, the devil, and all but gold.

These write to lords, some mean reward to get,
As needy beggars sing at doors for meat.
Those write because all write, and so have still Excuse for writing, and for writing ill.

Wretched indeed! but far more wretched yet
Is he who makes his meal on others wit:
'Tis chang'd, no doubt, from what it was before;
His rank digestion makes it wit no more:

Sense, past through him, no longer is the same;
For food digested takes another name.

I pass o'er all those confessors and martyrs,
Who live like S—tt—n, or who die like Chartres,
Out-cant old Esdras, or out-drink his heir,
Out-usure Jews, or Irishmen out-swear;
Wicked as pages, who in early years
Act sins which Prisca's confessor scarce hears.
Ev'n those I pardon, for whose sinful sake
Schoolmen new tenements in hell must make;
Of whose strange crimes no canonist can tell
In what commandment's large contents they dwell.

One, one man only breeds my just offence;
Whom crimes gave wealth, and wealth gave im-
pudence:

Time, that at last matures a clap to pox,
Whose gentle progress makes a calf an ox,
And brings all natural events to pass,
Hath made him an attorney of an ass.
No young divine, new-benefic'd, can be
More pert, more proud, more positive, than he.
What further could I wish the fop to do,
But turn a wit, and scribble verses too?
Pierce the soft labyrinth of a lady's ear
With rhymes of this per cent., and that per year?
Or court a wife, spread out his wily parts,
Like nets or line-twigs, for rich widows hearts;
Call himself barrister to every wench,
And woo in language of the pleas and bench?
Language, which Boreas might to Auster hold More rough than forty Germans when they scold.

Curs'd be the wretch, so venal and so vain:
Paltry and proud, as drabs in Drury-lane.

'Tis such a bounty as was never known,
 If Peter deigns to help you to your own:
 What thanks, what praise, if Peter but supplies!
 And what a solemn face, if he denies!
 Grave, as when prisoners shake the head and swear
 'Twas only suretiship that brought them there.
 His office keeps your parchment fates entire,
 He starves with cold to save them from the fire;
 For you he walks the streets through rain or dust,
 For not in chariots Peter puts his trust;
 For you he sweats and labours at the laws,
 Takes God to witness he affects your cause,
 And lies to every lord in every thing,
 Like a king's favourite—or like a king.
 These are the talents that adorn them all,
 From wicked Waters ev'n to godly **
 Not more of Simony beneath black gowns,
 Not more of bastardy in heirs to crowns.
 In shillings and in pence at first they deal;
 And steal so little, few perceive they steal;
 Till, like the sea, they compass all the land,
 From Scots to Wight, from Mount to Dover strand:
 And when rank widows purchase luscious nights,
 Or when a duke to Janssen punts at White's,
 Or city heir in mortgage melts away;
 Satan himself feels far less joy than they.
 Piecemeal they win this acre first, then that,
 Glean on, and gather up the whole estate.
 Then strongly fencing ill-got wealth by law,
 Indentures, covenants, articles they draw,
 Large as the fields themselves, and larger far
 Than civil codes, with all their glosses, are;
 So vast, our new divines, we must confess,
 Are fathers of the church for writing less.
 But let them write for you, each rogue impairs
 The deeds, and dextrously omits, ses heires:
 No commentator can more sily pass
 Over a learn'd, unintelligible place:
 Or, in quotation, shrewd divines leave out [doubt.
 Those words that would against them clear the
 So Luther thought the pater-noster long,
 When doom'd to say his beads and even-song;
 But having cast his cowl, and left those laws,
 Adds to Christ's prayer, the power and glory clause.
 The lands are bought; but where are to be found
 Those ancient woods, that shaded all the ground?
 We see no new-built palaces aspire,
 No kitchens emulate the vestal fire. [yore
 Where are those troops of poor, that throng'd of
 The good old landlord's hospitable door?
 Well, I could wish, that still in lordly domes
 Some beasts were kill'd, though not whole hectoms;
 That both extremes were banish'd from their walls,
 Carthusian fasts, and sulsome bachanals;
 And all mankind might that just mean observe,
 In which none e'er could surfeit, none could starve.
 These as good works, 'tis true, we all allow,
 But oh! these works are not in fashion now:
 Like rich old wardrobes, things extremely rare,
 Extremely fine, but what no man will wear.
 Thus much I've said, I trust, without offence;
 Let no court sycophant pervert my sense,
 Nor fly informer watch these words to draw
 Within the reach of treason, or the law.

VOL. VIII.

SATIRE IV.

WELL, if it be my time to quit the stage,
 Adieu to all the follies of the age!
 I die in charity with fool and knave,
 Secure of peace at least beyond the grave.
 I've had my purgatory here betimes,
 And paid for all my satires, all my rhymes.
 The poet's hell, its tortures, fiends, and flames,
 To this were trifles, toys, and empty names.
 With foolish pride my heart was never fir'd,
 Nor the vain itch t' admire, or be admir'd;
 I hop'd for no commission from his Grace;
 I bought no benefice, I begg'd no place:
 Had no new verses, nor new suit to show;
 Yet went to court!—the devil would have it so.
 But, as the fool that in reforming days
 Would go to mass in jest (as story says)
 Could not but think, to pay his fine was odd,
 Since 'twas no form'd design of serving God;
 So was I punish'd, as if full as proud,
 As prone to ill, as negligent of good,
 As deep in debt, without a thought to pay,
 As vain, as idle, and as false, as they }
 Who live at court, for going once that way!
 Scarce was I enter'd, when, behold! there came
 A thing which Adam had been pos'd to name;
 Noah had refus'd it lodging in his ark,
 Where all the race of reptiles might embark:
 A verier monster, than on Afric's shore
 The sun e'er got, or slimy Nilus bore,
 Or Sloan or Woodward's wondrous shelves contain,
 Nay, all that lying travellers can feign.
 The watch would hardly let him pass at noon,
 At night would swear him dropp'd out of the moon.
 One, whom the mob, when next we find or make
 A popish plot, shall for a Jesuit take,
 And the wise justice starting from his chair
 Cry, By your priesthood tell me what you are?
 Such was the wight: th' apparel on his back,
 Though coarse, was reverend, and though bare,
 was black:
 The suit, if by the fashion one might guess,
 Was velvet in the youth of good Queen Bess,
 But mere tuff-taffety what now remain'd:
 So time, that changes all things, had ordain'd!
 Our sons shall see it leisurely decay,
 First turn plain rash, then vanish quite away.
 This thing has travell'd, and speaks language too,
 And knows what's fit for every state to do;
 Of whose best phrase and courtly accent join'd,
 He forms one tongue, exotic and refin'd,
 I talkers I've learn'd to bear; Morteux I knew,
 Henley himself I've heard, and Budget too.
 The Doctor's wormwood style, the hash of tongues
 A pedant makes, the storm of Gunson's lungs,
 The whole artillery of the terms of war,
 And (all those plagues in one) the bawling bar;
 These I could bear; but not a rogue so civil,
 Whose tongue will compliment you to the devil.
 A tongue, that can cheat widows, cancel scores,
 Make Scots speak treason, cozen subtlest whores,
 K

With royal favourites in flattery vie,
And Oldmixon and Burnet both outlie.

He spies me out; I whisper, Gracious God!
What sin of mine could merit such a rod?
That all the shot of dulness now must be
From this thy blunderbuss discharg'd on me!
Permit (he cries) no stranger to your fame
To crave your sentiment, if ———'s your name.
What speech esteem you most? "The king's,"
said I.

But the best words?—O Sir, the dictionary."
You miss my aim! I mean the most acute
And perfect speaker?—"Onflow, past dispute."
But, Sir, of writers? "Swift, for closer style,
"But Hoadly for a period of a mile."
Why yes, 'tis granted, these indeed may pass:
Good common linguists, and so Panurge was;
Nay troth th' apostles (though perhaps too rough)
Had once a pretty gift of tongues enough:
Yet these were all poor gentlemen! I dare
Affirm, 'twas travel made them what they were.

Thus, others talents having nicely shown,
He came by sure transition to his own:
Till I cry'd out, You prove yourself so able,
Pity! you was not Druggerman at Babel;
For had they found a linguist half so good,
I make no question but the tower had stood.

"Obliging Sir! for courts you sure were made:
"Why then for ever bury'd in the shade?
"Spirits like you, should see and should be seen,
"The king would smile on you—at least the
"queen."

Ah, gentle Sir! you courtiers so cajole us—
But Tully has it, "Nunquam minus solus."
And as for courts, forgive me, if I say
No lessons now are taught the Spartan way:
Though in his pictures lust be full display'd,
Few are the converts Aretine has made;
And though the court show vice exceeding clear,
None should, by my advice, learn virtue there.

At this entranc'd, he lifts his hands and eyes,
Squeaks like a high stretch'd lutestring, and replies:
"Oh, 'tis the sweetest of all earthly things
"To gaze on princes, and to talk of kings!"
Then, happy man who shows the tombs! said I,
He dwells amidst the royal family;
He every day from king to king can walk,
Of all Harries, all our Edwards talk;
And get, by speaking truth of monarchs dead,
What few can of the living, ease and bread.
"Lord, Sir, a mere mechanic! strangely low,
"And coarse of phrase,—your English all are so.
"How elegant your Frenchman!" Mine, d'ye mean?

I have but one; I hope the fellow's clean,
"Oh! Sir, politely so! nay, let me die,
"Your only wearing is your paduasoy."
Not, Sir, my only, I have better still,
And this you see is but my dishabille—
Wild to get loose, his patience I provoke,
Mistake, confound, object at all he spoke.
But as coarse iron, sharpen'd, mangles more,
And itch most hurts when anger'd to a fore;
So when you plague a fool, 'tis still the curse,
You only make the matter worse and worse.

He past it o'er; affects an easy smile
At all my peevishness, and turns his style.
He asks, "What news?" I tell him of new plays,
New eunuchs, harlequins, and operas.
He hears, and as a still with simples in it,
Between each drop it gives, stays half a minute,
Loth to enrich me with too quick replies,
By little, and by little, drops his lies. [shows,
Mere household trash: of birthnights, balls, and
More than ten Hollinsheds, or Halls, or Stows.
When the queen frown'd, or smil'd, he knows; and what

A subtle minister may make of that:
Who sins with whom: who got his pension rug,
Or quicken'd a reversion by a drug:
Whose place is quarter'd out, three parts in four,
And whether to a bishop, or a whore:
Who, having lost his credit, pawn'd his rent,
Is therefore fit to have a government:
Who, in the secret, deals in stocks secure,
And cheats th' unknowing widow and the poor:
Who makes a trust of charity a job,
And gets an act of parliament to rob:
Why turnpikes rise, and now no cit nor clown
Can gratis see the country, or the town:
Shortly no lad shall chuck, or lady vole,
But some excising courtier will have toll.
He tells what strumpet places sells for life,
What 'squire his lands, what citizen his wife:
At last (which proves him wiser still than all)
What lady's face is not a whited wall.

As one of Woodward's patients, sick, and sore,
I puke, I nauseate,—yet he thrusts in more:
Trims Europe's balance, tops the statesman's part,
And talks gazettes and postboys o'er by heart.
Like a big wife at sight of lothsome meat
Ready to cast, I yawn, I sigh, and sweat.
Then as a licens'd spy, whom nothing can
Silence or hurt, he libels every man;
Swears every place entail'd for years to come,
In sure succession to the day of doom:
He names the price for every office paid,
And says our wars thrive ill, because delay'd;
Nay hints, 'tis by connivance of the court,
That Spain robs on, and Dunkirk's still a port.
Not more amazement seiz'd on Circe's guests,
To see themselves fall headlong into beasts,
Than mine to find a subject stay'd and wife
Already half turn'd traitor by surprise.
I felt th' infection slide from him to me;
As in the pox, some give it to get free;
And quick to swallow me, methought I saw
One of our giant statues ope its jaw.

In that nice moment, as another Lye
Stood just a-tilt, the minister came by.
To him he flies, and bows, and bows again,
Then, close as Umbra, joins the dirty train.
Not Fannius' self more impudently near,
When half his nose is in his prince's ear.
I quak'd at heart; and, still afraid to see
All the court fill'd with stranger things than he,
Ran out as fast as one that pays his bail,
And dreads more actions, hurries from a jail.

Bear me, some God! oh quickly bear me hence
To wholesome solitude, the nurse of sense;

Where Contemplation prunes her ruffled wings,
And the free soul looks down to pity kings!
There sober thought pursu'd th' amusing theme,
Till fancy colour'd it, and form'd a dream.
A vision hermits can to hell transport,
And forc'd ev'n me to see the damn'd at court.
Not Dante, dreaming all th' infernal state,
Beheld such scenes of envy, sin, and hate.
Base fear becomes the guilty, not the free;
Suits tyrants, plunderers, but suits not me:
Shall I, the terror of this sinful town,
Care, if a livery'd lord or smile or frown?
Who cannot flatter, and detest who can,
Tremble before a noble serving man?
O my fair mistress, Truth! shall I quit thee
For huffing, braggart, puff nobility?
Thou, who since yesterday hast roll'd o'er all
The busy, idle blockheads of the ball,
Hast thou, oh fun! beheld an emptier sort,
Than such as swell this bladder of a court?
Now pox on those who show a court in wax!
It ought to bring all courtiers on their backs;
Such painted puppets: such a varnish'd race
Of hollow gewgaws, only dress and face!
Such waxen noses, stately staring things—
No wonder some folks bow, and think them kings.
See! where the British youth, engag'd no
more,

At Fig's at White's, with felons, or a whore,
Pay their last duty to the court, and come
All fresh and fragrant, to the drawing-room;
In hues as gay, and odours as divine,
As the fair fields they sold to look so fine.
"That's velvet for a king!" the flatterer swears;
'Tis true, for ten days hence 'twill be King Lear's.
Our court may justly to our stage give rules,
That helps it both to fool's-coats and to fools.
And why not players strut in courtiers clothes?
For these are actors too, as well as those:
Wants reach all states: they beg but better dress,
And all is splendid poverty at best.

Painted for sight, and essenc'd for the smell,
Like frigates fraught with spice and cochineal,
Sail in the ladies: how each pirate eyes
So weak a vessel, and so rich a prize!
Top-gallant he, and she in all her trim,
He boarding her, she striking sail to him:

"Dear Countess! you have charms all hearts to "hit!"

And "Sweet Sir Fopling! you have so much
"wit."

Such wits and beauties are not prais'd for nought,
For both the beauty and the wit are bought.

'Twould burst even Heraclitus with the spleen,
To see those antics, Fopling and Courtin:
The presence seems, with things so richly odd,
The mosque of Mahound, or some queer Pa-god.
See them survey their limbs by Durer's rules,
Of all beau-kind the best proportion'd fools?
Adjust their clothes, and to confession draw
Those venial sins, an atom, or a straw:
But oh! what terrors must distract the soul
Convicted of that mortal crime, a hole:
Or should one pound of powder less bespread
Those monkey tails that wag behind their head!
Thus finish'd, and corrected to a hair,
They march, to prate their hour before the fair.
So first to preach a white-glov'd chaplain goes,
With band of lily, and with cheek of rose,
Sweeter than Sharon, in immaculate trim,
Neatness itself impertinent in him.

Let but the ladies smile, and they are blest:
Prodigious! how the things protest, protest!
Peace, fools, or Gonson will for Papiests seize you,
If once he catch you at your Jesu! Jesu!

Nature made every fop to plague his brother,
Just as one beauty mortifies another.
But here's the captain that will plague them both,
Whose air cries arm! whose very looks an oath:
The captain's honest, Sirs, and that's enough,
Though his soul's bullet, and his body buff.
He spits fore-right; his haughty chest before,
Like battering rams, beats open every door:
And with a face as red, and as awry,
As Herod's hangdogs in old tapestry,
Scarecrow to boys, the breeding woman's curse,
Has yet a strange ambition to look worse:
Confounds the civil, keeps the rude in awe,
Jests like a licens'd fool, commands like law.

Frighted, I quit the room, but leave it so
As men from jails to execution go;
For hung with deadly sins I see the wall,
And lin'd with giants deadlier than them all:
Each man an askapart, of strength to toss
For quoits, both Temple-bar and Charing-cross.
Scar'd at the grizly forms, I sweat, I fly,
And shake all o'er, like a discover'd spy.

Courts are too much for wits so weak as mine:
Charge them with Heaven's artillery, bold divine!

From such alone the great rebukes endure,
Whose satire's sacred, and whose rage secure:
'Tis mine to wash a few light stains; but theirs
To deluge sin, and drown a court in tears.
Howe'er, what's now Apocrypha, my wit,
In time to come, may pass for holy writ.

EPILOGUE TO THE SATIRES.

IN TWO DIALOGUES.

WRITTEN IN 1738.

DIALOGUE I.

Fr. NOT twice a twelvemonth you appear in print,
And when it comes, the court see nothing in't.
You grow correct, that once with rapture writ,
And are, besides, too moral for a wit,
Decay of parts, alas! we all must feel—
Why now, this moment, don't I see you steal!
'Tis all from Horace; Horace long before ye
Said, "Tories call'd him Whig, and Whigs a "Tory;
And taught his Romans, in much better metre,
"To laugh at fools who put their trust in Peter."
But Horace, Sir, was delicate, was nice; 11
Bubo observes, he last'd no sort of vice:
Horace would say, Sir Billy serv'd the crown,
Blunt could do business, Higgins knew the town;
In Sappho touch the failings of the sex,
In reverend bishops note some small neglects,
And own the Spaniard did a waggish thing,
Who cropt our ears, and sent them to the King.
His fly, polite, insinuating style
Could please at court, and make Augustus smile:
An artful manager, that crept between 21
His friend and shame, and was a kind of screen.
But 'faith your very friends will soon be sore;
Patriots there are, who wish you'd jest no more—
And where's the glory? 'twill be only thought
The great man never offer'd you a groat.
Go see Sir Robert—

P. See Sir Robert!—hum—
And never laugh—for all my life to come?
Seen him I have, but in his happier hour
Of social pleasure, ill-exchang'd for power; 30
Seen him, uncumber'd with a venal tribe,
Smile without art, and win without a bribe.

VARIATIONS.

After ver. 2, in the MS.

You don't, I hope, pretend to quit the trade,
Because you think your reputation made:
Like good Sir Paul, of whom so much was said,
That when his name was up, he lay a-bed.
Come, come, refresh us with a livelier song,
Or, like Sir Paul, you'll lie a-bed too long.
P. Sir, what I write, should be correctly writ.
F. Correct: 'tis what no genius can admit.
Besides, you grow too moral for a wt.

Would he oblige me! let me only find,
He does not think me what he thinks mankind.
Come, come, at all I laugh he laughs, no doubt;
The only difference is, I dare laugh out.

F. Why yes: with scripture still you may be free;

A horse-laugh, if you please, at honesty;
A joke on Jekyll, or some odd old Whig,
Who never chang'd his principle, or wig; 40
A patriot is a fool in every age,
Whom all Lord Chamberlains allow the stage:
These nothing hurts; they keep their fashion still,
And wear their strange old virtue, as they will.

If any ask you, "Who's the man, so near "His prince, that writes in verse, and has his
"ear?"

Why answer, Lyttleton; and I'll engage
The worthy youth shall ne'er be in a rage:
But were his verses vile, his whisper base,
You'd quickly find him in Lord Fanny's case. 50
Sejanus, Wolsey, hurt not honest Fleury,
But well may put some statesmen in a fury.

Laugh then at any, but at fools or foes;
These you but anger, and you mend not those.
Laugh at your friends, and if your friends are sore,
So much the better, you may laugh the more.
To vice and folly to confine the jest,
Sets half the world, God knows, against the rest;
Did not the sneer of more impartial men
At sense and virtue balance all again 60
Judicious wits spread wide the ridicule,
And charitably comfort knave and fool.

P. Dear Sir, forgive the prejudice of youth:
Adieu distinction, satire, warmth, and truth!
Come, harmless characters that no one hit;
Come, Henley's oratory, Osborn's wit!
The honey dropping from Favonio's tongue,
The flowers of Bubo, and the flow of Young!
The gracious dew of pulpit eloquence,
And all the well-whipp'd cream of courtly sense,
That first was H—vy's, F—'s next, and then, 71
The S—te's, and then H—vy's once agen.

O come, that easy Ciceronian style,
So Latin, yet so English all the while,
As, though the pride of Middleton and Bland,
All boys may read, and girls may understand!
Then might I sing, without the least offence,
And all I sung should be the nation's sense;
Or teach the melancholy muse to mourn,
Hang the sad verse on Carolina's urn, 80

And hail her passage to the realms of rest,
All part's perform'd, and all her children blest!
So—satire is no more—I feel it die—
No gazetteer more innocent than I—
And let, a God's name, every fool and knave
Be grac'd through life, and flatter'd in his grave.

F. Why so? if satire knows its time and place,
You still may lash the greatest—in disgrace:
For merit will by turns forsake them all;
Would you know when? exactly when they fall.
But let all satire in all changes spare 91
Immortal S—k, and grave De—re.

Silent and soft, as saints remov'd to heaven,
All ties dissolv'd, and every sin forgiven,
These may some gentle ministerial Wing
Receive, and place for ever near a king! [port,
There, where no passion, pride, or shame trans-
Lull'd with the sweet Nepenthe of a court;
There, where no father's, brother's, friend's disgrace [place:
Once break their rest, or stir them from their
But pass the sense of human miseries, 101
All tears are wip'd for ever from all eyes;
No cheek is known to blush, no heart to throb,
Save when they lose a question, or a job.

P. Good Heaven forbid, that I should blast their glory,
Who know how like Whig Ministers to Tory,
And when three sovereign's dy'd, could scarce be next,

Considering what a gracious prince was next.
Have I, in silent wonder seen such things
As pride in slaves, and avarice in kings; 110
And at a peer, or peeress, shall I fret,
Who starves a sister, or forswears a debt?
Virtue, I grant you, is an empty boast;
But shall the dignity of vice be lost?

Ye gods! shall Cibber's son, without rebuke,
Swear like a lord, or Rich outwhore a duke?
A favourite's porter with his master vie,
Be brib'd as often, and as often lie? [skill?
Shall Ward draw contracts with a statesmen's
Or Japhet pocket, like his Grace, a will? 120
Is it for Bond, or Peter, (paltry things?)
To pay their debts, or keep their faith, like kings?
If Blount dispatch'd himself, he play'd the man;
And so may'st thou, illustrious Passeran!

But shall a printer, weary of his life, [wise?
Learn, from their books, to hang himself and
This, this, my friend, I cannot, must not bear;
Vice thus abus'd, demands a nation's care:
This calls the church to deprecate our sin,
And hurls the thunder of the laws on gin. 130

Let modest Foster, if he will, excell
Ten metropolitans in preaching well;
A simple Quaker, or a Quaker's wife,
Outdo Landaffe in doctrine,—yea in life:
Let humble Allen, with an awkward shame,
Do good by stealth, and blush to find it fame;
Virtue may choose the high or low degree,
'Tis just alike to virtue, and to me;

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 111, in some editions:
Who starves a mother—

Dwell in a monk, or light upon a king,
She's still the same belov'd, contented thing. 140
Vice is undone, if she forgets her birth,
And stoops from angels to the dregs of earth:
But 'tis the fall degrades her to a whore;
Let greatness own her, and she's mean no more,
Her birth, her beauty, crowds and courts confess,
Chaste matrons praise her, and grave bishops bless;
In golden chains the willing world she draws,
And hers the gospel is, and hers the laws;
Mounts the tribunal, lifts her scarlet head,
And sees pale virtue carted in her stead. 150
Lo! at the wheels of her triumphal car,
Old England's genius, rough with many a scar,
Dragg'd in the dust! his arms hang idly round,
His flag inverted trails along the ground!
Our youth, all livery'd o'er with foreign gold,
Before her dance: behind her, crawl the old!
See thronging millions to the pagod run,
And offer country, parent, wife, or son! [claim,
Hear her black trumpet through the land pro-
That Not to be corrupted is the shame. 160
In soldier, churchman, patriot, man in power,
'Tis avarice all, ambition is no more!
See, all our nobles begging to be slaves!
See, all our fools aspiring to be knaves!
The wit of cheats, the courage of a whore,
Are what ten thousand envy and adore:
All, all look up, with reverential awe,
At crimes that 'scape, or triumph o'er the law:
While truth, worth, wisdom, daily they decry—
"Nothing is sacred now but villany." 170
Yet may this verse (if such a verse remain)
Show there was one who held it in disdain.

DIALOGUE II.

F. 'Tis all a libel—Paxton (Sir) will say.

P. Not yet, my friend! to-morrow 'faith it may;

And for that very cause I print to-day.

How should I fret to mangle every line,

In reverence to the sins of thirty-nine!

Vice with such giant-strides comes on amain,

Invention strives to be before in vain;

Feign what I will, and paint it e'er so strong,

Some rising genius sins up to my song.

F. Yet none but you by name the guilty lash;

Even Guthry saves half Newgate by a dash.

Spare then the person, and expose the vice.

P. How, Sir! not damn the sharper, but the dice?

Come on then, satire! general, unconfin'd,

Spread thy broad wing, and souce on all the kind.

Ye statesmen, priests, of one religion all!

Ye tradesmen, vile in army, court, or hall!

Ye reverend Atheists. F. Scandal! name them,
Who?

P. Why that's the thing you bid me not to do.

Who starv'd a sister, who forswore a debt, 20

I never nam'd; the town's inquiring yet,

The poisoning dame—F. You mean—P. I don't!

F. You do.

P. See, now I keep the secret, and not you!

The bribing statesman—F. Hold, too high you go.

P. The brib'd elector—F. There you stoop too low.

P. I fain would please you, if I knew with what;
Tell me, which knave is lawful game, which not?
Must great offenders, once escap'd the crown,
Like royal harts, be never more run down?
Admit your law to spare the knight requires, 30
As beasts of nature may we hunt the squires?
Suppose I censure—you know what I mean—
To save a bishop, may I name a dean?

F. A dean, Sir? no; his fortune is not made,
You hurt a man that's rising in the trade.

P. If not the tradesman who set up to-day,
Much less the 'prentice who to-morrow may.
Down, down proud satire! though a realm be spoil'd,

Arraign no mightier thief than wretched Wild;
Or, if a court or country's made a job, 40
Go drench a pickpocket, and join the mob.

But, Sir, I beg you, (for the love of vice!)
The matter's weighty, pray consider twice;
Have you less pity for the needy cheat,
The poor and friendless villain, than the great?
Alas! the small discredit of a bribe
Scarce hurts the lawyer, but undoes the scribe.
Then better sure it charity becomes
To tax directors, who (thank God) have plums;
Still better, ministers; or, if the thing 50
May pinch ev'n there—why lay it on a king.

F. Stop! stop!

P. Must satire, then, nor rise nor fall?
Speak out, and bid me blame no rogues at all.

F. Yes, strike that Wild, I'll justify the blow.

P. Strike? why the man was hang'd ten years ago:

Who now that obsolete example fears?

Ev'n Peter trembles only for his ears. 58

F. What, always Peter? Peter thinks you mad,
You make men desperate, if they once are bad:
Else might he take to virtue some years hence—

P. As S—k, if he lives, will love the prince.

F. Strange spleen to S—k!

P. Do I wrong the man?

God knows, I praise a courtier where I can.
When I confess, there is who feels for fame,
And melts to goodness, need I Scarborough name?
Pleas'd let me own, in Esther's peaceful grove
(Where Kent and nature vie for Pelham's love)
The scene, the master, opening to my view,
I sit and dream I see my craggs anew!

Ev'n in a bishop I can spy desert: 70
Secker is decent; Rundel has a heart;
Manners with candour are to Benson given;
To Berkley, every virtue under heaven.

But does the court a worthy man remove?
That instant, I declare, he has my love:
I shun his zenith, court his mild decline;
Thus Sommers once, and Halifax, were mine.
Oft, in the clear, still mirror of retreat,
I study'd Shrewsbury, the wise and great; 79
Carleton's calm sense, and Stanhope's noble flame,
Compar'd, and knew their generous end the same:
How pleasing Atterbury's softer hour!
How shin'd the soul, unconquer'd in the tower!

How can I Pultney, Chesterfield forget,
While Roman spirit charms, and Attic wit:
Argyll, the state's whole thunder born to wield,
And shake alike the senate and the field:
Or Wyndham, just to freedom and the throne,
The master of our passions, and his own? 89
Names, which I long have lov'd, nor lov'd in vain, Rank'd with their friends, not number'd with their train;

And if yet higher the proud list should end,
Still let me say: No follower, but a friend.

Yet think not, friendship only prompts my lays:
I follow virtue; where she shines, I praise;
Point she to Priest or Elder, Whig or Tory,
Or round a Quaker's beaver cast a glory.
I never (to my sorrow I declare)
Din'd with the Man of Rofs, or my Lord Mayor.
Some, in their choice of friends (nay, look not grave) 100

Have still a secret bias to a knave:
To find an honest man, I beat about;
And love him, court him, praise him, in or out.

F. Then why so few commended?

P. Not so fierce;

Find you the virtue, and I'll find the verse.
But random praise—the task can ne'er be done:
Each mother asks it for her booby son,
Each widow asks it for the best of men,
For him she weeps, for him she weds again.
Praise cannot stoop, like satire, to the ground: 110
The number may be hang'd, but not be crown'd.
Enough for half the greatest of these days,
To 'scape my censure, not expect my praise.
Are they not rich? what more can they pretend?
Dare they to hope a poet for their friend?
What Richelieu wanted, Louis scarce could gain,
And what young Ammon wish'd, but wish'd in vain.
No power the muse's friendship can command;
No power, when virtue claims it, can withstand:
To Cato, Virgil paid one honest line; 120
O let my country's friend illumine mine! [no sin,
—What are you thinking? F. Faith the thought's
I think your friends are out, and would be in.

P. If merely to come in, Sir, they go out,
The way they take is strangely round about.

F. They too may be corrupted, you'll allow? |

P. I only call those knaves who are so now.
Is that too little? Come then, I'll comply—
Spirit of Arnall! aid me while I lie.
Cobham's a coward, Polwarth is a slave, 130
And Lyttelton a dark, designing knave;
St. John has ever been a mighty fool—
But let me add, Sir Robert's mighty dull,
Has never made a friend in private life,
And was, besides, a tyrant to his wife.

But pray, when others praise him; do I blame?
Call Verres, Wolfey, any odious name?
Why rail they then, if but a wreath of mine,
O all-accomplish'd St. John! deck thy shrine,
What? shall each spur-gall'd hackney of the day,
When Paxton gives him double pots and pay, 141
Or each new-pension'd sycophant, pretend
To break my windows if I treat a friend;
Then wisely plead, to me they meant no hurt,
But 'twas my guest at whom they threw the dirt

Sure, if I spare the minister, no rules
Of honour bind me, not to maul his tools;
Sure, if they cannot cut, it may be said
His saws are toothless, and his hatchets lead.

It anger'd Turenne, once upon a day, 150
To see a footman kick'd that took his pay:
But when he heard th' affront the fellow gave,
Knew one a man of honour, one a knave,
The prudent general turn'd it to a jest;
And begg'd, he'd take the pains to kick the rest:
Which not at present having time to do—
F. Hold, Sir! for God's sake, where's th' affront to you?

Against your worship when had S—k writ?
Ur P—ge pour'd forth the torrent of his wit?
Or grant the bard whose distich all commend 160
[In power a servant, out of power a friend]
To W—le guilty of some venial sin;
What's that to you who ne'er was out nor in?

The priest whose flattery bedropt the crown,
How hurt he you? he only stain'd the gown.
And how did, pray, the florid youth offend,
Whose speech you took, and gave it to a friend?

P. Faith it imports not much from whom it came;
Whoever borrow'd, could not be to blame,
Since the whole house did afterwards the same. }
Let courtly wits to wits afford supply; 171

As hog to hog in huts of Westphaly;
If one, through nature's bounty or his lord's,
Has what the frugal dirty soil affords,
From him the next receives it, thick or thin;
As pure a mess almost as it came in;
The blessed benefit, not there confin'd,
Drops to the third, who nuzzles close behind;
From tail to mouth, they feed and they carouse:
The last full fairly gives it to the house. 180

F. This filthy simile, this beastly line
Quite turns my stomach—

P. So does flattery mine:
And all your courtly civet-cats can vent,
Perfume to you, to me is excrement.
But hear my father—Japhet, 'tis agreed,
Writ not, and Chartres scarce could write or read,
In all the courts of Pindus guiltless quite;
But pens can forge, my friend, that cannot write;
And must no egg in Japhet's face be thrown,
Because the deed he forg'd was not my own? 190
Must never patriot then declaim at gin,
Unless, good man! he has been fairly in?
No zealous pastor blame a failing spouse,
Without a staring reason on his brows?
And each blasphemer quite escape the rod,
Because the insult's not on man, but God?

Ask you what provocation I have had?
The strong antipathy of good to bad.
When truth or virtue an affront endures,
Th' affront is mine, my friend, and should be yours. 200

Mine, as a foe profess'd to false pretence,
Who think a coxcomb's honour like his sense;

VARIATIONS.

Ver, 185, in the MS.

I grant it, Sir; and further 'tis agreed,
Japhet writ not, and Chartres scarce could read.

Mine, as a friend to every worthy mind;
And mine as man, who feel for all mankind.

F. You're strangely proud.

P. So proud, I am no slave: }
So impudent, I own myself no knave: }
So odd, my country's ruin makes me grave.
Yes, I am proud; I must be proud to see
Men not afraid of God, afraid of me:
Safe from the bar, the pulpit, and the throne, 210
Yet touch'd and sham'd by ridicule alone.

O sacred weapon! left for truth's defence,
Sole dread of folly, vice, and insolence!
To all but heaven-directed hands deny'd,
The muse may give thee, but the gods must guide:
Reverend I touch thee! but with honest zeal;
To rouse the watchmen of the public weal,
To virtue's work provoke the tardy hall,
And goad the prelate slumbering in his stall.
Ye tinsel insects! whom a court maintains, 220
That counts your beauties only by your stains,
Spin all your cobwebs o'er the eye of day!
The muse's wing shall brush you all away:
All his grace preaches, all his lordship sings,
All that makes saints of queens, and gods of kings;
All, all but truth, drops dead-born from the press,
Like the last gazette, or the last address.

When black ambition stains a public cause,
A monarch's sword when mad vain-glory draws,
Not Waller's wreath can hide the nation's scar,
Not Boileau turn the feather to a star. 231

Not so, when, diadem'd with rays divine,
Touch'd with the flame that breaks from virtue's shrine:

Her priestless muse forbids the good to die,
And opes the temple of eternity.
There, other trophies deck the truly brave,
Than such as Anstis casts into the grave;
Far other stars than * and * * wear,
And may descend to Mordington from Stair;
(Such as on Houghs unsully'd mitre shine, 240
Or beam, good Digby, from a heart like thine)
Let envy howl, while heaven's whole chorus sings,
And bark at honour not conferr'd by kings;
Let flattery sickening see the incense rise,
Sweet to the world, and grateful to the skies:
Truth guards the poet, sanctifies the line,
And makes immortal verse as mean as mine.

Yes, the last pen for freedom let me draw,
When truth stands trembling on the edge of law;
Here, last of Britons! let your names be read;
Are none, none living? let me praise the dead,
And for that cause which made your fathers shine,
Fall by the votes of their degenerate line.

F. Alas, alas! pray end what you began,
And write next winter more Essays on Man.

After ver. 227, in the MS.

Where's now the star that lighted Charles to rise?
—With that which follow'd Julius to the skies.
Angels, that watch'd the Royal Oak so well,
How chanc'd ye nod, when luckless Sorel fell?
Hence, lying miracles! reduc'd so low
As to the regal touch and papal toe;
Hence haughty Edgar's title to the Main,
Britain's to France, and thine to India, Spain!

IMITATIONS OF HORACE.

EPISTLE VII.

IMITATED IN THE MANNER OF DR. SWIFT.

'Tis true, my lord, I gave my word,
I would be with you, Jane the third;
Chang'd it to August, and (in short)
Have kept it—as you do at court.
You humour me when I am sick,
Why not when I am splenetic?
In town, what objects could I meet?
The shops shut up in every street,
And funerals blackening all the doors,
And yet more melancholy whores:
And what a dust in every place!
And a thin court that wants your face,
And fevers raging up and down,
And W* and H both in town!

“The dog-days are no more the case.”
'Tis true, but winter comes apace:
Then southward let your bard retire,
Hold out some months 'twixt sun and fire,
And you shall see, the first warm weather,
Me and the butterflies together.

My lord, your favours well I know;
'Tis with distinction you bestow;
And not to every one that comes,
Just as a Scotsman does his plums.
“Pray take them, Sir—Enough's a feast:
“Eat some, and pocket up the rest”——
What, rob your boys? those pretty rogues!
“No, Sir, you'll leave them to the hogs.”
Thus foo's with compliments besiege ye,
Contriving never to oblige ye.
Scatter your favours on a fop,
Ingratitude's the certain crop;
And 'tis but just, I'll tell you wherefore,
You give the things you never care for.
A wife man always is or should
Be mighty ready to do good;
But makes a difference in his thought
Betwixt a guinea and a groat.

Now this I'll say, you'll find in me
A safe companion and a free;

But if you'd have me always near——
A word, pray, in your honour's ear.
I hope it is your resolution
To give me back my constitution!
The sprightly wit, the lively eye,
Th' engaging smile, the gaiety,
That laugh'd down many a summer fun,
And kept you up so oft till one:
And all that voluntary vein,
As when Belinda rais'd my strain.

A weazel once made shift to sink
In at a corn-loft through a chink;
But having amply stuff'd his skin,
Could not get out as he got in;
Which one belonging to the house
('Twas not a man, it was a mouse)
Observing, cry'd, “You 'scape not so,
“Lean as you came, Sir, you must go.”

Sir, you may spare your application,
I'm no such beast, nor his relation;
Nor one that temperance advance,
Cramm'd to the throat with Ortolans:
Extremely ready to resign
All that may make me none of mine.
South-Sea subscriptions take who please,
Leave me but liberty and ease.
'Twas what I said to Craggs and Child,
Who prais'd my modesty, and smil'd.
Give me, I cry'd, (enough for me)
My bread, and independency!
So bought an annual rent or two,
And liv'd——just as you see I do;
Near fifty, and without a wife,
I trust that sinking fund, my life.
Can I retrench? Yes, mighty well,
Shrink back to my paternal cell,
A little house, with trees a-row,
And, like its master, very low.
There dy'd my father, no man's debtor,
And there I'll die, nor worse nor better.
To set this matter full before ye,
Our old friend Swift will tell his story.
“Harley, the nation's great support——”
But you may read it, I stop short.

THE LATTER PART OF SATIRE VI*.

O charming noons! and nights divine!
 Or when I sup, or when I dine,
 My friends above, my folks below,
 Chatting and laughing all-a-row,
 The beans and bacon set before 'em,
 The grace-cup serv'd with all decorum:
 Each willing to be pleas'd, and please,
 And even the very dogs at ease!
 Here no man prates of idle things,
 How this or that Italian sings,
 A neighbour's madness, or his spouse's,
 Or what's in either of the houses:
 But something much more our concern,
 And quite a scandal not to learn:
 Which is the happier, or the wiser,
 A man of merit, or a miser?
 Whether we ought to choose our friends,
 For their own worth, or our own ends?
 What good, or better, we may call,
 And what, the very best of all?
 Our friend Dan Prior told (you know)
 A tale extremely "à propos":
 Name a town life, and in a trice
 He had a story of two mice.
 Once on a time (so runs the fable)
 A country mouse, right hospitable,
 Receiv'd a town mouse at his board,
 Just as a farmer might a lord
 A frugal mouse, upon the whole,
 Yet lov'd his friend, and had a soul,
 Knew what was handsome, and would do't,
 On just occasion, "coûte qui coûte."
 He brought him bacon (nothing lean);
 Pudding, that might have pleas'd a dean;
 Cheese, such as men in Suffolk make,
 But wish'd it Stilton for his sake;
 Yet, to his guest though no way sparing,
 He eat himself the rind and paring.
 Our courtier scarce could touch a bit,
 But show'd his breeding and his wit;
 He did his best to seem to eat,
 And cry'd, "I vow you're mighty neat."
 "But lord, my friend, this savage scene!"
 "For God's sake, come, and live with men:
 Consider mice, like men, must die,
 Both small and great, both you and I:
 Then spend your life in joy and sport,
 (This doctrine, friend, I learn'd at court.)"
 The veriest hermit in the nation
 May yield, God knows, to strong temptation.
 Away they came, through thick and thin,
 To a tall house near Lincoln's-Inn:
 ('Twas on the night of a debate,
 When all their lordships had sat late).
 Behold the place, where if a poet
 Shin'd in description, he might show it;
 Tell how the moon-beam trembling falls,
 And tips with the silver all the walls;
 Palladian walls, Venetian doors,
 Grottesco roofs, and stucco floors:

* See the first part in Swift's Poems.

But let it (in a word) be said,
 The moon was up, and men a-bed,
 The napkin's white, the carpet red:
 The guests withdrawn had left the treat,
 And down the mice sat, "tête à tête."
 Our courtier walks from dish to dish,
 Tastes for his friend of fowl and fish;
 Tells all their names, lays down the law,
 "Que ça est bon! Ah goûtez ça!"
 "That jelly's rich, this malmsey healing, Pray dip your whiskers and your tail in."
 Was ever such a happy swain?
 He stuffs and swills, and stuffs again.
 "I'm quite ashamed—'tis mighty rude
 To eat so much—but all's so good.
 I have a thousand thanks to give—
 My lord alone knows how to live."
 No sooner said, but from the hall
 Rush chaplain, butler, dogs and all:
 "A rat, a rat! clap to the door!"—
 The cat comes bouncing on the floor.
 O for the heart of Homer's mice,
 Or gods to save them in a trice!
 (It was by providence they think,
 For your damn'd stucco has no chink).
 "An't please your honour, quoth the peasant,
 This same desert is not so pleasant:
 Give me again my hollow tree,
 A crust of bread, and liberty!"

BOOK IV. ODE I.

TO VENUS.

AGAIN? new tumults in my breast?
 Ah spare me, Venus! let me, let me rest!
 I am not now, alas! the man
 As in the gentle reign of my Queen Anne.
 Ah, sound no more thy soft alarms,
 Nor circle sober fifty with thy charms!
 Mother too fierce of dear desires!
 Turn, turn to willing hearts your wanton fires.
 To number five dire direct your doves,
 There spread round Murray all your blooming loves;
 Noble and young, who strikes the heart
 With every sprightly, every decent part;
 Equal, the injur'd to defend,
 To charm the mistress, or to fix the friend.
 He, with a hundred arts refin'd,
 Shall stretch thy conquests over half the kind:
 To him each rival shall submit,
 Make but his riches equal to his wit.
 Then shall thy form the marble grace,
 (Thy Grecian form) and Chloe lend the face:
 His house, embosom'd in the grove,
 Sacred to social life and social love,
 Shall glitter o'er the pendent green,
 Where Thames reflects the visionary scene:
 Thither the silver-sounding lyres
 Shall call the smiling loves, and young desires;
 There, every grace and muse shall throng,
 Exalt the dance, or animate the song;

There youths and nymphs in consort gay,
 Shall hail the rising, close the parting day.
 With me, alas! those joys are o'er;
 For me the vernal garlands bloom no more.
 Adieu! fond hope of mutual fire,
 The still-believing, still renew'd desire;
 Adieu! the heart-expanding bowl,
 And all the kind deceivers of the soul!
 But why? ah tell me, ah too dear!
 Steals down my cheek th' involuntary tear?
 Why words so flowing, thoughts so free,
 Stop, or turn nonsense, at one glance of thee?
 Thee, dress'd in fancy's airy beam,
 Absent I follow through th' extended dream;
 Now, now I cease, I clasp thy charms,
 And now you burst (ah cruel!) from my arms;
 And swiftly shoot along the Mall,
 Or softly glide by the canal,
 Now shown by Cyathia's silver ray,
 And now on rolling waters snatch'd away.

PART OF THE NINTH ODE OF THE FOURTH BOOK.

A FRAGMENT.

Lest you should think that verse shall die,
 Which sounds the silver Thames along,
 Taught on the wings of truth to fly
 Above the reach of vulgar song;
 Though daring Milton fits sublime,
 In Spenser native muses play;
 Nor yet shall Waller yield to mine,
 Nor pensive Cowley's moral lay—
 Sages and chiefs long since had birth
 Ere Cæsar was, or Newton nam'd;
 Then rais'd new empires o'er the earth,
 And those, new heavens and systems fram'd.
 Vain was the chief's, the sage's pride!
 They had no poet, and they died:
 In vain they schem'd, in vain they bled!
 They had no poet, and are dead.

MISCELLANIES.

On receiving from the Right Honourable
THE LADY FRANCES SHIRLEY,
A STANDISH AND TWO PENS.

YES, I beheld th' Athenian queen
 Descend in all her sober charms;
 " And take (she said, and smil'd serene)
 " Take at this hand celestial arms.

" Secure the radiant weapons wield;
 " This golden lance shall guard desert,
 " And if a vice dares keep the field,
 " This steel shall stab it to the heart."

Aw'd, on my bended knees I fell,
 Receiv'd the weapons of the sky;
 And dipp'd them in the fable well,
 The fount of fame or infamy.

" What well? what weapon? (Flavia cries)
 " A standish, steel and golden pen!
 " It came from Bertrand's, not the skies;
 " I gave it you to write again.

" But, friend, take heed whom you attack;
 " You'll bring a house (I mean of peers)
 " Red, blue, and green, nay white and black,
 " L—— and all about your ears.

" You'd write as smooth again on glass,
 " And run, on ivory, so glib,
 " As not to stick at fool or ass,
 " Nor stop at flattery or fib.

" Athenian queen! and sober charms!
 " I tell you, fool, there's nothing in't:
 " 'Tis Venus, Venus gives these arms;
 " In Dryden's Virgil see the print.

" Come, if you'll be a quiet soul,
 " That dares tell neither truth nor lies,
 " I'll list you in the harmless roll
 " Of those that sing of these poor eyes."

EPISTLE
 TO
ROBERT EARL OF OXFORD, AND
EARL MORTIMER.

SUCH were the notes thy once-lov'd poet sung,
 Till death untimely stopp'd his tuneful tongue.
 Oh, just beheld, and lost! admir'd, and mourn'd!
 With softest manners, gentlest arts adorn'd!
 Blest in each science, blest in every strain!
 Dear to the muse! to Harley dear—in vain!
 For him, thou oft hast bid the world attend,
 Fond to forget the statesman in the friend;
 For Swift and him, despis'd the farce of state,
 The sober follies of the wise and great;
 Dextrous, the craving, fawning crowd to quit,
 And pleas'd to 'scape from flattery to wit.

Absent or dead, still let a friend be dear,
 (A sigh the absent claims, the dead a tear)
 Recal those nights that clos'd thy toilsome days,
 Still hear thy Parnell in his living lays,
 Who, careless now of interest, fame, or fate,
 Perhaps forgets that Oxford e'er was great;
 Or deeming meanest what we greatest call,
 Beholds thee glorious only in thy fall.

And sure, if aught below the seats divine
 Can touch immortals, 'tis a soul like thine:
 A soul supreme, in each hard instance try'd,
 Above all pain, and passion, and all pride,
 The rage of power, the blast of public breath,
 The lust of lucre, and the dread of death.

In vain to deserts thy retreat is made;
 The muse attends thee to thy silent shade:
 'Tis her's, the brave man's latest steps to trace,
 Re-judge his acts, and dignify disgrace.
 When interest calls off all her sneaking train,
 And all th' oblig'd desert, and all the vain;
 She waits, or to the scaffold, or the cell,
 When the last lingering friend has bid farewell.
 Ev' if now, she shades thy evening-walk with bays
 (No hireling she, no prostitute to praise);

Ev'n now, observant of the parting ray,
Eyes the calm sun-set of thy various day,
Through fortune's cloud one truly great can see,
Nor fears to tell, that Mortimer is he.

EPISTLE

TO JAMES CRAGGS, ESQ.

Secretary of State in the Year 1720.

A soul as full of worth, as void of pride,
Which nothing seeks to show, or needs to hide;
Which nor to guilt, nor fear, its caution owes,
And boasts a warmth that from no passion flows:
A face untaught to feign; a judging eye,
That darts severe upon a rising lie,
And strikes a blush through frontless flattery: }
All this thou wert; and being this before,
Know, kings and fortune cannot make thee more.
Then scorn to gain a friend by servile ways,
Nor wish to lose a foe these virtues raise;
But candid, free, sincere, as you began,
Proceed—a minister, but still a man.
Be not (exalted to whate'er degree)
Asham'd of any friend, not ev'n of me:
The patriot's plain, but untrod path pursue;
If not, 'tis I must be asham'd of you.

EPISTLE

TO MR. JERVAS,

With MR. DRYDEN'S Translation of FRESNOY'S Art of Painting.

[This epistle, and the two following, were written some years before the rest, and originally printed in 1717.]

THIS verse be thine, my friend, nor thou refuse
This, from no venal or ungrateful muse.
Whether thy hand strike out some free design,
Where life awakes, and dawns at every line;
Or blend in beauteous tints the colour'd mass,
And from the canvass call the mimic face:
Read these instructive leaves, in which conspire
Fresnoy's close art, and Dryden's native fire:
And reading with, like theirs, our fate and fame,
So mix'd our studies, and so join'd our name;
Like them to shine through long succeeding age,
So just thy skill, so regular my rage.

Smit with the love of sister arts we came,
And met congenial, mingling flame with flame;
Like friendly colours found them both unite,
And each from each contract new strength and light.

How oft in pleasing tasks we wear the day,
While summer-suns roll unperceiv'd away!

How oft our slowly-growing works impart,
While images reflect from art to art!
How oft review; each finding like a friend
Something to blame, and something to commend?

What flattering scenes our wandering fancy
wrought,
Rome's pompous glories rising to our thought!
Together o'er the Alps methinks we fly,
Fir'd with ideas of fair Italy.
With thee on Raphael's monument I mourn,
Or wait inspiring dreams at Maro's urn:
With thee repose, where Tully once was laid,
Or seek some ruin's formidable shade:
While fancy brings the vanish'd piles to view,
And builds imaginary Rome anew.
Here thy well-studied marbles fix our eye;
A fading fresco here demands a sigh:
Each heavenly piece unwearied we compare,
Match Raphael's grace with thy lov'd Guido's
air,

Carracci's strength, Correggio's softer line,
Paulo's free stroke, and Titian's warmth divine.
How finish'd with illustrious toil appears
This small, well-polish'd gem, the work of years!
Yet still how faint by precept is express'd
The living image in the painter's breast!
Thence endless streams of fair ideas flow,
Strike in the sketch, or in the picture glow;
Thence beauty, waking all her forms, supplies
An angel's sweetness, or Bridgewater's eyes.

Muse! at that name thy sacred sorrows shed,
Those tears eternal that embalm the dead;
Call round her tomb each object of desire,
Each purer frame inform'd with purer fire:
Bid her be all that cheers or softens life,
The tender sister, daughter, friend, and wife:
Bid her be all that makes mankind adore;
Then view this marble, and be vain no more!

Yet still her charms in breathing paint engage;
Her modest cheek shall warm a future age.
Beauty, frail flower, that every season fears,
Blossoms in thy colours for a thousand years.
Thus Churchill's race shall other hearts surprise,
And other beauties envy Worsley's eyes;
Each pleasing Blount shall endless smiles bestow,
And soft Belinda's blush for ever glow.

Oh, lasting as those colours may they shine,
Free as thy stroke, yet faultless as thy line;
New graces yearly like thy works display,
Soft without weakness, without glaring gay;
Led by some rule, that guides, but not con-
strains;

And finish'd more through happiness than pains!
The kindred arts shall in their praise conspire,
One dip the pencil, and one string the lyre.
Yet should the graces all thy figures place,
And breathe an air divine on every face;
Yet should the muses bid my numbers roll
Strong as their charms, and gentle as their soul;
With Zeuxis' Helen thy Bridgewater vie,
And these be sung till Granville's Myra die:
Alas! how little from the grave we claim!
Thou but preserv'st a face, and I a name.

EPISTLE
TO MISS BLOUNT,
WITH THE WORKS OF VOITURE.

IN these gay thoughts the loves and graces shine,
And all the writer lives in every line:
His easy art may happy nature seem,
Trifles themselves are elegant in him.
Sure to charm all was his peculiar fate,
Who without flattery pleas'd the fair and great;
Still with esteem no less convers'd than read;
With wit well-natur'd, and with books well-bred:
His heart, his mistress, and his friend did share;
His time, the muse, the witty and the fair.
Thus wisely careless, innocently gay,
Cheerful he play'd the trifle, life, away;
Till fate scarce felt his gentle breath suppress,
As smiling infants sport themselves to rest,
Ev'n rival wits did Voiture's death deplore,
And the gay mourn'd who never mourn'd before:
The truest hearts for Voiture heav'd with sighs,
Voiture was wept by all the brightest eyes:
The smiles and loves had died in Voiture's death,
But that for ever in his lines they breathe.

Let the strict life of graver mortals be
A long, exact, and serious comedy;
In every scene some mortal let it teach,
And, if it can, at once both please and preach.
Let mine, an innocent gay farce appear,
And more diverting still than regular,
Have humour, wit, a native ease and grace,
Though not too strictly bound to time and place:
Critics in wit, or life, are hard to please;
Few write to those, and none can live to these.

Too much your sex are by their forms confin'd,
Severe to all, but most to womankind;
Custom, grown blind with age, must be your guide;
Your pleasure is a vice, but not your pride;
By nature yielding, stubborn but for fame;
Made slaves by honour, and made fools by shame.
Marriage may all these petty tyrants chase,
But sets up one, a greater in their place:
Well might you wish for change by those accurs'd,
But the last tyrant ever proves the worst.
Still in constraint your suffering sex remains,
Or bound in formal, or in real chains:
Whole years neglected, for some months ador'd,
The fawning servant turns a haughty lord.
Ah, quit not the free innocence of life,
For the dull glory of a virtuous wife;
Nor let false shows, nor empty titles please:
Aim not at joy, but rest content with ease.

The gods, to curse Pamela with her prayers,
Gave the gilt coach and dappled Flanders mares,
The shining robes, rich jewels, beds of state,
And, to complete her bliss, a fool for mate.
She glares in balls, front boxes, and the ring,
A vain, unquiet, glittering, wretched thing!
Pride, pomp, and state, but reach her outward
part;

She sighs, and is no duchess at her heart.

But, madam, if the fates withstand, and you
Are destin'd Hymen's willing victim too;

Trust not too much your now resistless charms,
Those, age or sickness, soon or late disarms:
Good-humour only teaches charms to last,
Still makes new conquests, and maintains the past;
Love, rais'd on beauty, will like that decay,
Our hearts may bear its slender chain a day;
As flowery bands in wantonness are worn,
A morning's pleasure, and at evening torn;
This binds in ties more easy, yet more strong,
The willing heart, and only holds it long.

Thus * Voiture's early care still shone the same,
And Monthausier was only chang'd in name;
By this, ev'n now they live, ev'n now they charm,
Their wit still sparkling, and their flames still warm.

Now crown'd with myrtle, on th' Elysian coast,
Amid those lovers, joys his gentle ghost:
Pleas'd, while with smiles his happy lines you view,
And finds a fairer Ramboüillet in you.
The brightest eyes in France inspir'd his muse;
The brightest eyes in Britain now peruse;
And dead, as living, 'tis our author's pride
Still to charm those who charm the world beside.

TO THE SAME.

On her leaving the Town after the Coronation, 1715.

As some fond virgin, whom her mother's care
Drags from the town to wholesome country air,
Just when she learns to roll a melting eye,
And hear a spark, yet think no danger nigh;
From the dear man unwilling she must sever,
Yet takes one kiss before she parts for ever:
Thus from the world fair Zephalinda flew,
Saw others happy, and with sighs withdrew;
Not that their pleasures caus'd her discontent,
She sigh'd, not that they stay'd, but that she went.

She went to plain-work, and to purling brooks,
Old-fashion'd halls, dull aunts, and croaking rooks:
She went from opera, park, assembly, play,
To morning-walks, and prayers three hours a-day;
To part her time 'twixt reading and bohea,
To muse, and spill her solitary tea;
Or o'er cold coffee trifle with the spoon,
Count the slow clock, and dine exact at noon;
Divert her eyes with pictures in the fire,
Hum half a tune, tell stories to the 'squire;
Up to her godly garret after seven,
There starve and pray, for that's the way to heaven.

Some 'squire, perhaps, you take delight to rack;
Whose game is whist, whose treat a toast in sack:
Who visits with a gun, presents you birds,
Then gives a smacking buss, and cries—no words!
Or with his hounds comes hallooing from the stable,

Makes love with nods, and knees beneath a table;
Whose laughs are hearty, though his jests are coarse,

And loves you best of all things—but his horse.

In some fair evening, on your elbow laid,
You dream of triumphs in the rural shade;
In pensive thought recal the fancy'd scene,
See coronations rise on every green;

* Mademoiselle Paulet.

Before you pass th' imaginary fights
Of lords, and earls, and dukes, and garter'd knights,
While the spread fan o'ershades your closing eyes;
Then give one flirt, and all the vision flies.
Thus vanish sceptres, coronets, and balls,
And leave you in lone woods, or empty walls!

So when your slave, at some dear idle time,
(Not plagu'd with headaches, or the want of rhyme),

Stands in the streets, abstracted from the crew,
And while he seems to study, thinks of you.
Just when his fancy points your sprightly eyes,
Or sees the blush of soft Parthenia rise,
Gay pats my shoulder, and you vanish quite,
Streets, chairs, and coxcombs, rush upon my sight;
Vex'd to be still in town, I knit my brow,
Look four, and hum a tune, as you may now.

THE BASSET-TABLE,

AN ECLOGUE.

CARDELIA. SMILINDA.

CARDELIA.

THE basset-table spread, the tallier come;
Why stays Smilinda in the dressing-room?
Rise, pensive nymph; the tallier waits for you.

SMILINDA.

Ah, madam, since my sharper is untrue,
I joyless make my once-ador'd Alpheu.
I saw him stand behind Ombrelia's chair,
And whisper with that soft, deluding air,
And those feign'd sighs which cheat the listening fair.

CARDELIA.

Is this the cause of your romantic strains?
A mightier grief my heavy heart sustains.
As you by love, so I by fortune cross'd;
One, one bad deal, three Septlevas have lost.

SMILINDA.

Is that the grief, which you compare with mine?
With ease, the smiles of fortune I resign:
Would all my gold in one bad deal were gone,
Were lovely Sharper mine, and mine alone.

CARDELIA.

A lover lost, is but a common care;
And prudent nymphs against that change prepare;
The knave of clubs thrice lost: Oh! who could guess

This fatal stroke, this unforeseen distress?

SMILINDA.

See Betty Lovet! very à propos,
She all the cares of love and play does know:
Dear Betty shall th' important point decide;
Betty, who oft the pain of each has try'd:
Impartial, she shall say who suffers most,
By cards, ill usage, or by lovers lost.

LOVET.

Tell, tell your griefs; attentive will I stay,
Though time is precious, and I want some tea.

CARDELIA.

Behold this equipage, by Mathers wrought,
With fifty guineas (a great penn'worth) bought.

See, on the tooth-pick, Mars and Cupid strive;
And both the struggling figures seem alive.
Upon the bottom shines the queen's bright face;
A myrtle foliage round the thimble-case;
Jove, Jove himself does on the scissars shine;
The metal and the workmanship divine!

SMILINDA.

This snuff-box—once the pledge of Sharper's love,
When rival beauties for the present strove;
At Corticelli's he the raffle won;
Then first his passion was in public shown:
Hazardia blush'd, and turn'd her head aside,
A rival's envy (all in vain) to hide.
This snuff-box,—on the hinge see brilliants shine!
This snuff-box will I stake; the prize is mine.

CARDELIA.

Alas! far lesser losses than I bear,
Have made a soldier sigh, a lover swear.
And oh! what makes the disappointment hard,
'Twas my own lord that drew the fatal card.
In complaisance, I took the queen he gave;
Though my own secret wish was for the knave.
The knave was Sonica, which I had chose;
And the next pull, my Septleva I lose.

SMILINDA.

But ah! what aggravates the killing smart,
The cruel thought, that stabs me to the heart;
This curs'd Ombrelia, this undoing fair,
By whose vile arts this heavy grief I bear;
She, at whose name I shed those spiteful tears,
She owes to me the very charms she wears.
An awkward thing, when first she came to town;
Her shape unfashion'd, and her face unknown:
She was my friend; I taught her first to spread
Upon her fallow cheeks enlivening red:
I introduc'd her to the park and plays;
And by my interest, Cozens made her stays.
Ungrateful wretch, with mimic airs grown pert,
She dares to steal my favourite lover's heart!

CARDELIA.

Wretch that I was! how often have I swore,
When Winnal tally'd, I would punt no more!
I know the bite, yet to my ruin run;
And see the folly which I cannot shun.

SMILINDA.

How many maids have Sharper's vows deceiv'd!
How many curs'd the moment they believ'd!
Yet his known falsehoods could no warning prove;
Ah! what is warning to a maid in love?

CARDELIA.

But of what marble must that breast be form'd,
To gaze on Basset, and remain unwarm'd?
When kings, queens, knaves, are set in decent rank;

Expos'd in glorious heaps the tempting bank,
Guineas, half-guineas, all the shining train;
The winner's pleasure, and the loser's pain:
In bright confusion open rouleaus lie,
They strike the soul, and glitter in the eye.
Fir'd by the sight, all reason I disdain;
My passions rise, and will not bear the rein.
Look upon Basset, you who reason boast;
And see if reason must not there be lost.

SMILINDA.

What more than marble must that heart compose
Can hearken coldly to my Sharper's vows!

Then, when he trembles! when his blushes rise!
 When awful love seems melting in his eyes!
 With eager beats his Mechlin cravat moves:
 He loves—I whisper to myself, he loves!
 Such unfeign'd passion in his looks appears,
 I lose my memory of my former fears;
 My panting heart confesses all his charms,
 I yield at once, and sink into his arms.
 Think of that moment, you who prudence boast;
 For such a moment, prudence well were lost.

CARDELIA.

At the groom-porter's, batter'd bullies play,
 Some dukes at Marybone bowl time away.
 But who the bowl, or rattling dice compares
 To Basset's heavenly joys, and pleasing cares?

SMILINDA.

Soft Simplicetta doats upon a beau;
 Prudina likes a man, and laughs at show.
 Their several graces in my Sharper meet;
 Strong as the footman, as the master sweet.

LOVET.

Cease your contention, which has been too long;
 I grow impatient, and the tea's too strong.
 Attend, and yield to what I now decide;
 The equipage shall grace Smilinda's side:
 The snuff-box to Cardelia I decree;
 Now leave complaining, and begin your tea.

VERBATIM FROM BOILEAU.

UN JOUR, DIT UN AUTEUR, &c.

ONCE (says an author, where I need not say)
 Two travellers found an oyster in their way;
 Both fierce, both hungry; the dispute grew strong;
 While scale in hand dame Justice pass'd along.
 Before her each with clamour pleads the laws,
 Explain'd the matter, and would win the cause.
 Dame Justice weighing long the doubtful right,
 Takes, opens, swallows it, before their sight.
 The cause of strife remov'd so rarely well,
 There take (says Justice) take you each a shell.
 We thrive at Westminster on fools like you;
 'Twas a fat oyster—Live in peace—Adieu.

ANSWER TO THE FOLLOWING QUESTION

OF MRS. HOWE.

WHAT IS PRUDERY?

'Tis a beldam,
 Seen with wit and beauty seldom.
 'Tis a fear that starts at shadows.
 'Tis (no, 'tis n't) like Miss Meadows,
 'Tis a virgin hard of feature,
 Old, and void of all good-nature;
 Lean and fretful; would seem wise;
 Yet plays the fool before she dies.
 'Tis an ugly, envious shrew,
 That rails at dear Lepell and you.

OCCASIONED BY SOME VERSES OF HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM.

MUSE, 'tis enough: at length the labour ends,
 And thou shalt live, for Buckingham commends.
 Let crowds of critics now my verse assail,
 Let Dennis write, and nameless numbers rail:
 This more than pays whole years of thankless pain,
 Time, health, and fortune, are not lost in vain.
 Sheffield approves, consenting Phœbus bends,
 And I and malice from this hour are friends.

A PROLOGUE

BY MR. POPE,

To a Play for Mr. Dennis's Benefit, in 1732, when he was Old, Blind, and in great Distress, a little before his Death.

As when that hero, who in each campaign
 Had brav'd the Goth, and many a Vandal slain,
 Lay fortune-struck, a spectacle of woe!
 Wept by each friend, forgiv'n by every foe:
 Was there a generous, a reflecting mind,
 But pitied Belisarius old and blind?
 Was there a chief but melted at the sight?
 A common soldier, but who clubb'd his mite?
 Such, such emotions should in Britons rise,
 When press'd by want and weakness Dennis lies;
 Dennis, who long had warr'd with modern Huns,
 Their quibbles routed, and defy'd their puns,
 A desperate bulwark, sturdy, firm, and fierce,
 Against the Gothic sons of frozen verse:
 How chang'd from him who made the boxes groan,
 And shook the stage with thunders all his own!
 Stood up to dash each vain pretender's hope,
 Maul the French tyrant, or pull down the Pope!
 If there's a Briton then, true bred and born,
 Who holds dragoons and wooden shoes in scorn;
 If there's a critic of distinguish'd rage;
 If there's a senior, who contemns this age;
 Let him to-night his just assistance lend,
 And be the critic's, Briton's, old man's friend.

PROLOGUE TO SOPHONISBA,

BY POPE AND MALLET.

WHEN learning, after the long Gothic night,
 Fair, o'er the western world, renew'd its light,
 With arts arising, Sophonisba rose:
 The tragic muse, returning, wept her woes.
 With her th' Italian scene first learn'd to glow;
 And the first tears for her were taught to flow.
 Her charms the Gallic muses next inspir'd:
 Corneille himself saw, wonder'd, and was fir'd.
 What foreign theatres with pride have shown,
 Britain, by juster title, makes her own.

When freedom is the cause, 'tis her's to fight;
 And her's, when freedom is the theme, to write.
 For this a British author bids again
 The heroine rise, to grace the British scene.
 Here, as in life, she breathes her genuine flame:
 She asks, what bosom has not felt the same:
 Asks of the British youth—Is silence there?
 She dares to ask it of the British fair.
 To-night, our home-spun author would be true,
 At once, to nature, history, and you.
 Well pleas'd to give our neighbours due applause,
 He owns their learning, but disdains their laws.
 Not to his patient touch, or happy flame,
 'Tis to his British heart he trusts for fame.
 If France excel him in one freeborn thought,
 The man, as well as poet, is in fault.
 Nature, informer of the poet's art,
 Whose force alone can raise or melt the heart,
 Thou art his guide; each passion, every line,
 Whate'er he draws to please, must all be thine.
 Be thou his judge: in every candid breast,
 Thy silent whisper is the sacred test.

MACER:

A CHARACTER.

WHEN simple Macer, now of high renown,
 First fought a poet's fortune in the town,
 'Twas all th' ambition his high soul could feel,
 To wear red stockings, and to dine with Steel.
 Some ends of verse his betters might afford;
 And gave the harmless fellow a good word;
 Set up with these, he ventur'd on the town,
 And with a borrow'd play out-did poor Crown.
 There he stopp'd short, nor since has writ a title,
 But has the wit to make the most of little:
 Like stunted hide-bound trees, that just have got Sufficient sap at once to bear and rot.
 Now he begs verse, and what he gets commends,
 Not of the wits, his foes, but fools his friends.
 So some coarse country wench, almost decay'd,
 Trudges to town, and first turns chambermaid;
 Aukward and supple, each devoir to pay,
 She flatters her good lady twice a-day;
 Thought wondrous honest, though of mean degree,
 And strangely lik'd for her simplicity:
 In a translated suit, then tries the town,
 With borrow'd pins, and patches not her own:
 But just endur'd the winter she began,
 And in four months a batter'd harridan.
 Now nothing left, but wither'd, pale, and shrunk,
 To bawd for others, and go shares with punk.

TO MR. JOHN MOORE,

AUTHOR OF THE CELEBRATED WORM-POWDER.

How much, egregious Moore, are we
 Deceiv'd by shows and forms!
 Whate'er we think, whate'er we see,
 All humankind are worms.

Man is a very worm by birth,
 Vile, reptile, weak, and vain!
 A while he crawls upon the earth,
 Then shrinks to earth again.

That woman is a worm, we find
 E'er since our grandame's evil;
 She first convers'd with her own kind,
 That ancient worm the devil.

The learn'd themselves we book-worms name,
 The blockhead is a slow-worm;
 The nymph whose tail is all on flame,
 Is aptly term'd a glow-worm:

The fops are painted butterflies,
 That flutter for a day;
 First from a worm they take their rise,
 And in a worm decay.

The flatterer an earwig grows;
 Thus worms suit all conditions.
 Misers are muck-worms, silk-worms beaux,
 And death watches physicians.

That statesmen have the worm, is seen
 By all their winding play;
 Their conscience is a worm within,
 That gnaws them night and day.

Ah Moore! thy skill were well employ'd,
 And greater gain would rise,
 If thou couldst make the courtier void
 The worm that never dies!

O learned friend of Abchurch-lane,
 Who sett'st our entrails free;
 Vain is thy art, thy powder vain,
 Since worms shall eat ev'n thee.

Our fate thou only canst adjourn
 Some few short years, no more!
 Ev'n Burton's wits to worms shall turn,
 Who maggots were before.

SONG, BY A PERSON OF QUALITY.

WRITTEN IN THE YEAR 1733.

I.

FLUTTERING spread thy purple pinions,
 Gentle Cupid, o'er my heart;
 I a slave in thy dominions;
 Nature must give way to art.

II.

Mild Arcadians, ever blooming,
 Nightly neding o'er your flocks,
 See my weary days consuming,
 All beneath yon flowery rocks.

III.

Thus the Cyprian goddess weeping,
 Mourn'd Adonis, darling youth;
 Him the boar, in silence creeping,
 Gorr'd with unrelenting tooth.

IV.

Cynthia, tune harmonious numbers;
Fair discretion, string the lyre;
Sooth my ever-waking slumbers:
Bright Apollo, lend thy choir.

V.

Gloomy Pluto, king of terrors,
Arm'd in adamant chains,
Lead me to the crystal mirrors,
Watering soft Elysian plains.

VI.

Mournful cypresses, verdant willow,
Gilding my Aurelia's brows,
Morpheus hovering o'er my pillow,
Hear me pay my dying vows.

VII.

Melancholy smooth Mæander,
Swiftly purling in a round,
On thy margin lovers wander,
With thy flowery chaplets crown'd.

VIII.

Thus when Philomela drooping,
Softly seeks her silent mate,
See the bird of Juno stooping;
Melody resigns to fate.

ON A CERTAIN LADY AT COURT.

I know the thing that's most uncommon;
(Envy be silent, and attend!)
I know a reasonable woman,
Handsome and witty, yet a friend.

Not warp'd by passion, aw'd by rumour;
Not grave through pride, nor gay through folly
An equal mixture of good-humour,
And sensible soft melancholy.

"Has she no faults then, (Envy says) Sir?"
Yes, she has one, I must aver:
When all the world conspires to praise her,
The woman's deaf, and does not hear.

ON HIS GROTTTO AT TWICKENHAM,

Composed of Marble, Spars, Gems, Ores, and Minerals.

THOU who shalt stop, where Thames' translucent wave
Shines a broad mirror through the shadowy cave;
Where lingering drops from mineral roofs distil,
And pointed crystals break the sparkling rill,
Unpolish'd gems no ray on pride bestow,
And latent metals innocently glow;
Approach. Great Nature studiously behold!
And eye the mine without a wish for gold.
Approach: but awful! lo! th' Ægerian grot,
Where, nobly pensive, St. John sat and thought;
Where British sighs from dying Wyndham stole,
And the bright flame was shot through Marchmont's soul.

Let such, such only, tread this sacred floor,
Who dare to love their country, and be poor.

VOL. VIII.

TO MRS. M. B. ON HER BIRTH-DAY.

Ou, be thou blest with all that heaven can send,
Long health, long youth, long pleasure, and a friend!

Not with those toys the female world admire,
Riches that vex, and vanities that tire.
With added years, if life bring nothing new,
But like a sieve let every blessing through,
Some joy still lost, as each vain year runs o'er,
And all we gain, some sad reflection more;
Is that a birth-day? 'tis alas! too clear,
'Tis but the funeral of the former year. 10

Let joy or ease, let affluence or content,
And the gay conscience of a life well spent,
Calm every thought, inspirit every grace,
Glow in thy heart, and smile upon thy face.
Let day improve on day, and year on year.
Without a pain, a trouble, or a fear;
Till death unfelt that tender frame destroy,
In some soft dream, or ecstacy of joy,
Peaceful sleep out the Sabbath of the tomb,
And wake to raptures in a life to come.

VARIATION.

Ver. 15. Originally thus in the MS.
And oh, since death must that fair frame destroy,
Die, by some sudden ecstacy of joy;
In some soft dream may thy mild soul remove,
And be thy latest gasp a sigh of love.

TO MR THOMAS SOUTHERN,

ON HIS BIRTHDAY, 1742.

RESIGN'D to live, prepar'd to die,
With not one sin, but poetry.
This day Tom's fair account has run
(Without a blot) to eighty-one.
Kind Boyle, before his poet, lays
A table, with a cloth of bays;
And Ireland, mother of sweet singers,
Presents her harp still to his fingers.
The feast, his towering genius marks
In yonder wild-goose and the larks!
The mushrooms show his wit was sudden!
And for his judgment, lo, a pudden!
Roast beef, though old, proclaims him stout,
And grace, although a bard, devout.
May Tom, whom heaven sent down to raise
The price of prologues and of plays,
Be every birth-day more a winner,
Digest his thirty-thousandth dinner;
Walk to his grave without reproach,
And scorn a rascal and a coach.

To question your empire has dar'd;
But men of discerning
Have thought that in learning,
To yield to a lady was hard.

II.

Impertinent schools,
With musty dull rules,
Have reading to females deny'd:
So Papists refuse
The Bible to use,
Left flocks should be wise as their guide.

III.

'Twas a woman at first,
(Indeed she was curst)
In knowledge that tasted delight,
And sages agree
The laws should decree
To the first of possessors the right.

IV.

Then bravely, fair dame,
Resume the old claim,
Which to your whole sex does belong;
And let men receive,
From a second bright Eve,
The knowledge of right, and of wrong.

V.

But if the first Eve
Hard doom did receive,
When only one apple had she,
What a punishment new
Shall be found out for you,
Who tasting, have robb'd the whole tree?

THE FOURTH EPISTLE

OF THE FIRST BOOK OF HORACE.

A Modern Imitation.

SAY, * St. John, who alone peruse
With candid eye, the mimic muse,
What schemes of politics, or laws,
In Gallic lands the patriot draws!
Is then a greater work in hand,
Than all the tomes of Haines's band?
"Or shoots he folly as it flies?
"Or catches manners as they rise?"
Or, urg'd by unquench'd native heat,
Does St. John Greenwich sports repeat?
Where (emulous of Chartres' fame)
Ev'n Chartres' self is scarce a name.
† To you (th' all-envy'd gift of heaven)
Th' indulgent gods, unask'd, have given
A form complete in every part,
And, to enjoy that gift, the art.

Than wit, and fame, and lucky hours,
A stock of health, and golden showers,
And graceful fluency of speech,
Precepts before unknown to teach?

* Amidst thy various ebbs of fear,
And gleaming hope, and black despair;
Yet let thy friend this truth impart;
A truth I tell with bleeding heart,
(In justice for your labours past)
† That every day shall be your last;
That every hour you life renew
Is to your injur'd country due.

In spite of fears, of mercy spight,
My genius still must rail, and write.
Haste to thy Twickenham's safe retreat,
And mingle with the grumbling great:
There, half devour'd by spleen, you'll find
The rhyming bubbler of mankind;
There (objects of our mutual hate)
We'll ridicule both church and state.

EPIGRAM ON MRS. TOFTS,

A handsome woman with a fine voice, but very covetous and proud ||.

So bright is thy beauty, so charming thy song,
As had drawn both the beasts and their Orpheus

But such is thy avarice; and such is thy pride,
That the beasts must have starv'd, and the poet have died.

A FAREWELL TO LONDON

IN THE YEAR 1715.

DEAR, damn'd, distracting town, farewell!
Thy fools no more I'll tease:
This year in peace, ye critics, dwell,
Ye harlots, sleep at ease!

Soft B—— and rough C——, adieu!
Earl Warwick make your moan,
The lively H——k and you
May knock up whores alone.

To drink and droll be Rowe allow'd
Till the third watchman toll;
Let Jervais gratis paint, and Frowde
Save threepence and his soul.

Farewell Arbuthnot's raillery
On every learned sot;
And Garth, the best good Christian he,
Although he knows it not.

Lintot, farewell! thy bard must go;
Farewell, unhappy Tonson!
Heaven gives thee, for thy loss of Rowe,
Lean Philips, and fat Johnson.

Why should I stay? Both parties rage;
My vixen mistress squalls;
The wits in envious feuds engage;
And Homer (damn him!) calls.

The love of arts lies cold and dead
In Halifax's urn;
And not one muse of all he fed,
Has yet the grace to mourn.

My friends, by turns, my friends confound,
Betray, and are betray'd:
Poor Y—r's sold for fifty pound,
And B——ll is a jade.

Why make I friendships with the great,
When I no favour seek?
Or follow girls seven hours in eight?—
I need but once a week.

Still idle, with a busy air,
Deep whimsies to contrive;
The gayest valetudinaire,
Most thinking rake alive.

Sollicitous for others ends,
Though fond of dear repose;
Careless or drowsy with my friends,
And frolic with my foes.

Luxurious lobster-nights, farewell,
For sober, studious days!
And Burlington's delicious meal,
For fallads, tarts, and pease!

Adieu to all but Gay alone,
Whose soul, sincere and free,
Loves all mankind, but flatters none,
And so may starve with me.

A DIALOGUE.

Pope. SINCE my old friend is grown so great,
As to be Minister of State,
I'm told (but 'tis not true I hope)
That Craggs will be ashamed of Pope.

Craggs. Alas! if I am such a creature,
To grow the worse for growing greater;
Why faith, in spite of all my brags,
'Tis Pope must be ashamed of Craggs.

A FRAGMENT.

WHAT are the falling rills, the pendant shades,
The morning bowers, the evening colonnades,

But soft recesses for th' uneasy mind
To sigh unheard in, to the passing wind!
So the struck deer, in some sequester'd part,
Lies down to die (the arrow in his heart);
There hid in shades, and wasting day by day,
Inly he bleeds, and pants his soul away.

VERSES LEFT BY MR. POPE,

On his lying in the same Bed which Wilmot the celebrated Earl of Rochester slept in, at Adderbury, then belonging to the Duke of Argyll, July 9th. 1739.

WITH no poetic ardour fir'd
I press the bed where Wilmot lay;
That here he lov'd, or here expir'd,
Begets no numbers grave, or gay.

But in thy roof, Argyll, are bred
Such thoughts as prompt the brave to lie.
Stretch'd out in honour's nobler bed,
Beneath a nobler roof—the sky.

Such flames as high in patriots burn,
Yet sloop to bless a child or wife;

And such as wicked kings may mourn,
When freedom is more dear than life.

VERSES TO MR. C.

ST. JAMES'S PLACE,

London, October 22.

Few words are best; I wish you well;
Bethel, I'm told, will soon be here:
Some morning walks along the Mall,
And evening friends, will end the year.

If in this interval, between
The falling leaf and coming frost,
You please to see, on Twit'nam green,
Your friend, your poet, and your host;

For three whole days you here may rest,
From office, business, news, and strife;
And (what most folks would think a jest)
Want nothing else, except your wife.

ON CHARLES EARL OF DORSET.

In the Church of Witbyam in Suffex.

DORSET, the grace of courts, the muses' pride,
Patron of arts, and judge of nature, dy'd.
The scourge of pride, though sanctified or great,
Of sops in learning, and of knaves in state:
Yet soft his nature, though severe his lay,
His anger moral, and his wisdom gay.
Blest satirist! who touch'd the mean so true,
As show'd, vice had his hate and pity too.
Blest courtier! who could king and country please,
Yet sacred keep his friendships, and his ease.
Blest peer! his great forefathers every grace
Reflecting, and reflected in his race;
Where other Buckhursts, other Dorsets shine,
And patrons still, or poets, deck the line.

II.

ON SIR WILLIAM TRUMBALL,

One of the principal Secretaries of State to King William III. who, having resigned his place, died in his Retirement at Easthamsted, in Berkshire, 1716.

A PLEASING form; a firm, yet cautious mind;
Sincere, though prudent; constant, yet resign'd;
Honour unchang'd, a principle profess'd,
Fix'd to one side, but moderate to the rest;
An honest courtier, yet a patriot too;
Just to his prince, and to his country true:
Fill'd with the sense of age, the fire of youth,
A scorn of wrangling, yet a zeal for truth;
A generous faith, from superstition free:
A love to peace, and hate of tyranny; [mov'd,
Such, this man was: who now, from earth re-
At length enjoys that liberty he lov'd.

III.

ON THE HON. SIMON HARCOURT,

Only Son of the Lord Chancellor HARCOURT, at the Church of Stanton-Harcourt, in Oxfordshire, 1720.

To this sad shrine, whoe'er thou art! draw near,
Here lies the friend most lov'd, the son most dear;
Who ne'er knew joy, but friendship might divide,
Or gave his father grief, but when he dy'd.
How vain is reason, eloquence how weak!
If Pope must tell what Harcourt cannot speak,
Oh let thy once-lov'd friend inscribe thy stone,
And, with a father's sorrows, mix his own!

Ob. Feb. xvi. M.DCC.XX.

Statesman, yet friend to truth! of soul sincere,
In action faithful, and in honour clear!
Who broke no promise, serv'd no private end,
Who gain'd no title, and who lost no friend,
Ennobled by himself, by all approv'd,
Prais'd, wept, and honour'd, by the muse he lov'd.

INTENDED FOR MR. ROWE,

In Westminster-Abbey.

THY relicks, Rowe, to this fair urn we trust,
 And sacred, place by Dryden's awful dust :
 Beneath a rude and nameless stone he lies,
 To which thy tomb shall guide inquiring eyes,
 Peace to thy gentle shade, and endless rest !
 Blest in thy genius, in thy love too blest !
 One grateful woman to thy fame supplies
 What a whole thankless land to his denies.

VARIATION.

It is as follows on the monument in the Abbey erected to Rowe and his daughter.
 Thy relicks, Rowe ! to this sad shrine we trust,
 And near thy Shakspeare place thy honour'd bust,
 Oh, next him, skill'd to draw the tender tear,
 For never heart felt passion more sincere ;
 To nobler sentiment to fire the brave,
 For never Briton more disdain'd a slave.
 Peace to thy gentle shade, and endless rest ;
 Blest in thy genius, in thy love too blest !
 And blest, that, timely from our scene remov'd,
 Thy soul enjoys the liberty it lov'd.
 To these so mourn'd in death, so lov'd in life ;
 The childless parent and the widow'd wife,
 With tears inscribes this monumental stone,
 That holds their ashes and expects her own.

VI.

ON MRS. CORBET,

Who died of a Cancer in her Breast.

HERE rests a woman, good without pretence,
 Blest with plain reason, and with sober sense :
 No conquests she, but o'er herself, desir'd,
 No arts essay'd, but not to be admir'd.
 Passion and pride were to her soul unknown,
 Convinc'd that virtue only is our own.
 So unaffected, so compos'd a mind ;
 So firm, yet soft ; so strong, yet so refin'd ;
 Heaven, as its purest gold, by tortures try'd ;
 The saint sustain'd it, but the woman dy'd.

VII.

On the Monument of the Honourable ROBERT DIGBY, and of his Sister MARY, erected by their Father the LORD DIGBY, in the Church of Sherborne, in Dor-setshire, 1727.

Go ! fair example of untainted youth,
 Of modest wisdom, and pacific truth ;
 Compos'd in sufferings, and in joy sedate,
 Good without noise, without pretension great.
 Just of thy word, in every thought sincere,
 Who knew no wish but what the world might
 hear :

Of softest manners, unaffected mind,
 Lover of peace, and friend of human kind :
 Go, live ! for Heaven's eternal year is thine,
 Go, and exalt thy moral to divine.

And thou, blest maid ! attendant on his doom,
 Pensive hast follow'd to the silent tomb,
 Steer'd the same course to the same quiet shore,
 Not parted long, and now to part no more !
 Go then, where only bliss sincere is known !
 Go, where to love and to enjoy are one !

Yet take these tears, mortality's relief,
 And till we share your joys, forgive our grief :
 These little rites, a stone, a verse receive ;
 'Tis all a father, all a friend can give !

VIII.

ON SIR GODFREY KNELLER,

In Westminster-Abbey, 1723.

KNELLER, by Heaven, and not a master taught,
 Whose art was nature, and whose pictures thought ;
 Now for two ages having snatch'd from fate
 Whate'er was beauteous, or whate'er was great,
 Lies crown'd with princes honours, poets lays,
 Due to his merit, and brave thirst of praise.

Living, great nature fear'd he might outvie
 Her works ; and, dying, fears herself may die.

IX.

ON GENERAL HENRY WITHERS,

In Westminster-Abbey, 1729.

HERE, Withers, rest ! thou bravest, gentlest mind !
 Thy country's friend, but more of human kind.
 Oh born to arms ! O worth in youth approv'd !
 O soft humanity, in age belov'd :
 For thee, the hardy veteran drops a tear,
 And the gay courtier feels the sigh sincere.
 Withers, Adieu ! yet not with thee remove
 Thy martial spirit, or thy social love !
 Amidst corruption, luxury, and rage,
 Still leave some ancient virtues to our age ;
 Nor let us say (those English glories gone)
 The last true Briton lies beneath this stone.

X.

ON MR. ELIJAH FENTON,

At Eastbamsted, in Berks, 1730.

This modest stone, what few vain marbles can,
 May truly say, Here lies an honest man :
 A poet, blest beyond the poets fate, [great ;
 Whom Heaven kept sacred from the proud and Foe to loud praise, and friend to learned ease,
 Content with science in the vale of peace,
 Calmly he look'd on either life, and here
 Saw nothing to regret, or there to fear ;
 From nature's temperate feast rose satisfy'd, Thank'd Heaven that he had liv'd, and that he dy'd.

XI.

ON MR. GAY.

In Westminster-Abbey, 1732

Of manners gentle, of affections mild;
In wit, a man; simplicity, a child:
With native humour tempering virtuous rage,
Firm'd to delight at once and last the age;
Above temptation in a low estate,
And uncorrupted, ev'n among the great:
A safe companion, and an easy friend,
Unblam'd through life, lamented in thy end.
These are thy honours! not that here thy bust
Is mix'd with heroes, or with kings thy dust;
But that the worthy and the good shall say,
Striking their pensive bosoms—Here lies Gay.

ANOTHER.

Well then! poor Gay lies under ground,
So there's an end of honest Jack:
So little justice here he found,
'Tis ten to one he'll ne'er come back.

ON DR. FRANCIS ATTERBURY,

BISHOP OF ROCHESTER,

Who died in Exile at Paris, 1732.

[His only Daughter having expired in his arms, immediately after she arrived in France to see him.]

DIALOGUE.

SHE.

Yes, we have liv'd—one pang, and then we part!
May Heaven, dear father! now have all thy heart,
Yet ah! how once we lov'd, remember still,
Till you are dust like me.

HE.

Dear shade! I will:
Then mix this dust with thine—O spotless ghost!
O more than fortune, friends, or country lost!
Is there on earth, one care, one wish beside!
Yes—Save my country, Heaven,
—He said, and dy'd.

XIV.

ON EDMOND DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM,

Who died in the Nineteenth Year of his Age, 1735.

If modest youth, with cool reflection crown'd,
And every opening virtue blooming round,
Could save a parent's justest pride from fate,
Or add one patriot to a sinking state;
This weeping marble had not ask'd thy tear,
Or sadly told, how many hopes lie here!
The living virtue now had shone approv'd,
The senate heard him, and his country lov'd:
Yet softer honours, and less noisy fame
Attend the shade of gentle Buckingham:
In whom a race, for courage fam'd and art,
Ends in the milder merit of the heart;
And, chiefs or sages long to Britain given,
Pays the last tribute of a saint to Heaven.

XV.

FOR ONE WHO WOULD NOT BE BURIED IN WEST-MINSTER-ABBEY.

Heroes and kings! your distance keep!
In peace let one poor poet sleep,
Who never flatter'd folks like you:
Let Horace blush, and Virgil too.

ANOTHER, ON THE SAME.

Under this marble, or under this fill,
Or under this turf, or e'en what they will;
Whatever an heir, or a friend in his stead,
Or any good creature shall lay o'er my head,
Lies one who ne'er car'd, and still cares not a pin,
What they said, or may say of the mortal within:
But who, living and dying, serene still and free,
Trusts in God, that as well as he was, he shall be.

ON BUTLER'S MONUMENT.

Perhaps by Mr. Pope.

Respect to Dryden, Sheffield justly pay'd,
And noble Villers honour'd Cowley's shade:
But whence this barber?—that a name so mean
Should, join'd with Butler's, on a tomb be seen:
This pyramid would better far proclaim,
To future ages, humbler Settle's name:
Poet and patron then had been well pair'd,
The city printer, and the city bard.

LETTER TO THE PUBLISHER,

OCCASIONED BY THE
FIRST CORRECT EDITION OF THE DUNCIAD.

It is with pleasure I hear, that you have procured a correct copy of the Dunciad, which the many surreptitious ones have rendered so necessary; and it is yet with more, that I am informed it will be attended with a Commentary: a work so requisite, that I cannot think the author himself would have omitted it, had he approved of the first appearance of this poem.

Such notes as have occurred to me, I herewith send you: you will oblige me by inserting them amongst those which are, or will be, transmitted to you by others; since not only the author's friends, but even strangers, appear engaged by humanity, to take some care of an orphan of so much genius and spirit, which its parent seems to have abandoned from the very beginning, and suffered to step into the world naked, unguarded, and unattended.

It was upon reading some of the abusive papers lately published, that my great regard to a person, whose friendship I esteem as one of the chief honours of my life, and a much greater respect to truth, than to him or any man living, engaged me in inquiries, of which the enclosed notes are the fruit.

I perceived, that most of these authors had been (doubtless very wisely) the first aggressors. They had tried, till they were weary, what was to be got by railing at each other: nobody was either concerned or surprised, if this or that scribbler was proved a dunce. But every one was curious to read what could be said to prove Mr. Pope one, and was ready to pay something for such a discovery: a stratagem which would they fairly own, it might not only reconcile them to me, but screen them from the resentment of their lawful superiors, whom they daily abuse, only (as I charitably hope) to get that by them, which they cannot get from them.

I found this was not all: ill success in that had transported them to personal abuse, either of himself, or (what I think he could less forgive) of his friends. They had called men of virtue and honour bad men, long before he had either leisure or inclination to call them bad writers: and some had been such old offenders, that he had quite forgotten their persons as well as their slanders, till they were pleased to revive them.

Now what had Mr. Pope done before, to incense them? He had published those works which are in the hands of every body, in which not the least mention is made of any of them. And what has he done since? He has laughed, and written the Dunciad. What has that said of them? A very serious truth, which the public had said before, that they were dull: and what it had no sooner said, but they themselves were at great pains to procure, or even purchase, room in the prints, to testify under their hands to the truth of it.

I should still have been silent, if either I had seen any inclination in my friend to be serious with such accusers, or if they had only meddled with his writings; since whoever publishes, puts himself on his trial by his country. But when his moral character was attacked, and in a manner from which neither truth nor virtue can secure the most innocent; in a manner, which, though it annihilates the credit of the accusation with the just and impartial, yet aggravates very much the guilt of the accusers; I mean by authors without names; then I thought, since the danger was common to all, the concern ought to be so; and that it was an act of justice to detect the authors, not only on this account, but as many of them are the same who for several years past have made free with the greatest names in church and state, exposed to the world the private misfortunes of families, abused all, even to women, and whose prostituted paper,

(for one or other party, in the unhappy divisions of their country) have insulted the fallen, the friendless, the exiled, and the dead.

Besides this, which I take to be a public concern, I have already confessed I had a private one. I am one of that number who have long loved and esteemed Mr. Pope; and had often declared it was not his capacity or writings (which we ever thought the least valuable part of his character), but the honest, open, and beneficent man, that we most esteemed, and loved in him. Now, if what these people say were believed, I must appear to all my friends either a fool, or a knave; either imposed on myself, or imposing on them; so that I am as much interested in the confutation of these calumnies, as he is himself.

I am no author, and consequently not to be suspected either of jealousy or resentment against any of the men, of whom scarce one is known to me by sight; and as for their writings, I have sought them (on this one occasion) in vain, in the closets and libraries of all my acquaintance. I had still been in the dark, if a gentleman had not procured me (I suppose from some of themselves, for they are generally much more dangerous friends than enemies) the passages I send you. I solemnly protest I have added nothing to the malice or absurdity of them; which it behoves me to declare, since the vouchers themselves will be so soon and so irrecoverably lost. You may in some measure prevent it, by preserving at least their titles (a), and discovering (as far as you can depend on the truth of your information) the names of the concealed authors.

The first objection I have heard made to the poem, is, that the persons are too obscure for satire. The persons themselves, rather than allow the objection, would forgive the satire; and if one could be tempted to afford it a serious answer, were not all assassins, popular insurrections, the insolence of the rabble without doors, and of domestics within, most wrongfully chastised, if the meanness of offenders indemnified them from punishment? On the contrary, obscurity renders them more dangerous, as less thought of: law can pronounce judgment only on open facts: morality alone can pass censure on intentions of mischief; so that for secret calumny, or the arrow flying in the dark, there is no public punishment left, but what a good writer inflicts.

The next objection is, that these sort of authors are poor. That might be pleaded as an excuse at the Old Bailey, for lesser crimes than defamation (for it is the case of almost all who are tried there), but sure it can be none here: for who will pretend that the robbing another of his reputation supplies the want of it in himself? I question not but such authors are poor, and heartily wish the objection were removed by any honest livelihood. But poverty is here the accident, not the subject: he who describes malice and villany to be pale and meagre, expresses not the least anger against paleness or leanness, but against malice and villany. The apothecary in Romeo and Juliet is poor; but is he therefore justified in vending poison? Not but poverty itself becomes a just subject of satire, when it is the consequence of vice, prodigality, or neglect of one's lawful calling; for then it increases the public burden, fills the streets and highways with robbers, and the garrets with clippers, coiners, and weekly journalists.

But omitting that two or three of these offend less in their morals than in their writings; must poverty make nonsense sacred? If so, the fame of bad authors would be much better consulted than that of all the good ones in the world; and not one of an hundred had ever been called by his right name.

They mistake the whole matter: it is not charity to encourage them in the way they follow, but to get them out of it; for men are not bunglers because they are poor, but they are poor because they are bunglers.

Is it not pleasant enough, to hear our authors crying out on the one hand, as if their persons and characters were too sacred for satire; and the public objecting on the other, that they are too mean even for ridicule? But whether bread or fame be their end, it must be allowed, our author, by and in this poem, has mercifully given them a little of both.

There are two or three, who by their rank and fortune have no benefit from the former objections, supposing them good; and these I was sorry to see in such company. But if, without any provocation, two or three gentlemen will fall upon one, in an affair wherein his interest and reputation are equally embarked; they cannot certainly, after they have been content to print themselves his enemies, complain of being put into the number of them.

Others, I am told, pretend to have been once his friends. Surely they are their enemies who say so; since nothing can be more odious than to treat a friend as they have done. But of this I cannot persuade myself, when I consider the constant and eternal aversion of all bad writers to a good one.

Such as claim a merit from being his admirers, I would gladly ask, if it lays him under a personal obligation? At that rate, he would be the most obliged humble servant in the world. I dare swear for these in particular, he never desired them to be his admirers, nor promised in return to be theirs: that had truly been a sign he was of their acquaintance; but would not the malicious world have suspected such an approbation of some motive worse than ignorance, in the author of the Essay on Criticism? Be it as it will, the reasons of their admiration, and of his contempt, are equally subsisting, for his works and theirs are the very same that they were.

One, therefore, of their assertions I believe may be true, "That he has a contempt for their writings." And there is another which would probably be sooner allowed by himself than by any good judge beside, "That his own have found too "much success with the public." But as it cannot consist with his modesty to claim this as a justice, it lies not on him, but entirely on the public, to defend its own judgment.

There remains what in my opinion might seem a better plea for these people, than any they have made use of. If obscurity or poverty were to exempt a man from satire, much more should folly or dulness, which are still more involuntary; nay, as much so as personal deformity. But even this will not help them: deformity becomes an object of ridicule when a man sets up for being handsome; and so must dulness when he sets up for a wit. They are not ridiculed because ridicule in itself is, or ought to be, a pleasure; but because it is just to undeceive and vindicate the honest and unpretending part of mankind from imposition, because particular interest ought to yield to general, and a great number who are not naturally fools, ought never to be made so, in complaisance to a few who are. Accordingly we find that in all ages, all vain pretenders, were they ever so poor or ever so dull, have been constantly the topics of the most candid satirists, from the Codrus of Juvenal to the Damon of Boileau.

Having mentioned Boileau, the greatest poet and most judicious critic of his age and country, admirable for his talents, and yet perhaps more admirable for his judgment in the proper application of them; I cannot help remarking the resemblance betwixt him and our author, in qualities, fame, and fortune; in the distinctions shown them by their superiors, in the general esteem of their equals, and in their extended reputation amongst foreigners; in the latter of which ours has met with the better fate, as he has had for his translators persons of the most eminent rank and abilities in their respective nations(b). But the resemblance holds in nothing more than in their being equally abused by the ignorant pretenders to poetry of their times; of which not the least memory will remain but in their own writings, and in the notes made upon them. What Boileau has done in almost all his poems, our author has only in this: I dare answer for him, he will do it in no more; and on this principle, of attacking few but who had slandered him, he could not have done it at all, had he been confined from censuring obscure and worthless persons, for scarce any other were his enemies. However, as the parity is so remarkable, I hope it will continue to the last; and if ever he should give us an edition of this poem himself, I may see some of them treated as gently, on their repentance or better merit, as Perrault and Quinault were at last by Boileau.

In one point I must be allowed to think the character of our English poet the more amiable. He has not been a follower of fortune or success; he has lived with the great without flattery; been a friend to men in power, without pensions, from whom, as he asked, so he received no favour, but what was done him in his friends. As his Satires were the more just for being delayed, so were his Panegyrics; bestowed only on such persons as he had familiarly known, only for such virtues as he had long observed in them, and only at such times as others cease to praise, if not begin to calumniate them, I mean when out of power or out of fashion(c). A satire, therefore, on writers so notorious for the contrary practice, became no man so well as himself; as none, it is plain, was so little in their friendships, or so much in that of those whom they had most abused, namely the greatest and best of all parties. Let me add a further reason, that, though engaged in their friendships, he never espoused their animosities; and can almost singly challenge this honour, not to have written a line of any man, which, through guilt, through shame, or through fear, through variety of fortune, or change of interests, he was ever unwilling to own.

I shall conclude with remarking, what a pleasure it must be to every reader of humanity, to see all along, that our author, in his very laughter, is not indulging his own ill-nature, but only punishing that of others. As to his Poem, those alone are capable of doing it justice, who, to use the words of a great writer, know how hard it is (with regard both to his subject and his manner) "Vetustis dare novitatem, obsoletis nitorem, obscuris lucem, fastiditis gratiam."

I am your most humble servant,

(d) This gentleman was of Scotland, and bred at the university of Utrecht, with the Earl of Mar. He served in Spain under Earl Rivers. After the peace, he was made one of the Commissioners of the Customs in Scotland, and then of taxes in England: in which, having shown himself for twenty years diligent, punctual, and incorruptible (though without any other assistance of fortune), he was suddenly displaced by the minister, in the sixty-eighth year of his age; and died two months after, in 1741. He was a person of universal learning, and an enlarged conversation; no man had a warmer heart for his friend, or a sincerer attachment to the constitution of his country.

DENNIS' REMARKS

ON PRINCE ARTHUR.

I CANNOT but think it the most reasonable thing in the world, to distinguish good writers, by discouraging the bad. Nor is it an ill-natured thing, in relation even to the very persons upon whom the reflections are made. It is true, it may deprive them, a little the sooner, of a short profit and a transitory reputation; but then it may have a good effect, and oblige them (before it be too late) to decline that for which they are so very unfit, and to have recourse to something in which they may be more successful.

CHARACTER OF MR. P. 1716.

The persons whom Boileau has attacked in his writings, have been for the most part authors, and most of those authors, poets: and the censures he hath passed upon them have been confirmed by all Europe.

GILDON, Pref. to his NEW REHEARSAL.

It is the common cry of the poetasters of the town, and their fautors, that it is an ill-natured thing to expose the pretenders to wit and poetry. The judges and magistrates may with full as good reason be reproached with ill-nature for putting the laws in execution against a thief or impostor.—The same will hold in the republic of letters, if the critics and judges will let every ignorant pretender to scribbling pass on the world.

THEOBALD, Letter to Mift, June 22, 1728.

Attacks may be levelled, either against failures in genius, or against the pretensions of writing without one.

CONCANEN, Ded. to the Author of the DUNCIAD.

A Satire upon dulness is a thing that has been used and allowed in all ages.

Out of thine own mouth will I judge thee, wicked scribbler!

TESTIMONIES OF AUTHORS CONCERNING OUR POET AND HIS WORKS.

M. SCRIBLERUS LECTORI S.

BEFORE we present thee with our exertions on this most delectable poem (drawn from the many volumes of our adversaria on modern authors) we shall here, according to the laudable usage of editors, collect the various judgments of the learned concerning our poet: various indeed, not only of different authors, but of the same author at different seasons. Nor shall we gather only the testimonies of such eminent wits, as would of course descend to posterity, and consequently be read without our collection; but we shall likewise with incredible labour seek out for divers others, which, but for this our diligence, could never, at the distance of a few months, appear to the eye of the most curious. Hereby thou mayest not only receive the delectation of variety, but also arrive at a more certain judgment, by a grave and circumspect comparison of the witnesses with each other, or of each with himself. Hence also thou wilt be enabled to draw reflections, not only of a critical, but a moral nature, by being let into many particulars of the person as well as genius, and of the fortune as well as merit, of our author: in which, if I relate some things of little concern peradventure to thee, and some of as little even to him; I entreat thee to consider how minutely all true critics and commentators are wont to insist upon such, and how material they seem to themselves, if to none other. Forgive me, gentle reader, if (following learned example) I ever and anon become tedious: allow me to take the same pains to find whether my author were good or bad, well or ill-natured, modest or arrogant; as another, whether his author was fair or brown, short or tall, or whether he wore a coat or a cassock.

We proposed to begin with his life, parentage, and education: but as to these, even his contemporaries do exceedingly differ. One saith, (a) he was educated at home; another (b) that he was bred at St. Omer's, by Jesuits; a third (c) not at St. Omer's, but at Oxford! a fourth (d) that he had no university education at all. Those who allow him to be bred at home, differ as much concerning his tutor: one saith (e) he was kept by his father on purpose; a second (f), that he was an itinerant priest; a third (g), that he was a parson; one (h) calleth him a secular clergyman of the church of Rome; another (i), a monk. As little do they agree about his father, whom one (k) supposeth, like the father of Hesiod, a tradesman or merchant; another (l), a husbandman; another (m), a hatter, &c. Nor has an author been wanting to give our poet such a father as Apuleius hath to Plato, Jamblichus to Pythagoras, and divers to Homer, namely a dæmon: for thus Mr. Gildon (n): "Certain it is, that his original is not from Adam, but the devil; and that he wanteth nothing but horns and tail to be the exact resemblance of his infernal father." Finding, therefore, such contrariety of opinions, and (whatever be ours of this sort of generation) not being fond to enter into controversy, we shall defer writing the life of our poet, till authors can determine among themselves what parents or education he had, or whether he had any education or parents at all.

(a) Giles Jacob's Lives of the Poets, vol. ii. in his Life. (b) Dennis's Reflections on the Essay on Crit.

Proceed we to what is more certain, his works, though not less uncertain the judgments concerning them; beginning with his Essay on Criticism, of which hear first the most ancient of critics,

Curll, in his Key to the Dunciad (first edit. said to be printed for A. Dodd) in the 10th page, declared Gildon to be the author of that libel; though, in the subsequent editions of his key, he left out this assertion, and affirmed (in the Curliad, p. 4. and 8), that it was written by Dennis only.

MR. JOHN DENNIS.

"His precepts are false or trivial, or both; his thoughts are crude and abortive, his expressions absurd, his numbers harsh and unmusical, his rhymes trivial and common—instead of majesty, we have something that is very mean; instead of gravity, something that is very boyish; and instead of perspicuity and lucid order, we have but too often obscurity and confusion." And in another place: "What rare numbers are here! Would not one swear that this youngster had espoused some antiquated muse, who had sued out a divorce from some superannuated sinner, upon account of impotence; and who, being poked by the former spouse, has got the gout in her decrepid age, which makes her hobble so damnably (o)."

No less peremptory is the censure of our hypercritical historian,

MR. OLDMIXON.

"I dare not say any thing of the Essay on Criticism in verse; but if any more curious reader has discovered in it something new, which is not in Dryden's prefaces, dedications, and his Essay on Dramatic Poetry, not to mention the French critics, I should be very glad to have the benefit of the discovery (p)."

He is followed (as in fame, so in judgment) by the modest and simple-minded

MR. LEONARD WELSTED.

Who, out of great respect to our poet, not naming him, doth yet glance at his essay, together with the Duke of Buckingham's, and the criticisms of Dryden, and of Horace, which he more openly taxeth: (q) "As to the numerous treatises, essays, arts, &c. both in verse and prose, that have been written by the moderns on this ground-work, they do but hackney the same thoughts over again, making them still more trite. Most of their pieces are nothing but a pert, insipid heap of common-place. Horace has, even in his Art of Poetry, thrown out several things which plainly shew, he thought an Art of Poetry was of no use, even while he was writing one."

To all which great authorities, we can only oppose that of

MR. ADDISON,

"(r) The Art of Criticism (saith he) which was published some months since, is a masterpiece in its kind. The observations follow one another like those in Horace's Art of Poetry, without that methodical regularity which would have been requisite in a prose writer. They are some of them uncommon, but such as the reader must assent to, when he sees them explained with that ease and perspicuity in which they are delivered. As for those which are the "most known and the most received, they are placed in so beautiful a light, and illustrated with such apt illusions, that they have in them all the graces of novelty; and make the reader, who was before acquainted with them, still more convinced of their truth and solidity. And here give me leave to mention what Monsieur Boileau has so well enlarged upon in the preface to his works: that wit and fine writing doth not consist so much in advancing things that are new, as in giving things that are known an agreeable turn. It is impossible for us, who live in the latter ages of the world, to make observations in criticism, morality, or any art or science, which have not been touched upon by others; we have little else left us, but to represent the common sense of mankind in more strong, more beautiful, or more uncommon lights. If a reader examines Horace's Art of Poetry, he will find but few precepts in it which he may not meet with in Aristotle, and which were not commonly known by all the poets of the Augustan age. His way of expressing, and applying them, not his invention of them, is what we are chiefly to admire."

"Longinus, in his Reflections, has given us the same kind of sublime, which he observes in the several passages that occasioned them: I cannot but take notice that our English author has, after the same manner, exemplified several of the precepts in the very precepts themselves." He then produces some instances of a particular beauty in the numbers, and concludes with saying, that "there are three poems in our tongue of the same nature, and each a master-piece in its kind! The Essay on Translated Verse; the Essay on the Art of Poetry; and the Essay on Criticism."

Of Windsor Forest, positive is the judgment of the affirmative

MR. JOHN DENNIS,

"(s) That it is a wretched rhapsody, impudently writ in emulation of the Cooper's Hill of Sir John Denham: the author of it is obscure, is ambiguous, is affected, is temerarious, is barbarous."

But the author of the Dispensary (t), in the preface to his poem of Clarendon, differs from this opinion: "Those who have seen these two excellent poems of Cooper's Hill, and Windsor Forest, the one written by Sir John Denham, the other by Mr. Pope, will shew a great deal of candor if they approve of this."

DR. GARTH,

Of the epistle to Eloisa, we are told by the obscure writer of a poem called Sawney, "That because Prior's Henry and Emma charmed the finest tastes, our author writ his Eloisa in opposition to it: but forgot innocence and virtue; if you take away her tender thoughts, and her fierce desires, all the rest is of no value." In which, methinks, his judgment resembleth that of a French taylor on a villa and gardens by the the Thames: "All this is very fine; but take away the river, and it is good for nothing."

(s) Letter to B. B. at the end of the Remarks on Pope's Homer, 1717.

But very contrary hereunto was the opinion of himself, saying in his Alma (u),

MR. PRIOR

O Abelard? ill-fated youth,
Thy tale will justify this truth:
But well I weet, thy cruel wrong
Adorns a nobler poet's song:
Dan Pope, for thy misfortune griev'd,
With kind concern and skill has weav'd
A filken web; and ne'er shall fade
Its colours: gently has he laid
The mantle o'er thy sad distress,
And Venus shall the texture bless, &c.

Come we now to his translation of the Iliad, celebrated by numerous pens, yet shall it suffice to mention the indefatigable

SIR RICHARD BLACKMORE, Knight,

Who (though otherwise a severe censurer of our author) yet styleth this a "laudable translation (v)."

That ready writer

MR. OLDMIXON,

in his forementioned essay, frequently commends the same. And the painful

MR. LEWIS THEOBALD

thus extolls it (x), "The spirit of Homer breathes all through this translation.—I am in doubt, whether I should not admire the justness to the original, or the force and beauty of the language, or the sounding variety of the numbers: but when I find all these meet, it puts me in mind of what the poet says of one of his heroes, That he alone raised and flung with ease a weighty stone, that two common men could to lift from the ground; just so, one single person has performed in this translation, what I once despaired to have seen done by the force of several masterly hands." Indeed the same gentleman appears to have changed his sentiments in his Essay on the Art of Sinking in Reputation (printed in Mist's Journal, March 30, 1728), where he says thus: "In order to sink in reputation, let him take it into his head to descend into Homer (let the world wonder, as it will, how the devil he got there), and pretend to do him into English, so his version denote his neglect of the manner how." Strange variation! We are told in

MIST'S JOURNAL, June 8.

"That this translation of the Iliad was not in all respects conformable to the fine taste of his friend Mr. Addison; inasmuch that he employed a younger muse in an undertaking of this kind, which he supervised himself." Whether Mr. Addison did find it conformable to his taste, or not, best appears from his own testimony the year following its publication, in these words:

(u) Alma, Cant. 2.

(x) Censor, vol. II. n. 33.

MR. ADDISON'S FREEHOLDER, N^o 40.

"When I consider myself as a British freeholder, I am in a particular manner pleased with the labours of those who have improved our language with the translations of old Greek and Latin authors.—We have already most of their historians in our own tongue, and, what is more for the honour of our language, it has been taught to express with elegance the greatest of their poets in each nation. The illiterate among our own countrymen may learn to judge from Dryden's Virgil of the most perfect epic performance. And those parts of Homer which have been published already by Mr. Pope, give us reason to think that the Iliad will appear in English with as little disadvantage to that immortal poem."

As to the rest there is a slight mistake, for this younger muse was an elder: nor was the gentleman (who is a friend of our author) employed by Mr. Addison to translate it after him, since he saith himself that he did it before (y). Contrariwise, that Mr. Addison engaged our author in this work appeareth by declaration thereof in the preface to the Iliad, printed some time before his death, and by his own letters of October 26, and November 2, 1713, where he declares it is his opinion that no other person was equal to it.

Next comes his Shakspeare on the stage: "Let him" (quoth one, whom I take to be MR. THEOBALD, Mist's Journal, June 8, 1728). "publish such an author as he has least studied, and forget to discharge even the dull duty of an editor. In this project let him lend the bookseller his name (for a competent sum of money) to promote the credit of an exorbitant subscription." Gentle reader, be pleased to cast thine eye on the proposal below quoted, and on what follows (some months after the former assertion) in the same Journalist of June 8, "The bookseller proposed the book by subscription, and raised some thousand of pounds for the same: I believe the gentleman did not share in the profits of this extravagant subscription."

"After the Iliad, he undertook" (saith

MIST'S JOURNAL, June 8, 1728.)

"the sequel of that work, the Odyssy; and having secured the success by a numerous subscription, he employed some underlings to perform what, according to his proposals, should come from his own hands." To which heavy charge we can in truth oppose nothing but the words of

MR. POPE'S PROPOSAL FOR THE ODYSSEY (printed by J. Watts, Jan. 10, 1724.),

"I take this occasion to declare that the subscription for Shakspeare belongs wholly to Mr. Tonson: and that the benefit of this proposal is not solely for my own use, but for that of two of my friends, who have assisted me in this work." But these very gentlemen are extolled above our Poet himself in another of Mist's journals, March 30, 1728, saying, "That he would not advise Mr. Pope to try the experiment again of getting a " great part of a book done by assistants, lest those

 " extraneous parts should unhappily ascend to the " sublime, and retard the declension of the whole." Behold! these underlings are become good writers!

If any say, that before the said proposals were printed, the subscription was begun without declaration of such assistance; verily those who set it on foot, or (as the term is) secured it, to wit, the right honourable the Lord Viscount Harcourt, were he living, would testify; and the right honourable the Lord Bathurst, now living, doth testify, the same is a falsehood.

Sorry I am, that persons professing to be learned, or of whatever rank of authors, should either falsely tax, or be falsely taxed. Yet let us, who are only reporters, be impartial in our citations, and proceed.

MIST'S JOURNAL, June 8, 1728.

" Mr. Addison raised this author from obscurity, obtained him the acquaintance and friendship of the whole body of our nobility, and transferred his powerful interests with those great men to this rising bard, who frequently levied by that means unusual contributions on the public." Which surely cannot be, if, as the author of the Dunciad Dissected reporteth, Mr. Wycherly had before " introduced him into a familiar acquaintance with the greatest peers and brightest wits then living."

" No sooner (saith the same journal) was his body lifeless, but this author, reviving his resentment, libelled the memory of his departed friend; and what was still more heinous, made the scandal public." Grievous the accusation! unknown the accuser! the person accused, no witness in his own cause; the person, in whose regard accused, dead! But if there be living any one nobleman whose friendship, yea any one gentleman whose subscription Mr. Addison procured to our author, let him stand forth, that truth may appear! Amicus Plato, amicus Socrates, sed magis amica veritas. In verity, the whole story of the libel is a lie; witness those persons of integrity, who, several years before Mr. Addison's decease, did see and approve of the said verses, in no wise a libel, but a friendly rebuke sent privately in our author's own hand to Mr. Addison himself, and never made public, till after their own journals, and Curll had printed the same. One name alone, which I am here authorized to declare, will sufficiently evince this truth, that of the right honourable the Earl of Burlington.

Next is he taxed with a crime (in the opinion of some authors, I doubt, more heinous than any in morality), to wit, Plagiarism, from the inventive and quaint-conceited

JAMES-MOORE SMITH, Gent.

" (z) Upon reading the third volume of Pope's miscellanies, I found five lines which I thought excellent; and happening to praise them, a gentleman produced a modern comedy (the Rival Modes) published last year, where were the same verses to a tittle.

" These gentlemen are undoubtedly the first

" plagiaries, that pretend to make a reputation by stealing from a man's works in his own life-time, and out of a public print." Let us join to this what is written by the author of the Rival Modes, the said Mr. James-Moore Smith, in a letter to our author himself, who had informed him a month before that play was acted, Jan. 27, 1726-7, that " These verses, which he had before given him leave to insert in it, would be known for his, some copies being got abroad. He desires, nevertheless, that since the lines had been read in his comedy to several, Mr. P. would not deprive it of them," &c. Surely, if we add the testimonies of the Lord Bolingbroke, of the Lady to whom the said verses were originally addressed, of Hugh Bethel, Esq; and others, who knew them as our author's, long before the said gentleman composed his play; it is hoped, the ingenious, that affect not error, will rectify their opinion by the suffrage of so honourable personages.

And yet followeth another charge, insinuating no less than his enmity both to church and state, which could come from no other informer than the said

MR. JAMES-MOORE SMITH.

" (a) The Memoirs of a Parish Clerk was a very dull and unjust abuse of a person who wrote in defence of our religion and constitution, and who has been dead many years." This seemeth also most untrue; it being known to divers that these memoirs were written at the seat of the Lord Harcourt in Oxfordshire, before that excellent person (Bishop Burnet's) death, and many years before the appearance of that history, of which they are pretended to be an abuse. Most true it is, that Mr. Moore had such a design, and was himself the man who prest Dr. Arbuthnot and Mr. Pope to assist him therein; and that he borrowed those memoirs of our author, when that history came forth, with intent to turn them to such abuse. But being able to obtain from our author but one single hint, and either changing his mind, or having more mind than ability, he contented himself to keep the said memoirs, and read them as his own to all his acquaintance. A noble person there is, into whose company Mr. Pope once chanced to introduce him, who well remembereth the conversation of Mr. Moore to have turned upon the contempt he had for the work of that reverend prelate, and how full he was of a design he declared himself to have of exposing it." This noble person is the Earl of Peterborough.

Here in truth should we crave pardon of all the foresaid right honourable and worthy personages, for having mentioned them in the same page with such weekly riff-raff railers and rhymers; but that we had their ever-honoured commands for the same; and that they are introduced not as witnesses in the controversy, but as witnesses that cannot be controverted: not to dispute, but to decide.

Certain it is, that dividing our writers into two classes, of such who were acquaintance, and of such who were strangers to our author; the former are those who speak well, and the other those who Speak evil of him. Of the first class, the most noble

JOHN DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM
 sums up his character in these lines :

" (b) And yet so wondrous, so sublime a thing,
 " As the great Iliad, scarce could make me sing,
 " Unless I justly could at once commend
 " A good companion, and as firm a friend ;
 " One moral, or a mere well-natur'd deed,
 " Can all desert in sciences exceed."

So also is he decypher'd by the honourable
SIMON HARCOURT.

" (c) Say, wondrous youth, what column wilt
 " thou choose,
 " What laurel'd arch, for thy triumphant muse ?
 " Though each great ancient court thee to his " shrine, [thine,
 " Though every laurel through the dome be
 " Go to the good and just, and awful train !
 " Thy soul's delight,——"

Recorded in like manner for his virtuous disposition, and gentle bearing, by the ingenious

MR. WALTER HART,

in this apostrophe :

" (d) Oh ! ever worthy, ever crown'd with
 " praise !
 " Blest in thy life, and blest in all thy lay*,
 " Add, that the Sisters every thought refine,
 " And ev'n thy life be faultless as thy line,
 " Yet envy still with fiercer rage pursues,
 " Obscures the virtue, and defames the muse,
 " A soul like thine, in pain, in grief, resign'd,
 " Views with just scorn the malice of mankind."

The witty and moral satirist

DR. EDWARD YOUNG,

wishing some check to the corruption and evil manners of the times, calleth out upon our Poet to undertake a task so worthy of his virtue :

 " train, [plain ?"

" Nor hears that virtue, which he loves, com-

And, to close all, hear the reverend Dean of St.
 Patrick's :

" A soul with every virtue fraught,
 " By patriots, priests, and poets taught.
 " Whose filial piety excels
 " Whatever Grecian story tells.
 " A genius for each business fit,
 " Whose meanest talent is his wit," &c.

Let us now recreate thee by turning to the other side, and showing his character drawn by those with whom he never conversed, and whose countenances he could not know, though turned against him : first again commencing with the high voiced and never enough quoted

MR. JOHN DENNIS,

Who, in his Reflections on the Essay on Criticism,
 thus describeth him : " A little affected hypocrite,
 " who has nothing in his mouth but candour, truth,
 " friendship, good-nature, humanity, and magna-
 " nimity. He is so great a lover of falsehood,
 " that, whenever he has a mind to calumniate his
 " contemporaries, he brands them with some defect
 " which was just contrary to some good quality,
 " for which all their friends and acquaintance
 " commend them. He seems to have a particular
 " pique to people of quality, and authors of that
 " rank.—He must derive his religion from St.
 " Omer's."—But in the character of Mr. P. and his writings, (printed by S. Popping, 1716, he saith, " Though he is a professor of the worst re" ligion, yet he laughs at it ;" but that, " never" theless, he is a virulent papist ; and yet a pillar
 " for the church of England."

Of both which opinions

MR. LEWIS THEOBALD

seems also to be ; declaring in Mist's Journal, of June 22, 1718, " That, if he is not shrewdly
 " abused, he made it his practice to cackle to both " parties in their own sentiments." But, as to his pique against people of quality, the same journal-list doth not agree, but saith (May 8, 1728), " He had,
 " by some means or other, the acquaintance and
 " friendship of the whole body of our nobility."

However contradictory this may appear, Mr.
 Dennis and Gildon, in the character last cited, make it all plain, by assuring us, " That he is a crea-
 " ture that reconciles all contradictions : he is a
 " beast, and a man ; a Whig, and a Tory ; a writer
 " (at one and the same time) of (g) Guardians
 " and Examiners ; an assessor of liberty, and of " the dispensing power of kings ; a Jesuitical pro" fessor of truth ; a base and a soul pretender to " candour." So that, upon the whole account, we must conclude him either to have been a great hypocrite, or a very honest man ; a terrible im-poster upon both parties, or very moderate to either.

Be it as to the judicious reader shall seem good.

(g) The names of two weekly papers.

sure it is, he is little favoured of certain authors, whose wrath is perilous; for one declares he ought to have a price set on his head, and to be hunted down as a wild beast (b). Another protests that he does not know what may happen; advises him to ensure his person; says, he has bitter enemies, and expressly declares it will be well if he escapes with his life (i). One desires he would cut his own throat, or hang himself (k). But Pasquin seemed rather inclined it should be done by the government, representing him engaged in grievous designs with a lord of parliament then under prosecution (l). Mr. Dennis himself hath written to a minister, that he is one of the most dangerous persons in this kingdom (m); and assureth the public, that he is an open and mortal enemy to his country; a monster, that will, one day, show as daring a soul as a mad Indian, who runs a muck to kill the first Christian he meets (n). Another gives information of treason discovered in his poem (o). Mr. Curll boldly supplies an imperfect verse with kings and princesses (p). And one Matthew Concanen, yet more impudent, publishes at length the two most sacred names in this nation, as members of the Dunciad (q)!

This is prodigious! yet it is almost as strange, that in the midst of these invectives his greatest enemies have (I know not how) borne testimony to some merit in him.

MR. THEOBALD,

in censuring his Shakspeare, declares, "He has so great an esteem for Mr. Pope, and so high an opinion of his genius and excellencies; that, notwithstanding he professes a veneration almost rising to idolatry for the writings of this inimitable poet, he would be very loth even to do him justice, at the expence of that other gentleman's character (r)."

MR. CHARLES GILDON,

after having violently attacked him in many pieces, at last came to wish from his heart, "That Mr. Pope would be prevailed upon to give us Ovid's Epistles by his hand, for it is certain we see the original of Sappho to Phaon with much more life and likeness in his version, than in that of Sir Car Scrope. And this (he adds) is the more to be wished, because in the English tongue we have scarcely any thing truly and naturally written

Although he says, "The smooth numbers of the Dunciad are all that recommend it, nor has it any other merit;" yet that same paper hath these words: "The author is allowed to be a perfect master of an easy and elegant versification. In all his works we find the most happy turns, and natural similes, wonderfully short, and thick sown."

The Essay on the Dunciad also owns, p. 25. it is very full of beautiful images. But the panegyric, which crowns all that can be said on this poem, is bestowed by our laureat, who "grants it to be a better poem of its kind than ever was writ:" but adds, "it was a victory over a parcel of poor wretches, whom it was al-

"most cowardice to conquer.—A man might as well triumph for having killed so many silly flies that offended him. Could he have let them alone, by this time, poor souls! they had all been buried in oblivion (y)." Here we see our excellent laureat allows the justice of the satire on every man in it but himself; as the great Mr. Dennis did before him.

The said MR. DENNIS and MR. GILDON, in the most furious of all their works (the forecited character, p. 5.) do in concert (z) confess, "That some men of good understanding value him for his rhymes." And (p. 17.) "that he has got, like Mr. Bays in the Rehearsal (that is like Mr. Dryden), a notable knack at rhyming, and writing smooth verse."

Of his Essay on Man, numerous were the praises bestowed by his avowed enemies, in the imagination that the same was not written by him, as it was printed anonymously.

Thus sang of it even

BEZALEEL MORRIS.

"Auspicious bard! while all admire thy strain,
"All but the selfish, ignorant, and vain;

MR. LEONARD WELTSTED

thus wrote (a) to the unknown author, on the first publication of the said essay; "I must own, after the reception which the vilest and most immoral ribaldry hath lately met with, I was surprised to see what I had long despaired, a performance deserving the name of a poet. Such, Sir, is your work. It is indeed above all commen-

"Sir,

"I had not the opportunity of bearing of your excellent pamphlet till this day. I am infinitely satisfied and pleased with it, and hope you will meet with that encouragement your admirable performance deserves," &c.

CH. GILDON.

"Now, is it not plain, that any one who sends such compliments to another, has not been used to write in partnership with him to whom he sends them?" Dennis, remarks on the Dunciad, p. 50. Mr. Dennis is therefore welcome to take this piece to himself.

(a) In a letter under his own hand, dated March 12. 1733.

"dation, and ought to have been published in an age and country more worthy of it. If my testimony be of any weight, you are sure to have it in the amplest manner," &c. &c. &c.

Thus we see every one of his works hath been extolled by one or other of his most inveterate enemies; and to the success of them all they do unanimously give testimony. But it is sufficient, in-far omnium, to behold the great critic, Mr. Dennis, sorely lamenting it, even from the Essay on Criticism to this day of the Dunciad! "A most notorious instance (quoth he) of the depravity of genius and taste, the approbation this essay meets with (b).—I can safely affirm, that I never attacked any of these writings, unless they had success infinitely beyond their merit. This, though an empty, has been a popular scribbler. The epidemic madness of the times has given him reputation (c).—If after the cruel treatment so many extraordinary men (Spenser, Lord Bacon, Ben. Jonson, Milton, Butler, Otway, and others) have received from this country, for these last hundred years, I should shift the scene, and show all that penury changed at once to riot and profuseness; and more squandered away upon one subject, than would have satisfied the greater part of those extraordinary men; the reader to whom this one creature should be unknown, would fancy him a prodigy of art and nature; would believe that all the great qualities of these persons were centered in him alone. But if I should venture to assure him that the People of England had made such a choice, the reader would believe me a malicious enemy, and slanderer; or that the reign of the last (Queen Anne's) ministry was designed by fate to encourage fools (d)."

But it happens, that this our poet never had any place, pension, or gratuity, in any shape, from the said glorious queen, or any of her ministers. All he owed, in the whole course of his life, to any court, was a subscription for his Homer, of 200 l. from King George I. and 100 l. from the prince and princess.

However, lest we imagine our author's success was constant and universal, they acquaint us of certain works in a less degree of repute, whereof, although owned by others, yet do they assure us he is the writer. Of this sort, Mr. Dennis (e) ascribes to him two farces, whose names he does not tell; but assures us that there is not one jest in them: and an imitation of Horace, whose title he does not mention; but assures us it is much more execrable than all his works (f). The Daily Journal, May 11. 1728, assures us, "He is below Tom Durfey in the drama; because, as that writer thinks, the Marriage-hater matched, and the Boarding-school, are better than the What d'ye call it;" which is not Mr. P.'s, but Mr. Gay's.

Mr. Gildon assures us, in his New Rehearsal, (p. 48.) "That he was writing a play of the Lady Jane Grey;" but it afterwards proved to be Mr. Rowe's. We are assured by another, "He wrote a pamphlet called Dr. Andrew Tripe (g);" which proved to be one Dr. Wagstaff's. Mr. Theobald assures us, in Mist of the 27th of April, "That the treatise of the Profound is very dull; and that Mr. Pope is the author of it." The writer of Gulliveriana is of another opinion; and says, "The whole, or greatest part of the merit of this treatise must, and can only be ascribed to Gulliver (h)." [Here, gentle reader! cannot I but smile at the strange blindness and positiveness of men; knowing the said treatise to appertain to none other but to me, Martinus Scriblerus.]

We are assured, in Mist of June 8. "That his own plays and farces would better have adorned the Dunciad, than those of Mr. Theobald; for he had neither genius for tragedy nor comedy." Which, whether true or not, it is not easy to judge; in as much as he had attempted neither. Unless we will take it for granted, with Mr. Cibber, that his being once very angry at hearing a friend's play abused, was an infallible proof the play was his own; the said Mr. Cibber thinking it impossible for a man to be much concerned for any but himself: "Now let any man judge (saith he) by his concern, who was the true mother of the child (i)?"

But from all that hath been said, the discerning reader will collect, that it little availed our author to have any candour, since, when he declared he did not write for others, it was not credited; as little to have any modesty, since, when he declined writing in any way himself, the presumption of others was imputed to him. If he singly enterpris-

ed one great work, he was taxed of boldness and madness to a prodigy (k): If he took assistant in another, it was complained of, and represented as a great injury to the public (l). The loftiest heroics; the lowest ballads; treatises against the state or church; satires on lords and ladies; raillery on wits and authors; squabbles with booksellers; or even full and true accounts of monsters, poisons, and murders; of any hereof was there nothing so good, nothing so bad, which hath not at one or other season been to him ascribed. If it bore no author's name, then lay he concealed; if it did, he fathered it upon that author, to be yet better concealed: If it resembled any of his styles, then was it evident; if it did not, then disguised he it on set purpose. Yea, even direct oppositions in religion, principles, and politics, have equally been supposed in him inherent. Surely a most rare and singular character; of which let the reader make what he can.

Doubtless most commentators would hence take occasion to turn all to their author's advantage, and from the testimony of his very enemies would affirm, that his capacity was boundless, as well as his imagination; that he was a perfect master of all styles, and all arguments; and that there was in those times no other writer, in any kind, of any degree of excellence, save he himself. But as this is not our own sentiment, we shall determine on nothing; but leave thee, gentle reader, to steer thy judgment equally between various opinions, and to choose whether thou wilt incline to the testimonies of authors avowed; or of authors concealed; of those who knew him, or of those who knew him not.

MARTINUS SCRIBLERUS

OF THE POEM.

THIS poem, as it celebrateth the most grave and ancient things, Chaos, Night, and Dulness; so is it of the most grave and ancient kind. Homer (saith Aristotle) was the first who gave the form, and (saith Horace) who adapted the measure to heroic poesy. But even before this, may be rationally presumed from what the ancients have left written, was a piece by Homer composed, of like nature and matter with this of our poet. For of epic sort it appeareth to have been, yet of matter surely not unpleasant; witness what is reported of it by the learned Archbishop Eustathius, in Odyss. x. And accordingly Aristotle, in his Poetics, chap. iv. doth further set forth, that as the Iliad and Odyssy gave example to tragedy, so did this poem to comedy its first idea.

From these authors also it should seem, that the hero, or chief personage of it was no less obscure, and his understanding and sentiments no less quaint and strange (if indeed not more so) than any of the actors of our poem. Margites was the name of this personage, whom antiquity recordeth to have been Dunce the first; and surely, from what we hear him, not unworthy to be the root of so spreading a tree, and so numerous a posterity. The poem, therefore, celebrating him, was properly and absolutely a Dunciad; which though now unhappily lost, yet is its nature sufficiently known by the infallible tokens aforesaid. And thus it doth appear, that the first Dunciad was the first epic poem written by Homer himself, and anterior even to the Iliad or Odyssy.

Now, forasmuch as our poet hath translated those two famous works of Homer, which are yet left, he did conceive it in some sort his duty to imitate that also which was lost; and was therefore induced to bestow on it the same form which Homer's is reported to have had, namely that of epic poem; with a title also framed after the ancient Greek manner, to wit, that of Dunciad.

Wonderful it is, that so few of the moderns have been stimulated to attempt some Dunciad: since, in the opinion of the multitude, it might cost less pain and toil than an imitation of the greater epic. But possible it is also, that on due reflection the maker might find it easier to paint a Charlemagne, a Brute, or a Godfrey, with just pomp, and dignity heroic, than a Margites, a Codrüs, or a Fleckno.

We shall next declare the occasion and the cause which moved our poet to this particular work. He lived in those days, when (after Providence had permitted the invention of printing as a scourge for the sins of the learned) paper also became so cheap, and printers so numerous, that a deluge of authors covered the land: whereby not only the peace of the honest unwriting subject was daily molested, but unmerciful demands were made of his applause, yea of his money, by such as would neither earn the one, nor deserve the other. At the same time, the licence of the press was such, that it grew dangerous to refuse them either: for they would forthwith publish slanders unpunished, the authors being anonymous, and skulking under the wings of publishers; a set of men who neither scrupled to vend either calumny or blasphemy, as long as the town would call for it.

(a) Now our author, living in those times, did conceive it an endeavour well worthy an honest satirist, to dissuade the dull, and punish the wicked, the only way that was left. In that public-spirited view he laid the plan of this poem, as the greatest service he was capable (without much hurt, or being slain) to render his dear country. First, taking things from their original, he considereth the causes creative of such authors, namely Dulness and Poverty; the one born with them, the other contracted by neglect of their proper talents, through self-conceit of greater abilities. This truth he wrappeth in an allegory (b) (as the construction of epic poesy requireth), and feigns that one of these goddesses had taken up her abode with the other, and that they jointly inspired all such writers, and such works. (c) He proceedeth to show the qualities they bestow on these authors, and the effects they produce (d): then the materials, or stock, with which they furnish them (e), and, above all, that self-opinion (f) which causeth it to seem to themselves vastly greater than it is, and is the prime motive of their setting up in this bad and sorry merchandise. The great power of these goddesses acting in alliance (whereof as the one is the mother of industry, so is the other of plodding) was to be exemplified in some one great and remarkable action: (g) and none could be more so than that which our poet hath chosen, viz. the restoration of the reign of Chaos and Night, by the ministry of Dulness their daughter, in the removal of her imperial seat from the city to the polite world; as the action of the Æneid is the restoration of the empire of Troy, by the removal of the race from thence to Latium. But as Homer singeth only the wrath of Achilles, yet includes in his poem the whole history of the Trojan war; in like manner, our author hath drawn into this single action the whole history of Dulness, and her children.

A person must next be fixed upon to support this action. This phantom in the poet's mind must have a name (h): he finds it to be ———: and he becomes of course the hero of the poem.

The fable being thus, according to the best example, one and entire, as contained in the proposition; the machinery is a continued chain of allegories, setting forth the whole power, ministry, and empire of Dulness, extended through her subordinate instruments, in all her various operations.

This is branched into episodes; each of which hath its moral apart, though all conducive to the main end. The crowd assembled in the second book, demonstrates the design to be more extensive than to bad poets only; and that we may expect other episodes of the patrons, encouragers, or paymasters of such authors, as occasion shall bring them forth. And the third book, if well considered, seemeth to embrace the whole world. Each of the games relateth to some or other vile class of writers: the first concerneth the plagiarist, to whom he giveth the name of Moore; the second, the libellous novelist, whom he styleth Eliza; the third, the flattering dedicatress; the fourth, the bawling critic, or noisy poet; the fifth, the dark and dirty party-writer; and so of the rest: assigning to each some proper name or other, such as he could find.

As for the characters, the public hath already acknowledged how justly they are drawn: the manners are so depicted, and the sentiment so peculiar to those to whom applied, that surely to transfer them to any other or wiser personage, would be exceeding difficult: and certain it is, that every person concerned, being consulted apart, hath readily owned the resemblance of every portrait, his own excepted. So Mr. Cibber calls them, "a parcel of poor wretches, so many silly flies (i):" but adds, our author's wit is remarkably "more bare and barren, whenever it would fall foul on Cibber, than upon any other person whatever."

The descriptions are singular; the comparisons very quaint; the narration various, yet of one colour: the purity and chastity of diction is so preserved, that in the places most suspicious, not the words, but only the images have been censured; and yet are those images no other than have been sanctified by ancient and classical authority (though, as was the manner of those good times, not so curiously wrapped up), yea, and commented upon by the most grave doctors, and approved critics.

As it beareth the name of epic, it is thereby subject to such severe indispensable rules as are laid on all neoterics, a strict imitation of the ancients; insomuch that any deviation, accompanied with whatever poetic beauties, hath always been censured by the sound critic. How exact that limitation hath been in this piece, appeareth not only by its general structure, but by particular illusions infinite, many whereof have escaped both the commentator and poet himself; yea divers, by his exceeding diligence, are so altered and interwoven with the rest, that several have already been, and more will be, by the ignorant, abused as altogether and originally his own.

In a word, the whole poem proveth itself to be the work of our author, when his faculties were in full vigour and perfection; at that exact time when years have ripened the judgment, without diminishing the imagination: which, by good critics, is held to be punctually at forty. For at that season it was that Virgil finished his Georgics; and Sir Richard Blackmore at the like age composing his Arthurs; declared the same to be the very acme and pitch of life for epic poetry: though since he hath altered it to sixty, the year in which he published his Alfred (k). True it is, that the talents for criticism, namely smartness, quick censure, vivacity of remark, certainty of asseveration, indeed all but acerbity, seem rather the gifts of youth, than of riper age: but it is far otherwise in poetry; witness the works of Mr. Rymer and Mr. Dennis; who beginning with criticism, became afterwards such poets as no age hath paralleled. With good reason, therefore, did our author choose to write his essay on that subject at twenty, and reserve for his maturer years this great and wonderful work of the Dunciad.

RICARDUS ARISTARCHAS

OF THE HERO OF THE POEM.

OF the nature of Dunciad in general, whence derived, and on what authority founded, as well as of the art and conduct of this our Poem in particular, the learned and laborious Scriblerus hath, according to his manner, and with tolerable share of judgment, dissertated. But when he cometh to speak of the person of the hero fitted for such poem, in truth he miserably halts and hallucinates: for, misled by one Monsieur Bossu, a Gallic critic, he prateth of I cannot tell what phantom of a hero, only raised up to support the fable. A putrid conceit! As if Homer and Virgil, like modern undertakers, who first build their house and then seek out for a tenant, had contrived the story of a war and a wandering, before they once thought either of Achilles or Æneas. We shall therefore set our good brother and the world also right in this particular, by assuring them, that, in the greater epic, the prime intention of the muse is to exalt heroic virtue, in order to propagate the love of it among the children of men; and consequently that the poet's first thought must needs be turned upon a real subject meet for laud and celebration; not one whom he is to make, but one whom he may find, truly illustrious. This is the primum mobile of his poetic world, whence every thing is to receive life and motion. For, this subject being found, he is immediately ordained, or rather acknowledged, an hero, and put upon such action as befitteth the dignity of his character.

But the muse ceaseth not here her eagle-flight. For sometimes, satiated with the contemplation of these fons of glory, she turneth downward on her wing, and darts with Jove's lightning on the goose and serpent kind. For we may apply to the muse in her various moods, what an ancient master of wisdom affirmeth of the Gods in general: "Si Dii non irascuntur impiis et injustis, nec pios utique justosque diligunt. In rebus enim diversis, aut in in utramque partem moveri necesse est, aut in neutram. Itaque qui bonos diligit, et malos odit; et qui malos non odit, nec bonos diligit. Quia et diligere bonos ex odio malorum venit; et malos odisse ex honorum caritate descendit." Which in our vernacular idiom may be thus interpreted: "If the Gods be not provoked at evil men, neither are they delighted with the good and just.

"For contrary objects must either excite contrary affections, or no affections at all. So that he who loveth good men, must at the same time hate the bad; and he who hateth not bad men, cannot love the good; because to love good men proceedeth from an aversion to evil, and to hate evil men from a tenderness to the good." From this delicacy of the muse arose the little epic (more lively and cholerick than her elder sister, whose bulk and complexion incline her to the phlegmatic): and for this, some notorious vehicle of vice and folly was sought out, to make thereof an example. An early instance of which (nor could it escape the accurate Scriblerus) the father of epic poem himself affordeth us. From him the practice descended to the Greek dramatic poets, his offspring; who, in the composition of their Tetralogy, or set of four pieces, were wont to make the last a satiric tragedy. Happily, one of these ancient Dunciads) as we may well term it) is come down unto us, amongst the tragedies of the poet Euripides. And what doth the reader suppose may be the subject thereof? Why in truth, and it is worthy observation, the unequal contest of an old, dull, debauched buffoon Cyclops, with the heaven-directed favourite of Minerva; who, after having quietly borne all the monster's obscene and impious ribaldry, endeth the farce in punishing him with the mark of an indelible brand in his forehead. May we not then be excused, if, for the future, we consider the epics of Homer, Virgil, and Milton, together with this our poem, as a complete Tetralogy; in which the last worthily holdeth the place or station of the satiric piece?

Proceed we therefore in our subject. It hath been long, and alas for pity! still remaineth a question, whether the hero of the greater epic should be an honest man; or as the French critics express it, un honnête homme (a): but it never admitted of a doubt, but that the hero of the little epic should be just the contrary. Hence, to the advantage of our Dunciad, we may observe, how much juster the moral of that poem must needs be, where so important a question is previously decided.

But then it is not every knave, nor (let me add) every fool, that is a fit subject for a Dunciad. There must still exist some analogy, if not resemblance of qualities between the heroes of the two poems; and this, to admit of what neoteric critics call the parody, one of the liveliest graces of the little epic. Thus it being agreed that the constituent qualities of the greater epic hero, are wisdom, bravery, and love, from whence springeth heroic virtue; it followeth, that those of the lesser epic hero should be vanity, assurance, and debauchery, from which assemblage resulteth heroic dulness, the never-dying subject of this our poem.

This being settled, come we now to particulars. It is the character of true wisdom, to seek its chief support and confidence within itself; and to place that support in the resources which proceed from a conscious rectitude of will.—And are the advantages of vanity, when arising to the heroic standard, at all short of this self-complacence? Nay, are they not, in the opinion of the enamoured owner, far beyond it? “Let the world (will such an one say) impute to me what folly or weakness they please; but till wisdom can give me something that will make me more heartily happy, I am content to be GAZED AT (b).” This, we see, is vanity according to the heroic gage or measure; not that low and ignoble species which pretendeth to virtues we have not; but the laudable ambition of being gazed at for glorying in those vices, which every body knows we have. “The world may ask (says he) why I make my follies public? Why not? I have passed my life very pleasantly with them” In short, there is no sort of vanity such a hero would scruple, but that which might go near to degrade him from his high station in this our Dunciad; namely, “whether it would not be vanity in him, to take shame to himself for not being a wise man?”

Bravery, the second attribute of the true hero, is courage manifesting itself in every limb; while its correspondent virtue in the mock hero, is, that same courage all collected into the face. And as power, when drawn together, must needs have more force and spirit than when dispersed, we generally find this kind of courage in so high and heroic a degree, that it insults not only men, but Gods. Mezentius is, without doubt, the bravest character in all the Æneis: but how? His bravery, we know, was an high courage of blasphemy. And can we say less of this brave man's, who having told us that he placed his “sumum bonum in those follies, which he was not content barely to possess, but would likewise glory in,” adds, “If I am misguided, 'TIS NATURE'S FAULT, and I follow HER (c).” Nor can we be mistaken in making this happy quality a species of courage, when we consider those illustrious marks of it, which made his FACE “more known (as he justly boasteth) than most in the kingdom;”

and his language to consist of what we must allow to be the most daring figure of speech, that which is taken from the name of God

Gentle love, the next ingredient in the true hero's composition, is a mere bird of passage, or (as Shakspeare calls it) summer-teeming lust, and evaporates in the heat of youth; doubtless by that refinement it suffers in passing through those certain strainers which our poet somewhere speaketh of. But when it is let alone to work upon the lees, it acquireth strength by old age; and becometh a lasting ornament to the little epic. It is true, indeed, there is one objection to its fitness for such an use: for not only the ignorant may think it common, but it is admitted to be so, even by him who best knoweth its value. “Dont you think (argueth he), to say ‘only a man has his whore (d),’ ‘ought to go for little or nothing? Because defendit numerus; take the first ten thousand men you meet, and, I believe, you would be no loser if you betted ten to one, that every single sinner of them, one with another, has been guilty of the same frailty (e).” But here he seemeth not to have done justice to himself: the man is sure enough a hero, who hath his lady at fourscore. How doth his modesty herein lessen the merit of a whole well-spent life: not taking to himself the commendation (which Horace accounted the greatest in a theatrical character) of continuing to the very dregs the same he was from the beginning,

“—Servetur ad IMUM
“Qualis ab incepto processerat—”

But here, in justice both to the poet and the hero, let us farther remark, that the calling her his whore, implied she was his own, and not his neighbour's. Truly a commendable continence! and such as Scipio himself must have applauded. For how much self-denial was necessary not to covet his neighbour's whore? and what disorders must the coveting her have occasioned in that society, where (according to this political calculator) nine in ten of all ages have their concubines!

We have now, as briefly as we could advise, gone through the three constituent qualities of either hero. But it is not in any, or in all of these that heroism properly or essentially resideth. It is a lucky result rather from the collision of these lively qualities against one another. Thus, as from wisdom, bravery, and love, ariseth magnanimity, the object of admiration, which is the aim of the greater epic; so from vanity, assurance, and debauchery, springeth buffoonry, the source of ridicule, that “laughing ornament,” as he well termeth it (f), of the little epic.

(d) Alluding to these lines in the Epist. to Dr. Arbuthnot:

“And has not Colly still his lord and whore,
“His butchers Henley, his free-masons Moore?”

He is not ashamed (God forbid he ever should be ashamed!) of this character; who deemeth, that not reason but risibility distinguisheth the human species from the brutal. "As nature (saith this profound philosopher) distinguisheth our species from the mute creation by our risibility, her design MUST have been by that faculty as evidently to raise our HAPPINESS, as by our O's sublime (OUR ERECTED FACES) to lift the dignity of our FORM above them (i)." All this considered, how complete a hero must he be, as well as how happy a man, whose risibility lieth, not barely in his muscles, as in the common sort, but (as himself informeth us) in his very spirits? and whose O's sublime is not simply an erect face, but a brazen head; as should seem by his preferring it to one of iron, said to belong to the late king of Sweden?

But whatever personal qualities a hero may have, the examples of Achilles and Æneas show us, that all those are of small avail, without the constant assistance of the Gods: for the subversion and erection of empires have never been adjudged the work of man. How greatly soever then we may esteem of his high talents, we can hardly conceive his personal prowess alone sufficient to restore the decayed empire of Dulness. So weighty an achievement must require the particular favour and protection of the GREAT; who being the natural patrons and supporters of letters, as the ancient Gods were of Troy, must first be drawn off and engaged in another interest, before the total subversion of them can be accomplished. To surmount, therefore, this last and greatest difficulty, we have, in this excellent man, a professed favourite and intimado of the great. And look, of what force ancient piety was to draw the gods into the party of Æneas, that, and much stronger is modern incense, to engage the great in the party of dulness.

Thus have we essayed to pourtray or shadow out, this noble imp of fame. But now the impatient reader will be apt to say, If so many and various graces go to the making up a hero, what mortal shall suffice to bear his character? Ill hath he read, who seeth not, in every trace of this picture, that individual, ALL-ACCOMPLISHED PERSON, in whom these rare virtues and lucky circumstances have agreed to meet and concentre with the strongest lustre and fullest harmony.

The good Scriblerus indeed, nay the world itself, might be imposed on, in the late spurious editions, by I can't tell what sham hero or phantom: but it was not so easy to impose on HIM whom this egregious error most of all concerned. For no sooner had the fourth book laid open the high and swelling scene, but he recognized his own heroic acts: and when he came to the words,

"Soft on her lap her laureat son reclines," (though laureat imply no more than one crowned with laurel, as becometh any associate or consort in empire), he loudly resenteth this dignity to violated majesty. Indeed, not without cause, he being there represented as fast asleep; so misbecoming the eye of empire, which, like that of Providence, should never doze nor slumber. "Hah! (saith he), fast asleep, it seems! that's a little too strong. Pert and dull at least you might have allowed me, but as seldom asleep as any fool (l)." However, the injured hero may comfort himself with this reflection, that though it be a sleep, yet it is not the sleep of death, but of immortality. Here he will (m) live at least, though not awake; and in no worse condition than many an enchanted warrior before him. The famous Durandante, for instance, was, like him, cast into a long slumber by Merlin the British bard and necromancer; and his example for submitting to it with a good grace, might be of use to our hero. For that disastrous knight being sorely pressed or driven to make his answer by several persons of quality, only replied with a sigh, Patience, and shuffle the cards (n).

But now, as nothing in this world, no not the most sacred and perfect things, either of religion or government, can escape the sting of envy, methinks I already hear these carpers objecting to the clearness of our hero's title.

It would never (say they) have been esteemed sufficient to make an hero for the Iliad or Æneis, that Achilles was brave enough to overturn one empire, or Æneas pious enough to raise another, had they not been goddess-born, and princes bred. What then did this author mean, by erecting a player instead of one of his patrons (a person, "never a hero even on the stage," to this dignity of colleague in the empire of dulness, and achiever of a work that neither old Omar, Attila, nor John of Leyden, could entirely bring to pass.

To all this we have, as we conceive, a sufficient answer from the Roman historian, "Fabrum esse suæ quemque fortunæ:" that every man is the smith of his own fortune. The politic Florentine, Nicholas Machiavel, goeth still further, and affirmeth that a man needeth but to believe himself a hero to be one of the worthiest. "Let him (saith he) but fancy himself capable of the highest things, and he will of course be able to achieve them." From this principle it follows, that nothing can exceed our hero's prowess; as nothing ever equalled the greatness of his conceptions. Hear how he constantly paragoneth himself; at one time to Alexander the Great, and Charles the XII. of Sweden for the excess and delicacy of his ambition; to Henry the IV. of France, for honest policy; to the first Brutus, for love of liberty; and to Sir Robert Walpole, for good government while in power: at another time, to the god-like Socrates for his diversions and amusements; to Horace, Montaigne, and Sir William Temple, for an elegant vanity that maketh them for ever read and admired; to two Lord Chancellors, for law, from whom, when confederate against him at the bar, he carried away the prize of eloquence; and, to say all in a word, to the right reverend the Lord Bishop of London himself, in the art of writing pastoral letters.

Nor did his actions fall short of the sublimity of his conceit. In his early youth he met the revolution face to face in Nottingham; at a time when his betters contented themselves with following her. It was here he got acquainted with old battle-array, of whom he hath made so honourable mention in one of his immortal odes. But he shone in courts as well as in camps: he was called up when the nation fell in labour of this revolution; and was a gossip at her christening, with the bishop and the ladies.

As to his birth, it is true he pretendeth no relation either to Heathen god or goddess; but, what is as good, he was descended from a maker of both (p). And that he did not pass himself on the world for a hero, as well by birth as education, was his own fault: for his lineage he bringeth into his life as an anecdote, and is sensible he had it in his power to be thought nobody's son at all; and what is that but coming into the world a hero?

But be it, (the punctilious laws of epic poesy so requiring) that a hero of more than mortal birth must needs be had: even for this we have a remedy. We can easily derive our hero's pedigree from a goddess of no small power and authority amongst men; and legitimate and instal him after the right classical and authentic fashion: for, like as the ancient sages found a son of Mars in a mighty warrior; a son of Neptune in a skilful seamen; a son of Phœbus in a harmonious poet; so have we here, if need be, a son of Fortune in an artful gamester. And who fitter than the offspring of Chance, to assist in restoring the empire of Night and Chaos?

There is in truth another objection of greater weight, namely, "That this hero still existeth, and hath not yet finished his earthly course.—" For if Solon said well,

—ultima semper

Expectanda dies homini: dicique beatus

Ante obitum nemo supremaque funera debet!

"if no man can be called happy till his death,

"surely much less can any one, till then, be pronounced a hero: this species of men being far more subject than others to the caprices of fortune and humour." But to this also we have an answer, that will (we hope) be deemed decisive. It cometh from himself; who, to cut this matter short, hath solemnly protested that he will never change or amend.

With regard to his vanity, he declareth that nothing shall ever part them. "Nature (saith he) hath amply supplied me in vanity; a pleasure which neither the pertness of wit, nor the gravity of wisdom, will ever persuade me to part with." Our poet had charitably endeavoured to administer a cure to it: but he telleth us plainly, "My superiors perhaps may be mended by him; but for my part I own myself incorrigible. I look upon my follies as the best part of my fortune." And with good reason; we see to what they have brought him!

Secondly, as to buffoonry, "Is it (saith he) a time of day for me to leave off these fooleries, and set up a new character? I can no more put off my follies than my skin; I have often tried, but they stick too close to me: nor am I sure my friends are displeased with them, for in this light I afford them frequent matter of mirth, &c." Having then so publicly declared himself incorrigible, he is become dead in law (I mean the law Epopeian) and devolveth upon the poet as his property; who may take him, and deal with him as if he had been dead as long as an old Egyptian hero; that is to say, embowel and embalm him for posterity.

Nothing therefore (we conceive) remaineth to hinder his own prophecy of himself from taking immediate effect. A rare felicity! and what few prophets have had the satisfaction to see, alive!—Nor can we conclude better than with that extraordinary one of his, which is conceived in these oraculous words, My dulness will find somebody to do it right.

"Tandem Phœbus adest, morsusque inferre patem
"rantem

"Congelat, et patulos, ut erunt, induat hias
"tus." (a)

THE DUNCIAD.

BY AUTHORITY.

By virtue of the Authority in Us vested by the Act for subjecting Poets to the power of a Licenser, we have revised this Piece; where finding the style and appellation of KING to have been given to a certain Pretender, Pseudo-Poet, or Phantom, of the name of TIBBALD; and apprehending the same may be deemed in some sort a Reflection on Majesty, or at least an insult on that Legal Authority which has bestowed on another person the Crown of Poesy: We have ordered the said Pretender, Pseudo-Poet, or Phantom, utterly to vanish and evaporate out of this work: And do declare the said Throne of Poesy from henceforth to be abdicated and vacant, unless duly and lawfully supplied by the Laureate himself. And it is hereby enacted, that no other person do presume to fill the same.

THE ARGUMENT.

THE proposition, the invocation, and the inscription. Then the original of the great empire of dulness, and cause of the continuance thereof. The college of the goddesses in the city, with her private academy for poets in particular; the governors of it, and the four cardinal virtues. Then the poem hastes into the midst of things, presenting her, on the evening of a Lord Mayor's day, revolving the long succession of her sons, and the glories past and to come. She fixes her eyes on Bays * to be the instrument of that great event which is the subject of the poem. He is described pensive among his books, giving up the cause, and apprehending the period of her empire: After debating whether to betake himself to the church, or to gaming, or to party writing, he raises an altar of proper books, and (making first his solemn prayer and declaration) purposes thereon to sacrifice all his unsuccessful writings. As the pile is kindled, the goddesses beholding the flame from her seat, flies and puts it out by casting upon it the poem of Thulé. She forthwith reveals herself to him, transports him to her temple, unfolds her arts, and initiates him into her mysteries; then announcing the death of Eusden the poet laureat, anoints him, carries him to court, and proclaims him successor.

REMARKS.

The Dunciad, sic MS. It may well be disputed whether this be a right reading: Ought it not rather to be spelled Dunceiad, as the etymology evidently demands? Dunce with an e, therefore Dunceiad with an e. That accurate and punctual man of letters, the restorer of Shakespeare, constantly observes the preservation of this very letter e, in spelling the name of his beloved author, and not like his common careless editors, with the omission of one, nay sometimes of two ee's (as Shakspear), which is utterly unpardonable. "Nor is the neglect of a single letter so trivial as to some it may appear; the alteration whereof in a learned language is an achievement that brings honour to the critic who advances it; and Dr. Bentley will be remembered to posterity for his performances of this sort, as long as the world shall have any esteem for the remains of Menander and Philemon."

THEOBALD.

This is surely a slip in the learned author of the foregoing note; there having been since produced by an accurate antiquary, and autograph of Shakespeare, whereby it appears that he spelled his own name without the first e. And upon this authority it was, that those most critical curators of his monument in Westminster Abbey erased the former wrong reading, and restored the new spelling on a new piece of old Egyptian granite. Not for this only do they deserve our thanks, but for exhibiting on the same monument the first specimen of an edition of an author in marble; where (as may be seen on comparing the tomb with the book) in the space of five lines, two words and a whole verse are changed, and it is to be hoped will there stand, and outlast whatever hath been hitherto done in paper; as for the future, our learned sister university (the other eye of England) is taking care to perpetuate a total new Shakespeare at the Clarendon press.

BENTL.

It is to be noted, that this great critic also has omitted one circumstance; which is, that the inscription with the name of Shakespeare was intended to be placed on the marble scroll to which he points with his hand; instead of which it is now placed behind his back, and that specimen of an edition is put on the scroll, which indeed Shakespeare hath great reason to point at.

ANON.

Though I have as just a value for the letter E, as any grammarian living, and the same affection for the name of this poem as any critic for that of his author; yet cannot it induce me to agree with those who would add yet another e to it, and call it the Dunceiade; which being a French and foreign termination, is no way proper to a word entirely English, and vernacular. One e therefore

You by whose care, in vain decry'd and curst,

REMARKS.

in this case is right, and two ee's wrong. Yet upon the whole I shall follow the manuscript, and print it without any e at all; moved thereto by authority (at all times, with critics, equal, if not superior to reason). In which method of proceeding, I can never enough praise my good friend, the exact of Mr. Thomas Hearne; who, if any word occur, which to him and all mankind is evidently wrong, yet keeps he it in the text with due reverence, and only remarks in the margin, sic MS. In like manner we shall not amend this error in the title itself, but only note it obiter, to evince to the learned that it was not our fault, nor any effect of our ignorance or inattention.

SCRIBL.

This poem was written in the year 1726. In the next year an imperfect edition was published at Dublin, and reprinted at London in twelves; another at Dublin, and another at London in octavo: and three others in twelves the same year. But there was no perfect edition before that of London in quarto; which was attended with notes. We are willing to acquaint posterity, that this poem was presented to King George II. and his Queen by the hands of Sir Robert Walpole, on the 12th of March, 1728-9.

SCHOL. VET.

It was expressly confessed in the preface to the first edition, that this poem was not published by the author himself. It was printed originally in a foreign country. And what foreign country? Why, one notorious for blunders; where finding blanks only instead of proper names, these blunders filled them up at their pleasure.

The very hero of the poem hath been mistaken to this hour; so that we are obliged to open our notes with a discovery who he really was. We learn from the former editor, that this piece was presented by the hands of Sir Robert Walpole to King George II. Now the author directly tells us, his hero is the man

"——who brings

"The Smithfield muses to the ear of kings."

And it is notorious who was the person on whom this prince conferred the honour of the laurel.

It appears as plainly from the apostrophe to the great in the third verse, that Tibbald could not be the person, who was never an author in fashion, or caressed by the great; whereas this single characteristic is sufficient to point out the true hero: who, above all other poets of his time, was the peculiar delight and chosen companion of the nobility of England; and wrote, as he himself tells us, certain of his works at the earnest desire of persons of quality.

Lastly, the sixth verse affords full proof: this poet being the only one who was universally known to have had a son so exactly like him, in

Say, how the goddess bade Britannia sleep,
 And pour'd her spirit o'er the land and deep.
 In eldest time, ere mortals writ or read, his poetical, theatrical, political, and moral capacities, that it could justly be said of him,

Ver. 1. The mighty mother and her son, &c.] The reader ought here to be cautioned, that the mother, and not the son, is the principal agent of this poem; the latter of them is only chosen as her colleague (as was anciently the custom in Rome before some great expedition), the main action of the poem being by no means the coronation of the laureate, which is performed in the very first book, but the restoration of the empire of Dulness in Britain, which is not accomplished till the last.

Ver. 2. The Smithfield muses.] Smithfield is the place where Bartholomew fair was kept, whose shows, machines, and dramatical entertainments, formerly agreeable only to the taste of the rabble, were by the hero of this poem, and others of equal genius, brought to the theatres of Covent Garden, Lincoln's-inn-fields, and the Hay-market, to be the reigning pleasures of the court and town. This happened in the reigns of King George I. and II. See Book iii.

Ver. 4. By Dulness, Jove, and Fate:] i. e. by their judgments, their interests, and their inclinations.

Ver. 15. Laborious, heavy, busy, bold, &c.] I wonder the learned Scriblerus has omitted to advertise the reader, at the opening of this poem, that Dulness here is not to be taken contractedly for mere stupidity, but in the enlarged sense of the word, for all slowness of apprehension, shortness of sight, or imperfect sense of things. It includes (as we see by the poet's own words) labour, industry, and some degrees of activity and boldness; a ruling principle not inert, but turning topsy-turvy the understanding, and inducing an anarchy or confused state of mind. This remark ought to be carried along with the reader throughout the work; and without this caution he will be apt to mistake the importance of many of the characters, as well as of the design of the poet. Hence it is, that some have complained he chooses too mean a subject, and imagined he employs himself like Domitian, in killing flies; whereas those who have the true key will find he sports with a nobler quarry, and embraces a larger compass; or (as one saith, on a like occasion)

"Will see his work, like Jacob's ladder rise,
 Its foot in dirt, its head amidst the skies."

Ver. 22.—laugh and shake in Rabelais' easy chair.] The imagery is exquisite; and the equivoque in the last words, gives a peculiar elegance to the whole expression. The easy chair suits his age: Rabelais' easy chair marks his character; and he filled and possessed it as the right heir and successor of that original genius.

Ver. 23. Or praise the court, or magnify mankind.] Ironical, alluding to Gulliver's representations of both. The next line relates to the papers of the Drapier against the currency of Wood's Copper coin in Ireland, which, upon the great discontent of the people, his Majesty was graciously pleas'd to recal.

Ver. 26. Mourn not, my Swift! at aught our realm acquires] Ironical iterum. The politics of England and Ireland were at this time by some thought opposite, or interfering with each other. Dr. Swift of course was in the interest of the latter, our author of the former.

Ver. 34. Poverty and Poetry.] I cannot here omit a remark that will greatly endear our author to every one, who shall attentively observe that humanity and candour, which every where appears in him towards those unhappy objects of the ridicule of all mankind, the bad poets. He here imputes all scandalous rhymes, scurrilous weekly papers, base flatteries, wretched elegies, songs, and verses (even from those sung at court, to ballads in the streets), not so much to malice or ferocity as dulness; and not so much to dulness as to necessity. And thus, at the very commencement of his satire, makes an apology for all that are to be satirized.

Ver. 40. Curll's chaste press, and Lintot's rubric post:] Two booksellers, of whom see Book ii. The former was fined by the Court of King's Bench for publishing obscene books; the latter usually adorned his shop with titles in red letters.

Ver. 41. Hence hymning Tyburn's elegiac lines.] It is an ancient English custom for the malefactor to sing a Psalm at their execution at Tyburn; and no less customary to print elegies on their deaths, at the same time, or before.

Ver. 43. Sepulchral lies] is a just satire on the flatteries and falsehoods admitted to be inscribed on the walls of churches, in epitaphs; which occasioned the following epigram :

" Friend! in your epitaphs, I'm griev'd,
" So very much is said;
" One half will never be believ'd,
" The other never read."

Ver. 44. New-year odes.] Made by the poet laureate for the time being, to be sung at court on

Fierce champion Fortitude, that knows no fears
Of hisses, blows, or want, or loss of ears :
Calm Temperance, whose blessings those partake
Who hunger and who thirst for scribbling sake: 50
Prudence, whose glass presents th' approaching jail ;

Poetic Justice, with her lifted scale,
Where, in nice balance, Truth with gold she weighs,
And solid pudding against empty praise.

Here she beholds the Chaos dark and deep,
Where nameless Somethings in their causes sleep,
Till genial Jacob, or a warm third day,
Call forth each mass, a poem, or a play ;
How hints, like spawn, scarce quick in embryo lie,
How new-born Nonsense first is taught to cry, 60
Maggots, half-form'd, in rhyme exactly meet,
And learn to crawl upon poetic feet.

Here one poor word an hundred clenches makes,
And ductile Dulness new meanders takes;

There motly images her fancy strike,
Figures ill-pair'd, and similes unlike.

She sees a mob of metaphors advance,
Pleas'd with the madness of the mazy dance ;

How Tragedy and Comedy embrace ;

How Farce and Epic get a jumbled race ; 70

How Time himself stands still at her command,
Realms shift their place, and ocean turns to land ;

Here gay Description Egypt glads with showers,
Or gives to Zembla fruits, to Barca flowers ;

Glittering with ice here hoary hills are seen,
There painted valleys of eternal green,

In cold December fragrant chaplets blow,
And heavy harvests nod beneath the snow.

All these, and more, the cloud-compelling queen
Beholds through fogs, that magnify the scene. 80

She, tinsell'd o'er in robes of varying hues,
With self-applause her wild creation views ;

Sees momentary monsters rise and fall,
And with her own fools colours gilds them all.

every new-year's day, the words of which are happily drowned in the voices and instruments. The new-year odes of the hero of this work were of a cast distinguished from all that preceded him, and made a conspicuous part of his character as a writer, which doubtless induced our author to mention them here so particularly.

Ver. 45. In clouded majesty here Dulness shone.] See this cloud removed, or rolled back, or gathered up to her head, book iv. ver. 17, 18. It is worth while to compare this description of the majesty of Dulness in a state of peace and tranquillity, with that more busy scene where she mounts the throne in triumph, and is not so much supported by her own virtues, as by the princely consciousness of having destroyed all other.

in blanks, but most certainly could never be that which the editor foisted in formerly, and which no way agrees with the chronology of the poem. BENTL.

poem de Jure Divino, &c. of De Foe, and by some lines in Cowley's Miscellanies on the other. And both these authors had a resemblance in their fates

Var. Tibbald.] Author of a pamphlet intituled Shakspeare restored. During two whole years, while Mr. Pope was preparing his edition of Shakspeare, he published advertisements, requesting assistance, and promising satisfaction to any who could contribute to its greater perfection. But this restorer, who was at that time soliciting favours of him by letters, did wholly conceal his design, till after its publication (which he was since not ashamed to own, in a Daily Journal of Nov. 26. 1728):
And then an outcry was made in the prints, that our author had joined with the bookseller to raise an extravagant subscription; in which he had no share, of which he had no knowledge, and against which he had publicly advertised his own proposals for Homer. Probably that proceeding elevated Tibbald to the dignity he now holds in this poem, which he seems to deserve no other way better than his brethren; unless we impute it to the share he had in the Journals, cited among the Testimonies of Authors prefixed to this work.

logue of some few only of his works, which were very numerous. Mr. Cook, in his Battle of Poets, saith of him,

"Eusden, a laurell'd bard, by fortune rais'd,
"By very few was read, by fewer prais'd."

Mr. Oldmixon, in his Arts of Logic and Rhetoric,
p. 413, 414. affirms, "That of all the Galatratia's
"he ever met with, none comes up to some verses
"of this poet, which have as much of the ridi-
"culum and the sustain in them as can well be
"jumbled together, and are of that sort of non-
"sense, which so perfectly confounds all ideas,
"that there is no distinct one left in the mind."
Further he says of him, "That he hath prophe-
"sied his own poetry shall be sweeter than Catul-
"lus, Ovid, and Tibullus; but we have little "hopes of the accomplishment of it from what
"he hath lately published." Upon which Mr.
Oldmixon has not spared a reflection, "That the "putting the laurel on the head of one who writ such "verses, will give futurity a very lively idea of the "judgment and justice of those who bestowed
"it." Ibid. p. 417. But the well known learning of that noble person, who was then Lord Chamberlain, might have screened him from this unmannerly reflection. Nor ought Mr. Oldmixon to complain, so long after, that the laurel would have become his own brows, or any other's: It were more decent to acquiesce in the opinion of the Duke of Buckingham upon this matter:

"—In rush'd Eusden, and cry'd, Who shall have it,

"But I, the true laureate, to whom the king gave it,

"Apollo begg'd pardon, and granted his claim,

"But vow'd that till then he ne'er heard of his name."

Session of Poets.

The same plea might also serve for his successor, Mr. Cibber; and is further strengthened in the following epigram made on that occasion:

In merry old England it once was a rule,
The king had his poet, and also his fool;
But now we're so frugal, I'd have you to know it,
That Cibber can serve both for fool and for poet.

Of Blackmore, see Book ii. Of Philips, Book i. ver. 262. and Book iii. prope fin.

Nahum Tate was poet laureate, a cold writer, of no invention; but sometimes translated tolerably when befriended by Mr. Dryden. In his second part of Abraham and Achitophel are above two hundred admirable lines together of that great hand, which strongly shine through the insipidity of the rest. Something parallel may be observed of another author here mentioned.

Ver. 106. And all the mighty mad in Dennis' rage.] Mr. Theobald, in the Censor, vol. ii. N. 33. calls Mr. Dennis by the name of Furius. "The modern Furius is to be looked upon more as an object of pity, than of that which he daily provokes, laughter and contempt. Did we really know how much this poor man" [I wish that reflection on poverty had been spared] "suffers by being contradicted, or, which is the same thing in effect, by hearing another praised; we should, in compassion, sometimes attend to him with a silent nod, and let him go away with the triumphs of his ill-nature.—Poor Furius (again) when any of his contemporaries are well spoken of, quitting the ground of the present dispute, steps back a thousand years to call in the succour of the ancients. His very panegyric is spiteful, and he uses it for the same reason as some ladies do their commendations of a dead beauty, who would never have had their good word, but that a living one happened to be in their company. His applause is not the tribute of his heart, but the sacrifice of his revenge," &c. Indeed his pieces against our poet are somewhat of an angry character, and as they are now scarce extant, a taste of his style may be satisfactory to the curious. "A young, squab, short gentleman, whose outward form, though it should be that of downright monkey, would not differ so much from human shape as his unthinking

Dulness with transport eyes the lively Dunce,

REMARKS.

"immaterial part does from human understanding.—He is as stupid and as venomous as a hunch-backed toad. A book, through which folly and ignorance, those brethren so lame and impotent, do ridiculously look big and very dull, and strut and hobble, cheek by jowl, with their arms on kimbo, being led and supported, and bully-backed by that blind Hector, Impudence." Reflect. on the Essay on Criticism, p. 26. 29, 30.

It would be unjust not to add his reasons for this fury, they are so strong and coercive. "I regard him (saith he) as an enemy, not so much to me, as to my king, to my country, to my religion, and to that liberty which has been the sole felicity of my life. A vagary of fortune, who is sometimes pleased to be frolicsome, and the epidemic madness of the times, have given him reputation, and reputation (as Hobbes says) is power, and that has made him dangerous. Therefore I look on it as my duty to King George, whose faithful subject I am; to my country, of which I have appeared a constant lover; to the laws, under whose protection I have so long lived; and to the liberty of my country, more dear to me than life, of which I have now for forty years been a constant assessor, &c. I look upon it as my duty, I say, to do—you shall see what—to pull the lion's skin from this little ass, which popular error has thrown round him; and to show that this author, who has been lately so much in vogue, has neither sense in his thoughts, nor English in his expressions." DENNIS' Rem. on Hom. Pref. p. 2. 91, &c.

Besides these public spirited reasons, Mr. D. had a private one; which, by his manner of expressing it in p. 92, appears to have been equally strong. He was even in bodily fear of his life from the machinations of the said Mr. P. "The story (says he) is too long to be told, but who would be acquainted with it, may hear it from Mr. Curll, my bookseller.—However, what my reason has suggested to me, that I have, with a just confidence said, in defiance of his two clandestine weapons, his slander and his poison." Which last words of his book plainly discover Mr. D.'s suspicion was that of being poisoned, in like manner as Mr. Curll had been before him: of which fact, see a full and true account of the horrid and barbarous revenge, by poison, on the body of Edmund Curll, printed in 1716, the year antecedent to that wherein these Remarks of Mr. Dennis were published. But what puts it beyond all question, is a passage in a very warm treatise, in which Mr. D. was also concerned, price two-pence, called a True character of Mr. Pope and his Writings, printed for S. Popping, 1716; in the tenth page whereof he is said "to have insulted people in those calamities and diseases which he "himself gave them, by administering poison to "them:" and is called (p. 4.) a lurking way-

"laying coward, and a stabber in the dark."
Which (with many other things most lively set forth in that piece) must have rendered him a terror, not to Mr. Dennis only, but to all Christian people. This charitable warning only provoked our incorrigible poet to write the following epigram:

Should Dennis publish you had stabb'd your bro-

Lampoon'd your monarch, or debauch'd your mo-
Say, what revenge on Dennis can be had?
Too dull for laughter, for reply too mad:
On one so poor you cannot take the law;
On one so old your sword you scorn to draw:
Uncag'd then let the harmless monster rage,
Secure in dulness, madness, want, and age.

For the rest; Mr. John Dennis was the son of a saddler in London, born in 1657. He paid court to Mr. Dryden; and having obtained some correspondence with Mr. Wycherley and Mr. Congreve, he immediately obliged the public with their letters. He made himself known to the Government by many admirable schemes and projects; which the Ministry, for reasons best known to themselves, constantly kept private. For his character, as a writer, it is given us as follows: "Mr.
"Dennis is excellent at Pindaric writings, per"fectly regular in all his performances, and a per"son of sound learning. That he is master of a "great deal of penetration and judgment, his cri-
"ticisms (particularly on Prince Arthur) do suf"ficiently demonstrate." From the same account it also appears that he writ plays "more to get reputation than money." Dennis of himself. See Giles Jacob's Lives of Dramatic Poets, p. 68, 69, compared with p. 286.

Ver. 109. Bays, form'd by Nature, &c.] It is hoped the poet here hath done full justice to his hero's character, which it were a great mistake to imagine was wholly sunk in stupidity: he is allowed to have supported it with a wonderful mixture of vivacity. This character is heightened according to his own desire, in a letter he wrote to our author. "Pert and dull at least you might "have allowed me. What! am I only to be dull,
"and dull still, and again, and for ever?" He then solemnly appealed to his own conscience, that
"he could not think himself so, nor believe that
"our poet did; but that he spake worse of him
"than he could possibly think; and concluded it
"must be merely to show his wit, or for some
"profit or lucre to himself." Life of C. C. chap.
"vii. and letter to Mr. P. page 15, 40, 53. And to show his claim to what the poet was so unwilling to allow him, of being pert as well as dull, he declares he will have the last word; which occasioned the following epigram:

Swearing and supperless the hero fate,
Blasphem'd his gods, the dice, and damn'd his fate.
Then gnaw'd his pen, then dash'd it to the ground,
Sinking from thought to thought, a vast profound!
Plung'd for his sense, but found no bottom there,
Yet wrote and flounder'd on in mere despair. 120
Round him much embryo, much Abortion lay,
Much future Ode, and abdicated Play;
Nonsense precipitate, like running lead,
That slip'd through crags and zig-zags of the

Ver. 115. supperless the hero fate.] It is amazing how the sense of this hath been mistaken by all the former commentators, who most idly suppose it to imply that the hero of the poem wanted a supper. In truth a great absurdity! Not that we are ignorant that the hero of Homer's Odyssey is frequently in that circumstance, and therefore it can no way derogate from the grandeur of epic poem to represent such hero under a calamity, to which the greatest, not only of critics and poets, but of kings and warriors, have been subject. But much more refined, I will venture to say, is the meaning of our author: It was to give us oblique-ly a curious precept, or what Bossu calls a disguised sentence, that "Temperance is the life of Study."
The language of poesy brings all into action; and to represent a critic encompassed with books but without a supper, is a picture which lively expresseth how much the true critic prefers the diet of the mind to that of the body, one of which he always castigates, and often totally neglects, for the greater improvement of the other. SCRIBL.

But since the discovery of the true hero of the poem, may we not add, that nothing was so natural, after so great a loss of money at dice, or of reputation by his play, as that the poet should have no great stomach to eat a supper? Besides, how well has the poet consulted his heroic character, in adding that he swore all the time? BENTL.

Ver. 133. hapless Shakspeare, &c.] It is not to be doubted but Bays was a subscriber to Tibbald's Shakspeare. He was frequently liberal in this way; and, as he tells us, "subscribed to Mr. Pope's Homer, out of pure generosity and civility; but when Mr. Pope did so to his Nonjuror, he concluded it could be nothing but a joke." Letter to Mr. P. p. 24.

This Tibbald, or Theobald, published an edition of Shakspeare, of which he was so proud himself as to say, in one of Mist's Journals, June 8, "That to expose any errors in it was impracticable." And in another, April 27, "That whatever care might for the future be taken by any other editor, he would still give above five hundred emendations, that shall escape them all."

Ver. 134. Wish'd he had blotted] It was a ridiculous praise which the players gave to Shakspeare, "that he never blotted a line." Ben Jonson honestly wished he had blotted a thousand; and Shakspeare would certainly have wished the same, if he had lived to see those alterations in his works, which, not the actors only (and especially the daring hero of this poem) have made on the stage, but the presumptuous critics of our days in their editions.

Ver. 135. It was printed in the surreptitious editions, W—ly, W—s, who were persons eminent for good life; the one writ the Life of Christ in verse, the other some valuable pieces in the lyric kind, on pious subjects. The line is here restored according to its original.

"George Withers was a great pretender to poetical zeal against the vices of the times, and abused the greatest personages in power, which brought upon him frequent correction. The Marshalsea and Newgate were no strangers to him." WINSTANLY.—Quarles was as dull a writer, but an honest dull man. Blome's books are remarkable for their cuts.

Ver. 142. There, stamp'd with arms, Newcastle shines complete.] "The Duchess of Newcastle was one who busied herself in the ravishing delights of poetry; leaving to posterity, in print, three ample volumes of her studious endeavours." WINSTANLY, ibid.—Langbaine reckons up eight folios of her Grace's; which were usually adorned with gilded covers, and had her coat of arms upon them.

Ver. 146. Worthy Settle, Banks, and Broome.] The poet has mentioned these three authors in particular, as they are parallel to our hero in his three capacities; 1. Settle was his brother laureat; only, indeed, upon half pay, for the city instead of the court; but equally famous for unintelligible flights in his poems on public occasions, such as shows, birth-days, &c. 2. Banks was his rival in tragedy (though more successful) in one of his tragedies, the Earl of Essex, which is yet alive: Anna Boleyn, the Queen of Scots, and Cyrus the Great, are dead and gone. These he dress'd in a sort of beggar's velvet, or a happy mixture of the thick fustian and thin prosaic; exactly imitated in Perolla and Isidora, Cæsar in Egypt, and the Heroic Daughter. 3. Broome was a serving-man of Ben. Johnson, who once picked up a comedy from his betters, or from some cast scenes of his master, not entirely contemptible.

There, sav'd by spice, like mummies, many a year,
Dry bodies of divinity appear :

De Lyra there a dreadful front extends,
And here the groaning shelves Philemon bends.

Of these twelve volumes, twelve of amplest size,
Redeem'd from tapers and defrauded pies,
Inspir'd he seizes : These an altar raise :
An hecatomb of pure unfully'd lays
That altar crowns : A folio common-place 159
Founds the whole pile, of all his works the base :
Quartos, octavos, shape the lessening pyre ;
A twisted birth-day ode completes the spire.

Ver. 149. Caxton.] A printer in the time of
Edw. IV. Rich. III. and Hen. VII. ; Wynkyn de
Word, his successor, in that of Hen. VII. and VIII.
The former translated into prose Virgil's Æneis, as a history ; of which he speaks, in his proeme, in a very singular manner, as of a book hardly known.
Tibbald quotes a rare passage from him in Mist's
Journal of March 16. 1728, concerning a strange and marvellous beast, called Sagittayre, which he would have Shakspeare to mean rather than Teucer, the archer celebrated by Homer.

Ver. 167. E'er since Sir Fopling's periwig.] The first visible cause of the passion of the town for our hero, was a fair flaxen full-bottomed periwig, which he tells us he wore in his first play of the Fool in Fashion. It attracted, in a particular man-

Ah ! still o'er Britain stretch that peaceful wand,
Which lulls th' Helvetian and Batavian land ;
Where rebel to thy throne if Science rise,
She does but show her coward face, and dies :
There thy good scholiasts with unwearied pains
Make Horace flat, and humble Maro's strains :
Here studious I unlucky moderns save,
Nor sleeps one error in its father's grave,
Old puns restore, lost blunders nicely seek,
And crucify poor Shakspeare once a week.
For thee I dim these eyes, and stuff this head,
With all such reading as was never read ;
For thee supplying, in the worst of days,
Notes to dull books, and prologues to dull plays ;
For thee explain a thing till all men doubt it,
And write about it, goddesses, and about it,
So spins the silk-worm small its slender store,
And labours, till it clouds itself all o'er.
Not that my quill to critics was confin'd,
My verse gave ampler lessons to mankind ;
So gravest precepts may successful prove,
But sad examples never fail to move.

Wynkyn, rather than in Homer or Chaucer. Nay, so far had he lost his reverence to this incomparable author, as to say in print, he deserved to be whipt. An insolence which nothing sure can parallel ! but that of Dennis, who can be proved to have declared before company, that Shakspeare was a rascal. O tempora ! O mores !

Var. And crucify poor Shakspeare one a week.]
For some time, once a week or fortnight, he printed in Mist's Journal, a single remark, or poor conjecture, on some word or pointing of Shakspeare, either in his own name, or in letters to himself, as from others, without name. Upon these, somebody made this epigram :

“ 'Tis generous, Tibbald ! in thee and thy bro“ thers,

“ To help us thus to read the works of others :

“ Never for this can just returns be shown ;

“ For who will help us e'er to read thy own ?”

Or quite unravel all the réas'ning thread,
 And hang some curious cobweb in its stead! 180

 And ponderous slugs cut swiftly through the sky;
 As clocks to weight their nimble motion owe,
 The wheels above urg'd by the load below:
 Me Emptiness and Dulness could inspire,
 And were my elasticity and fire.
 Some dæmon stole my pen (forgive th' offence)
 And once betray'd me into common sense:
 Else all my prose and verse were much the same;
 This, prose on stilts; that, poetry fall'n lame. 190
 Did on the stage my fops appear confin'd?
 My life gave ampler lessons to mankind.
 Did the dead letter unsuccessful prove?
 The brisk example never fail'd to move.

 Heaven had decreed these works a longer date.

purchase it. "Whatever contempt (says he) philosophers may have for a fine periwig, my friend, who was not to despise the world, but live in it, knew very well that so material an article of dress upon the head of a man of sense, if it became him, could never fail of drawing to him a more partial regard and benevolence, than could possibly be hoped for in an ill-made one. This, perhaps, may soften the grave censure, which so youthful a purchase might otherwise have laid upon him. In a word, he made his attack upon this periwig, as your young fellows generally do upon a lady of pleasure; first by a few familiar praises of her person, and then a civil inquiry into the price of it; and we finished our bargain that night over a bottle." This remarkable periwig usually made its entrance upon the stage in a sedan, brought in by two chairmen, with infinite approbation of the audience.

Ver. 178, 179. Guard the sure barrier—Or quite unravel, &c.] For Wit or Reasoning are never greatly hurtful to Dulness, but when the first is founded in truth, and the other in usefulness.

Ver. 181. As forc'd from wind-guns, &c.] The thought of these four verses is founded in a poem of our author's, of a very early date (namely written at fourteen years old, and soon after printed) so the author of a poem called Successio.

This learned critic is to be understood allegorically: The doctors in this place mean no more than false dice; a cant phrase used among gamblers. So the meaning of these four sonorous lines is only this, "Shall I play fair or foul?"

A passage I have always suspected. Who sees not the antithesis of auratis and argenteus to be unworthy the Virgilian Majesty? And what absurdity to say a goose sings? canebat. Virgil gives a contrary character of the voice of this silly bird, in Ecl. ix.

"—— argutos inter strepere anser olores."

Read it, therefore, adesse strepebat. And why auratis porticibus? does not the very verse preceding this inform us,

"Romuleoque recens horrebat regia culmo."

Is this thatch in one line, and gold in another, consistent? I scruple not (repugnantibus omnibus manuscriptis) to correct it auritis. Horace uses the same epithet in the same sense,

Ver. 218. Cibberian forehead.] So indeed all the MSS. read, but I make no scruple to pronounce them all wrong, the laureat being elsewhere celebrated by our poet for his great modesty—modest Cibber—read, therefore, at my peril, Cerberian forehead. This is perfectly classical, and what is more, Homeric; the dog was the ancient, as the bitch is the modern symbol of impudence: Κυνὸς ὀφθαλμοῖς ἔχων, says Achilles to Agamemnon) which, when in a superlative degree, may well be denominated from Cerberus, the dog with three heads. But as to the latter part of this verse, Cibberian brain, that is certainly the genuine reading.

Under this pretence, the groom porter had a room appropriated to gaming all the summer the court was at Kensington, which his majesty accidentally being acquainted with, with a just indignation, prohibited. It is reported the same practice is yet continued wherever the court resides, and the hazard table there open to all the professed gamesters in town.

Ver. 328—Ogilby)—God save King Log!] See Ogilby's Æsop's Fables, where, in the story of the frogs and their king, this excellent hemistich is to be found.

Our author manifests here, and elsewhere, a prodigious tenderness for the bad writers. We see he selects the only good passage, perhaps, in all that ever Ogilby writ! which shows how candid and patient a reader he must have been. What can be more kind and affectionate than the words in the preface to his poems, where he labours to call up all our humanity and forgiveness toward these unlucky men, by the most moderate representation of their case, that has ever been given by any author?

But how much all indulgence is lost upon these people may appear from the just reflection made on their constant conduct and constant fate, in the following epigram:

"Ye little wits, that gleam'd a-while,
"When Pope vouchsaf'd a ray,
"Alas! depriv'd of his kind smile,

BOOK II.

ARGUMENT.

The king being proclaimed, the solemnity is graced with public games and sports of various kinds; not instituted by the hero, as by Æneas in Virgil, but for greater honour by the goddess in person (in like manner as the games Pythia, Isthmia, &c. were anciently said to be ordained by the Gods, and as Thetis herself appearing, according to Homer, Odyss. xxiv. proposed the prizes in honour of her son Achilles). Hither flock the poets and critics, attended, as is but just, with their patrons and booksellers. The goddess is first pleased, for her disport, to propose games to the booksellers, and setteth up the phantom of a poet, which they contend to overtake. The races described, with their divers accidents. Next, the game for a poetess. Then follow the exercises for the poets, of tickling, vociferating, diving: The first holds forth the arts and practices of dedicators, the second of disputants and fustian poets, the third of profound, dark, and dirty party-writers. Lastly, for the critics, the goddess proposes (with great propriety) an exercise, not of their parts, but their patience, in hearing the works of two voluminous authors, one in verse, and the other in prose, deliberately read, without sleeping: The various effects of which, with the several degrees and manners of their operation, are here set forth; till the whole number, not of critics only, but of spectators, actors, and all present, fall fast asleep; which naturally and necessarily ends the games.

High on a gorgeous seat, that far out-shone

REMARKS.

Two things there are, upon the supposition of which the very basis of all verbal criticism is founded and supported: The first, that an author could never fail to use the best word on every occasion; the second, that a critic cannot choose but know which that is. This being granted, whenever any word doth not fully content us, we take upon us to conclude, first, that the author could never have used it; and, secondly, that he must have used that very one, which we conjecture, in its stead.

Or that where on her Curlls the public pours,
All bounteous, fragrant grains and golden showers,

REMARKS.

We cannot therefore, enough admire the learned Scriblerus for his alteration of the text in the two last verses of the preceding book, which in all the former editions stood thus:

Hoarse thunder to its bottom shook the bog,
And the loud nation croak'd, God save king Log.

He has, with great judgment, transposed these two epithets; putting hoarse to the nation, and loud to the thunder: And this being evidently the true reading, he vouchsafed not so much as to mention the former; for which assertion of the just right of a critic he merits the acknowledgement of all sound commentators.

Ver. 2. Henley's gilt tub,] The pulpit of a dissenter is usually called a tub; but that of Mr. Orator Henley was covered with velvet, and adorned with gold. He had also a fair altar, and over it this extraordinary inscription, 'The Primitive Eucharist.' See the history of this person, book iii.

Ver. 2. or Fleckno's Irish throne,] Richard Fleckno was an Irish priest, but had laid aside (as himself expressed it) the mechanic part of priesthood. He printed some plays, poems, letters, and travels. I doubt not, our author took occasion to mention him in respect to the poem of Mr. Dryden, to which this bears some resemblance, though of a character more different from it than that of the Æneid from the Iliad, or the Lutrin of Boileau from the Defait de Bouts rimées of Sarazin.

It may be just worth mentioning, that the eminence from whence the ancient sophists entertained their auditors, was called by the pompous name of a throne. Themistius, Orat. i.

Ver. 3. Or that where on her Curlls the public pours,] Edmund Curll stood in the pillory at Charing-cross, in March 1727-8. "This (saith Edmund Curll) is a false assertion—I had indeed the corporal punishment of what the gentlemen of the long robe are pleased jocosely to call mounting the rostrum for one hour: but that scene of action was not in the month of March, but in February." [Curlliad, 12mo, p. 19.] And of the history of his being tost in a blanket, he saith, "Here, Scriblerus! thou leest in what thou assertest concerning the blanket: it was not a blanket, but a rug," p. 25. Much in the same manner Mr. Cibber remonstrated, that his brothers, at bedlam, mentioned Book i. were not brazen, but blocks; yet our author let it pass unaltered, as a trifle that no way altered the relationship.

We should think (gentle reader) that we but ill performed our part, if we corrected not as well our own errors now, as formerly those of the printer. Since what moved us to this work, was solely the love of truth not in the least any vain-glory, or desire to contend with great authors. And farther, our mistakes, we conceive, will the rather

Ver. 15. Rome in her Capitol saw Querno sit,] Camillo Querno was of Apulia, who hearing the great encouragement which Leo X. gave to poets, travelled to Rome with a harp in his hand, and sung to it twenty thousand verses of a poem called Alexis. He was introduced as a buffoon to Leo, and promoted to the honour of the laurel; a jest which the Court of Rome and the Pope himself entered into so far, as to cause him to ride on an elephant to the Capitol, and to hold a solemn festival on his coronation; at which it is recorded the poet himself was so transported as to weep for joy*. He was ever after a constant frequenter of the Pope's table, drank abundantly, and poured forth verses without number. Paulus Jovius, Elog. Vir. doct. cap. lxxxiii. Some idea of his poetry is given by Fam. Strada, in his Prolusions.

Never was dash'd out at one lucky hit,

A fool, so just a copy of a wit;
So like, that critics said, and courtiers swore,
A wit it was, and call'd the phantom More. 50

REMARKS.

Ver. 34. And gentle Dulness ever loves a joke.] This species of mirth called a joke, arising from a Malentendu, may be well supposed to be the delight of Dulness.

Ver. 47. Never was dash'd out, at one lucky hit.] Our author here seems willing to give some account of the possibility of Dulness making a wit (which could be done no other way than by chance). The fiction is the more reconciled to probability by the known story of Apelles, who being at a loss to express the foam of Alexander's horse, dash'd his pencil in despair at the picture, and happened to do it by that fortunate stroke.

Ver. 50. and call'd the phantom More.] CURLL, in his Key to the Dunciad, affirmed this to be James-Moore Smith, Esq.; and it is probable (considering what is said of him in the Testimonies) that some might fancy our author obliged to represent this gentleman as a plagiarist, or to pass for one himself. His case indeed was like that of a man I have heard of, who, as he was sitting in company, perceived his next neighbour had stolen his handkerchief: "Sir," (said the thief, finding himself detected) "do not expose me, I did it for mere want; be so good as take it privately out of my pocket again, and say nothing." The honest man did so, but the other cried out, "See, gentlemen, what a thief we have among us! look, he is stealing my handkerchief!"

Some time before, he had borrowed of Dr. Arbuthnot a paper called an Historico-physical account of the South Sea; and of Mr. Pope the Memoirs of a Parish Clerk, which for two years he kept, and read to the Rev. Dr. Young; F. Billers, Esq. and many others, as his own. Being applied to for them, he pretended they were lost; but there happening to be another copy of the letter, it came out in Swift and Pope's Miscellanies. Upon this, it seems, he was so far mistaken as to confess his proceeding by an endeavour to hide it : unguardedly printing (in the Daily Journal of April 3, 1728.) " That the contempt " which he and others had for these pieces," (which only himself had shown, and handed about as his own) " occasioned their being lost, and " for that cause only not returned " A fact, of which as none but he could be conscious, none but he could be the publisher of it. The plagiarisms of this person gave occasion to the following Epigram :

" Moore always smiles whenever he recites;
" He smiles (you think) approving what he writes.
" And yet in this no vanity is shown;
" A modest man may like what's not his own."

This young gentleman's whole misfortune was too inordinate a passion to be thought a wit. Here is a very strong instance attested by Mr. Savage, son of the late Earl Rivers; who having shown some verses of his in manuscript to Mr. Moore wherein Mr. Pope was called first of the tuneful train, Mr. Moore the next morning sent to Mr. Savage, to give those verses another turn, to wit, " That " Pope might now be the first, because Moore, " had left him unrivalled, in turning his style to " Comedy." This was during the rehearsal of the Rival Modes, his first and only work; the town condemned it in the action, but he printed it in 1726-7, with this modest motto :

" Hic cæstus, artemque repono."

The smaller pieces which we have heard attributed to this author are An Epigram on the Bridge at Blenheim, by Dr. Evans : Cosmelia, by Mr. Pit, Mr. Jones, &c. The Mock Marriage of a mad Divine, with a Cl. for a Parson, by Dr. W. The Saw pit, a Simile, by a Friend. Certain Physical works on Sir James Baker; and some un-owned Letters, Advertisements, and Epigrams against our author in the Daily Journal.

Notwithstanding what is here collected of the person imagined by Curll to be meant in this place, we cannot be of that opinion; since our poet had certainly no need of vindicating half a dozen of verses to himself, which every reader has done for him; since the name itself is not spelled Moore, but More; and, lastly, since the learned Scriblerus has not proved the contrary.

Ver. 50. the phantom More.] It appears from hence, that this is not the name of a real person, but fictitious. More from μῆρος, stultus, μωρία, stultitia, to represent the folly of a plagiarist. Thus Erasmus, " Admonuit me Mori cognomen tibi, " quod tam ad Morie vocabulum accedit quam es " ipse a re alienus" Dedication of Morie Enco-

SCRIBL.

Ver. 53. But lofty Lintot] We enter here upon the episode of the booksellers; persons, whose names being more known and famous in the learned world than those of the authors in this poem, do therefore need less explanation. The action of Mr. Lintot here imitates that of Dares in Virgil, rising just in this manner to lay hold on a bull. This eminent bookseller printed the Rival Modes before mentioned.

Ver. 58. Stood dauntless Curll;] We come now to a character of much respect, that of Mr. Edmund Curll. As a plain repetition of great actions is the best praise of them, we shall only say of this eminent man, that he carried the trade many lengths beyond what it had ever before arrived at; and that he was the envy and admiration of all his profession. He possessed himself a command over all authors whatever; he caused them to write what he pleased; they could not call their very names their own. He was not only famous among these; he was taken notice of by the state, the church, and the law, and received particular marks of distinction from each.

It will be owned that he is here introduced with all possible dignity: He speaks like the intrepid Diomede; he runs like the swift-footed Achilles; if he falls, 'tis like the beloved Nisus; and (what Homer makes to be the chief of all praises) he is favoured of the gods; he says but three words, and his prayer is heard; a goddess conveys it to the seat of Jupiter: Though he loses the prize, he gains the victory; the great mother comforts him, she inspires him with expedients, she honours him with an immortal present (such as Achilles receives from Thetis, and Æneas from Venus), at once instructive and prophetic; after this he is unrivalled and triumphant.

The tribute our author here pays him is a grateful return for several unmerited obligations: Many weighty animadversions on the public affairs, and many excellent and diverting pieces on private persons, has he given to his name. If ever he owed two verses to any other, he owed Mr. Curll some thousands. He was every day extending his fame, and enlarging his writings: Witness innumerable instances; but it shall suffice only to mention the Court Poems, which he meant to publish as the work of the true writer, a lady of quality; but being first threatened, and afterwards punished for it by Mr. Pope, he generously transferred it from her to him, and ever

 With arms expanded Bernard rows his state,
 And left-legg'd Jacob seems to emulate.
 Full in the middle way there stood a lake,
 Which Curll's Corinna chanc'd that morn to make:

 With reams abundant this abode supply; 90

since printed it in his name. The single time that ever he spoke to C. was on that affair, and to that happy incident he owed all the favour since received from him: So true is the saying of Dr. Sydenham, "that any one shall be, at some time" or other, the better or the worse, for having "but seen or spoken to a good or bad man."

Ver. 70. Curll's Corinna] This name, it seems, was taken by one Mrs. Thomas, who procured some private letters of Mr. Pope, while almost a boy, to Mr. Cromwell, and sold them without the consent of either those gentlemen to Curll, who printed them in 12mo, 1727. He discovered her to be the publisher, in his Key, p. 12. We only take this opportunity of mentioning the manner in which those letters got abroad, which the author was ashamed of as very trivial things, full, not only of levities, but of wrong judgments of men and books, and only excusable from the youth and inexperience of the writer.

Ver. 82. Down with the Bible, up with the Pope's arms] The Bible, Curll's sign: the Cross-keys, Lintot's.

 And plac'd it next him, a distinction rare!

 From her black grottos near the Temple-wall,
 Listening delighted to the jest unclean
 Of link-boys vile, and watermen obscene; 109

 She oft had favour'd him, and favours yet.

 Nor heeds the brown dishonours of his face.

And now the victor stretch'd his eager hand
 Where the tall nothing stood, or seem'd to stand;
 A shapeless shade, it melted from his sight, 111
 Like forms in clouds, or visions of the night.
 To seize his papers, Curll, was next thy care;
 His papers, light, fly diverse, tost in air;

To me this instance seems unluckily chosen; if it be a satire on any body, it must on a bad paymaster, since the person to whom they have here applied it, was a man of fortune. So at first sight it may be seen; but be not deceived, reader; these also are not real persons. 'Tis true, Curll declares Breval, a captain, author of a piece called the Confederates; but the same Curll first said it was written by Joseph Gay: Is his second assertion to be credited any more than his first? He likewise affirms Bond to be one who writ a satire on our poet: But where is such a satire to be found? where was such a writer ever heard of? As for Befaleel, it carries forgery in the very name; nor is it, as the others are, a surname. Thou may'st depend upon it, no such authors ever lived; all phantoms. SCRIBL.

Ver. 138. Cook shall be Prior,] The man here specified writ a thing called The Battle of the Poets, in which Philips and Warton were the heroes, and Swift and Pope utterly routed. He also published some malevolent things in the British, London, and Daily Journals: and at the same time wrote letters to Mr. Pope, protesting his innocence. His chief work was a translation of

Ver. 138. and Concanen, Swift:] In the first edition of this poem there were only asterisks in this place, but the names were since inserted, merely to fill the verse, and give ease to the reader.

Ver. 140. And we too boast our Garth and Addison.] Nothing is more remarkable than our author's love of praising good writers. He has in this very poem celebrated Mr. Locke, Sir Isaac Newton, Dr. Barrow, Dr. Atterbury, Mr. Dryden, Mr. Congreve, Dr. Garth, Mr. Addison; in a word, almost every man of his time that deserved it; even Cibber himself (presuming him to be the author of the Careless Husband). It was very difficult to have that pleasure in a poem on this subject, yet he has found means to insert their panegyric, and has made even Dulness out of her own mouth to pronounce it. It must have been particularly agreeable to him to celebrate Dr. Garth; both as his constant friend, and as he was his predecessor in this kind of satire. The Dispensary attacked the whole body of Apothecaries, a much more useful one undoubtedly than that of the bad poets; if in truth this can be a body, of which no two members ever agreed. It also did, what Mr. Theobald says is unpardonable, draw in parts of private character, and introduced persons independent of his subject. Much more would Boileau have incurred his censure, who left all subjects whatever, on all occasions, to fall upon the bad poets (which, it is to be feared, would have been more immediately his concern.) But certainly next to commending good writers, the greatest service to learning is to expose the bad, who can only that way be made of any use to it. This truth is very well set forth in these lines addressed to our author.

“The craven rook, and pert jack-daw,
 “(Though neither birds of moral kind)
 “Yet serve, if hang'd, and stuff'd with straw,
 “To show us which way blows the wind.

“Thus dirty knaves, or chattering fools,
 “Strung up by dozens in thy lay,
 “Teach more by half than Dennis' rules,
 “And point instruction every way.

“With Egypt's art thy pen may strive:
 “One potent drop let this but shed,
 “And every rogue that stunk alive,
 “Becomes a precious mummy dead.”

Ver. 142. rueful length of face] “The decrepid person or figure of a man are no reflections upon his genius: An honest mind will love and esteem a man of worth, though he be deformed or poor. Yet the author of the Dunciad hath libelled a person for his rueful

REMARKS.

"length of face!" Mist's Journal, June 8. The genius and man of worth, whom an honest mind should love, is Mr. Curll. True it is, he stood on the pillory, an incident which will lengthen the face of any man, though it were ever so comely, therefore is no reflection on the natural beauty of Mr. Curll. But as to reflection on any man's face or figure, Mr. Dennis saith excellently; "Natural deformity comes not by our fault; it is often occasioned by calamities and diseases, which a man can no more help than a monster can his deformity. There is no one misfortune, and no one disease, but what all mankind are subject to.—But the deformity of this author is visible, present, lasting, unalterable, and peculiar to himself. 'Tis the mark of God and Nature upon him, to give us warning that we should hold no society with him, as a creature not of our original, nor of our species: and they who have refused to take this warning, which God and Nature has given them, and have, in spite of it, by a senseless presumption, ventured to be familiar with him, have severely suffered, &c. It is certain his original is not from Adam, but from the devil." &c.—Dennis, Character of Mr. P. 8vo. 1716.

Admirably it is observed by Mr. Dennis against Mr. Law, p. 33. "That the language of Billingsgate can never be the language of charity, nor consequently of Christianity." I should else be tempted to use the language of a critic; for what is more provoking to a commentator than to behold his author thus pourtray'd? Yet I consider it really hurts not him! whereas to call some others dull, might do them prejudice with a world too apt to believe it: Therefore, though Mr. D. may call another a little ass or a young toad, far be it from us to call him a toothless lion or an old serpent. Indeed, had I written these notes (as was once my intent) in the learned language, I might have given him the appellations of balatro, calceatum caput, scurra in trivis, being phrases in good esteem and frequent usage among the best learned: But in our mother-tongue, were I to tax any gentlemen of the Dunciad, surely it should be in words not to the vulgar intelligible; whereby Christian charity, decency, and good accord among authors, might be preserved. When that prince died in exile, he wrote an invective against his memory, occasioned by some humane elegies on his death. He lived to the time of Queen Anne.

Our good poet, (by the whole cast of his work being obliged not to take off the irony) where he could not show his indignation, hath shown his contempt, as much as possible; having here drawn as vile a picture as could be represented in the colours of epic poesy. Ibid. Eliza Haywood; this woman was authoress of those most scandalous books called the Court of Carimania, and the New Utopia. For the two babes of love, see Curll, Key, p. 22. But whatever reflection he is pleased to throw upon this lady, surely it was what from him she little deserved, who had celebrated Curll's undertakings for reformation of manners, and declared herself "to be so perfectly acquainted with the sweetness of his disposition, and that tenderness with which he considered the errors of his fellow-creatures; that, though she should find the little inadvertencies of her own life recorded in his papers, she was certain it would be done in such a manner as she could not but approve." Ver. 167. Osborne, Thomas] A bookseller in Gray's Inn, very well qualified by his impudence to act this part; therefore placed here instead of a less deserving predecessor. [Chapman, the publisher of Mrs. Haywood's New Utopia, &c.] This man published advertisements for a year together, pretending to sell Mr. Pope's Subscription books of Homer's Iliad at half the price: Of which book he had none, but cut to the size of them (which was quarto) the common books in folio, without copper-plates, on a worse paper, and never above half the value.

Upon this advertisement the Gazetteer harangued thus, July 6, 1739, "How melancholy must it be to a writer to be so unhappy as to see

 A second effort brought but new disgrace,
 The wild Meander wash'd the artist's face:
 Thus the small jet, which hasty hands unlock,
 Spirts in the gardener's eyes who turns the cock.
 Not so from shameless Curll; impetuous spread
 The stream, and smoking flourish'd o'er his head.
 So (fam'd like thee for turbulence and horns) 181

 His rapid waters in their passage burn.

REMARKS.

"his works hawked for sale in a manner so fatal to his fame! How, with honour to yourself, and justice to your subscribers, can this be done! What an ingratitude to be charged on the only honest poet that lived in 1738! and than whom virtue has not had a shriller trumpeter for many ages! That you were once generally admired and esteemed, can be denied by none; but that you and your works are now despised, is verified by this fact:" which being utterly false, did not indeed much humble the author, but drew this just chastisement on the bookseller.

Ver. 183. Through half the heavens he pours th' exalted urn;] In a manuscript Dunciad (where are some marginal corrections of some gentlemen some time deceased) I have found another reading of these lines: thus,

"And lifts his urn, through half the heavens to
 " flow;
 " His rapid waters in their passage glow."

This I cannot but think the right: For, first, though the difference between burn and glow may seem not very material to others, to me I confess the latter has an elegance, a je ne sçay quoy, which is much easier to be conceived than explained. Secondly, every reader of our poet must have observed how frequently he uses this word glow in other parts of his works: To instance only in his Homer:

- (1.) Iliad ix. ver. 726. With one resentment glows,
- (2.) Iliad xi. ver. 926. There the battle glows.
- (3.) Ibid. ver. 985. The closing flesh that instant ceas'd to glow.
- (4.) Iliad xii. ver. 45. Encompass'd Hector glows.
- (5.) Ibid. ver. 475. His beating breast with generous ardour glows.
- (6.) Iliad xvii. ver. 591. Another part glow'd with refulgent arms.
- (7.) Ibid. ver. 654. And curl'd on silver props in order glow.

ples, or I could stretch this catalogue to a great extent; but these are enough to prove his fondness for this beautiful word, which, therefore let all future editions replace here.

I am aware, after all, that burn is the proper word to convey an idea of what was said to be Mr. Curll's condition at this time: But from that very reason I infer the direct contrary. For surely every lover of our author will conclude he had more humanity than to insult a man on such a misfortune or calamity, which could never befall him purely by his own fault, but from an unhappy communication with another. This note is half Mr. Theobald, half SCRIBL.

and whose indefatigable muse produced no less than six epic poems: Prince and King Arthur, twenty books; Eliza, ten; Alfred, twelve; the Redeemer, six; besides Job, in folio; the whole book of Psalms; the Creation, seven books; Nature of Man, three books; and many more. It is in this sense he is styled afterwards the everlasting Blackmore. Notwithstanding all which, Mr. Gildon seems assured, "that this admirable author did
"not think himself upon the same foot with Ho-
"mer." Comp. Art of Poetry, vol. i. p. 108.

But how different is the judgment of the author of Characters of the Times? p. 25. who says,
"Sir Richard Blackmore is unfortunate in hap"pening to mistake his proper talents; and that "he has not for many years been so much as
"named, or even thought of among writers."—
Even Mr. Dennis differs greatly from his friend
Mr. Gildon: "Blackmore's action (saith he) has "neither unity, nor integrity, nor morality, nor
"universality; and consequently he can have no
"fable, and no heroic poem: His narration is
"neither probable, delightful, nor wonderful;
"his characters have none of the necessary quali-
"fications; the things contained in his narration
"are neither in their own nature delightful, nor "numerous enough, nor rightly disposed, nor "surprising, nor pathetic." Nay, he proceeds so far as to say Sir Richard has no genius; first laying down, that "genius is caused by a furious joy
"and pride of soul, on the conception of an ex"traordinary hint. Many men (says he) have "their hints, without these motions of fury and "pride of soul, because they want fire enough to "agitate their spirits; and these we call cold
"writers. Others who have a great deal of fire,
"but have not excellent organs, feel the fore-
"mentioned notions, without the extraordinary
"hints; and these we call fustian writers. But "he declares that Sir Richard had neither the "hints nor the motions." Remarks on Prince
Arthur, octavo, 1696. Preface.

Pope, accusing him in very high terms of profaneness and immorality (Essay on Polite Writing,

Curll, that he was author of a travestie on the first psalm. Mr. Dennis took up the same report, but with the addition of what Sir Richard had neglected, an argument to prove it; which being very curious, we shall here transcribe. "It was
"he who burlesqued the Psalms of David. It is evening of the Lord Mayor's day: The first book passed in that night; the next morning the games begin in the Strand, thence along Fleet-street (plac-

In his Essay on Criticism, and the Arts of Logic and Rhetoric, he frequently reflects on our author.
But the top of his character was a perverter of history, in that scandalous one of the Stuarts, in folio, and his Critical History of England, two volumes, 8vo. Being employed by Bishop Kennet in publishing the historians in his collection, he falsified Daniel's Chronicle in numberless places. Yet this very man, in the preface to the first of these books, advanced a particular fact, to charge three eminent persons of falsifying the Lord Clarendon's History; which fact has been disproved by Dr. Atterbury, late Bishop of Rochester, then the only survivor of them; and the particular part he pretended to be falsified, produced since, after almost ninety years, in that noble author's original manuscript. He was all his life a virulent party-writer for hire, and received his reward in a small place, which he enjoyed to his death.

He bears no tokens of the fabler streams,
 And mounts far off among the swans of Thames.
 True to the bottom, see Concanen creep,
 A cold, long-winded, native of the deep : 300
 If perseverance gain the diver's prize,
 Not everlasting Blackmore this denies :
 No noise, no stir, no motion canst thou make,
 Th' unconscious stream sleeps o'er thee like a lake.

 With each a sickly brother at his back :
 Sons of a day ! just buoyant on the flood,
 Then number'd with the puppies in the mud.

REMARKS.

Ver. 291. Next Smedley div'd.] In the surreptitious editions, this whole episode was applied to an initial letter E—, by whom, if they meant the laureat, nothing was more absurd, no part agreeing with his character. The allegory evidently demands a person dipped in scandal, and deeply immersed in dirty work ; whereas Mr. Eusden's writings rarely offended but by their length and multitude ; and accordingly are taxed of nothing else in book i. ver. 102. But the person here mentioned, an Irishman, was author and publisher of many scurrilous pieces, a weekly Whitehall Journal, in the year 1722, in the name of Sir James Baker ; and particularly whole volumes of Billingsgate against Dr. Swift and Mr. Pope, called Gulliveriana and Alexandriana, printed in 8vo, 1728.

Ver. 295. Then * * essay'd.] A gentleman of genius and spirit, who was secretly dipt in some papers of this kind, on whom our poet bestows a panegyric instead of a satire, as deserving to be better employed than in party-quarrels, and personal invectives.

Ver. 299 Concanen.] Matthew Concanen, an Irishman, bred to the law. Smedley (one of his brethren in enmity to Swift) in his Metamorphosis of Scriblerus, p. 7. accuses him of "having boasted of what he had not written, but others had revised and done for him." He was author of several dull and dead scurrilities in the British and London Journals, and in a paper called the Speculatist. In a pamphlet, called a Supplement to the Profound, he dealt very unfairly with our poet, not only frequently imputing to him Mr. Broome's verses (for which he might indeed seem in some degree accountable, having corrected what that gentleman did) but those of the Duke of Buckingham, and others : To this rare piece somebody humorously caused him to take for his motto, "De profundis clamavi." He was since a hired scribler in the Daily Courant, where he poured forth much Billingsgate against the Lord Bolingbroke, and others ; after which this man was surprisingly promoted to administer justice and law in Jamaica.

REMARKS.

Ver. 306, 307. With each a sickly brother at his back—Sons of a day, &c.] These were daily papers, a number of which, to lessen the expence, were printed one on the back of another.

Ver. 312. Osborne.] A name assumed by the eldest and gravest of these writers, who at last being ashamed of his pupils, gave his paper over, and in his age remained silent.

Ver. 314. Gazetteers.] We ought not to suppose that a modern critic here taxeth the poet with an anachronism, affirming these gazetteers not to have lived within the time of his poem, and challenging us to produce any such paper of that date. But we may with equal assurance assert these gazetteers not to have lived since, and challenge all the learned world to produce one such paper at this day. Surely, therefore, where the point is so obscure, our author ought not to be censured too rashly. SCRIBL.

Notwithstanding this affected ignorance of the good Scriblerus, the Daily Gazetteer was a title given very properly to certain papers, each of which lasted but a day. Into this, as a common sink, was received all the trash, which had been before dispersed in several journals, and circulated at the public expence of the nation. The authors were the same obscure men : though sometimes relieved by occasional essays from statesmen, courtiers, bishops, deans, and doctors. The meaner sort were rewarded with money ; others with places or benefices, from an hundred to a thousand a-year. It appears from the report of the secret committee for inquiring into the conduct of R. Earl of O. "That no less than fifty thousand seventy-seven pounds eighteen shillings, were paid to authors and printers of newspapers, such as Free Britons, Daily Courants, Corn Cutter's Journals, Gazetteers, and other political papers, between Feb. 10, 1731, and Feb. 10, 1741." Which shows the benevolence of one minister, to have expended, for the current dulness of ten years in Britain, double the sum which gained Louis XIV. so much honour, in annual pensions to learned men all over Europe. In which, and in a much longer time, not a pension at court, nor preferment in the church or universities, of any consideration, was bestowed on any man distinguished for his learning separately from party merit, or pamphlet-writing.

It is worth a reflection, that of all the panegyrics bestowed by these writers on this great minister, not one is at this day extant or remembered, not even so much credit done to his personal character by all they have written, as by one short occasional compliment of our author:

"Seen him I have; but in his happier hour
"Of social pleasure, ill exchange'd for power!
"Seen him, uncumber'd by the venal tribe,
"Smile without art, and win without a bribe."

Ver. 315. Arnall] WILLIAM ARNALL, bred an attorney, was a perfect genius in this sort of work. He began under twenty with furious party papers; then succeeded Concanen in the British Journal. At the first publication of the Dunciad, he prevailed on the author not to give him his due place in it, by a letter professing his detestation of such practices as his predecessors. But since, by the most unexampled insolence, and personal abuse of several great men, the poet's particular friends, he most amply deserved a niche in the Temple of Infamy: witness a paper, called the Free Briton, a dedication intitled. To the Genuine Blunderer, 1732, and many others. He writ for hire, and valued himself upon it; not indeed without cause, it appearing by the aforesaid REPORT, that he received "for Free Britons, and other writings, in "the space of four years, no less than ten thousand "nine hundred and ninety-seven pounds six shillings and eight-pence, out of the Treasury." But frequently, through his fury or folly, he exceeded all the bounds of his commission, and obliged his honourable patron to disavow his scurrilities.

Ver. 323. The plunging prelate, &c.] It having been invidiously insinuated that by this title was meant a truly great prelate, as respectable for his defence of the present balance of power in the civil constitution, as for his opposition to the scheme of no power at all, in the religious; I owe so much to the memory of my deceased friend as to declare, that when, a little before his death, I informed him of this insinuation, he called it vile and malicious, as any candid man, he said, might understand, by his having paid a willing compliment to this very prelate in another part of the poem.

REMARKS.

Ver. 255. Around him wide, &c.] It is to be hoped that the satire in these lines will be understood in the confined sense in which the author meant it, of such only of the clergy, who, though solemnly engaged in the service of religion, dedicate themselves for venal and corrupt ends to that of ministers or factions; and though educated under an entire ignorance of the world, aspire to interfere in the government of it, and consequently to disturb and disorder it; in which they fall short of their predecessors only by being invested with much less of that power and authority, which they employed indifferently (as is hinted at in the lines above) either in supporting arbitrary power, or in exciting rebellion; in canonizing the vices of tyrants, or in blackening the virtues of patriots; in corrupting religion by superstition, or betraying it by libertinism, as either was thought best to serve the ends of policy, or flatter the follies of the great.

Ver. 399. Toland and Tindal.] Two persons not so happy as to be obscure, who writ against the religion of their country. Toland, the author of the Atheist's Liturgy, called Pantheisticon, was a spy, in pay to Lord Oxford. Tindal was author of the rights of the Christian Church, and Christianity as old as the Creation. He also wrote an abusive pamphlet against Earl S— which was suppressed while yet in MS. by an eminent person, then out of the ministry, to whom he showed it, expecting his approbation: This Doctor afterwards published the same piece, mutatis mutandis, against that very person.

M. wrote with great zeal against the stage; Mr. Dennis answered with as great: Their books were printed in 1726. The same Mr. Law is author of a book, intituled, "An Appeal to all that doubt of, or disbelieve the truth of the Gospel;" in which he has detailed a system of the rankest spinozism, for the most exalted theology; and amongst other things as rare, has informed us of this, that Sir Isaac Newton stole the principles of his philosophy from one Jacob Behmen, a German cobbler.

Ver. 414. Morgan] A writer against religion, distinguished no otherwise from the rabble of his tribe, than by the pompousness of his title; for having stolen his morality from Tindal, and his philosophy from Spinoza, he calls himself, by the courtesy of England, a moral philosopher.

Ibid. BOOK III.

ARGUMENT.

After the other persons are disposed in their proper places of rest, the goddess transports the king to her temple, and there lays him to slumber with his head on her lap; a position of marvellous virtue, which causeth all the visions of wild enthusiasts, projectors, politicians, inamoratos, castle builders, chemists, and poets. He is immediately carried on the wings of fancy, and led by a mad poetical Sibyl, to the Elysian shade; where, on the banks of Lethe, the souls of the dull are dipped by Bavius, before their entrance into this world. There he is met by the ghost of Settle, and by him made acquainted with the wonders of the place, and with those which he himself is destined to perform. He takes him to a mount of vision, from whence he shows him the past triumphs of the empire of Dulness, then the present, and lastly the future: how small a part of the world was ever conquered by science, how soon those conquests were stopped, and those very nations again reduced to her dominion. Then distinguishing the island of Great Britain, shows by what aids, by what persons, and by what degrees, it shall be brought to her empire. Some of the persons he causes to pass in review before his eyes, describing each by his proper figure, character, and qualifications. On a sudden the scene shifts, and a vast number of miracles and prodigies appear, utterly surprising and unknown to the king himself, till they are explained to be the wonders of his own reign now commencing. On this subject Settle breaks into a congratulation, yet not unmixed with concern, that his own times were but the types of these. He prophesies how first the nation shall be over-run with farces, operas, and shows; how the throne of Dulness shall be advanced over the theatres, and set up even at court: then how her sons shall preside in the seats of arts and sciences: giving a glimpse, or Pisgah sight, of the future fulness of her glory, the accomplishment whereof is the subject of the fourth and last Book.

BUT in her temple's last recess enclos'd,
On Dulness' lap th' anointed head repos'd.
Him close she curtains round with vapours blue,
And soft besprinkles with Cimmerian dew,
Then raptures high the seat of sense o'erflow,
Which only heads refin'd from reason know.

REMARKS.

Ver. 5, 6, &c.] Hereby is intimated that the following vision is no more than the chimera of the dreamer's brain, and not a real or intended satire on the present age; doubtless more learned, more enlightened, and more abounding with great geniuses in divinity, politics, and whatever arts and sciences, than all the preceding. For fear of any such mistake of our poet's honest meaning, he hath again, at the end of the vision, repeated this monition, saying that it all passed through the ivory gate, which (according to the ancients) denoteth fallacy.

REMARKS.

How much the good Scriblerus was mistaken, may be seen from the fourth Book, which, it is plain from hence, he had never seen. BENTL.

Ver. 15. A slip-shod Sibyl] This allegory is extremely just, no conformation of the mind so much subjecting it to real madness, as that which produces real dulness. Hence we find the religious (as well as the poetical) enthusiasts of all ages were ever, in their natural state, most heavy and lumpish; but on the least application of heat, they run like lead, which of all metals falls quickest into fusion. Whereas fire in a genius is truly Promethean, it hurts not its constituent parts, but only fits it (as it does well-tempered steel) for the necessary impressions of art. But the common people have been taught (I do not know on what foundation) to regard lunacy as a mark of wit, just as the Turks and our modern Methodists do of holiness. But if the cause of madness assigned by a great philosopher be true, it will unavoidably fall upon the dunces. He supposes it to be the dwelling over long on one object or idea: Now as this attention is occasioned either by grief or study, it will be fixed by dulness; which hath not quickness enough to comprehend what it seeks, nor force and vigour enough to divert the imagination from the object it laments.

Ver. 19. Taylor,] John Taylor, the Water-poet, an honest man, who owns he learned not so much as the accident: A rare example of modesty in a Poet!

"And never scarce did learn my accident;
"For having got from possum to posset,
"I there was gravell'd, could no farther get."

bad poets, as may be seen from many dedications of Quarles and others to him. Some of these anagramed his name Benlowes into Benevolus: to verify which, he spent his whole estate upon them.

Ver. 22. And Shadwell nods the poppy, &c.] Shadwell took opium for many years; and died of too large a dose, in the year 1692.

Ver. 24. Ver. 34. Ward in Pillory.] John Ward of Hackney, Esq. Member of Parliament, being convicted of forgery, was first expelled the House, and then sentenced to the pillory on the 17th of February 1727. Mr Curll (having likewise stood there) looks upon the mention of such a gentleman in a satire, as a great act of barbarity, Key to the Dunc. 3d edit. p. 16. And another author reasons thus upon it. Durgin, 8vo. p. 11, 12. "How unworthy is it of Christian charity to animate the rabble to abuse a worthy man in such a situation? What could move the poet thus to mention a brave sufferer, a gallant prisoner, exposed to the view of all mankind! It was laying aside his senses, it was committing a crime for which the law is deficient not to punish him! nay, a crime which man can scarce forgive, or time efface! nothing surely could have induced him to it but being bribed by a great lady," &c. (to whom this brave, honest, worthy gentleman was guilty of no offence but forgery, proved in open court). But it is evident, this verse could not be meant of him; it being notorious, that no eggs were thrown at that gentleman. Perhaps therefore it might be intended of Mr. Edward Ward the poet, when he stood there.

Ver. 36. and length of ears.] This is a sophisticated reading. I think I may venture to affirm all the copyists are mistaken here : I believe I may say the same of the critics; Dennis, Oldmixon, Welsted, have passed it in silence. I have also stumbled at it, and wondered how an error so manifest could escape such accurate persons. I dare assert, it proceedeth originally from the inadvertency of some transcriber, whose head ran on the pillory, mentioned two lines before; it is therefore amazing that Mr. Carll himself should overlook it ! Yet that scholiast takes not the least notice hereof. That the learned Mist also read it thus, is plain from his ranging this passage among those in which our author was blamed for personal satire on a man's face (whereof doubtless he might take the ear to be a part); so likewise Concanen, Ralsh, the Flying Post, and all the herd of commentators.—Tota armenta sequuntur.

A very little sagacity (which all these gentlemen therefore wanted) will restore to us the true sense of the poet thus :

By his broad shoulders known, and length of years.

See how easy a change; of one single letter ! That Mr. Settle was old, is most certain; but he was (happily) a stranger to the pillory. This note partly Mr. THEOBALD's, partly SCRIBL.

Ver. 37. Settle] Elkanah Settle was once a writer in vogue as well as Cibber, both for dramatic poetry and politics. Mr. Dennis tells us, that "he was a formidable rival to Mr. Dryden," and that in the University of Cambridge there "were those who gave him the preference." Mr. Welsted goes yet farther in his behalf: "Poor Settle was formerly the mighty rival of Dryden; nay, for many years, bore his reputation above him." Pref. to his Poems, 8vo. p. 31. And Mr. Milbourne cried out, "How little was Dryden able, even when his blood ran high, to defend himself against Mr. Settle!" Notes on Dryd. Virg. p. 175. These are comfortable opinions; and no wonder some authors indulge them.

He was author or publisher of many noted pamphlets in the time of King Charles II. He answered all Dryden's political poems! and being cried up on one side, succeeded not a little in his tragedy of the Empress of Morocco [the first that was ever printed with cuts]. "Upon this he grew insolent, the wits writ against his play, he replied, and the town judged he had the better. In short, Settle was then thought a very formidable rival to Mr. Dryden; and not only the town, but the University of Cambridge was divided which to prefer; and in both places the younger sort inclined to Elkanah." Dennis, Pref. to Rem. on Hom.

All as the vest, appear'd the wearer's frame,
Old in new state, another yet the same.

Bland and familiar as in life, begun

Thus the great father to the greater son :

Oh born to see what none can see awake !

Behold the wonders of th' oblivious lake.

Thou, yet unborn, hast touch'd this sacred shore ;

The hand of Bavius drench'd thee o'er and o'er.

But blind to former, as to future fate,

What mortal knows his pre-existent state ?

Who knows how long thy transmigrating soul

Might from Bæotian to Bæotian roll !

How many Dutchmen she vouchsaf'd to thrid ?

How many stages through old monks she rid ?

And all who since, in wild benighted days,

Mix'd the owl's ivy with the poet's bays.

As man's meanders to the vital spring

Roll all their tides, then back their circles bring ;

Or whirligigs, twirl'd round by skilful swain,

Suck the thread in, then yield it out again :

All nonsense thus, of old or modern date,

Shall, in the centre, from thee circulate.

For this, our queen unfolds to vision true

Thy mental eye, for thou hast much to view :

Old scenes of glory, times long cast behind,

Shall, first recall'd, rush forward to thy mind :

Then stretch thy sight o'er all her rising reign,

And let the past and future fire thy brain.

Ascend this hill, whose cloudy point commands
Her boundless empire over seas and lands.

See, round the Poles where keener spangles shine,

Where spices smoke beneath the burning line, 70

(Earth's wide extremes) her sable flag display'd,

And all the nations cover'd in her shade !

Far eastward cast thine eye, from whence the sun

And orient science their bright course begun :

One godlike monarch all that pride confounds,

He, whose long wall the wandering Tartar bounds;

VARIATIONS.

Ver. 73. in the former ed.

Far eastward cast thine eye, from whence the sun
And orient science at a birth begun.

But as this was thought to contradict that line of the introduction,

In eldest times, ere mortals writ or read,

which supposes the sun and science did not set out together, it was altered to "their bright course begun." But this slip, as usual, escaped the gentlemen of the Dunciad.

REMARKS.

Ver. 50. Might from Bæotian, &c.] Bæotia lay under the ridicule of the wits formerly, as Ireland does now; though it produced one of the greatest poets, and one of the greatest general of Greece :

"Bæotum crasso jurares acre natum." Horat.

Ver. 75. Chi Ho-am-ti Emperor of China, the same who built the great wall between China and Tartary, destroyed all the books and learned men of that empire.

Heavens! what a pile! whole ages perish there,
And one bright blaze turns Learning into air.

Thence to the south extend thy gladden'd eyes;
There rival flames with equal glory rise, 80
From shelves to shelves see greedy Vulcan roll,
And lick up all their physic of the soul.

How little, mark! that portion of the ball,
Where, faint at best, the beams of science fall:
Soon as they dawn, from Hyperborean skies
Embody'd dark, what clouds of Vandals rise!
Lo! where Mæotis sleeps, and hardly flows
The freezing Tanais through a waste of snows,
The north by myriads pours her mighty sons,
Great nurse of Goths, of Alans, and of Huns! 90
See Alaric's stern port! the martial frame
Of Genferic; and Attila's dread name!
See, the bold Ostrogoths on Latium fall;
See, the fierce Visigoths on Spain and Gaul!
See, where the morning gilds the palmy shore
(The soil that arts and infant letters bore)
His conquering tribes th' Arabian prophet draws,
And saving Ignorance enthrones by laws.
See Christians, Jews, one heavy Sabbath keep,
And all the western world believe and sleep. 100

Lo! Rome herself, proud mistress now no more
Of arts, but thundering against heathen lore;
Her gray-hair'd synods damning brooks unread,
And Bacon trembling for his brazen head.
Padua, with sighs, beholds her Livy burn,
And even th' Antipodes Virgilius mourn.

Ver. 102. thundering against heathen lore.] A strong instance of this pious rage is placed to Pope Gregory's account. John of Salisbury gives a very odd encomium of this pope, at the same time that he mentions one of the strangest effects of this excess of zeal in him: "Doct̃ sanctissimus ille Gregorius, qui melleo prædicationis imbre totam rigavit et inebriavit ecclesiam; non modo Mathesin jussit ab aula, sed, ut traditur, a majoribus, incendio dedit probatæ lectionis scripta, Palatinus quæcunque tenebat Apollo." And in another place: "Fertur beatus Gregorius bibliothecam combussisse gentilem; quo divinæ paginæ gratior esset locus, et major, autoritas, et diligenter studioſor." Desiderius, Archbishop of Vienna, was sharply reproved by him for teaching grammar and literature, and explaining the poets; because (says this Pope) "In uno se ore cum Jovis laudibus Christi laudes non capiunt: Et quam grave nefandumque sit Episcopis canere quod nec Laico religioso conveniat, ipse considera." He is said, among the rest, to have burned Livy; "Quia in superstitionibus et sacris Romanorum

And see, my son! the hour is on its way,
That lifts our goddess to imperial sway;
This favourite isle, long sever'd from her reign,
Dove-like she gathers to her wings again.
Now look through Fate! behold the scene she draws!

See all her progeny, illustrious fight!
Behold, and count them, as they rise to light. 130

REMARKS.

"perpetuo versatur." The same pope is accused by Vossius, and others, of having caused the noble monuments of the old Roman magnificence to be destroyed, lest those who came to Rome should give more attention to triumphal arches, &c. than to holy things. Bayle, Dict.

Ver. 109. Till Peter's keys some christen'd Jove adorn,] After the government of Rome devolved to the popes, their zeal was for some time exerted in demolishing the heathen temples and statues, so that the Goths scarce destroyed more monuments of antiquity out of rage, than these out of devotion. At length they spared some of the temples, by converting them to churches; and some of the statues, by modifying them into images of saints. In much later times, it was thought necessary to change the statues of Apollo and Pallas, on the tomb of Sannazarius, into David and Judith; the lyre easily became a harp, and the Gorgon's head turned to that of Holofernes.

But as this revolution is only here set on foot by the first of these classes, the poets, they only are here particularly celebrated, and they only properly fall under the care and review of this colleague of dulness, the laureat. The others, who finish the great work, are reserved for the fourth book, where the Goddess herself appears in full glory.

As Berecynthia, while her offspring vie
In homage to the mother of the sky,
Surveys around her, in the blest abode,
An hundred sons, and every son a God:
Not with less glory mighty Dulness crown'd

And modest as the maid that sips alone;
From the strong fate of drams if thou get free,
Another d'Urfey, Ward shall sing in thee.

There may seem some error in these verses, Mr.

Mr. Dennis argues the same way. "My "minds of all sensible men, Mr. P. repented, and

"my two volumes of Letters." Ibid. p. 80. We should hence believe, the name of Mr. Dennis hath also crept into this poem by some mistake.
But from hence, gentle reader! thou may'st beware, when thou givest thy money to such authors, not to flatter thyself that thy motives are good-nature, or charity.

Ver. 152. Horneck and Roome] These two were virulent party-writers, worthily coupled together, and one would think prophetically, since,
after the publishing of this piece, the former dying,
the latter succeeded him in honour and employment. The first was Philip Horneck, author of a Billingsgate paper called the High German Doctor. Edward Roome was son of an undertaker for funerals in Fleet-street, and writ some of the papers called Pasquin, where, by malicious innuendoes, he endeavoured to represent our author guilty of malevolent practices with a great man then under prosecution of Parliament. Of this man was made the following epigram:

"You ask why Roome diverts you with his jokes,
"Yet if he writes, as dull as other folks!
"You wonder at it—This, Sir, is the case,
"The jest is lost unless he prints his face."

P—le was the author of some vile plays and pamphlets. He published abuses on our author in a paper called the Prompter.

Ver. 153. Goode,] an ill natured critic, who writ a satire on our author, called The Mock Æ-sop, and many anonymous libels in newspapers for

Ver. 165. Ralph] James Ralph, a name inserted after the first editions, not known to our author till he writ a swearing piece called Sawney, very abusive of Dr. Swift, Mr. Gay, and himself. These lines allude to a thing of his, intitled Night, a poem. This low writer attended his own works with panegyrics in the Journals, and once in particular praised himself highly above Mr. Addison, in wretched remarks upon that author's Account of English Poets, printed in a London Journal, Sept. 1728. He was wholly illiterate, and knew no language, not even French. Being advised to read the rules of dramatic poetry before he began a play, he smiled and replied, "Shakespeare writ
"without rules." He ended at last in the common sink of all such writers, a political newspaper, to which he was recommended by his friend
Arnal, and received a small pittance for pay.

Ver. 168. Morris,] Besaleel. See book ii.

Ver. 169. Flow, Wellsted, &c.] Of this author see the remark on book ii. v. 209. But (to be impartial) add to it the following different character of him.

Mr. Wellsted had, in his youth raised so great expectations of his future genius, that there was a kind of struggle between the most eminent of the two Universities, which should have the honour of his education. To compound this he (civilly) became a member of both, and after having passed some time at the one, he removed to the other.
From thence he returned to town, where he became the darling expectation of all the polite writers, whose encouragement he acknowledged in his occasional poems, in a manner that will make no small part of the fame of his protectors.
It also appears from his works, that he was happy in the patronage of the most illustrious characters of the present age—Encouraged by such a combination in his favour, he—published a book of poems, some in the Ovidian, some in the Horatian manner; in both which the most exquisite

So sweetly mawkish, and so smoothly dull;
Heady, not strong; o'erflowing, though not full.

Divides a friendship long confirm'd by age?

But fool with fool is barbarous civil war.
Embrace, embrace, my sons! be foes no more!
Nor glad vile poets with true critics gore.

judges pronounce he even rivalled his masters—
His love-verses have rescued that way of writing from contempt—In his translations, he has given us the very soul and spirit of his author. His Ode—his Epistle—his Verses—his Love-tale—all,
are the most perfect things in all poetry Wellsted of himself, Char. of the Times, 8vo, 1728, page 23, 24. It should not be forgot for his honour, that he received at one time the sum of five hundred pounds for secret service, among the other excellent authors hired to write anonymously for the ministry. See Report of the Secret Committee, &c. in 1742.

Ver. 173. Ah Dennis! Gildon ah!] These men became the public scorn by a mere mistake of their talents. They would needs turn critics of their own country writers (just as Aristotle and Longinus did of theirs) and discourse upon the beauties and defects of composition:

How parts relate to parts, and they to whole;
The body's harmony, the beaming soul.

Whereas had they followed the example of those microscopes of wit, Kuster, Burman, and their followers, in verbal criticism on the learned languages, their acuteness and industry might have raised them a name equal to the most famous of the scholiasts. We cannot therefore but lament the late apostacy of the Prebendary of Rochester, who beginning in so good a train, has now turned short to write comments on the Fire-side, and Dreams upon Shakespeare; where we find the spirit of Oldmixon, Gildon, and Dennis, all revived in his belaboured observations. SCRIBL.

Here Scriblerus, in this affair of the Fire-side, I want thy usual candour. It is true, Mr Upton did write notes upon it, but with all the honour and good faith in the world. He took it to be a panegyric on his patron. This it is to have to do with wits; a commerce unworthy a scholiast of so solid learning. ARIST.

Ver. 173, Ah, Dennis, &c.] The reader, who has seen, through the course of these notes, what a constant attendance Mr. Dennis paid to our author and all his works, may perhaps wonder he should be mentioned but twice, and so slightly touched, in this poem. But in truth he looked upon him

Equal in wit, and equally polite,
Shall this a Pasquin, that a Grumbler write;
Like are their merits, like rewards they share,
That shines a Consul, this Commissioner.

with some esteem, for having (more generously than all the rest) set his name to such writings. He was also a very old man at this time. By his own account of himself, in Mr. Jacob's Lives, he must have been above threescore, and happily lived many years after. So that he was senior to Mr. d'Urfey, who hitherto of all our poets enjoyed the longest bodily life.

Ver. 179. Behold yon pair, &c.] One of these was author of a weekly paper called the Grumbler, as the other was concerned in another called Pasquin, in which Mr. Pope was abused with the Duke of Buckingham, and Bishop of Rochester. They also joined in a piece against his first undertaking to translate the Iliad, intituled, Homerides, by Sir Iliad Doggrel, printed 1715.

Of the other works of these gentlemen the world has heard no more, than it would of Mr. Pope's, had their united laudable endeavours discouraged him from pursuing his studies. How few good works had ever appeared (since men of true merit are always the least presuming) had there been always such champions to stifle them in their conception? And were it not better for the public, that a million of monsters should come into the world, which are sure to die as soon as born, than that the serpents should strangle one Hercules in his cradle?

The union of these two authors gave occasion to this epigram:

"Burnet and Ducket, friends in spite,
Came hissing out in verse;
Both were so forward, each would write,
So dull, each hang an a——
Thus Amphibœna (I have read)
At either end affails;
None knows which leads or which is led,
For both heads are but tails."

After many editions of this poem, the author thought fit to omit the names of these two persons, whose injury to him was of so old a date.

Ver. 184. That shines a Consul, this Commissioner.] Such places were given at this time to such sort of writers.

Ver. 187 myster wight,] Uncouth mortal.

Ver. 188 Wormius hight.] Let not this name, purely fictitious, be conceited to mean the learned Olaus Wormius, much less (as it was unwarrantably foisted into the surreptitious editions) our own antiquary, Mr. Thomas Hearne, who had no way aggrieved our poet, but on the contrary published many curious tracts which he hath to his great contentment perused.

Ver. 192. Wits, who, like owls, &c.] These few lines exactly describe the right verbal critic: the darker his author is, the better he is pleased; like the famous quack doctor, who put up in his bills, he delighted in matters of difficulty. Somebody said well of these men, that their heads were libraries out of order.

Ver. 199. lo! Henley stands, &c.] J. Henley the orator; he preached on the Sundays upon Theological matters, and on the Wednesdays upon all other sciences. Each auditor paid one shilling. He declaimed some years against the greatest persons, and occasionally did our author that honour. WELSTED, in Oratory Transactions, N. 1. published by Henley himself, gives the following account of him: "He was born at Melton-Mowbray in Leicestershire. From his own parish school he went to St. John's College in Cambridge. He began there to be uneasy; for it shocked him to find he was commanded to believe against his own judgment in points of religion, philosophy, &c. for his genius leading him freely to dispute all propositions, and call all points to account, he was impatient under those fetters of the free-born mind.—Being admitted to Priest's orders, he found the examination very short and superficial, and that it was not necessary to conform to the Christian religion, in order either to deaconship or priesthood." He came to town, and, after having for some years been a writer for booksellers, he had an ambition to be so for ministers of state. The only reason he did not rise in the church, we are told, "was the envy of others, and a disrelish entertained of him, because he was not qualified to be a complete Spaniel." However, he offered the service of his pen to two great men, of opinions and interests directly opposite; by both of whom being rejected, he set up a new project, and styled himself the Restorer of ancient Eloquence. He thought "it as lawful to take a license from the king and parliament in our place,

There (says his friend) he had the assurance to form a plan, which no mortal ever thought of; he had success against all opposition; challenged his adversaries to fair disputations, and none would dispute with him; writ, read, and studied twelve hours a day; composed three dissertations a-week on all subjects; undertook to teach in one year what schools and universities teach in five; was not terrified by menaces, insults, or satires, but still proceeded, matured his bold scheme, and put the church, and all that in danger." WELSTED, Narrative in Orat. Transact. N. I.

After having stood some prosecutions, he turned his rhetoric to buffoonry upon all public and private occurrences. All this passed in the same room; where sometimes he broke jests, and sometimes that bread which he called the Primitive Eucharist.—This wonderful person struck medals, which he dispersed as tickets to his subscribers: the device a star rising to the meridian, with this motto, AD SUMMA; and below INVENIAM VIAM AUT FACIAM. Hear with what honest plainness he treateth our great Geometer. "As to mathematical demonstration (saith he), founded upon the proportions of lines and circles to each other, and the ringing of changes upon figures, these have no more to do with the greatest part of philosophy, than they have with the Man in the Moon. Indeed, the zeal for this sort of gibberish [mathematical principles] is greatly abated of late: and though it is now upwards of twenty years that the Dagon of modern philosophers, Sir ISAAC NEWTON, has lain with his face upon the ground before the ark of God, Scripture philosophy; for so long MOSES's PRINCIPIA have been published; and the Treatise of Power Essential and Mechanical, in which Sir Isaac Newton's philosophy is treated with the utmost CONTEMPT, has been published a dozen years; yet is there not one of the whole society who hath had the COURAGE to attempt to raise him up. And so let him lie."—The philosophical principles of Moses asserted, &c. p. 2. by JULIUS BATE, A. M. Chaplain to the Right Honourable the Earl of Harrington. London, 1744, octavo. SERIEL.

Ver. 224. But, "Learn ye Dunces! not to scorn your God." The hardest lesson a dunce can learn. For being bred to scorn what he does not understand, that which he understands least he will be apt to scorn most. Of which, to the disgrace of all government, and (in the poet's opinion) even of that of DULNESS herself, we have had a late example in a book intituled, Philosophical Essays concerning human Understanding.

Ver. 224.—not to scorn your God." See this subject pursued in Book iv.

Thus he, for then a ray of reason stole
Half through the solid darkness of his soul;
But soon the cloud return'd—and thus the fire:
See now, what Dulness and her sons admire!
See what the charms, that smite the simple heart
Not touch'd by nature, and not reach'd by art. 230

His never-blushing head he turn'd aside
(Not half so pleas'd when Goodman prophesy'd);
And look'd, and saw a fable forcerer rise,
Swift to whose hand a winged volume flies:
All sudden, gorgons hiss, and dragons glare,
And ten-horn'd fiends and giants rush to war.
Hell rises, heaven descends, and dance on earth?
Gods, imps, and monsters, music, rage and mirth,
A fire, a jig, a battle, and a ball,
Till one wide conflagration swallows all. 240

Thence a new world, to nature's laws unknown,
Breaks out refulgent, with a heaven its own;
Another Cynthia her new journey runs,
And other planets circle other suns.
The forests dance, the rivers upward rise,
Whales sport in woods, and dolphins in the skies;
And last, to give the whole creation grace,
Lo! one vast egg produces human race.

Joy fills his soul, joy innocent of thought;
What power, he cries, what power these wonders
wrought? 250

Son; what thou seek'st is in thee! Look, and find
Each monster meets his likeness in thy mind.
Yet would'st thou more! In yonder cloud behold,
Whose farfetched skirts are edg'd with flaming gold,
A matchless youth! his nod these worlds controuls,
Wings the red lightning, and the thunder rolls.

REMARKS.

Ver. 232. (Not half so pleas'd, when Goodman prophesy'd.)] Mr. Cibber tells us, in his Life, p. 149. that Goodman being at the rehearsal of a play, in which he had a part, clapped him on the shoulder, and cried, "If he does not make a good actor, I'll be d—d.—And (says Mr. Cibber) I make it a question, whether Alexander himself, or Charles the twelfth of Sweden, when at the head of their first victorious armies, could feel a greater transport in their bosoms than I did in mine."

Ver. 233. a fable forcerer] Dr. Faustus, the subject of a set of Farces, which lasted in vogue two or three seasons, in which both playhouses strove to outdo each other for some years. Ver. 237. Hell rises, Heaven descends, and dance on earth:] This monstrous absurdity was actually represented in Tibbald's Rape of Proserpine.

"Then sprung forth that succession of monstrous medleys that have so long infested the stage, which arose upon one another alternately at both houses, outvying each other in expence." He then proceeds to excuse his own part of them, as follows: "If I am asked why I assented? I have no better excuse for my error than to confess I did it against my conscience, and had not virtue enough to starve. Had Henry IV. of France a better for changing his religion? I was still in my heart, as much as he could be, on the side of truth and sense."

 he answers Noman: whereupon they all go away

The author only seems to lament, that he was employed in translation at all."

Benson* (Surveyor of the buildings to his Majesty King George I.) gave in a report to the lords, that their house and the Painted-chamber adjoining were in immediate danger of falling. Whereupon the lords met in a committee to appoint some other place to sit in, while the house should be taken down. But it being proposed to cause some other builders first to inspect it, they found it in very good condition. The lords, upon this, were going upon an address to the king against Benson, for such a misrepresentation; but the Earl of Sunderland, then secretary, gave them assurance that his Majesty would remove him, which was done accordingly. In favour of this man, the famous Sir Christopher Wren, who had been architect to the Crown for above fifty years, who built most of the churches in London, laid the first stone of St. Paul's, and lived to finish it, had been displaced from his employment at the age of near ninety years.

Ver. 326. Ambrose Philips.] "He was (saith Mr. Jacob) one of the wits at Button's, and a justice of the peace." But he hath since met with higher preferment in Ireland: and a much greater character we have of him in Mr. Gildon's Complete Art of Poetry, vol. i. p. 157. "Indeed, he confesses, he dares not set him quite on the same foot with Virgil, lest it should seem flattery; but he is much mistaken if posterity does not afford him a greater esteem than he at present enjoys." He endeavoured to create some misunderstanding between our author and Mr. Addison, whom also, soon after, he abused as much. His constant cry was, that Mr. P. was an enemy to the government; and in particular, he was the avowed author of a report very industriously spread, that he had a hand in a party-paper, called the Examiner; a falsehood well known to those yet living, who had the direction and publication of it.

Ver. 328. While Jones' and Boyle's united labours fall.] At the time when this poem was written, the banquetting-house of Whitehall, the church and piazza of Covent-garden, and the palace and chapel of Somerset-house, the works of the famous Inigo Jones, had been for many years so neglected, as to be in danger of ruin. The portico of Covent-garden church had been just then restored and beautified at the expence of the Earl of Burlington; who, at the same time, by his publication of the designs of that great master and Palladio, as well as by many noble buildings of his own, revived the true taste of architecture in this kingdom.

author, which continued to his death. He wrote several works of humour, with great success; the Shepherd's Week, Trivia, the What d'ye call it, Fables; and lastly, the celebrated Beggar's Opera; a piece of satire which hit all tastes and degrees of men, from those of the highest quality to the very rabble: that verse of Horace:

could never be so justly applied as to this. The vast success of it was unprecedented, and almost incredible: what is related of the wonderful effects of the ancient music or tragedy, hardly came up to it: Sophocles and Euripides were less followed and famous. It was acted in London sixty-three days, uninterrupted; and renewed the next season with equal applauses. It spread into all the great towns of England; was played in many places to the thirtieth and fortieth time, and at Bath and Bristol fifty, &c. It made its progress into Wales, Scotland, and Ireland, where it was performed twenty-four days together: it was last acted in Minorca. The fame of it was not confined to the author; the ladies carried about with them the favourite songs of it in fans; and houses were furnished with it in screens. The person who acted

Polly, till then obscure, became all at once the favourite of the town; her pictures were engraved, and sold in great numbers; her life written; books of letters and verses to her published; and pamphlets made even of her sayings and jests.

Furthermore, it drove out of England, for that season, the Italian opera, which had carried all before it for ten years. That idol of the nobility and people, which the great critic, Mr. Dennis, by the labours and outcries of a whole life could not overthrow, was demolished by a single stroke of this gentleman's pen. This happened in the year 1728. Yet so great was his modesty, that he constantly prefixed to all the editions of it this motto, "Nes hæc novimus esse nihil."

Ver. 332. And Pope's ten years to comment and translate.] The author here plainly laments that he was so long employed in translating and commenting. He began the Iliad in 1713, and finished it in 1719. The edition of Shakspeare (which he undertook merely because no body else would) took up near two years more in the drudgery of comparing impressions, rectifying the scenery, &c.; and the translation of half the Odyssey employed him from that time to 1725.

Ver. 333. Proceed, great days! &c.] It may perhaps seem incredible, that so great a revolution in learning, as is here prophesied, should be brought about by such weak instruments as have been [hitherto] described in our poem: But do not thou, gentle reader, rest too secure in thy contempt of these instruments. Remember what the Dutch stories somewhere relate, that a great part of their provinces was once overflowed, by a small opening made in one of their dykes by a single water-rat.

However, that such is not seriously the judgment of our poet, but that he conceiveth better hopes from the diligence of our schools, from the regularity of our universities, the discernment of our great men, the accomplishments of our nobility, the encouragement of our patrons, and the genius of our writers of all kinds (notwithstanding some few exceptions in each), may plainly be seen from his conclusion; where, causing all this vision to pass through the ivory gate, he expressly, in the language of poetry, declares all such imaginations to be wild, ungrounded, and fictitious. SCRIBL.

BOOK IV.

ARGUMENT.

The poet being, in this book, to declare the completion of the prophecies mentioned at the end of the former, makes a new invocation; as the greater poets are wont, when some high and worthy matter is to be sung. He shows the goddess coming in her majesty, to destroy Order and Science, and to substitute the kingdom of the

Dull upon earth. How she leads captive the Sciences, and silences the Muses; and what they be who succeed in their stead. All her children, by a wonderful attraction, are drawn about her; and bear along with them divers others, who promote her empire by connivance, weak resistance, or discouragement of arts; such as half wits, tasteless admirers, vain pretenders, the flatterers of dunces, or the patrons of them. All these crowd round her; one of them offering to approach her, is driven back by a rival, but she commends and encourages both. The first who speak in form, are the geniuses of the schools, who assure her of their care to advance her cause, by confining youth to words, and keeping them out of the way of real knowledge. Their address, and her gracious answer; with her charge to them and the universities. The universities appear by their proper deputies; and assure her that the same method is observed in the progress of education. The speech of Aristarchus on this subject. They are driven off by a band of young gentlemen returned from travel with their tutors; one of whom delivers to the goddess in a polite oration, an account of the whole conduct and fruits of their travels: presenting to her at the same time a young nobleman perfectly accomplished. She receives him graciously, and endues him with the happy quality of want of shame. She sees loitering about her a number of indolent persons abandoning all business and duty, and dying with laziness: to these approaches the antiquary Annius, entreating her to make them virtuosos, and assign them over to him: but Mummius, another antiquary, complaining of his fraudulent proceeding, she finds a method to reconcile their difference. Then enter a troop of people fantastically adorned, offering her strange and exotic presents: among them, one stands forth and demands justice on another, who had deprived him of one of the greatest curiosities in nature; but he justifies himself so well, that the goddess gives them both her approbation. She recommends to them to find proper employment for the indolents before-mentioned, in the study of butterflies, shells, birds nests, moss, &c. but with particular caution, not to proceed beyond trifles, to any useful or extensive views of nature, or of the Author of nature. Against the last of these apprehensions, she is secured by a hearty address from the minute philosophers and free-thinkers, one of whom speaks in the name of the rest. The youth, thus instructed and principled, are delivered to her in a body, by the hands of Silenus; and then admitted to taste the cup of the Magus her high-priest, which causes a total oblivion of all obligations, divine, civil, moral, or rational. To these her adepts she sends priests, attendants, and comforters, of various kinds; confers on them orders and degrees; and then dismissing them with a speech, confirming to each his privileges, and telling what she expects from each, concludes with a yawn of extraordinary virtue: the progress and effects whereof on all orders of men, and the consummation of all, in the restoration of Night and Chaos, conclude the poem.

YET, yet a moment, one dim ray of light
Indulge, dread Chaos, and eternal Night!
Of darkness visible so much be lent,
As half to show, half veil the deep intent.
Ye powers! whose mysteries restor'd I sing,
To whom Time bears me on his rapid wing,
Suspend a while your force inertly strong,
Then take at once the poet and the song.

Now flam'd the dog-star's unpropitious ray,
Smote every brain, and wither'd every bay;
Sick was the sun, the owl forsook his bower,
The moon-struck prophet felt the madding hour:
Then rose the seed of Chaos, and of Night,
To blot out Order, and extinguish Light,
Of dull and venal a new world to mold,
And bring Saturnian days of lead and gold.

She mounts the throne; her head a cloud conceal'd,
In broad effulgence all below reveal'd,

REMARKS.

The Dunciad, Book IV.] This book may properly be distinguished from the former, by the name of the Greater Dunciad; not so indeed in size, but in subject; and so far contrary to the distinction anciently made of the Greater and Lesser Iliad. But much are they mistaken who imagine this work in anywise inferior to the former, or of any other hand than of our poet; of which I am much more certain than that the Iliad itself was the work of Solomon, or the Batrachomyomachia of Homer, as Barnes hath affirmed.

BENT.

Ver. 1, &c.] This is an invocation of much piety. The poet, willing to approve himself a genuine son, beginneth by showing (what is ever agreeable to Dulness) his high respect for antiquity and a great family, how dead or dark soever: Next declareth his passion for explaining mysteries; and, lastly, his impatience to be re-united to her.

Ver. 16. Lead and gold.] i. e. dull and venal

Ver. 20. her laureate son reclines.] With great judgment it is imagined by the poet, that such a colleague as Dulness had elected, should sleep on the throne, and have very little share in the action of the poem. Accordingly he hath done little or nothing from the day of his anointing; having past through the second book without taking part in any thing that was transacted about him; and through the third in profound sleep. Nor ought this, well considered, to seem strange in our days, when so many kings consort have done the like.

SCRIBL.

This verse our excellent laureate took so to heart, that he appealed to all mankind, "if he was not as seldom asleep as any fool." But it is hoped the poet hath not injured him, but rather verified his prophecy (p. 243 of his own Life, 8vo, ch. ix.) where he says, "the reader will be as much pleased to find me a dunce in my old age, as he was to prove me a brisk blockhead in my youth." Wherever there was any room for briskness, or alacrity of any sort, even in sinking, he hath had it allowed; but here, where there is nothing for him to do but to take his natural rest, he must permit his historian to be silent. It is from their actions only that princes have their character, and poets from their works: And if in those he be as much asleep as any fool, the poet must leave him and them to sleep to all eternity.

BENTL.

For he considers that my face is more known than most in the nation; and therefore a lick at the laureate will be a sure bait ad captandum vulgus, to catch little readers." Life of Colly Cibber, ch. ii.

Now, if it be certain, that the works of our poet have owed their success to this ingenious expedient, we hence derive an unanswerable argument, that this Fourth Dunciad, as well as the former three, hath had the author's last hand, and was by him intended for the press: Or else to what purpose hath he crowned it, as we see, by this finishing stroke, the profitable lick at the laureate?

Ver. 21, 22. Beneath her foot-stool, &c.] We are next presented with the pictures of those whom the goddess leads in captivity. Science is only depressed and confined so as to be rendered useless; but Wit or Genius, as a more dangerous and active enemy, punished, or driven away:—

sciences being often reconciled in some degree

There foam'd rebellious Logic, gagg'd and bound;
There, stript, fair Rhetoric languish'd on the ground
His blunted arms by Sophistry are borne,
And shameless Billingsgate her robes adorn.
Morality, by her false guardians drawn,
Chicane in furs, and Casuistry in lawn,
Gasps, as they straiten at each end the cord,
And dies when Dulness gives her Page the word. 30
Mad Mátthesis alone was unconfin'd,
Too mad for mere material chains to bind,
Now to pure Space lifts her ecstatic stare,
Now running round the circle, finds it square.
But held in tenfold bonds the muses lie,
Watch'd both by Envy's and by Flattery's eye;
There to her heart sad Tragedy address
The dagger wont to pierce the tyrant's breast;
But sober History restrain'd her rage,
And promis'd vengeance on a barbarous age. 40

REMARKS.

with Learning, but never upon any terms with Wit. And accordingly it will be seen that she admits something like each Science, as Casuistry, Sophistry, &c. but nothing like Wit, Opera alone supplying its place.

Ver. 30. gives her Page the word.] There was a judge of this name, always ready to hang any man that came before him, of which he was suffered to give a hundred miserable examples, during a long life, even to his dotage. Though the candid Scriblerus imagined Page here to mean no more than a page or mute, and to allude to the custom of strangling state criminals in Turkey by mutes or pages. A practice more decent than that of our Page, who, before he hanged any one, loaded him with reproachful language.

SCRIBL.

Ver. 39. But sober History] History attends on Tragedy, Satire on Comedy, as their substitutes in the discharge of their distinct functions; the one in high life, recording the crimes and punishments of the great; the other in low, exposing the vices or follies of the common people. But it may be asked, How came History and Satire to be admitted with impunity to minister comfort to the muses, even in the presence of the goddess, and in the midst of all her triumphs? A question, says Scriblerus, which we thus resolve: History was brought up in her infancy by Dulness herself; but being afterwards espoused into a noble house, she forgot (as is usual) the humility of her birth, and the cares of her early friends. This occasioned a long estrangement between her and Dulness. At length, in process of time, they met together in a monk's cell, were reconciled, and became better friends than ever. After this they had a second quarrel, but it held not long, and are now again on reasonable terms, and so are likely to continue. This accounts for the connivance shown to History on this occasion. But the boldness of Satire springs from a very different cause; for the reader ought to know, that she alone of all the sisters is unconquerable, never to be silenced when truly inspired and animated (as should seem

There sunk Thalia, nerveless, cold, and dead,
Had not her sister Satire held her head:
Nor could'st thou, Chesterfield! a tear refuse,
Thou wept'st, and with thee wept each gentle
muse.

When lo! a harlot form soft sliding by,
With mincing step, small voice, and languid eye:
Foreign her air, her robe's discordant pride
In patch-work fluttering, and her head aside;
By singing peers upheld on either hand,
She trip'd and laugh'd, too pretty much to stand:
Cast on the prostrate Nine a scornful look, 51
Then thus in quaint recitative spoke.

O Cara! Cara! silence all that train:
Joy to great Chaos! let Division reign:
Chromatic tortures soon shall drive them hence,
Break all their nerves, and fritter all their sense:
One Trill shall harmonise joy, grief, and rage.
Wake the dull Church, and lull the ranting Stage:

from above, for this very purpose, to oppose the kingdom of Dulness to her last breath.

Ver. 43. Nor could'st thou, &c.] This noble person in the year 1737, when the act aforesaid was brought into the House of Lords, opposed it in an excellent speech (says Mr. Cibber) "with a lively spirit, and uncommon eloquence."—This speech had the honour to be answered by the said Mr. Cibber, with a lively spirit also, and in a manner very uncommon, in the 8th Chapter of his Life and Manners. And here, gentle reader, would I gladly insert the other speech, whereby thou mightest judge between them; but I must defer it on account of some differences not yet adjusted between the noble author, and myself, concerning the true reading of certain passages.

BENTL.

Ver. 45. When lo! a harlot form] The attitude given to this phantom, represents the nature and genius of the Italian opera; its affected airs, its effeminate sounds, and the practice of patching up these operas with favourite songs, incoherently put together. These things were supported by the subscriptions of the nobility. This circumstance, that Opera should prepare for the opening of the grand sessions, was prophesied of in Book iii. ver. 304.

"Already Opera prepares the way,
"The sure forerunner of her gentle sway".

Ver. 54. Let Division reign;] Alluding to the false taste of playing tricks in music with numberless divisions, to the neglect of that harmony which conforms to the sense, and applies to the passions. Mr. Handel had introduced a great number of hands, and more variety of instruments into the orchestra, and employed even drums and cannon to make a fuller chorus; which proved so much too manly for the fine gentlemen of his age, that he was obliged to remove his music into Ireland. After which they were reduced, for want of composers, to practise the patch-work above-mentioned.

To the same notes thy sons shall hum, or snore,
And all thy yawning daughters cry, encore. 60
Another Phœbus, thy own Phœbus, reigns,
Joys in my jiggs, and dances in my chains.
But soon, ah soon, Rebellion will commence,
If Music meanly borrows aid from Sense:
Strong in new arms, lo! giant Handel stands,
Like bold Briareus, with a hundred hands;
To stir, to rouse, to shake the soul he comes,
And Jove's own thunders follow Mars's drums.
Arrest him, empress, or you sleep no more—
She heard, and drove him to th' Hibernian shore. 70

And now had Fame's posterior trumpet blown,
And all the nations summon'd to the throne.
The young, the old, who feel her inward sway,
One instinct seizes, and transports away.
None need a guide, by sure Attraction led,
And strong impulsive gravity of head:
None want a place, for all their centre found,
Hung to the goddess, and coher'd around.
Not closer orb in orb, conglob'd are seen
The buzzing bees about their dusky queen. 80

The gathering number, as it moves along,
Involves a vast involuntary throng,
Who, gently drawn, and struggling less and less,
Roll in her vortex, and her power confess.
Not those alone who passive own her laws,
But who, weak rebels, more advance her cause.
Whate'er of dunce in college or in town
Sneers at another, in toupee or gown;
Whate'er of mungil no one class admits,
A wit with dunces, and a dunce with wits. 90

Nor absent they, no members of her state,
Who pay her homage in her sons, the great;
Who, false to Phœbus, bow the knee to Baal;
Or impious, preach his word without a call,
Patrons, who sneak from living worth to dead,
Withhold the pension, and set up the head;
Or vest dull Flattery in the sacred gown;
Or give from fool to fool the laurel crown.
And (last and worse) with all the cant of wit,
Without the soul, the muses Hypocrit 100

There march'd the bard and blockhead side by side.

Who rhym'd for hire, and patroniz'd for pride.
Narcissus, prais'd with all a parson's power,
Look'd a white lily sunk beneath a shower.
There mov'd Montalto with superior air;
His stretch'd-out arm display'd a volume fair;

REMARKS.

Ver. 76 to 101. It ought to be observed that here are three classes in this assembly. The first of men absolutely and avowedly dull, who naturally adhere to the goddess, and are imaged in the simile of the bees about their queen. The second involuntarily drawn to her, though not caring to own her influence; from ver. 81 to 90.—The third, of such as, though not members of her state, yet advance her service by flattering Dulness, cultivating mistaken talents, patronising vile scribblers, discouraging living merit, or setting up for wits, and men of taste in arts they understand not; from ver. 91 to 101.

Courtiers and patriots in two ranks divide,
Through both he pass'd, and bow'd from side to

But as in graceful act, with awful eye,
Compos'd he stood, bold Benson thrust him by:
On two unequal crutches propt he came, III
Milton's on this, on that one Johnston's name.
The decent knight retir'd with sober rage,
Withdrew his hand, and clos'd the pompous page.
But (happy for him as the times went then)
Appear'd Apollo's Mayor and Aldermen,
On whom three hundred gold-capt youths await,
To lug the ponderous volume off in state.

When Dulness smiling, "Thus revive the wits!

But murder first, and mince them all to bits; 120
As erst Medea (cruel, so to save!)
A new edition of old Æsop gave;
Let standard-authors, thus, like trophies borne,
Appear more glorious, as more hack'd and torn.
And you, my critics! in the chequer'd shade,
Admire new light through holes yourselves have made.

Ver. 114.
What! no respect, he cried, for Shakspeare's

Ver. 108—bow'd from side to side:] As being of no one party.

Ver. 110. bold Benson] This man endeavoured to raise himself to fame by erecting monuments, striking coins, setting up heads, and procuring translations, of Milton; and afterwards by as great a passion for Arthur Johnston, a Scots Physician's Version of the Psalms, of which he printed many fine editions. See more of him, Book
iii. ver. 325.

Ver. 113. The decent knight] An eminent person who was about to publish a very pompous edition of a great author at his own expence.

Ver. 115, &c.] These four lines were printed in a separate leaf by Mr. Pope in the last edition, which he himself gave, of the Dunciad, with directions to the printer, to put this leaf into its place as soon as Sir T. H.'s Shakspeare should be published.

Ver. 119. Thus revive, &c.] The goddess applauds the practice of tacking the obscure names of persons not eminent in any branch of learning, to those of the most distinguished writers; either by printing editions of their works, with impertinent alterations of their text, as in the former instances; or by setting up monuments disgraced with their own vile names and inscriptions, as in the latter.

Ver. 128. A Page, a Grave.] For what less than a grave can be granted to a dead author? or what less than a page can be allowed a living one!

Ver. 128. A Page.] Pagina, not Pedissequus. A

On passive paper, or on solid brick. 130
So by each bard, an alderman shall sit,
A heavy lord shall hang at every wit,
And while on Fame's triumphal car they ride,
Some slave of mine be pinion'd to their side."

Ver. 132. A heavy Lord shall hang at every wit,] How unnatural an image, and how ill supported! saith Aristarchus. Had it been,

A heavy wit shall hang at every Lord,

something might have been said, in an age so distinguished for well-judging patrons. For Lord, then, read Load; that is, of debts here, and of commentaries hereafter. To this purpose, conspicuous is the case of the poor author of Hudibras, whose body, long since weighed down to the grave, by a load of debts, has lately had a more unmerciful load of commentaries laid upon his spirit; wherein the editor has atchieved more than Virgil himself, when he turned critic, could boast of, which was only, that he had picked gold out of another man's dung; whereas the editor has picked it out of his own. SCRIBL.

Aristarchus thinks the common reading right:
and that the author himself had been struggling, and but just shaken off his load when he wrote the following epigram:

"My lord complains, that Pope, stark mad with gardens,

"Has lopt three trees, the value of three farthings:

"But he's my neighbour, cries the peer polite,

"And if he'll visit me, I'll wave my right.

"What? on compulsion? and against my will,

"A lord's acquaintance? Let him file his bill."

Ver. 137, 138.

Dunce scorning Dunce beholds the next advance,
But Fop shows Fop superior complaisance.]

This is not to be ascribed so much to the different manners of a court and college, as to the different effects which a pretence to learning, and a pretence to wit, have on blockheads. For as judgment consists in finding out the differences in things, and wit in finding out their likenesses, so the Dunce is all discord and dissension, and constantly busied in reproving, examining, confuting, &c. while the Fop flourishes in peace, with songs and hymns of praise, addresses, characters, epithalamiums, &c

When lo! a spectre rose, whose index-hand
Held forth by virtue of the dreadful wand; 140
His beaver'd brow a birchen garland wears,
Dropping with infant's blood, and mother's tears.
O'er every vein a shuddering horror runs;
Eaton and Winton shake through all their sons.
All flesh is humbled, Westminster's bold race
Shrink, and confess the Genius of the place:
The pale Boy-Senator yet tingling stands,
And holds his breeches close with both his hands.

Then thus, since man from beast by words is
known, 149

Words are man's province, words we teach alone.
When Reason doubtful, like the Samian letter,
Points him two ways, the narrower is the better.
Plac'd at the door of Learning, youth to guide,
We never suffer it to stand too wide.

To ask, to guess, to know, as they commence,
As fancy opens the quick springs of sense,
We ply the memory, we load the brain,
Blind rebel Wit, and double chain on chain,
Confine the thought, to exercise the breath;
And keep them in the pale of words till death. 160

Whate'er the talents, or howe'er design'd,
We hang one jingling padlock on the mind:
A poet the first day, he dips his quill;
And what the last? a very poet still.

Pity! the charm works only in our wall,
Lost, lost too soon in yonder house or hall.
There truant Windham every muse gave o'er,
There Talbot sunk, and was a wit no more!
How sweet an Ovid, Murray was our boast!
How many martials were in Pulteney lost! 170

Else sure some bard, to our eternal praise,
In twice ten thousand rhyming nights and days,
Had reach'd the work, the all that mortal can;
And South beheld that masterpiece of man.

Oh (cry'd the Goddess) for some pedant reign!
Some gentle James, to bless the land again;
To stick the Doctor's chair into the throne,
Give law to words, or war with words alone,

Ver. 176. Some gentle James, &c.] Wilson tells us that this king, James the First, took upon himself to teach the Latin tongue to Car, Earl of Somerset; and that Gondomar the Spanish Ambassador would speak false Latin to him, on purpose to give him the pleasure of correcting it, whereby he wrought himself into his good graces,

Senates and courts with Greek and Latin rule,
And turn the council to a Grammar School! 180
For sure, if Dulness sees a grateful day,
'Tis in the shade of arbitrary sway.

O! if my sons may learn one earthly thing,
Teach but that one, sufficient for a king;
That which my priests, and mine alone, maintain,
Which, as it dies, or lives, we fall, or reign:
May you, my Cam, and Isis, preach it long,
"The Right Divine of Kings to govern wrong."

Prompt at the call, around the Goddess roll
Broad hats, and hoods, and caps, a sable shoal: 190
Thick and more thick the black blockade extends,
A hundred head of Aristotle's friends.
Nor wert thou, Isis! wanting to the day,

Each fierce Logician, still expelling Locke,

On German Crouzaz, and Dutch Burgerdyck.

REMARKS.

This great prince was the first who assumed the title of Sacred Majesty, which his loyal clergy transferred from God to him. "The principles of passive obedience and non-resistance (says the author of the Dissertation on Parties, Letter 8.), which before his time had skulked perhaps in some old homily, were talked, written, and preached into vogue in that inglorious reign."

Ver. 194. Though Christ Church, &c.] This line is doubtless spurious, and foisted in by the impertinence of the editor; and accordingly we have put it in between Hooks. For I affirm this college came as early as any other, by its proper deputies; nor did any college pay homage to Dulness in its whole body. BENTL.

Ver. 196. still expelling Locke,] In the year 1703 there was a meeting of the heads of the University of Oxford to censure Mr. Locke's Essay on Human Understanding, and to forbid the reading of it. See his Letters on the last edit.

Ver. 198. On German Crouzaz, and Dutch Burgerdyck] There seems to be an improbability that the Doctors and Heads of Houses should ride on horseback, who of late days, being gouty or unwieldy, have kept their coaches. But these are horses of great strength, and fit to carry any weight, as their German and Dutch extraction may manifest; and very famous we may conclude, being honoured with names, as were the horses Pegasus and Bucephalus. SCRIBL.

Though I have the greatest deference to the penetration of this eminent scholiast, and must own that nothing can be more natural than his interpretation, or juster than that rule of criticism, which directs us to keep to the literal sense, when no apparent absurdity accompanies it (and sure there is no absurdity in supposing a Logician on horseback), yet still I must needs think the hackneys here celebrated were not real horses, nor even Centaurs, which, for the sake of the learned Chiron, I should rather be inclined to think, if I

Low bow'd the rest: He, kingly, did but nod;
So upright Quakers please both man and God.

were forced to find them four legs, but downright plain men, though Logicians: and only thus metamorphosed by a rule of rhetoric, of which Cardinal Perron gives us an example, where he calls Clavius, "Un Esprit pesant, lourd, sans subtilité, ni gentillesse, un Gros Cheval d'Allemagne."

Here I profess to go opposite to the whole stream of commentators. I think the poet only aimed, though awkwardly, at an elegant Græcism in this representation; for in that language the word ἵππος [horse] was often prefixed to others, to denote greatness of strength; as ἵπποδάμειον, ἵππογλυσσον, ἵππομαράθρον, and particularly ἵπποφρονμῶν, a great connoisseur, which comes nearest to the case in hand. But the learned Scipio Maffei understands it of a certain wine called Port, from Oporto, a city of Portugal, of which this professor invited him to drink abundantly. SCIP. MAFF. De Computationibus Academicis. [And to the opinion of Maffei inclineth the sagacious Annotator on Dr. King's "Advice to Horace."]

Ver. 210. Aristarchus.] A famous Commentator and Corrector of Homer, whose name has been frequently used to signify a complete critic. The compliment paid by our author to this eminent professor, in applying to him so great a name, was the reason that he hath omitted to comment on this part which contains his own praises. We shall therefore supply that loss to our best ability. SCRIBL.

Ver. 214. Critics like me—] Alluding to two famous editions of Horace and Milton; whose richest veins of poetry he had prodigally reduced to the poorest and most beggarly prose.—Verily the learned scholiast is grievously mistaken. Aristarchus is not boasting here of the wonders of his art in annihilating the sublime; but of the usefulness of it, in reducing the turgid to its proper class; the words "make it prose again," plainly showing that prose it was, though ashamed of its original, and therefore to prose it should return. He calls it something more than Letter, from the enormous figure it would make among the other letters, being one Gamma set upon the shoulders of another.

Ver. 220. of Me or Te,] It was a serious dispute, about which the learned were much divided, and some treatises written: had it been about Meum and Tuum it could not be more contested, than whether at the end of the first Ode of Horace, to read, Me doctarum hederæ præmia frontium, or, Te doctarum hederæ.—By this the learned scholiast would seem to insinuate that the dispute was not about Meum and Tuum, which is a mistake: for, as a venerable sage observeth, Words are the counters of wisdom, but the money of fools; so that we see their property was indeed concerned. SCRIBL.

Ver. 222. Or give up Cicero to C or K.] Grammatical disputes about the manner of pronouncing Cicero's name in Greek. It is a dispute whether in Latin the name of Hermagoras should end in as or a. Quintilian quotes Cicero as writing it Hermagora, which Bentley rejects, and says Quintilian must be mistaken, Cicero could not write it so, and that in this case he would not believe Cicero himself. These are his very words: Ego vero Ciceronem ita scripsisse ne Ciceroni quidem affirmanti crediderim.—Epist. ad Mill. in fin. Frag. Menand. et Phil.

 Or chew'd by blind old scholiasts o'er and o'er,
 The critic eye, that microscope of wit,
 Sees hairs and pores, examines bit by bit:
 How parts relate to parts, or they to whole;
 The body's harmony, the beaming soul,
 Are things which Kuster, Burman, Wasse shall see,
 When man's whole frame is obvious to a flea.

Ah, think not, mistress! more true Dulness lies
 In Folly's cap, than Wisdom's grave disguise. 240
 Like buoys, that never sink into the flood,
 On Learning's surface we but lie and nod,
 Thine is the genuine head of many a house,

 See! still thy own, the heavy Canon roll,
 And metaphysic smokes involve the Pole.
 For thee we dim the eyes, and stuff the head
 With all such reading as was never read: 250
 For thee explain a thing till all men doubt it,
 And write about it, Goddess, and about it:
 So spins the silk-worm small its slender store,
 And labours, till it clouds itself all o'er.

But wherefore waste I words? I see advance
 Whore, Pupil, and lac'd Governor, from France.
 Walker! our hat—nor more he deign'd to say,
 But, stern as Ajax' spectre, strode away.

In flow'd at once a gay embroider'd race,
 And tittering push'd the pedants off the place:
 Some would have spoken, but the voice was drown'd

By the French horn, or by the opening hound,
 The first came forwards, with as easy mien,
 As if he saw St. James's and the Queen. 280

When thus th' attendant orator begun,
 Receive, great Empress! thy accomplish'd Son:
 Thine from the birth, and sacred from the rod,
 A dauntless infant! never scar'd with God.
 The fire saw, one by one, his virtues wake:
 The mother begg'd the blessing of a rake.

REMARKS.

Ver. 272. lac'd Governor] Why lac'd? Because gold and silver are necessary trimming to denote the dress of a person of rank, and the Governor must be supposed so in foreign countries, to be admitted into courts and other places of fair reception. But how comes Aristarchus to know at sight that this Governor came from France? Know? Why, by the laced coat. SCRIBL.

Ibid. Whore, Pupil, and lac'd Governor] Some critics have objected to the order here, being of opinion that the Governor should have the precedence before the Whore, if not before the Pupil. But were he so placed, it might be thought to insinuate that the Governor led the Pupil to the Whore; and were the Pupil placed first, he might be supposed to lead the Governor to her. But our impartial poet, as he is drawing their picture, represents them in the order in which they are generally seen; namely, the Pupil between the Whore and the Governor; but placeth the Whore first, as she usually governs both the other.

Ver. 280. As if he saw St. James's] Reflecting on the disrespectful and indecent behaviour of several forward young persons in the presence, so offensive to all serious men, and to none more than the good Scriblerus.

Ver. 281. th' attendant orator] The Governor above-said. The poet gives him no particular name; being unwilling, I presume, to offend or to do injustice to any, by celebrating one only with whom this character agrees, in preference to so many who so equally deserve it. SCRIBL.

Ver. 284. A dauntless infant never scar'd with God] i. e. Brought up in the enlarged principles of modern education; whose great point is, to keep the infant mind free from the prejudices of opinion, and the growing spirit unbroken by terrifying names. Amongst the happy consequences of this reformed discipline, it is not the least, that we have never afterwards any occasion for the priest, whose trade, as a modern wit informs us, is only to finish what the nurse began. SCRIBL.

Ver. 286.—the blessing of a rake.] Scriblerus is here much at a loss to find out what this blessing should be. He is sometimes tempted to imagin

Thou gav'st that ripeness, which so soon began,
 And ceas'd so soon, he ne'er was boy, nor man.
 Through school and college, thy kind cloud o'ercaft,
 Safe and unseen the young Æneas past : 290
 Thence bursting glorious, all at once let down,
 Stunn'd with his giddy larum half the town.
 Intrepid then, o'er seas and lands he flew :
 Europe he saw, and Europe saw him too.
 There all thy gifts and graces we display,
 Thou, only thou, directing all our way ;
 To where the Seine, obsequious as she runs,
 Pours at great Bourbon's feet her silken sons ;
 Or Tyber, now no longer Roman, rolls,
 Vain of Italian arts, Italian souls : 300

 Where slumber abbots, purple as their wines :
 To isles of fragrance, lily silver'd vales,
 Diffusing languor in the panting gales :
 To lands of singing, or of dancing slaves, [waves.
 Love-whispering woods, and lute-resounding
 But chief her shrine where naked Venus keeps,
 And Cupids ride the lion of the deeps,
 Where, eas'd of fleets, the Adriatic main 309
 Wafts the smooth eunuch and enamour'd swain.
 Led by my hand, he saunter'd Europe round,
 And gather'd every vice on Christian ground ;
 Saw every court, heard every king declare
 His royal sense of operas, or the fair ;
 The flews and palace equally explor'd,
 Intrigued with glory, and with spirit whor'd ;
 Try'd all bors d'auteurs, all liqueurs defin'd,
 Judicious drank, and greatly-daring din'd ;

it might be the marrying a great fortune ; but this, again, for the vulgarity of it, he rejects, as something uncommon seem'd to be prayed for. And after many strange conceits, not at all to the honour of the fair sex, he at length rests in this, that it was, that her son might pass for a wit ; in which opinion he fortifies himself by ver. 316. where the orator, speaking of his pupil, says, that he

Intrigued with glory, and with spirit whor'd, which seems to insinuate that her prayer was heard. Here the good scholiast, as indeed, every where else, lays open the very soul of modern criticism, while he makes his own ignorance of a poetical expression hold open the door to much erudition and learned conjecture : the blessing of a rake signifying no more than that he might be a rake the effects of a thing for the thing itself, a common figure. The careful mother only wish'd her son might be a rake, as well knowing that its attendant blessings would follow of course.

Ver. 307. But chief, &c.] These two lines, in their force of imagery and colouring, emulate and equal the pencil of Rubens.

Ver. 308. And Cupids ride the lion of the deeps.] The winged lion, the arms of Venice. This republic heretofore the most considerable in Europe, for her naval force, and the extent of her commerce, now illustrious for her carnivals.

Dropt the dull lumber of the Latin store, 319
 Spoil'd his own language, and acquir'd no more ;
 All classic learning lost on classic ground ;
 And last turn'd air, the echo of a sound ;
 See now, half cur'd, and perfectly well-bred,
 With nothing but a solo in his head ;
 As much estate, and principle, and wit,
 As Jansen, Fleetwood, Cibber, shall think fit ;
 Stol'n from a duel, follow'd by a nun,
 And, if a borough choose him, not undone !
 See, to my country happy I restore 329
 This glorious youth, and add one Venus more.
 Her too receive (for her my soul adores),
 So may the sons of sons of sons of whores
 Prop thine, O empress ! like each neighbour throne,
 And make a long posterity thy own.
 Pleas'd, she accepts the hero and the dame,
 Wraps in her veil, and frees from sense or shame.
 Then look'd, and saw a lazy, lolling sort,
 Unseen at church, at senate, or at court,
 Of ever-listless loiterers, that attend
 No cause, no trust, no duty, and no friend. 349
 Thee too, my Paridel ! she mark'd thee there,
 Stretch'd, on the rack of a too easy-chair,
 And heard thy everlasting yawn confess
 The pains and penalties of idleness.
 She pity'd ! but her pity only shed
 Benigner influence on thy nodding head.
 But Annus, crafty seer, with ebon wand,
 And well-dissembled emerald on his hand,

REMARKS.

Ver. 318. Greatly-daring din'd.] It being indeed no small risk to eat through those extraordinary compositions, whose disguised ingredients are generally unknown to the guests, and highly inflammatory and unwholesome.

Ver. 374. With nothing but a solo in his head ;] With nothing but a solo ? Why, if it be a solo how should there be any thing else ? Palpable tautology ! Read boldly an opera, which is enough of conscience for such a head as has lost all its Latin.
 BENTL.

Ver. 326. Jansen, Fleetwood, Cibber.] Three very eminent persons, all managers of plays ; who, though not governors by profession, had, each in his way, concerned themselves in the education of youth ; and regulated their wits, their morals, or their finances, at that period of their age which is the most important, their entrance into the polite world. Of the last of these, and his talents for this end, see Book i. ver. 199, &c.

Ver. 331. Her too receive, &c.] This confirms what the learned Scriblerus advanced in his note on ver. 272, that the Governor, as well as the Pupil, had a particular interest in this lady.

Ver. 341. Thee too, my Paridel !] The poet seems to speak of this young gentleman with great affection. The name is taken from Spenser, who gives it to a wandering courtly squire, that travelled about for the same reason for which many young squires are now fond of travelling, and especially to Paris.

Ver. 347. Annus.] The name taken from An-

False as his gems, and canker'd as his coins,
Came, cramm'd with capon, from where Pollio

Soft, as the wily fox is seen to creep,
Where bask on sunny banks the simple sheep,
Walk round and round, now prying here, now

So he; but pious, whisper'd first his prayer.

Grant, gracious goddess! grant me still to cheat,
O may thy cloud still cover the deceit!
Thy choicer mists on this assembly shed,
But pour them thickest on the noble head.

So shall each youth, assisted by our eyes,
See other Cæsars, other Homers rise; 360

Which Chaleis gods, and mortals call an owl,

Now see an Attys, now a Cecrops clear,

Nay, Mahomet! the pigeon at thine ear;

Be rich in ancient brags, though not in gold,

And keep his lares, though his house be sold;

To headless Phœbe his fair bride postpone,

Honour a Syrian prince above his own;

Lord of an Orho, if I vouch it true;

Blest in one Niger, till he knows of two. 370

nius, the monk of Viterbo, famous for many impositions and forgeries of ancient manuscripts and inscriptions, which he was prompted to by mere vanity; but our Annus had a more substantial motive.

Ver. 363. Attys and Cecrops.] The first king of Athens, of whom it is hard to suppose any coins are extant; but not so improbable as what follows, that there should be any of Mahomet, who forbid all images; and the story of whose pigeon was a monkish fable. Nevertheless one of these Annuses made a counterfeit medal of that impostor, now in the collection of a learned nobleman.

Ver. 371. Mummius.] This name is not merely an allusion to the Mummius he was so fond of, but probably referred to the Roman general of that name, who burned Corinth, and committed the curious statues to the captain of a ship, assuring him, "that if any were lost or broken, he should procure others to be made in their stead;" by which it should seem (whatever may be pretended) that Mummius was no virtuoso.

Ibid. — Fool-renown'd.] A compound epithet in the Greek manner, renown'd by fools, or renowned for making fools.

Ver. 372. Cheops.] A king of Egypt, whose body was certainly to be known, as being buried alone in his pyramid, and is therefore more genuine than any of the Cleopatras. This royal mummy, being stolen by a wild Arab, was purchased by the Consul of Alexandria, and transmitted to the museum of Mummius; for proof of which, he brings a passage in Sandys's Travels, where that accurate and learned voyager assures us, that he saw the sepulchre empty; which agrees exactly (saith he) with

Fierce as a startled adder, swell'd, and said,
Rattling an ancient sistrum at his head:

Speak'st thou of Syrian princes? traitor base!

Mine, Goddess! mine is all the horned race.

True, he had wit, to make their value rise;

From foolish Greeks to steal them, was as wise:

More glorious yet, from barbarous hands to keep,

When Sallee rovers chas'd him on the deep. 380

Then taught by Hermes, and divinely bold,

Down his own throat he risk'd the Grecian gold,

Receiv'd each demi-god, with pious care,

Deep in his entrails—I rever'd them there,

I bought them, shrouded in that living shrine,

And, at their second birth, they issue mine.

Witness great Ammon! by whose horns I swore,

(Reply'd soft Annus) this our paunch before

Still bears them, faithful; and that thus I eat,

Is to refund the medals with the meat. 390

To prove me, goddess! clear of all design,

Bid me with Pollio sup, as well as dine:

There all the learn'd shall at the labour stand,

And Douglas lend his soft obstetric hand.

The Goddess smiling seem'd to give consent;

So back to Pollio, hand in hand, they went.

the time of the theft above mentioned. But he omits to observe, that Herodotus tells the same thing of it in his time.

Ver. 375. Speak'st thou of Syrian princes? &c.] The strange story following, which may be taken for a fiction of the poet, is justified by a true relation in Spon's Voyages. Vailiant (who wrote the History of the Syrian Kings, as it is to be found on medals) coming from the Levant, where he had been collecting various coins; and being pursued by a Corsair of Sallee, swallowed down twenty gold medals. A sudden Bourasque freed him from the rover; and he got to land with them in his belly. On his road to Avignon, he met two physicians, of whom he demanded assistance. One advised purgations, the other vomits. In this uncertainty he took neither, but pursued his way to Lyons, where he found his ancient friend, the famous physician and antiquary Dufour, to whom he related his adventure. Dufour, without staying to inquire about the uneasy symptoms of the burden he carried, first asked him, whether the medals were of the higher empire? He assured him they were. Dufour was ravished with the hope of possessing so rare a treasure; he bargained with him on the spot for the most curious of them, and was to recover them at his own expence.

Ver. 387. Witness great Ammon.] Jupiter Ammon is called to witness, as the father of Alexander, to whom those kings succeeded in the division of the Macedonian empire, and whose horns they wore on their medals.

Ver. 394. Douglas.] A physician of great learning and no less taste; above all, curious in what related to Horace, of whom he collected every edition, translation, and comment, to the number of several hundred volumes.

Then thick as locusts blackening all the ground,
A tribe, with weeds and shells fantastic crown'd,
Each with some wond'rous gift approach'd the
power,

A nest, a toad, a fungus, or a flower. 400
But far the foremost, two, with earnest zeal,
And aspect ardent, to the throne appeal.

The first thus open'd: Hear thy suppliant's call,
Great queen, and common mother of us all!
Fair from its humble bed I rear'd this flower,
Suckled and cheer'd with air, and sun, and shower:
Soft on the paper ruff its leaves I spread,
Bright with the gilded button ript its head.
Then thron'd in glass, and nam'd it Caroline: 409
Each maid cried, Charming! and each youth Divine!
Did nature's pencil ever blend such rays,
Such varied light in one promiscuous blaze!
Now prostrate! dead! behold that Caroline:
No maid cries, Charming! and no youth, Divine!
And lo the wretch! whose vile, whose insect lust
Lay'd this gay daughter of the spring in dust.
Oh, punish him, or to th' Elysian shades
Dismiss my soul, where no carnation fades!
He ceas'd, and wept. With innocence of mien
Th' accus'd stood forth, and thus address'd the queen: 420

Of all th' enamell'd race, whose silvery wing
Waves to the tepid zephyrs of the spring,
Or swims along the fluid atmosphere,
Once brightest shin'd this child of heat and air.
I saw, and started from its vernal bower
The rising game, and chas'd from flower to flower.
It fled, I follow'd; now in hope, now pain;
It stop'd, I stop'd; it mov'd. I mov'd again.
At last it fixt, 'twas on what plant it pleas'd, 429
And where it fixt, the beauteous bird I seiz'd:
Rose or carnation was below my care;
I meddle, Goddess! only in my sphere.
I tell the naked fact without disguise,
And, to excuse it, need but show the prize;
Whose spoils this paper offers to your eye,
Fair ev'n in death! this peerless butterfly.

My sons! (the answer'd) both have done your parts:
Live happy both, and long promote our arts.
But hear a mother, when she recommends
To your fraternal care our sleeping friends. 440
The common soul, of Heaven's more frugal make,
Serves but to keep fools pert, and knaves awake;

Of souls the greater part, heaven's common make,
Serve but to keep fools pert, and knaves awake;
And most but find that centinel of God,
A drowsy watchman in the land of Nod.

REMARKS.

Ver. 409. And nam'd it Caroline:] It is a com-and great persons, to give their names to the most curious flowers of their raising: Some have been

The most recluse, discreetly open'd, find
Congenial matter in the cockle kind;
The mind in metaphysics at a loss,
May wander in a wilderness of moss; 450
The head that turns at superlunar things,
Pois'd with a tail, may steer on Wilkins' wings.

O, would the sons of men once think their eyes
And reason giv'n them but to study flies!
See nature in some partial narrow shape,
And let the author of the whole escape;
Learn but to trifle; or who must observe,
To wonder at their Maker, not to serve.

Let others creep by timid steps, and slow,
On plain Experience lay foundations low,
By common sense to common knowledge bred,
And last, to nature's cause through nature led.
All seeing in thy mists, we want no guide,
Mother of Arrogance, and source of Pride! 470
We nobly take the high priori road,
And reason downward, till we doubt of God:
Make nature still encroach upon his plan;
And shove him off as far as e'er we can:
Thrust some mechanic cause into his place,
Or bind in matter, or diffuse in space.
Or, at one bound o'erleaping all his laws,
Make God man's image, man the final cause,

enlarged and useful notions, entertained the extravagant hope of a possibility to fly to the moon; which has put some volatile geniuses upon making wings for that purpose.

Ver. 462. When moral evidence shall quite decay.] Alluding to a ridiculous and absurd way of some mathematicians, in calculating the gradual decay of moral evidence by mathematical proportions: according to which calculation, in about fifty years it will be no longer probable that Julius Cæsar was in Gaul, or died in the senate-house.
See Craig's Theologia Christianæ Principia Mathematica. But as it seems evident, that facts of a thousand years old, for instance, are now as probable as they were five hundred years ago; it is plain, that if in fifty more they quite disappear, it must be owing, not to their arguments, but to the extraordinary power of our goddess; for whose help, therefore, they have reason to pray.

Find Virtue local, all relation scorn,
 See all in self, and but for self be born : 480
 Of nought so certain as our reason still,
 Of nought so doubtful as of soul and will.
 Or hide the God still more ! and make us see
 Such as Lucretius drew, a God like thee :
 Wrapt up in self, a God without a thought,
 Regardless of our merit or default.
 Or that bright image to our fancy draw,
 Which Theocles in raptur'd vision saw,
 Wild through poetic scenes the Genius roves,
 Or wanders wild in academic groves ; 490
 That Nature our society adores,
 Where Tindal dictates, and Silenus snores
 Rous'd at his name, up rose the bowfy fire,
 And shook from out his pipe the seeds of fire ;
 Then snap'd his box, and strok'd his belly down,
 Rosy and reverend, though without a gown.
 Bland and familiar to the throne he came,
 Led up the youth, and call'd the goddess dame.
 Then thus : From priestcraft happily set free,
 Lo ! every finish'd son returns to thee : 500
 First slave to words, then vassal to a name,
 Then dupe to party ; child and man the same ;

REMARKS.

Ver. 491. Where Tindal dictates, and Silenus snores.] It cannot be denied but that this fine stroke of satire against atheism was well intended. But how must the reader smile at our author's officious zeal, when he is told, that at the time this was written, you might as soon have found a wolf in England as an atheist ! The truth is, the whole species was exterminated. There is a trifling difference, indeed, concerning the author of the Atchievement. Some, as Dr. Ashenurst, gave it to Bentley's Boylean Lectures. And he so well convinced that great man of the truth, that whatever afterwards he found atheist, he always read it A Theist. But, in spite of a claim so well made out, others gave the honour of this exploit to a latter Boylean lecturer. A judicious apologist for Dr. Clarke, against Mr. Whiston, says, with no less elegance than positiveness of expression, it is a most certain truth, that the demonstration of the being and attributes of God, has extirpated and banished atheism out of the Christian world, p. 18. It is much to be lamented, that the clearest truths have still their dark side. Here we see it becomes a doubt which of the two Herculeses was the monster queller. But what of that ? Since the thing is done, and the proof of it so certain, there is no occasion for so nice a canvassing of circumstances.

For of all the accommodations of fashionable life, as there are none more reputable, so there are none of so little charge as friendship. Ver. 523, 524. Lost is his God, his country—And nothing left but homage to a king !] So strange as this may seem to a mere English reader, the famous Monf. de la Bruyere declares it to be the character of every good subject in a Monarchy : " Where (says he) there is no such thing as love of our country, the interest, the glory, and service of the prince, supply its place." De la Republique, chap. x.

Of this duty another celebrated French author speaks indeed a little more disrespectfully ; which for that reason, we shall not translate, but give in his own words, " L'Amour de la Patrie, le grand motif des premiers Heros, n'est plus regardé que comme une Chimère ; l'idée du Service du Roi, étendue jusqu'à l'oubli de tout

Her's, therefore, took away the shape, and left the human mind; his takes away the mind, and leaves the human shape.

Ver. 529. But she, good goddess, &c.] The only comfort people can receive, must be owing in some shape or other to Dulness; which makes some stupid, others impudent, gives self-conceit to some, upon the flatteries of their dependents, presents the false colours of interest to others, and busies or amuses the rest with idle pleasures or sensuality, till they become easy under any infamy. But here is the difficulty, why pigeons in so shocking a shape should be brought to a table. Hares indeed might be cut into larks at a second dressing, out of frugality: Yet that seems no probable motive, when we consider the extravagance before mentioned, of dissolving whole oxen and boars into a small vial of jelly; nay, it is expressly said, that all flesh is nothing in his sight. I have searched Apicius, Pliny, and the feast of Trimalchio, in vain; I can only resolve it into some mysterious superstitious rite, as it is said to be done by a priest, and soon after called a sacrifice, attended (as all ancient sacrifices were) with libation and song. Ill would that scholiast discharge his duty, who should neglect to honour those whom Dulness has distinguished; or suffer them to lie forgotten, when their rare modesty would have left them nameless. Let us not, therefore, overlook the services which have been done her cause by one Mr. Thomas Edwards, a gentleman, as he is pleased to call himself, of Lincoln's-Inn; but, in reality, a gentleman only of the Dunciad; or, to speak him better, in the plain language of our ancestors to such mushrooms, a gentleman of the last edition: who, nobly eluding the solicitude of his careful father, very early retained himself in the cause of Dulness against Shakspeare, and with the wit and learning of his ancestor Tom Thimble in the Rehearsal, and with the air of good nature and politeness of Caliban in the tempest, hath now happily finished the Dunces's progress in personal abuse. For a libeller is nothing but a Grub-street critic run to seed.

Lamentable is the dulness of these gentlemen of the Dunciad. This Fungoso and his friends, who are all gentlemen, have exclaimed much against us for reflecting his birth, in the words, "a gentlemen of the last edition," which we hereby declare concern not his birth, but his adoption only: and mean no more than that he is become a gentleman of the last edition of the Dunciad. Since gentlemen, then, are so captious, we think it proper to declare that Mr. Thomas Thimble, who is here said to be Mr. Thomas Edwards's ancestor, is only related to him by the muse's side.

SCRIBL.

This tribe of men, which Scriblerus has here so well exemplified, our poet hath elsewhere admirably characterised in that happy line,

"A brain of feathers, and a heart of lead."

For the satire extends much further than to the person who occasioned it, and takes in the whole species of those on whom a good education (to fit them for some useful and learned profession) has been bestowed in vain. That worthless band

"Of ever-listless loiterers, that attend
"No cause, no trust, no duty, and no friend;"

who, with an understanding too dissipated and futile for the offices of civil life; and a heart too lumpish, narrow, and contracted for those of social, become fit for nothing: and so turn wits

All my commands are easy, short, and full:
My sons! be proud, be selfish, and be dull.
Guard my prerogative, assert my throne:
This nod confirms each privilege your own.

and critics, where sense and civility are neither required nor expected.

Ver. 571. Some, deep free-masons, join the silent race] The poet all along expresses a very particular concern for this silent race: He has here provided, that in case they will not waken or open (as was before proposed) to a humming bird or a cockle, yet at worst they may be made free-masons; where taciturnity is the only essential qualification, as it was the chief of the disciples of Pythagoras.

Ver. 576. A Gregorian, one a Gormogon,] A sort of lay-brothers, slips from the root of the free-masons.

Ver. 584. each privilege your own, &c.] This speech of Dulness to her sons at parting may possibly fall short of the reader's expectations; who may imagine the goddess might give them a charge of more consequence, and, from such a theory as is before delivered, incite them to the practice of something more extraordinary, than to personate running footmen, jockies, stage coachmen, &c.

But if it be well considered, that whatever inclination they might have to do mischief, her sons are generally rendered harmless by their inability; and that it is the common effect of Dulness (even in her greatest efforts) to defeat her own design; the poet, I am persuaded, will be justified, and it will be allowed that these worthy persons, in their several ranks, do as much as can be expected from them.

Ver. 585. The cap and switch, &c.] The goddess's political balance of favour, in the distribution of her rewards, deserves our notice. It consists in joining with those honours claimed by birth and high place, others more adapted to the genius and talents of the candidates. And thus her great forerunner, John of Leyden, king of Munster, entered on his government, by making his ancient friend and companion, Knipper-dolling, general of his horse, and hangman. And had but Fortune seconded his great schemes of reformation, it is said, he would have established his whole household on the same reasonable footing.

SCRIBL.

Ver. 590. Arachne's subtile line;] This is one of the most ingenious employments assigned, and therefore recommended only to peers of learning.

The judge to dance his brother serjeant call;
 The senator at cricket urge the ball;
 The bishop stow (pontific luxury?)
 An hundred souls of turkeys in a pye;
 The sturdy 'squire to Gallic masters stoop,
 And drown his lands and manors in a souper.
 Others import yet nobler arts from France,
 Teach kings to fiddle, and make senates dance.
 Perhaps more high some daring son may soar,
 Froud to my list to add one monarch more: 600
 And, nobly conscious, princes are but things
 Born for first ministers, as slaves for kings,
 Tyrant supreme! shall three estates command,
 And make one mighty Dunciad of the land! [nods:
 More she had spoke, but yawn'd—All Nature
 What mortal can resist the yawn of gods?
 Churches and chapels instantly it reach'd:
 (St. James's first, for leaden G—— preach'd)

REMARKS.

Of weaving stockings of the webs of spiders, see the Phil. Transf.

Ver. 591. The judge to dance his brother serjeant call;] Alluding perhaps to that ancient and solemn dance, intituled, a call of serjeants.

Ver. 598. Teach kings to fiddle,] An ancient amusement of sovereign princes, (viz.) Achilles, Alexander, Nero; though despised by Themistocles, who was a republican—Make senates dance, either after their prince, or to Pontoise, or Siberia.

Ver. 606. What mortal can resist the yawn of gods?] This verse is truly Homeric; as is the conclusion of the action, where the great mother composes all, in the same manner as Minerva at the period of the Odyssey.—It may indeed seem a very singular epitasis of the poem, to end as this does, with a great yawn; but we must consider it as the yawn of a god, and of powerful effects. It is not out of nature, most long and grave counsels concluding in this very manner: Nor without authority, the incomparable Spenser having ended one of the most considerable of his works with a roar; but then it is the roar of a lion, the effects whereof are described as the catastrophe of the poem.

Ver. 607. Church and chapels, &c.] The progress of this yawn is judicious and natural, and worthy to be noted. First it seizeth the churches and chapels; then catcheth the schools, where, though the boys be unwilling to sleep, the masters are not: Next Westminster-hall, much more hard indeed to subdue, and not totally put to silence even by the goddess: Then the convocation, which, though extremely desirous to speak, yet cannot: Even the House of Commons, justly called the sense of the nation, is lost (that is to say suspended) during the yawn; (far be it from the author to suggest that it could be lost any longer!) but it spreadeth at large over all the rest of the kingdom, to such a degree, that Palinurus himself (though as incapable of sleeping as Jupiter) yet noddeth for a moment; the effect of which, though ever so momentary, could not but cause some relaxation, for the time, in all public affairs.

SCRIBL.

Then catch'd the schools; the hall scarce kept awake;

The convocation gap'd, but could not speak; 610
 Lost was the Nation's sense, nor could be found,
 While the long solemn unison went round:
 Wide, and more wide, it spread o'er all the realm;
 Ev'n Palinurus nodded at the helm:
 The vapour mild o'er each committee crept;
 Unfinish'd treaties in each office slept;
 And chiefs armies doz'd out the campaign!
 And navies yawn'd for orders on the main.

O Muse! relate (for you can tell alone,
 Wits have short memories, and dunces none) 620
 Relate, who first, who last resign'd to rest;
 Whose heads she partly, whose completely blest;
 What charms could faction, what ambition lull,
 The venal quiet, and entrance the dull;

REMARKS.

Ver. 610. The convocation gap'd, but could not speak;] Implying a great desire so to do, as the learned scholiast on the place rightly observes. Therefore beware, reader, lest thou take this gape for a yawn, which is attended with no desire but to go to rest: by no means the disposition of the convocation; whose melancholy case in short is this: She was, as is reported, infected with the general influence of the goddess; and while she was yawning carelessly at her ease, a wanton courtier took her at advantage, and in the very nick clapp'd a gag into her chops. Well therefore may we know her meaning by her gaping; and this distressful posture our poet here describes, just as she stands at this day, a sad example of the effects of Dulness and Malice unchecked, and despised.

BENTL.

Ver. 615,—618.] These verses were written many years ago, and may be found in the State Poems of that time. So that Scriblerus is mistaken, or whoever else have imagined this poem of a fresher date.

Ver. 620. Wits have short memories.] This seems to be the reason why the poets, when they give us a catalogue, constantly call for help on the muses, who, as the daughters of Memory, are obliged not to forget any thing. So Homer, Iliad ii.

Πληθὺν δ' ἔκ αὖ μνησόμεαι ἑὸν ὀνομήνω,
 Εἰ μὴ Ὀλυμπιάδες Μῦσαι Διὸς αἰγιόχοιο
 Θυγατέρες, μνησαίαθ'—

And Virgil, Æn. vii.

“Et meministis enim, Divæ, et memorare potestis:

“Ad nos vix tenuis famæ perlabitur aura.”

But our poet had yet another reason for putting this task upon the muse, that, all besides being asleep, she only could relate what passed. SCRIBL.

Ver. 624. The venal quiet, and, &c.] It were a problem worthy the solution of Mr. Ralph and his patron, who had lights that we know nothing of, —Which required the greatest effort of our

Till drown'd was sense, and shame, and right, and wrong—
O sing, and hush the nations with thy song!

In vain, in vain, the all-composing hour
Resistless falls: the muse obeys the power.
She comes! she comes! the fable throne behold
Of Night primæval, and of Chaos old! 630
Before her, Fancy's gilded clouds decay,
And all its varying rain-bows die away,
Wit shoots in vain its momentary fires,
The meteor drops, and in a flash expires.
As one by one at dread Medea's strain,
The sickening stars fade off th' ethereal plain;
As Argus' eyes, by Hermes' wand oppress'd,
Clos'd one by one to everlasting rest;
Thus at her felt approach, and secret might,
Art after Art goes out, and all is night: 640
See sculking Truth to her old cavern fled,
Mountrains of casuistry heap'd o'er her head!
Philosophy, that lean'd on heaven before,
Shrinks to her second cause, and is no more.

VARIATION.

Ver. 643. In the former edit. it stood thus:

Philosophy, that reach'd the heavens before,
Shrinks to her hidden cause, and is no more.

And this way was intended as a censure of the Newtonian philosophy. For the poet had been misled by the prejudices of foreigners, as if that philosophy had recurred to the occult qualities of Aristotle. This was the idea he received of it from a man educated much abroad, who had read every thing, but every thing superficially. Had his excellent friend Dr. A. been consulted in this matter, it is certain that so unjust a reflection had never discredited so noble a satire. When I hinted to him how he had been imposed upon, he changed the lines with great pleasure into a compliment (as they now stand) on that divine genius, and a satire on the folly by which he the poet himself had been misled.

REMARKS.

goddesses power, to intrance the dull, or to quiet the venal. For though the venal may be more unruly than the dull, yet, on the other hand, it demands a much greater expence of her virtue to intrance than barely to quiet. SCRIBL.

Ver. 629. She comes she comes! &c.] Here the muse, like Jove's eagle, after a sudden stoop at ignoble game, soareth again to the skies. As prophecy hath ever been one of the chief provinces of poetry, our poet here foretells from what we feel,

Phyfic of Metaphysic begs defence,
And Metaphysic calls for aid on Sense!
See Mystery to Mathematics fly!
In vain! they gaze, turn giddy, rave, and die.
Religion blushing veils her sacred fires,
And unawares Morality expires. 650
Nor public flame, nor private dares to shine:
Nor human spark is left, nor glimpse divine!
Lo! thy dread empire, Chaos! is restor'd,
Light dies before thy uncreating word:
Thy hand, great Anarch! lets the curtain fall;
And universal Darkness buries All.

REMARKS.

what we are to fear; and in the style of other prophets, hath used the future tense for the preterit: since what he says shall be, is already to be seen, in the writings of some even of our most adorned authors in divinity, philosophy, physics, metaphysics, &c. who are too good indeed to be named in such company.

Ibid. The fable throne behold.] The fable thrones of night and chaos, here represented as advancing to extinguish the light of the sciences, in the first place blot out the colours of fancy, and damp the fire of wit, before they proceed to their work.

Ver. 641. Truth to her old cavern fled.] Alluding to the saying of Democritus, that truth lay at the bottom of a deep well, from whence he had drawn her: Though Butler says, he first put her in, before he drew her out.

Ver. 649. Religion blushing veils her sacred fires,] Blushing as well at the memory of the past overflow of Dulness, when the barbarous learning of so many ages was wholly employed in corrupting the simplicity, and defiling the purity of religion, as at the view of these her false supports in the present; of which it would be endless to recount the particulars. However, amidst the extinction of all other lights, she is said only to withdraw hers! as hers alone in its own nature is unextinguishable and eternal.

Ver. 650. And unawares Morality expires.] It appears from hence that our Poet was of very different sentiments from the Author of the Characteristics, who has written a formal treatise on Virtue, to prove it not only real but durable, without the support of religion. The word Unawares alludes to the confidence of those men, who suppose that morality would flourish best without it, and consequently to the surprise such would be in (if any such there are) who indeed love virtue, and yet do all they can to root out the religion of their country.

BY THE AUTHOR.—A DECLARATION.

WHEREAS certain haberdashers of points and particles, being instigated by the spirit of pride, and assuming to themselves the name of critics and restorers, have taken upon them to adulterate the common and current sense of our glorious ancestors, poets of this realm, by clipping, coining, defacing the images, mixing their own base alloy, or otherwise falsifying the same; which they publish, utter, and vend as genuine: The said haberdashers having no right thereto, as neither heirs, executors, administrators, assigns, or in any sort related to such poets, to all or any of them: Now, we having carefully revised this our Dunciad, * beginning with the words the mighty mother, and ending with the words buries all, containing the entire sum of one thousand seven hundred and fifty-four verses, declare every word figure, point, and comma of this impression to be authentic: And do therefore strictly enjoin and forbid any person or persons whatsoever, to erase, reverse, put between hooks, or by any other means, directly or indirectly, change or mangle any of them. And we do hereby earnestly exhort all our brethren to follow this our example, which we heartily wish our great predecessors had heretofore set, as a remedy and prevention of all such abuses. Provided always, that nothing in this declaration shall be construed to limit the lawful and undoubted right of every subject of this realm, to judge, censure, or condemn, in the whole or in part, any poem or poet whatsoever.

Given under our hand at London, this third day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred thirty and two.

Declarat' cor' me,
JOHN BARBER, Mayor. }

* Read thus confidently, instead of "beginning with the word books, and ending with the word flies," as formerly it stood: Read also, "containing the entire sum of one thousand seven hundred and fifty-four verses," instead of "one thousand and twelve lines;" such being the initial and final words, and such the true and entire contents of this poem.

Thou art to know, reader! that the first edition thereof, like that of Milton, was never seen by the author (though living, and not blind): The editor himself confessed as much in his preface: And no two poems were ever published in so arbitrary a manner. The editor of this had as boldly suppressed whole passages, yea the entire last book, as the editor of Paradise Lost, added and augmented. Milton himself gave but ten books, his editor twelve; this author gave four books, his editor only three. But we have happily done justice to both; and presume we shall live, in this our last labour, as long as in any of our others.

Prefixed to the five first imperfect Editions of the DUNCIAD, in three Pooks, printed at DUBLIN and LONDON, in octavo and duodecimo, 1727.

THE PUBLISHER (a) TO THE READER.

IT will be found a true observation, though somewhat surprising, that when any scandal is vented against a man of the highest distinction and character, either in the state or literature, the public in

(a) The Publisher] Who he was is uncertain; but Edward Ward tells us, in his Preface to Dungen, "that most judges are of opinion this preface is not of English extraction, but Hibernian," &c. He means it was written by Dr. Swift, who, whether publisher or not, may be said in a sort to be author of the poem. For when he, together with Mr. Pope (for reasons specified in the preface to their Miscellanies) determined to burn the most trifling pieces in which they had any hand, and to destroy all that remained in their power; the first sketch of this poem was snatched from the fire by Dr. Swift, who persuaded his friend to proceed in it, and to him it was therefore inscribed. But the occasion of printing it was as follows:

There was published in those Miscellanies, a Treatise of the Bathos, or Art of Sinking in Poetry, in which was a chapter, where the species of bad writers were ranged in classes, and initial letters of names prefixed, for the most part at random. But such was the number of poets eminent in that art, that some one or other took every letter to himself. All fell into so violent a fury, that for half a year, or more, the common newspapers (in most of which they had some property, as being hired writers) were filled with the most abusive falsehoods and scurrilities they could possibly devise; a liberty no ways to be wondered at in those people, and in those papers, that, for many years, during the uncontrouled license of the press, had aspersed almost all the great characters of the age; and this with impunity, their own persons and names being utterly secret and obscure. This gave Mr. Pope the thought, that he had now some opportunity of doing good, by detecting and dragging into light these common enemies of mankind; since to invalidate this universal slander, it sufficed to show what contemptible men were the authors of it.

general afford it a most quiet reception: and the larger part accept it as favourably as if it were some kindness done to themselves: whereas, if a known scoundrel or blockhead but chanced to be touched upon, a whole legion is up in arms, and it becomes the common cause of all scribblers, and printers whatsoever.

Not to search too deeply into the reason hereof, I will only observe as a fact, that every week for these two months past, the town has been persecuted with (b) pamphlets, advertisements, letters, and weekly essays, not only against the wit and writings, but against the character and person of Mr. Pope. And that of all those men who have received pleasure from his works, which by modest computation may be about a (c) hundred thousand in these kingdoms of England and Ireland (not to mention Jersey, Guernsey, the Orcades, those in the new world, and foreigners who have translated him into their languages); of all this number not a man hath stood up to say one word in his defence.

He was not without hopes, that by manifesting the dulness of those who had only malice to recommend them; either the booksellers would not find their account in employing them, or the men themselves, when discovered, want courage to proceed in so unlawful an occupation. This it was that gave birth to the Dunciad; and he thought it an happiness, that by the late flood of slander on himself, he had acquired such a peculiar right over their names, as was necessary to his design.

(b) Pamphlets, advertisements, &c.] See the list of those anonymous papers, with their dates and authors annexed, inserted before the poem.

(c) about a hundred thousand] It is surprising with what stupidity this preface, which is almost a continued irony, was taken by those authors. All such passages as these were understood by Curll, Cook, Cibber, and others, to be serious. Hear the Laureate (Letter to Mr. Pope, p. 9.) "Though I grant the Dunciad a better poem of its kind than ever was writ; yet, when I read it with those vain-glorious encumbrances of Notes and Remarks upon it, &c.—it is amazing, that you, who have writ with such masterly spirit upon the ruling passion, should be so blind a slave to your own, as not to see how far a low avarice of praise," &c. (taking it for granted that the notes of Scriblerus and others, were the author's own.)

The only exception is the (d) author of the following poem, who doubtless had either a better insight into the grounds of this clamour, or a better opinion of Mr. Pope's integrity, joined with a greater personal love for him, than any other of his numerous friends and admirers.

Farther, that he was in his peculiar intimacy, appears from the knowledge he manifests of the most private authors of all the anonymous pieces against him, and from his having in this poem attacked (e) no man living, who had not before printed, or published some scandal against this gentleman.

How I came possess'd of it, is no concern to the reader: but it would have been a wrong to him had I detained the publication; since those names which are its chief ornaments die off daily so fast, as must render it too soon unintelligible. If it provoke the author to give us a more perfect edition, I have my end.

Who he is I cannot say, and (which is a great pity) there is certainly (f) nothing in his style and manner of writing, which can distinguish or discover him: for if it bears any resemblance to that of Mr. Pope, it is not improbable but it might be done on purpose, with a view to have it pass for his. But by the frequency of his allusions to Virgil, and a laboured (not to say affected) shortness in imitation of him, I should think him more an admirer of the Roman poet than of the Grecian, and in that not of the same taste with his friend.

I have been well informed, that this work was the labour of full (g) six years of his life, and that he wholly retired himself from all the avoca-

(e) The publisher in these words went a little too far; but it is certain, whatever names the reader finds that are unknown to him, are of such; and the exception is only of two or three, whose dulness, impudent scurrility, or self-conceit, all mankind agreed to have justly entitled them to a place in the Dunciad.

(f) There is certainly nothing in his style, &c.] This irony had small effect in concealing the author. The Dunciad, imperfect as it was, had not been published two days, but the whole town gave it to Mr. Pope.

(g) the labour of full six years, &c.] This also was honestly and seriously believed by divers gentlemen of the Dunciad. J. Ralph, pref. to Sawney, "We are told it was the labour of six years, with the utmost assiduity and application: It is no great compliment to the author's sense, to have employed so large a part of his life, &c." So also Ward, pref. to Durgin, "The Dunciad, as the publisher very wisely confesses, cost the author six years retirement from all the pleasures of life; though it is somewhat difficult to conceive, from either its bulk or beauty, that it could be so long in hatching, &c. But the length of time and closeness of application were mentioned, to prepossess the reader with a good opinion of it."

They just as well understood what Scriblerus said of the poem.

tions and pleasures of the world, to attend diligently to its correction and perfection; and six years more he intended to bestow upon it, as would seem by this verse of Statius, which was cited at the head of his manuscript:

"Oh mihi bisse nos multum vigilata per annos,
"Duncia! (b)"

Hence also we learn the true title of the poem: which with the same certainty as we call that of Homer the Iliad, of Virgil the Æneid, of Camoens the Lusiad, we may pronounce, could have been, and can be, no other than

THE DUNCIAD.

It is styled heroic, as being doubly so; not only with respect to its nature, which according to the best rules of the ancients, and strictest ideas of the moderns, is critically such; but also with regard to the heroical disposition and high courage of the writer, who dared to stir up such a formidable, irritable, and implacable race of mortals.

There may arise some obscurity in chronology from the names in the poem, by the inevitable removal of some authors, and insertion of others in their niches. For whoever will consider the unity of the whole design, will be sensible, that the poem was not made for these authors, but these authors for the poem. I should judge that they were clapped in as they rose, fresh and fresh, and changed from day to day; in like manner as when the old boughs wither, we thrust new ones into a chimney.

I would not have the reader too much troubled, or anxious, if he cannot decypher them: since when he shall have found them out, he will probably know no more of the persons than before.

Yet we judged it better to preserve them as they are, than to change them for fictitious names; by which the satire would only be multiplied, and applied to many instead of one. Had the hero, for instance, been called Codrus, how many would have affirmed him to have been Mr. T. Mr. E. Sir R. B. &c. But now all that unjust scandal is saved by calling him by a name, which, by good luck, happens to be that of a real person.

All these were afterwards reprinted in a pamphlet, intituled, A Collection of all the Verses, Essays, Letters, and Advertisements occasioned by Mr. Pope and Swift's Miscellanies, prefaced by Concannon, Anonymous, 8vo, and printed for A. Moore, 1728, price 1 s. Others of an elder date, having lain as waste paper many years, were, upon the publication of the Dunciad, brought out, and their authors betrayed by the mercenary book-sellers (in hopes of some possibility of vending a few) by advertising them in this manner.—“The Confederates, a Farce. By Capt. Breval (for which he was put into the Dunciad). An Epilogue to Powell's Puppet-show. By Col. Duckett (for which he was put into the Dunciad). Essays, &c. By Sir Richard Blackmore. (N. B. It was for a passage of this book that Sir Richard was put into the Dunciad.)” And so of others.

After the Dunciad, 1728.

An Essay on the Dunciad, 8vo, printed for J. Roberts. [In this book, p. 9. it was formally declared, “That the complaint of the aforesaid libels and advertisements was forged and untrue: that all mouths had been silent, except in Mr. Pope's praise; and nothing against him published, but by Mr. Theobald.”]

Sawney, in blank verse, occasioned by the Dunciad; with a critique on that poem. By J. Ralph [a person never mentioned in it at first, but inserted after], printed for J. Roberts, 8vo.

A complete Key to the Dunciad. By E. Curll, 12mo, price 6 d.

A second and third edition of the same, with additions, 12mo.

The Popiad. By E. Curll, extracted from J. Dennis, Sir Richard Blackmore, &c. 12mo. price 6 d.

The Curliad. By the same E. Curll.

The Female Dunciad. Collected by the same

Mr. Curll, 12mo. price 6 d. With the Metamorphosis of P. into a stinging Nettle. By Mr. Foxton, 12mo.

The Metamorphosis of Scriblerus into Snarlerus. By J. Smedley, printed for A. Moore, folio, price 6 d.

The Dunciad dissected. By Curll and Mrs. Thomas, 12mo.

An Essay on the Taste and Writings of the present Times. Said to be writ by a gentleman of C. C. C. Oxon, printed for J. Roberts, 8vo.

The Arts of Logic and Rhetoric, partly taken from Bouhours, with new Reflections, &c. By John Oldmixon, 8vo.

Remarks on the Dunciad. By Mr. Dennis, dedicated to Theobald, 8vo.

A Supplement to the Profund. Anon. by Matthew Concannen, 8vo.

Mist's Weekly Journal, June 8. A long letter, signed W. A. Writ by some or other of the club of Theobald, Dennis, Moore, Concannen, Cooke, who for some time held constant weekly meetings for those kind of performances.

Daily Journal, June 11. A letter signed Philo-scriblerus, on the name of Pope.—Letter to Mr. Theobald, in verse, signed B. M. [Bezaleel Morris] against Mr. P.—Many other little epigrams, about this time in the same papers, by James Moore, and others.

Mist's Journal, June 22. A letter by Lewis Theobald.

Flying Post, August 8. Letter on Pope and Swift

Daily Journal, August 8. Letter charging the author of the Dunciad with treason.

Durgen: A plain satire on a pompous satirist. By Edward Ward, with a little of James Moore.

Apollo's Maggot in his cups. By E. Ward.

Gulliveriana Secunda. Being a collection of many of the libels in the newspapers, like the former volume, under the same title, by Smedley. Advertised in the Craftsman, Nov. 9: 1728, with this remarkable promise, that "any thing which any body should send as Mr. Pope's or Dr. Swift's, should be inserted and published as theirs."

Pope Alexander's supremacy and infallibility examined, &c. By George Duckett and John Dennis, 4to.

Dean Jonathan's Paraphrase on the fourth chapter of Genesis. Writ by E. Roome, folio, 1729.

Labeo: A paper of verses by Leonard Welsted, which after came into one epistle, and was published by James Moore, 4to, 1730. Another part of it came out in Welsted's own name, under the just title of Dulness and Scandal, folio, 1731.

There have been since published,

Verses on the imitator of Horace. By a lady [or between a lady, a lord, and a court squire] printed for J. Roberts, folio.

An epistle from a nobleman to a doctor of divinity, from Hampton-court [Lord H—y.] Printed for J. Roberts also, folio.

A Letter from Mr. Cibber to Mr. Pope. Printed for W. Lewis in Covent-garden, 8vo.

To the first Edition with Notes, in 4to, 1729.

IT will be sufficient to say of this edition, that the reader has here a much more correct and complete copy of the Dunciad, than has hitherto appeared. I cannot answer but some mistakes may have slipped into it, but a vast number of others will be prevented by the names being now not only set at length, but justified by the authorities and reasons given. I make no doubt, the author's own motive to use real rather than feigned names, was his care to preserve the innocent from any false application; whereas, in the former editions, which had no more than the initial letters, he was made, by keys printed here, to hurt the inoffensive, and (what was worse) to abuse his friends, by an impression at Dublin.

The commentary which attends this poem, was sent me from several hands, and consequently must be unequally written; yet will have one advantage over most commentaries, that it is not made upon conjectures, or at a remote distance of time: and the reader cannot but derive one pleasure from the very obscurity of the persons it treats of, that it partakes of the nature of a secret, which most people love to be let into, though the men or the things be ever so inconsiderable or trivial.

Of the persons it was judged proper to give some account: for since it is only in this monument that they must expect to survive (and here survive they will, as long as the English tongue shall remain such as it was in the reigns of Queen Anne and King George), it seemed but humanity to bestow a word or two upon each, just to tell what he was, what he writ, when he lived, and when he died.

If a word or two more are added upon the chief offenders, it is only as a paper pinned upon the breast, to mark the enormities for which they suffered; lest the correction only should be remembered, and the crime forgotten.

In some articles it was thought sufficient, barely to transcribe from Jacob, Curll, and other writers of their own rank, who were much better acquainted with them than any of the authors of this comment can pretend to be. Most of them had drawn each other's characters on certain occasions; but the few here inserted, are all that could be saved from the general destruction of such works.

Of the part of Scriblerus I need say nothing; his manner is well enough known, and approved by all but those who are too much concerned to be judges.

To the first Edition of the fourth Book of the Dunciad, when printed separately in the Year 1742.

WE apprehend it can be deemed no injury to the author of the three first books of the Dunciad, that we publish this fourth. It was found merely by accident, in taking a survey of the library of a late eminent nobleman; but in so blotted a condition, and in so many detached pieces, as plainly showed it to be not only incorrect, but unfinished. That the author of the three first books had a design to extend and complete his poem in this manner, appears from the dissertation prefixed to it, where it is said, that the design is more extensive, and that we may expect other episodes to complete it: And from the declaration in the argument to the third book, that the accomplishment of the prophecies therein would be the theme hereafter of a greater Dunciad. But whether or no he be the author of this, we declare ourselves ignorant. If he be, we are no more to be blamed for the publication of it, than Tucca and Varius for that of the last six books of the Æneid, though perhaps inferior to the former.

If any person be possessed of a more perfect copy of this work, or of any other fragments of it, and will communicate them to the publisher, we shall make the next edition more complete: In which we also promise to insert any criticisms that shall be published (if at all to the purpose) with the names of the authors; or any letters sent us (though not to the purpose) shall yet be printed under the title of "Epistolæ Obscurorum Virorum;" which, together with some others of the same kind, formerly laid by for that end, may make no unpleasant addition to the future impressions of this poem.

To the complete Edition of 1743.

I HAVE long had a design of giving some sort of notes on the works of this poet. Before I had the happiness of his acquaintance, I had written a commentary on his Essay on Man, and have since finished another on the Essay on Criticism. There was one already on the Dunciad, which had met with general approbation: But I still thought some additions were wanting (of a more serious kind) to the humorous notes of Scriblerus, and even to those written by Mr. Cleland, Dr. Arbuthnot, and others. I had lately the pleasure to pass some months with the author in the country, where I prevailed upon him to do what I had long desired, and favour me with his explanation of several passages in his works. It happened, that just at that juncture was published a ridiculous book against him, full of personal reflections, which furnished him with a lucky opportunity of improving this poem, by giving it the only thing it wanted, a more considerable hero. He was always sensible of its defect in that particular, and owned he had let it pass with the hero it had, purely for want of a better, not entertaining the least expectation that such an one was reserved for this post, as has since obtained the laurel: But since that had happened, he could no longer deny this justice either to him or the Dunciad.

And yet I will venture to say, there was another motive which had still more weight with our author: This person was one, who from every folly (not to say vice) of which another would be ashamed, has constantly derived a vanity: and therefore was the man in the world who would least be hurt by it.

WHEREAS, upon occasion of certain pieces relating to the gentlemen of the Dunciad, some have been willing to suggest, as if they looked upon them as an abuse: We can do no less than own it is our opinion, that to call these gentlemen bad authors is no sort of abuse, but a great truth. We cannot alter this opinion without some reason; but we promise to do it in respect to every person who thinks it an injury to be represented as no wit or poet, provided he procures a certificate of his being really such, from any three of his companions in the Dunciad, or from Mr. Dennis, singly, who is esteemed equal to any three of the number.

A PARALLEL

Of the Characters of MR. DRYDEN and MR. POPE, as drawn by certain of their Contemporaries.

MR. DRYDEN, his Politics, Religion, Morals.

MR. DRYDEN is a mere renegade from monarchy, poetry, and good sense (a). A true republican son of monarchical church (b). A republican atheist (c),

VII.

A PARALLEL

Of the Characters of MR. POPE and MR. DRYDEN, as drawn by certain of their Contemporaries.

MR. POPE, his Politics, Religion, Morals.

MR. POPE is an open and mortal enemy to his country and the commonwealth of learning (a). Some call him a Popish whig, which is directly

(a) Dennis, Rem. on the Rape of the Lock, Pref. p. 12.

Dryden was from the beginning an ἀλλοτριόσαλλος, and I doubt not will continue so to the last (d).

In the poem called Absalom and Achitophel, are notoriously traduced the King, the Queen, the Lords and Gentlemen, not only their honourable persons exposed, but the whole Nation and its Representatives notoriously libelled. It is scandalum magnatum, yea of Majesty itself (e).

He looks upon God's Gospel as a foolish fable, like the Pope, to whom he is a pitiful purveyor (f). His very Christianity may be questioned (g). He ought to expect more severity than other men, as he is most unmerciful in his own reflections on others (h): with as good a right as his Holiness, he sets up for poetical infallibility (i).

MR. DRYDEN only a Versifier.

His whole libel is all bad matter, beautified (which is all that can be said of it) with good metre (k). Mr. Dryden's genius did not appear in any thing more than his versification, and whether he is to be ennobled for that only, is a question (l).

MR. DRYDEN'S Virgil.

Tonson calls it Dryden's Virgil, to show that this is not that Virgil so admired in the Augustan age; but a Virgil of another stamp, a silly, impertinent, nonsensical writer. None but a Bavius, a Mævius, or a Bathyllus, carped at Virgil (m); and none but such unthinking vermin admire his translator (n). It is true, soft and easy lines might become Ovid's Epistles or Art of Love—But Virgil, who is all great and majestic, &c. requires strength of lines, weight of words, and closeness of expression; not an ambling muse running on carpet ground, and shod as lightly as a Newmarket racer.—He has numberless faults in his author's meaning, and in propriety of expression (o).

MR. DRYDEN understood no Greek nor Latin.

Mr. Dryden was once, I have heard, at Westminster school: Dr. Busby would have whipt him for so childish a paraphrase (p). The meanest pedant in England would whip a lubber of twelve for construing so absurdly (q). The translator is mad: every line betrays his stupidity (r). The faults are innumerable, and convince me that Mr. Dryden did not, or would not understand his author (s). This shows how fit Mr. D. may be to inconsistent (b). Pope, as a Papist, must be a tory and high flyer (c). He is both whig and tory (d).

He hath made it his custom to cackle to more than one party in their own sentiments (e).

In his miscellanies, the persons abused are, The King, the Queen, his late Majesty, both Houses of Parliament, the Privy-Council, the Bench of Bishops, the established Church, the present Minister, &c. To make sense of some passages, they must be construed into Royal Scandal (f).

He is a Popish rhymester, bred up with a contempt of the sacred writings (g). His religion allows him to destroy heretics, not only with his pen, but with fire and sword; and such were all those unhappy wits whom he sacrificed to his accursed Popish principles (h). It deserved vengeance to suggest, that Mr. Pope had less infallibility, than his namesake at Rome (i).

MR. POPE only a Versifier.

The smooth numbers of the Dunciad are all that recommend it, nor has it any other merit (k). It must be owned that he hath got a notable knack of rhyming and writing smooth verse (l).

MR. POPE'S Homer.

The Homer which Lintot prints, does not talk like Homer, but like Pope; and he who translated him, one would swear, had a hill in Tipperary for his Parnassus, and a puddle in some bog for his Hippocrene (m). He has no admirers, among those that can distinguish, discern, and judge (n).

He hath a knack at smooth verse, but without either genius or good sense, or any tolerable knowledge of English. The qualities which distinguish Homer are the beauties of his diction, and the harmony of his versification—But this little author, who is so much in vogue, has neither sense in his thoughts, nor English in his expressions (o).

MR. POPE understood no Greek.

He hath undertaken to translate Homer from the Greek, of which he knows not one word, into English, of which he understands as little (p). I translate Homer! A mistake in a single letter might fall on the printer well enough, but ixwe for ixwe must be the error of the author: nor had he art enough to correct it at the press (t). Mr. Dryden writes for the Court Ladies—He writes for the ladies, and not for use (u).

The translator puts in a little burlesque now and then into Virgil, for a ragout to his cheated subscribers (w).

MR DRYDEN tricked his Subscribers.

I wonder that any man, who could not but be conscious of his own unfitness for it, should go to amuse the learned world with such an undertaking! A man ought to value his reputation more than money; and not to hope that those who can read for themselves, will be imposed upon, merely by a partiality and unseasonably celebrated name (x). "Poetis quidlibet audendi" shall be Mr. Dryden's motto, though it should extend to picking of pockets (y).

Names bestowed on MR. DRYDEN.

An Ape.] A crafty ape dressed up in a gawdy gown—Whips put into an ape's paw, to play pranks with—None but apish and Papish brats will heed him (z).

An Ass.] A camel will take upon him no more burden than is sufficient for his strength, but there is another beast that crouches under all (a).

A Frog.] Poet squab endued with poet Maro's spirit! an ugly, croaking kind of vermin, which would swell to the bulk of an ox (b).

A Coward.] A Clinias or a Damantas, or a man of Mr. Dryden's own courage (c).

A Knave.] Mr. Dryden has heard of Paul the knave of Jesus Christ: And if I mistake not, I've read somewhere of John Dryden, servant to his Majesty (d).

A Fool.] Had he not been such a self-conceited fool (e)—Some great poets are positive block-heads (f).

A Thing.] So little a thing as Mr. Dryden (g).

wonder how this gentleman would look, should it be discovered, that he has not translated ten verses together in any book of Homer with justice to the poet, and yet he dares reproach his fellow writers with not understanding Greek (q). He has stuck so little to his original, as to have his knowledge in Greek called in question (r) I should be glad to know which it is of all Homer's excellencies which has so delighted the ladies, and the gentlemen who judge like ladies (s).

But he has a notable talent at burlesque; his genius slides so naturally into it, that he hath burlesqued Homer without designing it (t).

MR. POPE tricked his Subscribers.

It is indeed somewhat bold, and almost prodigious, for a single man to undertake such a work: But it is too late to dissuade by demonstrating the madness of the project. The subscribers expectations have been raised in proportion to what their pockets have been drained of (u). Pope has been concerned in jobs, and hired out his name to booksellers (w).

Names bestowed on MR. POPE.

An Ape.] Let us take the initial letter of his Christian name, and initial and final letters of his surname, viz. APE. and they give you the same idea of an ape as his face (x), &c.

An Ass.] It is my duty to pull off the lion's skin from this little ass (y).

A Frog.] A squab short gentleman—a little creature that, like the frog in the fable, swells, and is angry that it is not allowed to be as big as an ox (z).

A Coward.] A lurking, way-laying coward (a).

A Knave.] He is one whom God and nature have marked for want of common honesty (b).

A Fool.] Great fools will be christened by the names of great poets, and Pope will be called Homer (c).

A Thing.] A little abject thing (d).

THE LIFE OF THE AUTHOR.

Of manners gentle, of affections mild,
In wit a man, simplicity a child :
With native humour temp'ring virtuous rage,
Form'd to delight at once and lash the age ;
Above temptation in a low estate,
And uncorrupted, even among the great ;
A safe companion, and an easy friend,
Unblam'd through life, lamented in thy end.
These are thy honours! not that here thy bust
Is mix'd with heroes, or with kings thy dust ;
But that the virtuous and the good shall say,
Striking their pensive bosoms—Here lies GAY.

POPE'S EPITAPH ON GAY.

THE LIFE OF GAY.

JOHN GAY was born at or near Barnstaple in Devonshire, in 1688. His family was ancient, and had been long in possession of the estate of Goldworthy in that county; but being much reduced, he was born, as he himself tells us in his Rural Sports, without prospect of hereditary riches.

But I, who ne'er was blest by fortune's hand,
Nor brighten'd ploughshares in paternal land,

He was educated at the Free School of Barnstaple, by Mr. Luck, a master of good reputation, and author of a volume of Latin and English verses, from whom he acquired a taste for classical literature and poetry.

His fortune being insufficient to support the rank of a gentleman, and inadequate to the expence of a liberal education, he was sent to London, and placed apprentice with a silk mercer in the Strand.

The restraint and servility of his occupation soon became his aversion; and in a few years, his master, upon the offer of a small consideration, willingly consented to give up his indentures.

He was now at leisure to indulge his propensity to poetry; and as genius concurred with inclination, he soon produced his Rural Sports, a Georgic, printed in 1711, which he inscribed to Pope, who was then rising fast into reputation.

This performance procured him the acquaintance of Pope, who found such attractions in his manners and conversation, that he received him into his inmost confidence; and a friendship was formed between them, which lasted till their separation by death, without any known abatement on either part.

The same year he published, in prose, The Present State of Wit, containing a character of the periodical papers of the time.

His reputation was now so greatly advanced, that he attracted the notice of the Duchess of Monmouth, who, in 1712, appointed him her Secretary, with a handsome salary.

The kindness of the Duchess was very seasonable; for it relieved him from the importunities of want, occasioned by improvident thoughtlessness, and afforded him leisure to pursue his poetical studies; of which he made so good use, that the same year he produced Trivia, or the Art of Walking the Streets of London, one of the happiest of his poetical performances.

The same year appeared The Mohocks, a tragi-comical Farce, as it was acted near the Watch-house in Covent-Garden, which is generally supposed to have proceeded from his pen. In 1713, when Steele began "The Guardian," assisted by Addison and other wits, he contributed to it, Nos. 11, and 149.

The same year he brought on the stage, at Drury-Lane, his Wife of Bath, a Comedy, which was acted with very indifferent success; and on its revival, with some alterations, at Lincoln's Inn Fields, in 1730, he had the mortification to see it again rejected.

In 1714 he published The Shepherd's Week, in six pastorals, with a Proeme, in obsolete language, and a Prologue, addressed to Bolingbroke, who was then high in reputation and influence among the Tories. It was written at the instigation of Pope, and designed to degrade the compositions of A. Philips, his rival in pastoral poetry, by shewing, that if it be necessary to copy nature with minuteness, rural life must be exhibited, such as grossness and ignorance have made it. The execution of the plan exceeded the expectation of Pope, for the effect of reality and truth became conspicuous;

even when the intention was to show them groveling and degraded; and The Shepherd's Week was read with delight, as a just representation of rural manners and occupations, by those who had no interest in the rivalry of Pope and Philips.

The most promising views of preferment now opened to him at court. He was caressed by Bolingbroke, Swift, and the leading persons in the Tory Ministry, and his patroness rejoiced to see him taken from her service to attend the Earl of Clarendon, as Secretary to his embassy to the Court of Hanover, in the last year of Queen Anne's life.

This was a station that naturally gave him hopes of kindness from every party; but the Queen's death, which happened fifteen days after his arrival at Hanover, put an end to her favours, and the dedication of his Shepherd's Week to Bolingbroke, is supposed to have obstructed all kindness from the house of Hanover.

His office, however, made him personally known to the royal family; and his Epistle to a Lady occasioned by the arrival of her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, procured him a favourable admittance at the new court.

In 1715, he brought on the stage his What-d'ye-Call-it, a tragi-comic-pastoral Farce, which was acted with great applause, and honoured with the attendance of the Prince and Princess of Wales.

The novelty of this mock tragedy, the images of which were comic, and the action grave, and the favour with which it was received by the audience, produced a pamphlet against it, called, "The Key to the What-d'ye-Call-it," written by Griffin, a player, in conjunction with Theobald.

The exhibition of The What-d'ye-Call-it, pleased the town and the court, and advanced the reputation of its author, but failed to raise his fortune.

Places he found were daily given away,
And yet no friendly gazette mentioned Gay.

The profits, however, recruited his finances; and his poetical merit being endeared by the sweetness and sincerity of his disposition, made him the general favourite of the whole association of wits, and the companion of persons of the highest distinction, both in rank and abilities.

In 1716, he made a visit to Devonshire, at the expence of the Earl of Burlington, whom he repaid with an Epistle, containing an humorous account of his journey.

The year following, he made a similar return to the kindness of Mr. Pulteney, who, on resigning his place of Secretary at War, took him to Aix.

Soon after his return from France, he endeavoured to entertain the town with The Three Hours after Marriage, a Comedy, written by the joint assistance of Pope and Arbuthnot, which was deservedly driven off the stage with general condemnation. It was printed under the name of Gay, but his hand is not very discernible in any part of it. The character of Sir Tremendous, being apparently designed for Dennis, was probably introduced by Pope. Fossile, who was meant to ridicule Dr. Woodward, a man not really nor justly contemptible, might have been the production of Arbuthnot, whose knowledge in his profession would furnish a sufficient train of physical terms and observations. Phabe Clinket also should seem to have been intended to ridicule one of the females, whose petulant attacks had irritated Pope. Cibber says, that his own quarrel with him was occasioned by a joke thrown into the "Rehearsal," at the expence of this unsuccessful performance.

In 1718, he accompanied Pope on a visit to Lord Harcourt, at his seat in Oxfordshire, where he consecrated to posterity the death of two rural lovers, unfortunately killed in the neighbouring fields by a stroke of lightning, in his letter to Fenton, printed among Pope's Letters.

In 1720, he published a collection of his Poems, with Dione, a pastoral-tragedy, in 4to, by subscription, which, as he was generally known, was so successful, that he raised a thousand pounds, with which Pope advised him, and was seconded by Swift, to purchase an annuity; but the advice was thrown away.

Mr. Secretary Caggs having made him a present of some South Sea stock, he fell into the general insatiation of that disastrous year, and once supposed himself to be master of twenty thousand pounds.

His friends endeavoured to persuade him to sell his share; but he could not bear to obstruct his own fortune. He was then importuned to sell as much as would purchase a hundred a-year for life, "which," says Fenton, "would make you sure of a clean shirt and a shoulder of mutton every day." This advice was rejected; the profit and principal were lost; and he sunk under the calamity so low, that his life became in danger.

After languishing some time, he removed to Hampstead, in 1722, where, by the care of his friends, among whom Arbuthnot and Pope appear to have shown particular tenderness, his health was restored; and returning to his studies, he wrote The Captives, a Tragedy, which he was invited to read to the Princess of Wales, at Leicester-house.

On this occasion Mr. Victor relates, that when the hour came, and he saw the Princess and her ladies all in expectation, advancing with reverence, too great for any other attention, "he did not see a low foot-stool that happened to be near him, and stumbling over it, he fell against a large screen, which he overset, and threw the ladies into no small disorder."

The Captives was brought on the stage at Drury-Lane, in 1723, and acted eleven nights with great applause. The author's third night, was, by the express command of the Prince and Princess of Wales.

He now thought himself in favour; and having promises made him of preferment, he undertook to write Fables for the improvement of the young Duke of Cumberland, which he published, with a dedication to that Prince, in 1726. In some of the Fables "he was thought to be something too bold with the court," and in The Hare with many Friends, he figuratively described his own dependence on the promises of the Great.

Upon the accession of George II., the year following, his patroness became Queen, and he expected to be provided for in some office suitable to his inclination and abilities; but, on the settlement of the household, he found himself appointed Gentleman Usher to the Princess Louisa. By this offer he thought himself insulted, and sent a message to the Queen, that he was too old for the place. Remonstrances and solicitations were afterwards employed in his favour, and verses and flatteries were addressed to Mrs. Howard, afterwards Countess of Suffolk, who was much beloved by the King and Queen, to engage her interest in his promotion; but remonstrances and solicitations availed him nothing, and the verses and flatteries were thrown away.

The public favour, however, made him ample amends for the neglect of the court; and the pain which he suffered from his private disappointment, may be supposed to have been driven away by the unprecedented, and almost incredible success of the Beggar's Opera, written in ridicule of the musical Italian drama, and acted at Lincoln's Inn-fields, in 1727. It was first offered to Cibber and his brethren at Drury-Lane, and rejected; it being then carried to Rich, had the effect, as was ludicrously said, of making Gay rich, and Rich gay.

Of the original and progress of this new species of composition, Spence has given the relation in Pope's words.

"Dr. Swift had been observing once to Mr. Gay, what an odd pretty sort of a thing a Newgate pastoral might make. Gay was inclined to try at such a thing for some time, but afterwards thought it would be better to write a Comedy on the same plan. This was what gave rise to the Beggar's Opera. He began on it; and when first he mentioned it to Swift, the Doctor did not much like the project. As he carried it on, he showed it to both of us, and we now and then gave a correction, or a word or two of advice; but it was wholly of his own writing.—When it was done, neither of us thought it would succeed.—We showed it to Congreve, who, after reading it over, said, it would either take greatly, or be damned confoundedly.—We were all at the first night of it, in very great uncertainty of the event; 'till we were very much encouraged, by overhearing the Duke of Argyle, who sat in the next box to us, say, "It will do; it must do; I see it in the eyes of them." This was a good while before the first act was over, and so gave us ease soon; for that Duke (besides his own good taste) has a particular knack, as any one living, in discovering the taste of the public. He was quite right in this, as usual; the good nature of the audience appeared stronger and stronger every act, and ended in a clamour of applause."

Its reception is thus recorded in the notes to the Dunciad, (Book iii. l. 320.)

"This piece was received with greater applause than was ever known. Besides being acted in London sixty-three days without interruption, and renewed the next season with equal applause, it spread into all the great towns of England; was played in many places to the thirtieth and fortieth time; at Bath and Bristol fifty, &c. It made its progress into Wales, Scotland, and Ireland, where it was performed twenty-four days successively. The ladies carried about with them the favourite songs of it in fans, and houses were furnished with it in screens. The fame of it was not confined to the author only. The person who acted Polly, [Miss Fenton, afterwards Duchess of Bolton] till then obscure, became, all at once, the favourite of the town; her pictures were engraved and sold in great numbers; her life written; books of letters and verses to her published; and pamphlets made even of her sayings and jests. Furthermore, it drove out of England (for that season) the Italian Opera, which had carried all before it for ten years."

Of the Beggar's Opera, when it was printed, the reception was different, according to the different opinion of its readers. Swift commended it for the excellence of its morality, as a piece, that, "by a turn of humour, entirely new, placed all kinds of vice in the strongest and most odious light." [Intelligencer, No. 111.]

Dr. Herring, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, censured it as giving encouragement, not only to vice, but to crimes, by making a highwayman the hero, and dismissing him at last unpunished. Both these decisions are perhaps exaggerated; but it must be confessed, that the last has received the sanction of some respectable magistrates, who have said, that, after the exhibition of the Beggar's Opera, the gangs of robbers were evidently multiplied.

Encouraged by the unexampled success of the Beggar's Opera, he produced a second part, called Polly; but the objections to the first part, either political or moral, had obtained such prevalence, that when it was ready for rehearsal at Covent-Garden, a message was sent from the Lord Chamberlain, that it was not allowed to be acted, but commanded to be suppressed.

Being deprived of the produce of his talents by this act of power, he was forced to recompense his repulse, by printing it by a subscription, which drew the humanity of the public to his side, and was so liberal and extensive, that though the first part gained him four hundred pounds, the profits of the second were near thrice as much.—Considering its inferiority to the other in satire, wit, plot, and execution, in all probability he would not have been much a gainer, if it had been left to its own fate.

He received yet another recompense for this supposed hardship, in the kindness of the Duke and Duchess of Queensberry, who resented the indignity put upon him, resigned their respective employments at court, and took him into their family, and treated him with the most affectionate attention during the remaining part of his life. Spence relates, that the Duke, considering his want of economy, undertook the management of his money, and gave it to him as he wanted it. But it is supposed that the discountenance of the court, aggravated by the rejection of his Wife of Bath, which he brought again on the stage, in 1730, sunk deep into his heart, and gave him more discontent than the applauses or tenderness of his friends could overpower.

His dejection was soon accompanied by the return of his constitutional distemper, the colic, which he in vain endeavoured to remove, by a journey to Amesbury, the seat of his noble patron, in Wiltshire. "My melancholy," he writes to Pope, "increases, and every hour threatens me with some return of my distemper."

In this disposition, it is no wonder that he rejected Pope's proposal, in 1732, of writing verses on the Queen's hermitage; to which he answers, with a fixed despondency, "I know myself unworthy of royal patronage." He exerted himself, however, sufficiently to exhibit at the Haymarket this year; his Acis and Galatea, a Serenata, in air and recitative; the story taken from Ovid, and the music composed by Handel.

In the beginning of October 1732, he became apprehensive of his approaching end. "I begin," says he, "to look upon myself as one already dead, and desire my dear Mr. Pope, whom I love as my own soul, if you survive me, as you certainly will, if a stone should mark the place of my grave, see these words put upon it, with what else you may think proper."

Life is a jest, and all things show it;
I thought so once, but now I know it.

He found, however, in the delightful retirement of Amesbury, many intervals of ease and cheerfulness, which enabled him to finish the Opera of Achilles; and coming with the family to their house in Burlington-Gardens, to pass the winter season, he gave it to the theatre; and the week after, was suddenly seized with a violent inflammatory fever, which ending in a mortification of his bowels, put a period to his life, December 4th, 1732, in the 54th year of his age.

He was buried in Westminster Abbey, where his noble patrons erected a handsome monument to his memory; and Pope, agreeable to his dying request, gave him an epitaph, written with fondness and respect, but apparently with more esteem of his worth than veneration for his talents.

Then follows this inscription:

Here lie the ashes of MR. JOHN GAY,
The warmest friend,
The most benevolent man;
Who maintained
Independency
In low circumstances of fortune;
Integrity
In the midst of a corrupt age;
And that equal serenity of mind
Which conscious goodness alone can give,
Through the whole course of his life.
Favourite of the muses
He was led by them to every elegant art;
Refined in taste,
And fraught with graces all his own:
In various kinds of poetry
Superior to many,
Inferior to none,
His works continue to inspire
What his example taught,
Contempt of folly, however adorned;
Detestation of vice, however dignified;
Reverence of virtue, however disgraced.

Charles and Catherine, Duke and Duchesse of Queensberry, who loved this excellent man living, and regret him dead, have caused this monument to be erected to his memory.

The Opera of Achilles was acted soon after his death, and the profits were given to two widow sisters, Mrs. Ballet and Mrs. Fortescue, who, as heirs at law, shared his fortune, amounting to 3000*l.*, between them.

In 1738, was published a second volume of his Fables, more grave, and more political than the former.

There have appeared likewise under his name, The Distress'd Wife, a Comedy, first printed in 1743, and acted at Covent-Garden in 1772, and a humorous piece, called The Rehearsal at Gotham.

His Poems on Several Occasions, were printed in 2 vols. 12mo, 1737. Two additional volumes, professing to be The Miscellaneous Works of Mr. John Gay, were printed in 12mo, 1773; in which a fraud of singular importance to his reputation has been attempted. The "Elegiac Epistle to a Friend," "A Ballad on Ale," "Story of Cepheia," "Gondibert, Cantos 7, 8, 9," "The Man Mountain's Answer to the Liliputian verses," need no comment. The imposition is undeniable. The poem on Wine first printed in 1710, is inserted on the authority of Hill.

The character of Gay seems to have been very amiable. He was of an affable, sweet disposition, generous in his temper, and pleasant in his conversation. He was universally beloved, and esteemed as a soft and civil companion. His chief fault was an excessive indolence, without the least knowledge of economy, which often subjected him to pecuniary difficulties. "He was a natural man," says Spence in Pope's words, "without design, who spoke what he thought, and just as he thought it; he was of timid temper, and fearful of giving offence to the great; which caution, however, was of no avail." In the "Dunciad," he says, with just indignation,

Gay dies unpension'd with a hundred friends;

And, in the "Epistle to Arbuthnot," he has this tender and indignant apostrophe—

Of all thy blameless life the sole return,
My verse, and Queensb'ry weeping o'er thy urn!

As a poet, he is characterised by variety, sprightliness, ease, and elegance. His compositions, though original in some parts, are not of the highest kind. They are, in general, more distinguished by vivacity, penetration, good sense, and perspicuity of expression, than by sublimity, tenderness, imagination, and strength or harmony of numbers. His Pastorals, Fables, and Beggar's Opera, are the chief foundation of his fame. His pastorals seem to have the highest finishing. They are perfectly Doric. The rural simplicity neglected by Pope, and admired in Philips, appears in its true guise in the Shepherd's Week: "There only nature is seen exactly such as the country affordeth, and the manner meetly copied from the rustical folk therein." His Fables have obtained more popularity. They are the favourites of the nursery and of the school, and the delight of persons of every rank and of every age. The versification is polished, the apologues, in general, are correct; they possess originality, wit, and humour; and to these is superadded, a considerable portion of poetical spirit. He is sometimes, however, deficient in that quality, and in the harmony of his numbers; but he is, upon the whole, the most agreeable metrical fabulist in our language. The merits of the Beggar's Opera are universally acknowledged. "We owe to Gay," says Dr. Johnson, "the Ballad Opera: a mode of Comedy, which at first was supposed to delight only by its novelty; but has now, by the experience of half a century, been found so well accommodated to the disposition of a popular audience, that it is likely to keep long possession of the stage. Whether this new drama was the product of judgment or of luck, the praise of it must be given to the inventor: and there are many writers read with more reverence, to whom such merit of originality cannot be attributed."

Of his Tales, Epistles, Eclogues, Songs, &c. it would be superfluous to enumerate the brighter passages. Many of these little compositions are favourites with the public. His Tales and Eclogues unite a considerable portion of the grace and ease of Prior, with the humour of Swift; but they are not remarkable for the beauty of their images, or the harmony of their numbers. His Pastoral Tragedy of Dione is classical and elegant; but will not greatly entertain without the proper embellishments, acting and music. His Contemplation on Night, and Thoughts on Eternity, merit the highest praise. His Sweet William's Farewell, is one of the most popular ballads in the English language.

The estimate of his poetical character, as given by Dr. Johnson, is, in some instances, too severe to be approved by readers uncorrupted by literary prejudices.

"As a poet, he cannot be rated very high. He was, as I once heard a female critic remark, "of a lower order." He had not, in any great degree, the mens divinator, the dignity of genius. His first performance, the Rural Sports, is such as was easily planned and executed: it is never contemptible, nor ever excellent. The Fan is one of those mythological fictions which antiquity delivers ready to the hand, but which, like other things that lie open to every one's use, are of little value. His Fables seem to have been a favourite work. Of this kind of fables he does not appear to have formed any distinct or settled notion. For a Fable he gives now and then a Tale, or an abstracted Allegory; and from some, by whatever name they are called, it will be difficult to extract any moral principle. They are, however, told with liveliness; the versification is smooth, and the diction, though now and then a little constrained by the measure or the rhyme, is generally happy. The Trivia may be allowed all that it claims: it is sprightly, various, and pleasant. The subject is of that kind which Gay was, by nature, qualified to adorn; yet some of his decorations may be justly wished away. The appearance of Cloacina is nauseous and superfluous. Dione, is a counterpart to "Amynta" and "Pastor Fido," and other trifles of the same kind, easily imitated, and unworthy of imitation. What the Italians call Comedies, from a happy conclusion, Gay calls a Tragedy, from a mournful event; but the style of the Italians and of Gay is equally tragical.

"Of his little poems the public judgment seems to be right; they are neither much esteemed, nor totally despised. The Story of the Apparition is borrowed from one of the tales of Poggio. Those that please least, are the pieces to which Gulliver gave occasion; for who can much delight in the echo of an unnatural fiction?"

POEMS BY MR. GAY.

RURAL SPORTS:

A GEORGIC.

INSCRIBED TO MR. POPE, 1713 *.

“—Securi prælia ruris
Pandimus.” NEMESIAN

CANTO I.

YOU, who the sweets of rural life have known,
Despise th' ungrateful hurry of the town;
In Windsor groves your easy hours employ,
And, undisturb'd, yourself and muse enjoy,
'Thames listens to thy strains, and silent flows,*
And no rude wind through rustling o'fers blows;
While all his wondering nymphs around thee
throng,

To hear the Syrens warble in thy song.

But I, who ne'er was blest by fortune's hand,
Nor brighten'd ploughshares in paternal land,
Long in the noisy town have been immur'd,
Respir'd its smoke, and all its cares endur'd,
Where news and politics divide mankind,
And schemes of state involve th' uneasy mind;
Faction embroils the world; and every tongue
Is mov'd by flattery, or with scandal hung:
Friendship, for sylvan shades, the palace flies,
Where all must yield to interest's dearer ties,
Each rival Machiavel with envy burns,
And honesty forsakes them all by turns;
While calumny upon each party's thrown,
Which both promote, and both alike disown.
Fatigu'd at last, a calm retreat I chose,
And sooth'd my harass'd mind with sweet repose,
Where fields and shades, and the refreshing clime,
Inspire the sylvan song, and prompt my rhyme.
My muse shall rove through flowery meads and plains,
And deck with Rural Sports her native strains;
And the same road ambitiously pursue,
Frequented by the Mantuan swain and you.

'Tis not that rural sports alone invite,
But all the grateful country breathes delight;

* This poem received many material corrections from the author after it was first published.

Here blooming health exerts her gentle reign,
And strings the sinews of th' industrious swain.
Soon as the morning lark salutes the day,
Through dewy fields I take my frequent way,
Where I behold the farmer's early care
In the revolving labours of the year.

When the fresh spring in all her state is crown'd
And high luxuriant grass o'erspreads the ground,
The labourer with a bending scythe is seen,
Shaving the surface of the waving green;
Of all her native pride disrobes the land,
And meads lays waste before his sweeping hand;
While with the mounting sun the meadow glows,
The fading herbage round he loosely throws:
But, if some sign portend a lasting shower,
Th' experienc'd swain foresees the coming hour;
His sun-burnt hands the scattering fork forsake,
And ruddy damsels ply the saving rake;
In rising hills the fragrant harvest grows,
And spreads along the field in equal rows. [gains,

Now when the height of heaven bright Phœbus
And level rays cleave wide the thirsty plains,
When heifers seek the shade and cooling lake,
And in the middle path-way basks the snake;
O lead me, guard me from the sultry hours,
Hide me, ye forests, in your closest bowers,
Where the tall oak his spreading arms entwines,
And with the beech a mutual shade combines;
Where flows the murmuring brook, inviting dreams,
Where bordering hazel overhangs the streams,
Whose rolling current, winding round and round,
With frequent falls makes all the wood resound;
Upon the mossy couch my limbs I cast,
And e'en at noon the sweets of evening taste.

Here I peruse the Mantuan's Georgic strains,
And learn the labours of Italian swains;
In every page I see new landscapes rise,
And all Hesperia opens to my eyes;

I wander o'er the various rural toil,
 And know the nature of each different soil:
 This waving field is gilded o'er with corn,
 That spreading trees with blushing fruit adorn:
 Here I survey the purple vintage grow,
 Climb round the poles, and rise in graceful row:
 Now I behold the steed curvet and bound,
 And paw with restless hoof the smoking ground:
 The dew-lap'd bull now chafes along the plain,
 While burning love ferments in every vein;
 His well-arm'd front against his rival aims,
 And by the dint of war his mistress claims:
 The careful insect 'midst his works I view,
 Now from the flowers exhaust the fragrant dew;
 With golden treasures load his little thighs,
 And steer his distant journey through the skies;
 Some against hostile drones the hive defend,
 Others with sweets the waxen cells distend;
 Each in the toil his destin'd office bears,
 And in the little bulk a mighty soul appears.

Or when the ploughman leaves the task of day,
 And trudging homeward whistles on the way;
 When the big-udder'd cows with patience stand,
 Waiting the stroakings of the damsel's hand;
 No warbling cheers the woods; the feather'd choir
 To court kind slumbers, to the sprays retire;
 When no rude gale disturbs the sleeping trees,
 Nor aspen leaves confess the gentlest breeze;
 Engag'd in thought, to Neptune's bounds I stray,
 To take my farewell of the parting day;
 Far in the deep the sun his glory hides,
 A streak of gold the sea and sky divides:
 The purple clouds their amber linings show,
 And edg'd with flame rolls every wave below:
 Here pensive I behold the fading light,
 And o'er the distant billow lose my sight.

Now night in silent state begins to rise,
 And twinkling orbs bestow th' uncloudy skies;
 Her borrow'd lustre growing Cythia lends,
 And on the main a glittering path extends:
 Millions of worlds hang in the spacious air,
 Which round their suns their annual circles steer;
 Sweet contemplation elevates my sense,
 While I survey the works of providence.
 O could the muse in loftier strains rehearse
 The glorious Author of the universe,
 Who reins the winds, gives the vast ocean bounds,
 And circumscribes the floating worlds their rounds;

My soul should overflow in songs of praise,
 And my Creator's name inspire my lays!

As in successive course the seasons roll,
 So circling pleasures recreate the soul.
 When genial spring a living warmth bestows,
 And o'er the year her verdant mantle throws,
 No swelling inundation hides the grounds,
 But crystal currents glide within their bounds;
 The finny brood their wonted haunts forsake.
 Float in the sun, and skim along the lake;
 With frequent leap they range the shallow streams,
 Their silver coats reflect the dazzling beams.
 Now let the fisherman his toils prepare,
 And arm himself with every watery snare;
 His hooks, his lines, peruse with careful eye,
 Increase his tackle, and his rod retie.

When floating clouds their spongy fleeces drain,
 Troubling the streams with swift descending rain;
 And waters tumbling down the mountain's side,
 Bear the loose soil into the swelling tide;
 Then soon as vernal gales begin to rise,
 And drive the liquid burthen through the skies,
 The fisher to the neighbouring current speeds,
 Whose rapid surface purls unknown to weeds:
 Upon a rising border of the brook
 He sits him down, and ties the treacherous hook;
 Now expectation cheers his eager thought,
 His bosom glows with treasures yet uncaught,
 Before his eyes a banquet seems to stand,
 Where every guest applauds his skilful hand.

Far up the stream the twisted hair he throws,
 Which down the murmuring current gently flows;
 When, if or chance or hunger's powerful sway
 Directs the roving trout this fatal way,
 He greedily sucks in the twining bait,
 And tugs and nibbles the fallacious meat;
 Now, happy fisherman, now twitch the line!
 How thy rod bends! behold, the prize is thine!
 Cast on the bank, he dies with gasping pains,
 And trickling blood his silver mail distains.

You must not every worm promiscuous use,
 Judgment will tell the proper bait to choose:
 The worm that draws a long immoderate size,
 The trout abhors, and the rank morsel flies;
 And, if too small, the naked fraud's in sight,
 And fear forbids, while hunger does invite.
 Those baits will best reward the fisher's pains,
 Whose polish'd tails a shining yellow stains:
 Cleanse them from filth, to give a tempting gloss,
 Cherish the sully'd reptile race with moss;
 Amid the verdant bed they twine, they toil,
 And from their bodies wipe their native soil.

But when the sun displays his gracious beams,
 And shallow rivers flow with silver streams,
 Then the deceit the scaly breed survey,
 Bask in the sun, and look into the day:
 You now a more delusive art must try,
 And tempt their hunger with the curious fly.

To frame the little animal, provide
 All the gay hues that wait on female pride;
 Let nature guide thee; sometimes golden wire
 The shining bellies of the fly require;
 The peacock's plumes thy tackle must not fail,
 Nor the dear purchase of the fable's tail.
 Each gaudy bird some slender tribute brings,
 And lends the growing insect proper wings:
 Silks of all colours must their aid impart,
 And every fur promote the fisher's art.
 So the gay lady, with excessive care
 Borrows the pride of land, of sea, and air;
 Furs, pearls, and plumes, the glittering thing dis-
 plays,

Dazzles our eyes, and easy hearts betrays.

Mark well the various seasons of the year,
 How the succeeding insect race appear;
 In this revolving moon one colour reigns,
 Which in the next the fickle trout disdains,
 Oft have I seen the skilful angler try
 The various colours of the treacherous fly, [brook,
 When he with fruitless pain hath skimm'd the
 And the coy fish rejects the skipping hook,

He shakes the boughs that on the margin grow,
Which o'er the stream a waving forest throw;
When, if an insect fall (his certain guide),
He gently takes him from the whirling tide;
Examines well his form with curious eyes,
His gaudy vest, his wings, his horns, and size,
Then round his hook the chosen fur he winds,
And on the back a speckled feather binds,
So just the colours shine through every part,
That nature seems again to live in art.
Let not thy wary step advance too near.
While all thy hope hangs on a single hair;
The new-form'd insect on the water moves,
The speckled trout the curious snare approves;
Upon the curling surface let it glide,
With natural motion from thy hand supply'd,
Against the stream now gently let it play,
Now in the rapid eddy roll away.
The scaly shoals float by, and, seiz'd with fear,
Behold their fellows tost in thinner air;
But soon they leap, and catch the swimming bait,
Plunge on the hook, and share an equal fate.
When a brisk gale against the current blows,
And all the watery plain in wrinkles flows,
Then let the fisherman his art repeat,
Where bubbling eddies favour the deceit.
If an enormous salmon chance to spy
The wanton errors of the floating fly,
He lifts his silver gills above the flood,
And greedily sucks in th' unfaithful food;
Then downward plunges with the fraudulent prey,
And bears with joy the little spoil away;
Soon in smart pain he feels the dire mistake,
Lashes the wave, and beats the foamy lake;
With sudden rage he now aloft appears,
And in his eye convulsive anguish bears;
And now again, impatient of the wound,
He rolls and wreaths his shining body round;
Then headlong shoots beneath the dashing tide,
The trembling fins the boiling wave divide.
Now hope exalts the fisher's beating heart,
Now he turns pale, and fears his dubious art;
He views the tumbling fish with longing eyes,
While the line stretches with th' unwieldy prize;
Each motion humours with his steady hands,
And one slight hair the mighty bulk commands:
Till, tir'd at last, despoil'd of all his strength,
The game athwart the stream unfolds his length.
He now, with pleasure, views the gasping prize
Gnash his sharp teeth, and roll his blood-shot eyes;
Then draws him to the shore, with artful care,
And lifts his nostrils in the sickening air;
Upon the burthen'd stream he floating lies,
Stretches his quivering fins and gasping dies.
Would you preserve a numerous finny race;
Let your fierce dogs the ravenous otter chase
(Th' amphibious monster ranges all the shores,
Darts through the waves, and every haunt explores):
Or let the gin his roving steps betray,
And save from hostile jaws the scaly prey.
I never wander where the bordering reeds
O'erlook the muddy stream, whose tangling weeds
Perplex the fisher; I nor choose to bear
The thievish nightly net, nor barbed spear;

Nor drain I ponds, the golden carp to take,
Nor troll for pikes, dispeoplers of the lake;
Around the steel no tortur'd worm shall twine,
No blood of living insect stain my line.
Let me, less cruel, cast the feather'd hook,
With pliant rod athwart the pebbled brook,
Silent along the mazy margin stray,
And with the fur-wrought fly delude the prey.

C A N T O II.

Now, sporting muse, draw in the flowing reins,
Leave the clear streams awhile for sunny plains.
Should you the various arms and toils rehearse,
And all the fisherman adorn thy verse;
Should you the wide encircling net display,
And in its spacious arch inclose the sea;
Then haul the plunging load upon the land,
And with the foal and turbot hide the sand;
It would extend the growing theme too long,
And tire the reader with the watery song.

Let the keen hunter from the chase refrain,
Nor render all the ploughman's labour vain,
When Ceres pours out plenty from her horn,
And clothes the fields with golden ears of corn.
Now, now, ye reapers, to your task repair,
Haste! save the product of the bounteous year:
To the wide-gathering hook long furrows yield,
And rising sheaves extend through all the field.

Yet, if for Sylvan sports thy bosom glow,
Let thy fleet greyhound urge his flying foe.
With what delight the rapid course I view!
How does my eye the circling race pursue!
He snaps deceitful air with empty jaws;
The subtle hare darts swift beneath his paws;
She flies, she stretches, now with nimble bound
Eager he presses on, but overshoots his ground;
She turns, he winds, and soon regains the way,
Then tears with gory mouth the screaming prey.
What various sport does rural life afford! [board!
What unbought dainties heap the wholesome

Nor less the spaniel, skilful to betray,
Rewards the fowler with the feather'd prey.
Soon as the labouring horse, with swelling veins,
Hath safely hous'd the farmer's doubtful gains,
To sweet repast th' unwary partridge flies,
With joy amid the scatter'd harvest lies;
Wandering in plenty, danger he forgets,
Nor dreads the slavery of entangling nets.
The subtle dog scours with sagacious nose
Along the field, and snuffs each breeze that blows;
Against the wind he takes his prudent way,
While the strong gale directs him to the prey;
Now the warm scent assures the covey near,
He treads with caution, and he points with fear;
Then (lest some sentry-fowl the fraud descry,
And bid his fellows from the danger fly)
Close to the ground in expectation lies,
Till in the snare the fluttering covey rise.
Soon as the blushing light begins to spread,
And glancing Phœbus gilds the mountain's head,
His early flight th' ill-fated partridge takes,
And quits the friendly shelter of the brakes.
Or, when the sun casts a declining ray,
And drives his chariot down the western way

Let your obsequious ranger search around,
Where yellow stubble withers on the ground:
Nor will the roving spy direct in vain,
But numerous coveys gratify thy pain.

When the meridian sun contracts the shade,
And frisking heifers seek the cooling glade;
Or when the country floats with sudden rains,
Or driving mists deface the moisten'd plains;
In vain his toils th' unskilful fowler tries,
While in thick woods the feeding partridge lies.

Nor must the sporting verse the gun forbear,
But what's the fowler's be the muses' care.
See how the well-taught pointer leads the way:
The scent grows warm; he stops; he springs the prey;

The fluttering coveys from the stubble rise,
And on swift wing divide the sounding skies;
The scattering lead pursues the certain flight,
And death in thunder overtakes their flight.

Cool breathes the morning air, and winter's hand
Spreads wide her hoary mantle o'er the land;
Now to the copse thy lesser spaniel take,
Teach him to range the ditch, and force the brake;
Not closest coverts can protect the game:
Hark! the dog opens; take thy certain aim.

The woodcock flutters; how he wavering flies!
The wood resounds; he wheels, he drops, he dies.

The towering hawk let future poets sing,
Who terror bears upon his soaring wing:
Let them on high the frightened hern survey,
And lofty numbers paint their airy fray.
Nor shall the mounting lark the muse detain,
That greets the morning with his early strain;
When, 'midst his song, the twinkling glass betrays,

While from each angle flash the glancing rays,
And in the sun the transient colours blaze,
Pride lures the little warbler from the skies:
The light-enamour'd bird deluded dies.

But still the chase, a pleasant task, remains;
The hound must open in these rural strains.
Soon as Aurora drives away the night,
And edges eastern clouds with rosy light,
The healthy huntsman, with the cheerful horn,
Summons the dogs, and greets the dappled morn;
The jocund thunder wakes th' enliven'd hounds,
They rouse from sleep, and answer sounds for sounds;

Wide through the furfy field their rot they take,
Their bleeding bosoms force the thorny brake:
The flying game their smoking nostrils trace,
No bounding hedge obstructs their eager pace;
The distant mountains echo from afar,
And hanging woods resound the flying war:
The tuneful noise the sprightly courser hears,
Paws the green turf, and pricks his trembling ears;
The slacken'd rein now gives him all his speed,
Back flies the rapid ground beneath the steed;
Hills, dales, and forests, far behind remain, [train.
While the warm scent draws on the deep-mouth'd
Where shall the trembling hare a shelter find?
Hark! death advances in each gust of wind!

Now stratagems and doubling wiles she tries,
Now circling turns, and now at large she flies;
Till spent at last, she pants, and heaves for breath,
Then lays her down, and waits devouring death.

But stay, adventurous muse! hast thou the force

To wind the twisted horn, to guide the horse?
To keep the seat unmov'd, hast thou the skill,
O'er the high gate, and down the headlong hill?
Canst thou the stag's laborious chase direct,
Or the strong fox through all his arts detect?
The theme demands a more experienc'd lay:
Ye mighty hunters! spare this weak essay.

O happy plains, remote from war's alarms,
And all the ravages of hostile arms!
And happy shepherds, who, secure from fear,
On open downs preserve your fleecy care!
Whose spacious barns groan with increasing store,
And whirling flails disjoint the cracking floor!
No barbarous soldier, bent on cruel spoil,
Spreads desolation o'er your fertile soil;
No trampling steed lays waste the ripen'd grain,
Nor crackling fires devour the promis'd gain:
No flaming beacons cast their blaze afar,
The dreadful signal of invasive war:
No trumpet's clangour wounds the mother's ear,
And calls the lover from his swooning fair.

What happiness the rural maid attends,
In cheerful labour while each day she spends!
She gratefully receives what Heaven has sent,
And, rich in poverty, enjoys content.
(Such happiness, and such unblemish'd fame,
Ne'er glad the bosom of the courtly dame):
She never feels the spleen's imagin'd pains,
Nor melancholy stagnates in her veins;
She never loses life in thoughtless ease,
Nor on the velvet couch invites disease;
Her home-spun dress in simple neatness lies,
And for no glaring equipage she sighs:
Her reputation, which is all her boast,
In a malicious visit ne'er was lost;
No midnight masquerade her beauty wears,
And health, not paint, the fading bloom repairs.
If love's soft passion in her bosom reign,
An equal passion warms her happy swain;
No homebred jars her quiet state control,
Nor watchful jealousy torments her soul;
With secret joy she sees her little race
Hang on her breast, and her small cottage grace;
The fleecy ball their busy fingers cull,
Or from the spindle draw the lengthening wool;
Thus flow her hours with constant peace of mind,
Till age the latest thread of life unwind.

Ye happy fields, unknown to noise and strife,
The kind rewarders of industrious life;
Ye shady woods, where once I us'd to rove,
Alike indulgent to the muse and love;
Ye murmuring streams that in meanders roll, meanders
The sweet composers of the pensive soul;
Farewell!—The city calls me from your bowers;
Farewell, amusing thoughts and peaceful hours!

THE FAN,

HOM. Iliad. xiv. 215.

BOOK I.

I SING that graceful toy, whose waving play
With gentle gales relieves the sultry day;
Not the wide fan by Persian dames display'd,
Which o'er their beauty casts a grateful shade;
Nor that long known in China's artful land,
Which, while it cools the face, fatigues the hand:
Nor shall the muse in Asian climates rove,
To seek in Indostan some spicy grove,
Where, stretch'd at ease, the panting lady lies,
To shun the fervor of meridian skies,
While sweating slaves catch every breeze of air,
And with wide-spreading fans refresh the fair;
No busy gnats her pleasing dreams molest,
Inflame her cheek, or ravage o'er her breast;
But artificial zephyrs round her fly,
And mitigate the fever of the sky.

Nor shall Bermudas long the muse detain,
Whose fragrant forests bloom in Waller's strain,
Where breathing sweets from every field ascend,
And the wild woods with golden apples bend.
Yet let me in some odorous shade repose,
Whilst in my verse the fair palmetto grows:
Like the tall pine it shoots its stately head;
From the broad top depending branches spread;
No knotty limbs the taper body bears;
Hung on each bough a single leaf appears,
Which, shrivell'd in its infancy, remains
Like a clos'd fan, nor stretches wide its veins,
But, as the seasons in their circle run,
Opes its ribb'd surface to the nearer sun:
Beneath this shade the weary peasant lies,
Plucks the broad leaf, and bids the breezes rise.
Stay, wandering muse! nor rove in foreign climes;

To thy own native shore confine thy rhymes.
Assist, ye Nine, your loftiest notes employ;
Say what celestial skill contriv'd the toy;
Say how this instrument of love began,
And in immortal strains display the Fan.

Strephon had long confess'd his amorous pain,
Which gay Corinna rallied with disdain:
Sometimes in broken words he sigh'd his care,
Look'd pale, and trembled when he view'd the fair;
With bolder freedoms now the youth advanc'd,
He dress'd, he laugh'd, he sung, he rhym'd, he danc'd;

Now call'd more powerful presents to his aid,
And, to seduce the mistress, brib'd the maid;
Smooth flattery in her softer hours apply'd,
The surest charm to bend the force of pride:
But still unmov'd remains the scornful dame,
Insults her captive, and derides his flame.
When Strephon saw his vows dispers'd in air,
He sought in solitude to lose his care;
Relief in solitude he sought in vain,
It serv'd, like music, but to feed his pain.
To Venus now the slighted boy complains,
And calls the goddess in these tender strains:

O potent queen! from Neptune's empire sprung,
Whose glorious birth admiring Nereids sung,
Who 'midst the fragrant plains of Cyprus rove,
Whose radiant presence gilds the Paphian grove,
Where to thy name a thousand altars rise,
And curling clouds of incense hide the skies:
O beauteous goddess! teach me how to move,
Inspire my tongue with eloquence of love!
If lost Adonis e'er thy bosom warm'd,
If e'er his eyes or godlike figure charm'd,
Think on those hours when first you felt the dart;
Think on the restless fever of thy heart;
Think how you pine in absence of the swain:
By those uneasy minutes know my pain.
Ev'n while Cydippe to Diana bows,
And at her shrine renews her virgin vows,
The lover, taught by thee, her pride o'ercame;
She reads his oaths, and feels an equal flame.
Oh, may my flame, like thine, Acontius, prove;
May Venus dictate, and reward my love!
When crowds of suitors Atalanta try'd,
She wealth and beauty, wit and fame defy'd;
Each daring lover with adventurous pace
Pursued his wishes in the dangerous race;
Like the swift hind, the bounding damsel flies,
Strains to the goal, the distanc'd lover dies.
Hippomenes, O Venus! was thy care,
You taught the swain to stay the flying fair;
Thy golden present caught the virgin's eyes:
She stoops; he rushes on, and gains the prize.
Say, Cyprian deity, what gift, what art,
Shall humble into love Corinna's heart?
If only some bright toy can charm her sight,
Teach me what present may suspend her flight.
Thus the desponding youth his flame declares:
The goddess with a nod his passion hears.

Far in Cythera stands a spacious grove,
Sacred to Venus and the God of Love :
Here the luxuriant myrtle rears her head,
Like the tall oak the fragrant branches spread ;
Here nature all her sweets profusely pours,
And paints th' enamell'd ground with various
flowers ;

Deep in the gloomy glade a grotto bends,
Wide through the craggy rock an arch extends,
The rugged stone is cloth'd with mantling vines,
And round the cave the creeping woodbine twines.

Here busy Cupids, with pernicious art,
Form the stiff bow, and forge the fatal dart ;
All share the toil ; while some the bellows ply,
Others with feathers teach the shafts to fly :
Some with joint force whirl round the stony wheel,
Where streams the sparkling fire from temper'd steel ;

Some point their arrows with the nicest skill,
And with the warlike store their quivers fill.

A different toil another forge employs :
Here the loud hammer fashions female toys ;
Hence is the fair with ornament supply'd ;
Hence spring the glittering implements of pride ;
Each trinket that adorns the modern dame
First to these little artists ow'd its frame :
Here an unfinish'd diamond crosslet lay,
To which soft lovers adoration pay ;
There was the polish'd crystal bottle seen,
That with quick scents revives the modish spleen ;
Here the yet rude unjointed snuff-box lies,
Which serves the rally'd fop for smart replies ;
There piles of paper rose in gilded reams,
The future records of the lover's flames ;
Here clouded canes 'midst heaps of toys are found,
And inlaid tweezer-cases strow the ground ;
There stands the toilette, nursery of charms,
Completely furnish'd with bright beauty's arms :
The patch, the powder-box, pulville, perfumes,
Pins, paint, a flattering glass, and black-lead combs.

The toilsome hours in different labours slide,
Some work the file, and some the graver guide ;
From the loud anvil the quick blow rebounds,
And their rais'd arms descend in tuneful sounds.
Thus when Semiramis, in ancient days,
Bade Babylon her mighty bulwarks raise,
A swarm of labourers different tasks attend :
Here pullies make the ponderous oak ascend ;
With echoing strokes the craggy quarry groans,
While there the chissel forms the shapeless stones ;
The weighty mallet deals resounding blows,
Till the proud battlements her towers enclose.

Now Venus mounts her car, she shakes the reins,
And steers her turtles to Cythera's plains ;
Strait to the grott with graceful step she goes,
Her loose ambrosial hair behind her flows :
The swelling bellows heave for breath no more ;
All drop their silent hammers on the floor ;
In deep suspense the mighty labour stands ;
While thus the goddess spoke her mild commands :

Industrious loves ! your present toils forbear ;
A more important task demands your care :
Long has the scheme employ'd my thoughtful
mind,
By judgment ripen'd, and by time refin'd.

That glorious bird have ye not often seen,
Who draws the car of the celestial queen ?
Have ye not oft survey'd his varying dyes,
His tail all gilded o'er with Argus' eyes ?
Have ye not seen him in a sunny day
Unfurl his plumes, and all his pride display ;
Then suddenly contract his dazzling train,
And with long-trailing feathers sweep the plain ?
Learn from this hint, let this instruct your art ;
Thin taper sticks must from one centre part :
Let these into the quadrant's form divide,
The spreading ribs with snowy paper hide ;
Here shall the pencil bid its colours flow,
And make a miniature creation grow.
Let the machine in equal foldings close,
And now its plaited surface wide dispose.
So shall the fair her idle hand employ,
And grace each motion with the restless toy ;
With various play bid zephyrs rise,
While Love in every grateful zephyr flies.

The master Cupid traces out the lines,
And with judicious hand the draught designs :
Th' expecting loves with joy the model view,
And the joint labour eagerly pursue.
Some slit their arrows with the nicest art,
And into sticks convert the shiver'd dart ;
The breathing bellows wake the sleeping fire,
Blow off the cinders, and the sparks aspire ;
Their arrow's point they soften in the flame,
And sounding hammers break its barbed frame :
Of this the little pin they neatly mould, [fold ;
From whence their arms the spreading sticks un-
In equal plaits they now the paper bend,
And at just distance the wide ribs extend ;
Then on the frame they mount the limber screen,
And finish instantly the new machine.

The goddess, pleas'd, the curious work receives,
Remounts her chariot, and the grotto leaves ;
With the light Fan she moves the yielding air,
And gales till then unknown play round the fair.

Unhappy lovers, how will ye withstand,
When these new arms shall grace your charmer's hand ?

In ancient times, when maids in thought were pure,
When eyes were artless, and the look demure ;
When the wide ruff the well-turn'd neck enclos'd !
And heaving breasts within the stays repos'd ;
When the close hood conceal'd the modest ear,
Ere black-lead combs disown'd the virgin's hair ;
Then in the muff unactive fingers lay,
Nor taught the Fan in sickle forms to play.

How are the sex improv'd in amorous arts !
What new-found snares they bait for human hearts,
When kindling war the ravag'd globe ran o'er,
And fatten'd thirsty plains with human gore,
At first, the brandish'd arm the javelin threw,
Or sent wing'd arrows from the twanging yew ;
In the bright air the dreadful faulchion shone,
Or whistling slings dismiss'd th' uncertain stone.
Now men those less destructive arms despise ;
Wide-wasteful death from thundering cannon flies :
One hour with more battalions strows the plain,
Than were of yore in weekly battles slain.
So Love with fatal airs the nymph supplies,
Her dress disposes, and directs her eyes.

The bosom now its panting beauties shows;
Th' experienc'd eye resistless glances throws;
Now vary'd patches wander o'er the face,
And strike each gazer with a borrow'd grace;
The fickle head-dress sinks, and now aspires
A towery front of lace on branching wires;
The curling hair in tortur'd ringlets flows,
Or round the face in labour'd order grows.

How shall I soar, and on unweary wing
Trace varying habits upward to their spring!
What force of thought, what numbers can express
Th' inconstant equipage of female dress!
How the strait stays the slender waist constrain,
How to adjust the manteau's sweeping train!
What fancy can the petticoat surround,
With the capacious hoop of whalebone bound!

But stay, presumptuous muse! nor boldly dare
The toilette's sacred mysteries declare.
Let a just distance be to beauty paid;
None here must enter but the trusty maid.
Should you the wardrobe's magazine rehearse,
And glossy manteaus rustle in thy verse;
Should you the rich brocaded suit unfold,
Where rising flowers grow stiff with frosted gold;
The dazzled muse would from her subject stray,
And in a maze of fashions lose her way.

B O O K II.

OLYMPUS' gates unfold; in Heaven's high towers
Appear in council all th' immortal powers.
Great Jove above the rest exalted sat,
And in his mind revolv'd succeeding fate;
His awful eye with ray superior shone;
The thunder-grasping eagle guards his throne;
On silver clouds the great assembly laid,
The whole creation at one view survey'd.

But see! fair Venus comes in all her state;
The wanton Loves and Graces round her wait;
With her loose robe officious zephyrs play,
And strew with odoriferous flowers the way;
In her right hand she waves the fluttering Fan;
And thus in melting sounds her speech began:

Assembled powers! who fickle mortals guide,
Who o'er the sea, the skies, and earth, preside;
Ye fountains! whence all human blessings flow,
Who pour your bounties on the world below;
Bacchus first rais'd and prun'd the climbing vine,
And taught the grape to stream with generous
wine;

Industrious Ceres tam'd the savage ground,
And pregnant fields with golden harvests crown'd;
Flora with bloomy sweets enrich'd the year;
And fruitful autumn is Pomona's care.
I first taught woman to subdue mankind,
And all her native charms with dress refin'd;
Celestial synod! this machine survey,
That shades the face, or bids cool zephyrs play;
If conscious blushes on her cheek arise,
With this she veils them from her lover's eyes;
No levell'd glance betrays her amorous heart,
From the Fan's ambush she directs the dart.
The royal sceptre shines in Juno's hand,
And twisted thunder speaks great Jove's command;

On Pallas' arm the Gorgon field appears,
And Neptune's mighty grasp the trident bears;
Ceres is with the bending sickle seen,
And the strong bow points out the Cynthian
Queen;

Henceforth the waving Fan my hands shall grace,
The waving Fan supply the sceptre's place.
Who shall, ye powers! the forming pencil hold?
What story shall the wide machine unfold?
Let Loves and Graces lead the dance around,
With myrtle wreathes and flowery chaplets crown'd;
Let Cupid's arrow strow the smiling plains
With unresisting nymphs and amorous swains:
May glowing pictures o'er the surface shine,
To melt slow virgins with a warm design!

Diana rose, with silver crescent crown'd,
And fix'd her modest eyes upon the ground;
Then with becoming mien she rais'd her head,
And thus with graceful voice the virgin said:

Has woman then forgot all former wiles,
The watchful ogle, and delusive smiles?
Does man against her charms too powerful prove?
Or are the sex grown novices in love?
Why then these arms? or why should artful eyes,
From this slight ambush, conquer by surprise?
No guilty thought the spotless virgin knows,
And o'er her cheek no conscious crimson glows.
Since blushes then from shame alone arise,
Why should we veil them from her lover's eyes?

Let Cupid rather give up his command,
And trust his arrows in a female hand.
Have not the gods already cherish'd pride,
And woman with destructive arms supply'd?
Neptune on her bestows his choicest stores,
For her the chambers of the deep explore;
The gaping shell its pearly charge resigns,
And round her neck the lucid bracelet twines:
Plutus for her bids earth its wealth unfold,
Where the warm ore is ripen'd into gold;
Or where the ruby reddens in the soil,
Where the green emerald pays the searcher's toil.
Does not the diamond sparkle in her ear,
Glow on her hand, and tremble in her hair?
From the gay nymph the glancing lustre flies,
And imitates the lightning of her eyes.
But yet, if Venus' wishes must succeed,
And this fantastic engine be decreed,
May some chaste story from the pencil flow,
To speak the virgin's joy, and Hymen's woe!

Here let the wretched Ariadne stand,
Seduc'd by Theseus to some desert land,
Her locks dishevel'd waving in the wind,
The crystal tears confess her tortur'd mind.
The perjur'd youth unfurls his treacherous sails,
And their white bosoms catch the swelling gales.
Be still! ye winds, she cries; stay, Theseus, stay!
But faithless Theseus hears no more than they.
All desperate, to some craggy cliff she flies,
And spreads a well-known signal in the skies;
His lessening vessel ploughs the foamy main;
She sighs, she calls, she waves the sign in vain.

Paint Dido there amidst her last distress,
Pale cheeks and blood-shot eyes her grief express;
Deep in her breast the reeking sword is drown'd;
And gushing blood streams purple from the wound

Her sister Anna hovering o'er her stands,
Accuses Heaven with lifted eyes and hands,
Upbraids the Trojan with repeated cries,
And mixes curses with her broken sighs.
View this, ye maids; and then each swain believe:
They're Trojans all, and vow but to deceive.

Here draw Oenone in the lonely grove,
Where Paris first betray'd her into love:
Let wither'd garlands hang on every bough,
Which the false youth wove for Oenone's brow;
The garlands lose their sweets, their pride is shed,
And like their odours all his vows are fled.

On her fair arm her pensive head she lays,
And Xanthus' waves with mournful look surveys;
That flood which witness'd his inconstant flame,
When thus he swore, and won the yielding dame:

"These streams shall sooner to their fountain
move,

"Than I forget my dear Oenone's love."

Roll back, ye streams; back to your fountain run!
Paris is false; Oenone is undone.

Ah, wretched maid! think how the moments flew,
Ere you the pangs of this curst passion knew,
When groves could please, and when you lov'd the plain,

Without the presence of your perjur'd swain.

Thus may the nymph, whene'er she spreads the Fan,

In his true colours view perfidious man;
Pleas'd with her virgin state, in forests rove,
And never trust the dangerous hopes of Love.

The Goddess ended; merry Momus rose,
With smiles and grins he waggish glances throws;
Then with a noisy laugh forestalls his joke,
Mirth flashes from his eyes while thus he spoke:

Rather let heavenly deeds be painted there,
And by your own examples teach the fair.
Let chaste Diana on the piece be seen,
And the bright crescent own the Cynthian Queen.

On Latmos' top see young Endymion lies,
Feign'd sleep has clos'd the bloomy lover's eyes:
See, to his soft embraces how she steals,
And on his lips her warm caresses seals;
No more her hand the glittering javelin holds,
But round his neck her eager arms she folds.

Why are our secrets by our blushes shown?
Virgins are virgins still—while 'tis unknown.
Here let her on some flowery bank be laid,
Where meeting beeches weave a graceful shade;

Her naked bosom wanton tresses grace,
And glowing expectation paints her face;
O'er her fair limbs a thin loose veil is spread,
(Stand off! ye shepherds; fear Actæon's head):
Let vigorous Pan th' unguarded minute seize,
And in a shaggy goat the virgin please.

Why are our secrets by our blushes shown?
Virgins are virgins still—while 'tis unknown.

There with just warmth Aurora's passion trace,
Let spreading crimson stain her virgin face.

See Cephalus her wanton airs despise,
While she provokes him with desiring eyes;
To raise his passions, she displays her charms,
His modest hand upon her bosom warms; [suade;
Nor looks, nor prayers, nor force, his heart per-
But with disdain he quits the rosy maid.

Here let dissolving Leda grace the toy,
Warm cheeks and heaving breasts reveal her joy;
Beneath the pressing swan she pants for air,
While with his fluttering wings he fans the fair.
There let all-conquering gold exert its power,
And soften Danaë in a glittering shower.

Would you warn beauty not to cherish pride,
Nor vainly in the treacherous bloom confide,
On the machine the sage Minerva place,
With lineaments of wisdom mark her face.
See, where she lies near some transparent flood,
And with her pipe cheers the resounding wood:
Her image in the floating glass she spies,
Her bloated cheeks, worn lips, and shrivel'd eyes;
She breaks the guiltless pipe, and with disdain
Its shatter'd ruins flings upon the plain;
With the loud reed no more her cheek shall swell,
What! spoil her face! No. Warbling strains, farewell.

Shall arts, shall sciences, employ the fair?
Those trifles are beneath Minerva's care,
From Venus let her learn the married life,
And all the virtuous duties of a wife.
Here on a couch extend the Cyprian dame,
Let her eye sparkle with the glowing flame;
The god of war within her clinging arms
Sinks on her lips, and kindles all her charms.
Paint limping Vulcan with a husband's care,
And let his brow the cuckold's honours wear;
Beneath the net the captive lovers place,
Their limbs entangled in a close embrace.
Let these amours adorn the new machine,
And female nature on the piece be seen;
So shall the fair, as long as Fans shall last,
Learn from your bright examples to be chaste.

BOOK III.

Thus Momus spoke. When sage Minerva rose;
From her sweet lips smooth elocution flows;
Her skilful hand an ivory pallet grac'd,
Where shining colours were in order plac'd.
As gods are bless'd with a superior skill,
And, swift as mortal thought, perform their will;
Straight she proposes, by her art divine,
To bid the paint express her great design.
Th' assembled powers consent. She now began,
And her creating pencil stain'd the Fan.
O'er the fair field trees spread, and rivers flow,
Towers rear their heads, and distant mountains
grow;

Life seems to move within the glowing veins,
And in each face some lively passion reigns.
Thus have I seen woods, hills, and dales appear,
Flocks graze the plains, birds wing the silent air,
In darken'd rooms, where light can only pass
Through the small circle of a convex glass;
On the white sheet the moving figures rise,
The forest waves, clouds float along the skies.

She various fables on the piece design'd,
That spoke the follies of the female kind.
The fate of pride in Niobe she drew
(Be wise, ye nymphs, that scornful vice subdue).
In a wide plain th' imperious mother stood,
Whose distant bounds rose in a winding wood;

Upon her shoulder flows her mantling hair,
 Pride marks her brow, and elevates her air;
 A purple robe behind her sweeps the ground,
 Whose spacious border golden flowers surround;
 She made Latona's altars cease to flame,
 And of due honours robb'd her sacred name;
 To her own charms she bade fresh incense rise,
 And adoration own her brighter eyes.
 Seven daughters from her fruitful loins were born,
 Seven graceful sons her nuptial bed adorn,
 Who, for a mother's arrogant disdain,
 Were by Latona's double offspring slain.
 Here Phœbus his unnerring arrow drew,
 And from his rising steed her first-born threw;
 His opening fingers drop the slacken'd rein,
 And the pale corse falls headlong to the plain.
 Beneath her pencil here two wrestlers bend,
 See, to the grasp their swelling nerves distend;
 Diana's arrow joins them face to face,
 And death unites them in a strict embrace.
 Another here flies trembling o'er the plain
 (When Heaven pursues, we shun the stroke in vain):

This lifts his supplicating hands and eyes,
 And 'midst his humble adoration dies.
 As from his thigh this tears the barbed dart,
 A surer weapon strikes his throbbing heart:
 While that to raise his wounded brother tries,
 Death blasts his bloom, and locks his frozen eyes.
 The tender sisters, bath'd in grief, appear
 With sable garments and dishevel'd hair,
 And o'er their gasping brother's weeping flood;
 Some with their tresses stopt the gushing blood;
 They strive to stay the fleeting life too late,
 And in the pious action share their fate.
 Now the proud dame, o'ercome by trembling fear,
 With her wide robe protects her only care;
 To save her only care in vain she tries,
 Close at her feet the latest victim dies.
 Down her fair cheek the trickling sorrow flows,
 Like dewy spangles on the blushing rose;
 Fixt in astonishment she weeping stood,
 The plain all purple with her children's blood;
 She stiffens with her woes; no more her hair
 In easy ringlets wantons in the air;
 Motion forsakes her eyes; her veins are dry'd,
 And beat no longer with the sanguine tide;
 All life is fled; firm marble now she grows,
 Which still in tears the mother's anguish shows.

Ye haughty fair, your painted Fans display,
 And the just fate of lofty pride survey.
 Though lovers oft extol your beauty's power,
 And in celestial families adore;
 Though from your features Cupid borrows arms,
 And goddesses confess inferior charms;
 Do not, vain maid, the flattering tale believe,
 Alike thy lovers and thy glass deceive.

Here lively colours Procris' passion tell,
 Who to her jealous fears a victim fell.
 Here kneels the trembling hunter o'er his wife,
 Who rolls her sickening eyes, and gasps for life;
 Her drooping head upon her shoulder lies,
 And purple gore her snowy bosom dyes.
 What guilt, what horror, on his face appears!
 See, his red eye-lid seems to swell with tears;

With agony his wringing hands he strains,
 And strong convulsions stretch his branching veins.

Learn hence, ye wives! bid vain suspicion cease,
 Lose not, in sullen discontent, your peace:
 For, when fierce love to jealousy ferments,
 A thousand doubts and fears the soul invents;
 No more the days in pleasing converse flow,
 And nights no more their soft endearments know.

There on the piece the Volscian queen expir'd,
 The love of spoils her female bosom fir'd.
 Gay Chloreus' arms attract her longing eyes,
 And for the painted plume and helm she sighs;
 Fearless she follows, bent on gaudy prey,
 Till an ill-fated dart obstructs her way;
 Down drops the martial maid; the bloody ground
 Floats with a torrent from the purple wound;
 The mournful nymphs her drooping head sustain,
 And try to stop the gushing life in vain.

Thus the raw maid some tawdry coat surveys,
 Where the fop's fancy in embroidery plays;
 His snowy feather, edg'd with crimson dyes,
 And his bright sword-knot, lure her wandering eyes;

Fring'd gloves and gold brocade conspire to move;
 Till the nymph falls a sacrifice to love.

Here young Narcissus o'er the fountain stood,
 And view'd his image in the crystal flood:
 The crystal flood reflects his lovely charms,
 And the pleas'd image strives to meet his arms.
 No nymph his unexperienc'd breast subdued,
 Echo in vain the flying boy pursued,
 Himself alone the foolish youth admires,
 And with fond look the smiling shade desires:
 O'er the smooth lake with fruitless tears he grieves;
 His spreading fingers shoot in verdant leaves,
 Through his pale veins green sap now gently flows,
 And in a short-liv'd flower his beauty blows.

Let vain Narcissus warn each female breast,
 That beauty's but a transient good at best.
 Like flowers it withers with th' advancing year;
 And age, like winter, robs the blooming fair.
 Oh, Araminta! cease thy wonted pride,
 Nor longer in thy faithless charms confide;
 Ev'n while the glass reflects thy sparkling eyes,
 Their lustre and thy rosy colour flies!

Thus on the Fan the breathing figures shine,
 And all the powers applaud the wise design.

The Cyprian queen the painted gift receives,
 And with a grateful bow the synod leaves.
 To the low world she bends her steepy way,
 Where Strephon pass'd the solitary day.
 She found him in a melancholy grove,
 His down-cast eyes betray'd desponding love;
 The wounded bark confess'd his slighted flame,
 And every tree bore false Corinna's name:
 In a cool shade he lay with folded arms,
 Curses his fortune, and upbraids her charms;
 When Venus to his wondering eyes appears,
 And with these words relieves his amorous cares:

Rise! happy youth; this bright machine survey,
 Whose rattling sticks my busy fingers sway;
 This present shall thy cruel charmer move,
 And in her fickle bosom kindle love.

The Fan shall flutter in all female hands,
 And various fashions learn from various lands.

For this shall elephants their ivory shed;
 And polish'd sticks the waving engine spread:
 His clouded mail the tortoise shall resign,
 And round the rivet pearly circles shine.
 On this shall Indians all their art employ,
 And with bright colours stain the gaudy toy;
 Their paint shall here in wildest fancies flow,
 Their dress, their customs, their religion, show:
 So shall the British fair their minds improve,
 And on the Fan to distant climates rove.
 Here China's ladies shall their pride display,
 And silver figures gild their loose array;
 This boasts her little feet and winking eyes;
 That tunes the fife, or tinkling cymbal plies
 Here cross-legg'd nobles in rich state shall dine;
 There in bright mail distorted heroes shine.
 The peeping Fan in modern times shall rise,
 Through which unseen the female ogle flies;
 This shall in temples the sly maid conceal,
 And shelter love beneath devotion's veil.
 Gay France shall make the Fan her artist's care,
 And with the costly trinket arm the fair.
 As learned orators, that touch the heart,
 With various action raise their soothing art,
 Both head and hand affect the listening throng,
 And humour each expression of the tongue;
 So shall each passion by the Fan be seen,
 From noisy anger to the sullen spleen.

While Venus spoke, joy shone in Strephon's
 eyes;
 Proud of the gift, he to Corinna flies:

But Cupid (who delights in amorous ill,
 Wounds hearts, and leaves them to a woman's will)

With certain aim a golden arrow drew,
 Which to Leander's panting bosom flew.
 Leander lov'd, and to the sprightly dame
 In gentle sighs reveal'd his growing flame:
 Sweet smiles Corinna to his sighs returns,
 And for the sop in equal passion burns.

Lo, Strephon comes! and, with a suppliant
 bow,

Offers the present, and renews his vow.

When she the fate of Niobe beheld,
 Why has my pride against my heart rebell'd?
 She sighing cry'd. Disdain forsook her breast,
 And Strephon now was thought a worthy guest.

In Procris' bosom when she saw the dart,
 She justly blames her own suspicious heart;
 Imputes her discontent to jealous fear,
 And knows her Strephon's constancy sincere.

When on Camilla's fate her eye she turns,
 No more for show and equipage she burns:
 She learns Leander's passion to despise,
 And looks on merit with discerning eyes.

Narcissus' change to the vain virgin shows,
 Who trusts to beauty, trusts the fading rose.
 Youth flies apace, with youth your beauty flies;
 Love then, ye virgins, ere the blossom dies.

Thus Pallas taught her. Strephon weds the dame;

And Hymen's torch diffus'd the brightest flame.

THE SHEPHERD'S WEEK,

IN SIX PASTORALS. 1714.

WITH THE AUTHOR'S NOTES.

" — Libeat mihi fordida rura,

" Atque humiles habitare casas. — " — VIRG.

PROEME TO THE COURTEOUS READER.

GREAT marvel hath it been (and that not unworthily) to divers worthy wits, that in this our island of Britain, in all rare sciences so greatly abounding, more especially in all kinds of poesy highly flourishing, no poet (though otherwise of notable cunning in roundelays) hath hit on the right simple eclogue, after the true ancient guise of Theocritus, before this mine attempt.

Other poet travailing in this plain high-way of pastoral, know I none. Yet, certes, such it behoved a pastoral to be, as nature in the country affordeth; and the manners also meetly copied from the rustical folk therein. In this also my love to my native country (Britain) much pricketh me forward, to describe aright the manners of our own honest and laborious ploughmen, in no wise, sure, more unworthy a British poet's imitation, than those of Sicily or Arcadie; albeit, not ignorant I am, what a rout and rabblement of critical gallimawfry hath been made of late days by certain young men of insipid delicacy, concerning, I wist not what, golden age, and other outrageous conceits, to which they would confine pastoral. Whereof, I avow, I account nought at all, knowing no age so justly to be instiled golden, as this of our sovereign lady Queen Anne.

This idle trumpery (only fit for schools and school boys) unto that ancient Doric shepherd, Theocritus, or his mates, was never known; he rightly, throughout his fifth Idyll, maketh his louts give full language, and behold their goats at rut in all simplicity :

Ὁ πόλος ὅκκ' ἰσορῇ τὰς μηκάδας, οἷα βατῦνται,
Τάκνεται ὀφθαλμῶς, ὅτι ἔ τρέγος αὐτὸς ἔγιντο.
THEOC. Id. i. 87.

Verily, as little pleasance receiveth a true homebred taste, from all the fine finical new-fangled fooleries of this gay Gothic garniture, wherewith they so nicely bedeck their court-clowns, or clown-courtiers (for which to call them rightly I wot not), as would a prudent citizen journeying to his country farms, should he find them occupied by people of this motley make, instead of plain downright hearty cleanly folk, such as be now tenants to the burgeses of this realm.

Furthermore, it is my purpose, gentle reader, to set before thee, as it were a picture, or rather lively landscape of thy own country, just as thou mightest see it, didst thou take a walk into the fields at the proper season : even as Maister Milton hath elegantly set forth the same :

" As one who long in populous city pent,
" Where houses thick, and sewers annoy the air,
" Forth issuing on a summer's morn to breathe
" Among the pleasant villages and farms
" Adjoin'd, from each thing met conceives delight;
" The smell of grain, or tedded grafs, or kine,
" Or dairy, each rural sight, each rural sound."

Thou wilt not find my shepherdesses idly piping on oaten reeds, but milking the kine, tying up the sheaves, or, if the hogs are astray, driving them to the styes. My shepherd gathereth none other nosegays but what are the growth of our own fields; he sleepeth not under myrtle shades, but under a hedge; nor doth he vigilantly defend his flocks from wolves, because there are none, as Maister Spenser well observeth :

" Well is known that, since the Saxon king,
" Never was wolf seen, many or some,
" Nor in all Kent nor in Christendom."

For as much as I have mentioned Maister Spenser, soothly I must acknowledge him a bard of sweetest memorial. Yet hath his shepherd's boy at some times raised his rustic reed to rhyme more rumbling than rural. Divers grave points also hath he handled of churchly matter, and doubts in religion daily arising, to great clerks only appertaining. What liketh me best are his names, indeed right simple and meet for the country, such as Lobbin, Cuddy, Hobbinol, Diggon, and others, some of which I have made bold to borrow. Moreover, as he called his Eclogues, the " Shepherd's Calendar," and divided the same into twelve months, I have chosen (peradventure not over rashly) to name mine by the days of the week, omitting Sunday, or the Sabbath, ours being supposed to be Christian shepherds, and to be then at church-worship. Yet further, of many of Maister Spenser's eclogues it may be observed, though months they be called, of the said months therein nothing is specified; wherein I have also esteemed him worthy mine imitation.

That principally, courteous reader, whereof I would have thee to be advertised (seeing I depart from the vulgar usage), is touching the language of my shepherds; which is, soothly to say, such as is neither spoken by the country maiden, or the courtly dame; nay, not only such as in the present times is not uttered, but was never uttered in times past; and, if I judge aright, will never be uttered in times future: it having too much of the country to be fit for the court, too much of the court to be fit for the country; too much of the language of old times to be fit for the present, too much of the present to have been fit for the old, and too much of both to be fit for any time to come. Granted also it is, that in this my language I seem unto myself as a London mason, who calculateth his work for a term of years, when he buildeth with old materials upon a ground-rent that is not his own, which soon turns to rubbish and ruins. For this point no reason can I allege, only deep learned ensamples having led me thereunto.

But here again much comfort ariseth in me, from the hopes, in that I conceive, when these words, in the course of transitory things, shall decay, it may so hap, in meet time, that some lover of simplicity shall arise, who shall have the hardihood to render these mine eclogues into such modern dialect as shall be then understood, to which end glosses and explications of uncouth pastoral terms are annexed.

Gentle reader, turn over the leaf, and entertain thyself with the prospect of thine own country, limned by the painful hand of thy loving countryman,
JOHN GAY.

PROLOGUE

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE LORD VISCOUNT BOLINGBROKE.

Lo I, who erst beneath a tree,
Sung Bumkinet and Bowzybee,
And Blouzelind, and Marian bright,
In apron blue, or apron white,
Now write my sonnets in a book,
For my good Lord of Bolingbroke.
VOL. VIII.

As lads and lasses stood around
To hear my boxen hautboy sound,
Our clerk came posting o'er the green
With doleful tidings of the queen;
The queen, he said, to whom we owe
Sweet peace, that maketh riches flow;

That queen, who eas'd our tax of late,
Was dead, alas! and lay in state.

At this, in tears was Cicely seen,
Buxoma tore her pinnars clean,
In doleful dumps stood every clown,
The parson rent his band and gown.

For me, when as I heard that death
Had snatch'd queen Anne to Elizabeth,
I broke my reed, and sighing, swore
I'd weep for Blouzelind no more.

While thus we stood as in a stound,
And wet with tears, like dew the ground,
Full soon by bonfire and by bell
We learnt our liege was passing well.

A skilful leach (so God him speed)
They said had wrought this blessed deed.
This leach Arbuthnot was yclept,
Who many a night not once had slept;
But watch'd our gracious sovereign still;
For who could rest when she was ill?
Oh, may'st thou henceforth sweetly sleep!
Sheer, swains, oh sheer your softest sheep,
To swell his couch; for well I ween,
He sav'd the realm, who sav'd the queen.

Quoth I, please God, I'll hie with glee
To court, this Arbuthnot to see.
I sold my sheep and lambkins too,
For silver loops and garment blue;
My boxen hautboy, sweet of sound,
For lace that edg'd mine hat around;
For Lightfoot and my scrip, I got
A gorgeous sword, and eke a knot.

So forth I far'd to court with speed,
Of soldier's drum withouten dread;
For peace allays the shepherd's fear
Of wearing cap of grenadier.

There saw I ladies all a-row,
Before their queen in seemly show.
No more I'll sing Buxoma brown,
Like goldfinch in her Sunday gown;
Nor Clumfilis, nor Marian bright,
Nor damsel that Hobnelia hight.

But Lansdowne, fresh as flower of May,
And Berkeley, lady blithe and gay;
And Anglesea, whose speech exceeds
The voice of pipe, or oaten reeds;
And blooming Hyde, with eyes so rare;
And Montague beyond compare:
Such ladies fair would I depaint,
In roundelay or sonnet quaint.

There many a worthy wight I've seen,
In ribbon blue and ribbon green:
As Oxford, who a wand doth bear,
Like Moses, in our bibles fair;
Who for our traffic forms designs,
And gives to Britain Indian mines.
Now, shepherds, clip your fleecy care;
Ye maids, your spinning-wheels prepare;
Ye weavers, all your shuttles throw,
And bid broad cloths and ferges grow;
For trading free shall thrive again,
Nor leavings lewd affright the swain.

There saw I St. John, sweet of mien,
Full stedfast both to church and queen;
With whose fair name I'll deck my strain;
St. John, right courteous to the swain.

For thus he told me on a day,
Trim are thy sonnets, gentle Gay;
And, certes, mirth it were to see
Thy joyous madrigals twice three,
With preface meet, and notes profound,
Imprinted fair, and well y-bound.
All suddenly then home I sped,
And did ev'n as my lord had said.

Lo, here thou hast mine eclogues fair,
But let not these detain thine ear.
Let not th' affairs of states and kings
Wait, while our Bowzybeus sings.
Rather than verse of simple swain
Should stay the trade of France or Spain;
Or for the plaint of parson's maid,
Yon emperor's packets be delay'd;
In sooth, I swear by holy Paul,
I'd burn book, preface, notes, and all.

MONDAY; OR THE SQUABBLE.

LOBBIN CLOUT, CUDDY, CLODDIPOLE.

Lobbin Clout.

THE younglings, Cuddy, are but just awake,
No thrushes shrill the bramble-bush forsake,
No chirping lark the welkin sheen invokes,
No damsel yet the swelling udder strokes;

Ver. 3. Welkin, the same as welken, an old Saxon word, signifying a cloud; by poetical licence it is frequently taken for the element or sky, as may appear by this verse in the dream of Chaucer,

"Ne in all the welkin was no cloud."

—Sheen or shine, an old word for shining or bright.

O'er yonder hill does scant the dawn appear:
Then why does Cuddy leave his cot so rear?

Cuddy.

Ah Lobbin Clout! I ween my plight is guest,
For he that loves, a stranger is to rest;
If swains belie not, thou hast prov'd the smart,
And Blouzelinda's mistress of thy heart.

Ver. 5. Scant, used in the ancient British authors for

Ver. 6. Rear, an expression in several counties of England, for early in the morning.

Ver. 7. To ween, derived from the Saxon, to think or conceive.

This rising rear betokeneth well thy mind,
Those arms are folded for thy Blouzelind.
And well, I trow, our piteous plights agree:
Thee Blouzelinda smites, Buxoma me.

Lobbin Clout.

Ah, Blouzelind! I love thee more by half,
Than does their fawns, or cows the newn-fall'n calf:

Woe worth the tongue! may blisters fore it gall,
That names Buxoma Blouzelind withal.

Cuddy.

Hold, witlefs Lobbin Clout, I thee advise,
Lest blisters fore on thy own tongue arise. 20
Lo, yonder, Cloddipole, the blithsome swain,
The wisest lout of all the neighbouring plain!
From Cloddipole we learn to read the skies,
To know when hail will fall, or winds arise.
He taught us erst the heifer's tail to view, [sue:
When stuck aloft, that showers would straight en-
He first that useful secret did explain,
That pricking corns foretold the gathering rain.
When swallows fleet soar high, and sport in air,
He told us that the welkin would be clear. 30

Let Cloddipole then hear us twain rehearse,
And praise his sweetheart in alternate verse.
I'll wager this same oaken staff with thee,
That Cloddipole shall give the prize to me.

Lobbin Clout.

See this tobacco-pouch, that's lin'd with hair,
Made of the skin of sleekest fallow-deer.
This pouch, that's ty'd with tape of reddest hue,
I'll wager that the prize shall be my due.

Cuddy.

Begin thy carols then, thou vaunting flouch!
Be thine the oaken staff, or mine the pouch. 40

Lobbin Clout.

My Blouzelinda is the blithest lass,
Than primrose sweeter, or the clover-glass.
Fair is the king-cup that in meadow blows,
Fair is the daizy that beside her grows;
Fair is the gilliflower, of gardens sweet,
Fair is the marygold, for pottage meet:
But Blouzelind's than gilliflower more fair,
Than daizy, marygold, or king-cup rare.

Cuddy.

My brown Buxoma is the featest maid,
That e'er at wake delightful gambol play'd. 50
Clean as young lambkins or the goose's down,
And like the goldfinch in her Sunday gown.
The witlefs lamb may sport upon the plain,
The frisking kid delight the gaping swain,
The wanton calf may skip with many a bound,
And my cur Tray play deffest feats around;
But neither lamb, nor kid, nor calf, nor Tray,
Dance like Buxoma on the first of May.

Lobbin Clout.

Sweet is my toil when Blouzelind is near;
Of her bereft, 'tis winter all the year. 60
With her no sultry summer's heat I know;
In winter, when she's nigh, with love I glow.

Ver. 25. Erst, a contraction of ere this; it signifies some time ago, or formerly.

Ver. 56. Deft, an old word, signifying brisk or nimble.

Come, Blouzelinda, ease thy swain's desire,
My summer's shadow, and my winter's fire!

Cuddy.

As with Buxoma once I work'd at hay,
Ev'n noon-tide labour seem'd an holiday;
And holidays, if haply she were gone,
Like worky-days I wish'd would soon be done.
Eftsoons, O sweetheart kind! my love repay,
And all the year shall then be holiday. 70

Lobbin Clout.

As Blouzelinda, in a gamesome mood,
Behind a haycock loudly laughing stood,
I sily ran, and snatch'd a hasty kiss;
She wip'd her lips, nor took it much amiss.
Believe me, Cuddy, while I'm bold to say,
Her breath was sweeter than the ripen'd hay.

Cuddy.

As my Buxoma, in a morning fair,
With gentle finger strok'd her milky care,
I quaintly stole a kiss; at first, 'tis true,
She frown'd, yet after granted one or two. 80
Lobbin, I swear, believe who will my vows,
Her breath by far excell'd the breathing cows.

Lobbin Clout.

Leek to the Welch, to Dutchmen butter's dear,
Of Irish swains potatoe is the cheer;
Oats for their feasts the Scottish shepherds grind,
Sweet turnips are the food of Blouzelind.
While she loves turnips, butter I'll despise,
Nor leeks, nor oatmeal, nor potatoe, prize.

Cuddy.

In good roast-beef my landlord sticks his knife,
The capon fat delights his dainty wife, 90
Pudding our parson eats, the squire loves hare,
But white-pot thick is my Buxoma's fare.
While she loves white-pot, capon ne'er shall be,
Nor hare, nor beef, nor pudding, food for me.

Lobbin Clout.

As once I play'd at blindman's buff, it hapt
About my eyes the towel thick was wrapt.
I mis'd the swains, and seiz'd on Blouzelind.
True speaks that ancient proverb, "Love is blind."

Cuddy.

As at hot-cockles once I laid me down,
And felt the weighty hand of many a clown; 100
Buxoma gave a gentle tap, and I
Quick rose, and read soft mischief in her eye.

Ver. 69. Eftsoons, from est, an ancient British word, signifying soon. So that eftsoons is a doubling of the word soon; which is, as it were, to say, twice soon or very soon.

Ver. 79. Queint has various significations in the ancient English authors. I have used it in this place in the same sense as Chaucer hath done in his Miller's Tale. "As Clerkes being full subtle and quaint" (by which he means arch or waggish); and not in that obscene sense wherein he useth it in the line immediately following.

Ver. 85.

"Populus Alcidae gratissima, Vitis Iaccho,
"Formosæ Myrtus Veneri, sua Laurea Phæbo,
"Phillis amat Corylos. Ulas dum Phillis amabit,
"Nec Myrtus vincet Corylos nec Laurea Phæbi."
&c.

VIRG

Lobbin Clout.

On two near elms the slacken'd cord I hung,
Now high, now low, my Blouzelinda swung.
With the rude wind her ruffled garment rose,
And show'd her taper leg, and scarlet hose.

Cuddy.

Across the fallen oak the plank I laid,
And myself pois'd against the tottering maid.
High leap'd the plank; adown Buxoma fell;
I spy'd—but faithful sweethearts never tell. 110

Lobbin Clout.

This riddle, Cuddy, if thou canst explain,
This wily riddle puzzles every swain.
"What flower is that which bears the virgin's
"name,
"The richest metal joined with the same?"

Cuddy.

Answer, thou carle, and judge this riddle right,
I'll frankly own thee for a cunning wight.
"What flower is that which royal honour craves,
"Adjoin the virgin, and 'tis strown on graves?"

Cloddipole.

Forbear, contending louts, give o'er your strains!
An oaken staff each merits for his pains. 120
But see the sun-beams bright to labour warn,
And gild the thatch of goodman Hodge's barn.
Your herds for want of water stand a-dry,
They're weary of your songs—and so am I.

TUESDAY; OR, THE DITTY.

Marian.

YOUNG Colin Clout, a lad of peerless meed,
Full well could dance, and deftly tune the reed;
In every wood his carols sweet were known,
At every wake his nimble feats were shown.
When in the ring the rustic routs he threw,
The damsels' pleasures with his conquests grew;
Or when assant the cudgel threats his head,
His danger smites the breast of every maid,
But chief of Marian. Marian lov'd the swain,
The parson's maid, and neatest of the plain; 10
Marian, that soft could stroke the udder'd cow,
Or lessen with her sieve the barley-mow;
Marbled with sage the hardening cheese she press'd,
And yellow butter Marian's skill confess'd;
But Marian now, devoid of country cares,
Nor yellow butter, nor sage cheese, prepares;
For yearning love the wileless maid employs,
And love, say swains, "all busy heed destroys."
Colin makes mock at all her piteous smart;
A lass that Cicely hight had won his heart, 20
Cicely the western lass that tends the kee,
The rival of the parson's maid was she.
In dreary shade now Marian lies along,
And, mixt with sighs, thus wails in plaining song:

Ver. 103—110 were not in the early editions.Ver. 113. Marygold.Ver. 117. Rosemary.

"Dic quibus in terris inscripti nomina Regum
"Nascantur Flores."—VIRG.

Ver. 120. "Et vitula tu dignus et hic."—VIRG.Ver. 21. Kee, a west country word for kine or cows.

Ah, woful day! ah, woful noon and morn!
When first by thee my younglings white were shorn;

Then first, I ween, I cast a lover's eye,
My sheep were silly, but more silly I.
Beneath the shears they felt no lasting smart,
They lost but fleeces, while I lost a heart. 30

Ah, Colin? canst thou leave thy sweetheart true?
What I have done for thee, will Cicely do?
Will she thy linen wash, or hosen darn,
And knit thee gloves made of her own spun yarn?
Will she with huswife's hand provide thy meat?
And every Sunday morn thy neckcloth plait,
Which o'er thy kersey doublet spreading wide,
In service-time drew Cicely's eyes aside?

Where'er I gad, I cannot hide my care,
My new disasters in my look appear. 40
White as the curd my ruddy cheek is grown,
So thin my features that I'm hardly known.
Our neighbours tell me oft, in joking talk,
Of ashes, leather, oatmeal, bran, and chalk;
Unwittingly of Marian they divine,
And wist not that with thoughtful love I pine.
Yet Colin Clout, untoward shepherd swain,
Walks whistling blithe, while pitiful I plain.

Whilom with thee 'twas Marian's dear delight
To moil all day, and merry-make at night. 50
If in the soil you guide the crooked share,
Your early breakfast is my constant care;
And when with even hand you strow the grain,
I fright the thievish rooks from off the plain.
In missing days, when I my thresher heard,
With nappy beer I to the barn repair'd;
Lost in the music of the whirling flail,
To gaze on thee I left the smoking pail:
In harvest when the sun was mounted high,
My leathern bottle did thy draught supply; 60
Whene'er you mow'd, I follow'd with the rake,
And have full oft been sun-burnt for thy sake:
When in the welkin gathering showers were seen,
I lagg'd the last with Colin on the green;
And when at eve returning with thy car,
Awaiting heard the jingling bells from far,
Straight on the fire the footy pot I plac'd,
To warm thy broth I burnt my hands for haste.
When hungry thou stood'st staring, like an oaf,
I slic'd the luncheon from the barley-loaf; 70
With crumbled bread I thicken'd well thy mess.
Ah, love me more, or love thy pottage less!

Last Friday's eve, when as the sun was set,
I, near yon stile, three fallow gypsies met.
Upon my hand they cast a poring look,
Bid me beware, and thrice their heads they shook;
They said that many crosses I must prove;
Some in my wordly gain, but most in love.
Next morn I miss'd three hens and our old cock,
And off the hedge two pinner and a smock; 80
I bore these losses with a Christian mind,
And no mishaps could feel while thou wert kind.
But since, alas! I grew my Colin's scorn,
I've known no pleasure, night, or noon, or morn.
Help me, ye gypsies; bring him home again,
And to a constant lass give back her swain.

Have I not sat with thee full many a night,
When dying embers were our only light,

When every creature did in slumbers lie,
Besides our cat, my Colin Clout, and I?
No troublous thoughts the cat or Colin move,
While I alone am kept awake by love.

Remember, Colin, when at last year's wake
I bought the costly present for thy sake;
Could'st thou spell o'er the posy on thy knife,
And with another change thy state of life?
If thou forget'st, I wot, I can repeat,
My memory can tell the verse so sweet:
"As this is grav'd upon this knife of thine,
"So is thy image on this heart of mine." 100
But woe is me! such presents luckless prove,
For knives, they tell me, always sever love.

Thus Marian wail'd, her eyes with tears brim-full,
When Goody Dobbins brought her cow to bull.
With apron blue to dry her tears she fought;
Then saw the cow well serv'd, and took a groat.

WEDNESDAY; OR, THE DUMPS*.

Sparabella.

THE wailings of a maiden I recite,
A maiden fair that Sparabella hight.
Such strains ne'er warble in the linnet's throat,
Nor the gay goldfinch chaunts so sweet a note.
No magpie chatter'd, nor the painted jay,
No ox was heard to low, nor ass to bray;
No rustling breezes play'd the leaves among,
While thus her madrigal the damsel sung.

A while, O d'Urfey, lend an ear or twain
Nor, though in homely guise, my verse disdain; 10
Whether thou seek'st new kingdoms in the sun,
Whether thy muse does at Newmarket run,
Or does with gossips at a feast regale,
And heighten her conceits with sack and ale,
Or else at wakes with Joan and Hodge rejoice,
Where d'Urfey's lyrics swell in every voice;

* Dumps, or dumbs, made use of to express a fit of the füllens. Some have pretended that it is derived from Dumops, a king of Egypt, that built a pyramid, and died of melancholy. So mopes, after the same manner, is thought to have come from Merops, another Egyptian king, that died of the same distemper. But our English antiquaries have conjectured that dumps, which is a grievous heaviness of spirits, comes from the word dumplin, the heaviest kind of pudding that is eaten in this country; much used in Norfolk, and other counties of England.

Ver. 11. An opera written by this author, called, "The World in the Sun, or the Kingdom of Birds;" he is also famous for his song on the Newmarket horse-race, and several others that are sung by the British swains.

Yet suffer me, thou bard of wond'rous meed,
Amid thy bays to weave this rural weed.

Now the sun drove adown the western road,
And oxen laid at rest forgot the goad, 20
The clown fatigued trudg'd homeward with his spade,

Across the meadows stretch'd the lengthen'd shade;
When Sparabella, pensive and forlorn,
Alike with yearning love and labour worn,
Lean'd on her rake, and straight with doleful guise
Did this sad plaint in mournful notes devise.

Come night as dark as pitch, surround my head,
From Sparabella Bumkinet is fled;
The ribbon that his valorous cudgel won,
Last Sunday happier Clumfiliis put on. 30

Sure if he'd eyes (but love they say has none)
I whilom by that ribbon had been known.
Ah, well-a-day! I'm shent with baneful smart,
For with the ribbon he bestow'd his heart.

"My plaint, ye lasses, with this burthen aid,
"Tis hard so true a damsel dies a maid."

Shall heavy Clumfiliis with me compare?
View this, ye lovers, and like me despair.

Her blubber'd lip by smutty pipes is worn,
And in her breath tobacco whiffs are borne! 40
The cleanly cheese-press she could never turn,
Her aukward fist did ne'er employ the churn;
If e'er she brew'd, the drink would straight go sour,
Before it ever felt the thunder's power;

No housewifery the dowdy creature knew;
To sum up all, her tongue confess'd the shrew.
"My plaint, ye lasses, with this burthen aid,
"Tis hard so true a damsel dies a maid."

I've often seen my visage in yon lake,
Nor are my features of the homeliest make: 50
Though Clumfiliis may boast a whiter dye,
Yet the black floe turns in my rolling eye;
And fairest blossoms drop with every blast,
But the brown beauty will like hollies last.
Her wan complexion's like the wither'd leek,
While Katherine pears adorn my ruddy cheek.
Yet she, alas! the witless lout hath won,
And by her gain poor Sparabell's undone!
Let hares and hounds in coupling straps unite. 59

" 'Tis hard so true a damsel dies a maid."

Sooner shall cats disport in waters clear,
And speckled mackrel graze the meadows fair;
Sooner shall screech-owls bask in sunny day,
And the flow aqs on trees, like squirrels, play; 70
Sooner shall snails on insect pinions rove;
Than I forget my shepherd's wonted love.

"My plaint, ye lasses, with this burthen aid,
" 'Tis hard so true a damsel dies a maid."

Ah! didst thou know what proffers I withstood,
When late I met the 'squire in yonder wood!
To me he sped, regardless of his game,
While all my cheek was glowing red with shame;
My lip he kiss'd, and prais'd my healthful look,
Then from his purse of silk a guinea took, 80
Into my hand he forc'd the tempting gold,
While I with modest struggling broke his hold.
He swore that Dick, in livery striped with lace,
Should wed me soon, to keep me from disgrace;
But I nor footman priz'd, nor golden fee;
For what is lace or gold compar'd to thee?

"My plaint, ye lasses, with this burthen aid,
" 'Tis hard so true a damsel dies a maid."

Now plain I ken whence love his rise begun;
Sure he was born some bloody butcher's son, 90
Bred up in shambles, where our younglings slain
Erst taught him mischief, and to sport with pain.
The father only silly sheep annoys,
The son the sillier shepherd's destroys.
Does son or father greater mischief do?
The fire is cruel, so the son is too.

A sudden death shall rid me of my woe. 100

The prudent maiden deems it now too late,

THURSDAY; OR, THE SPELL.

Hobnelia.

HOBNELIA, seated in a dreary vale,
In pensive mood rehears'd her piteous tale;
Her piteous tale the winds in sighs bemoan,
And pining Echo answers groan for groan.

I rue the day, a rueful day I trow,
The woful day, a day indeed of wo!
When Lubberkin to town his cattle drove,
A maiden fine bedight he hapt to love;
The maiden fine bedight his love retains,
And for the village he forsakes the plains. 10
Return, my Lubberkin, these ditties hear;
Spells will I try, and spells shall ease my care.

"With my sharp heel I three times mark the
ground,

"And turn me thrice around, around, around."

When first the year I heard the cuckow sing,
And call with welcome note the budding spring,
I straightway set a-running with such haste,
Deborah that won the smock scarce ran so fast;
Till spent for lack of breath, quite weary grown,
Upon a rising bank I sat adown, 20
Then doff'd my shoe, and by my troth, I swear,
Therein I spy'd this yellow frizzled hair,
As like to Lubberkin's in curl and hue,
As if upon his comely pate it grew.

"With my sharp heel I three times mark the
ground,

"And turn me thrice around, around, around."

At eve last midsummer no sleep I sought,
But to the field a bag of hemp-seed brought;
I scatter'd round the seed on every side,
And three times in a trembling accent cry'd, 30

"This hemp-seed with my virgin hand I sow,
"Who shall my true-love be, the crop shall mow."

I strait look'd back, and, if my eyes speak truth,
With his keen scythe behind me came the youth.

"With my sharp heel I three times mark the
ground,

"And turn me thrice around, around, around."

Last Valentine, the day when birds of kind
Their paramours with mutual chirpings find;

rearily rose, just at the break of day,
Before the sun had chas'd the stars away ; 40
A-field I went, amid the morning dew
To milk my kine (for so should hufwives do);
Thee first I spy'd ; and the first swain we see,
In spite of fortune shall our true-love be.

See, Lubberkin, each bird his partner take ;
And canst thou then thy sweetheart dear forsake ?

" With my sharp heel I three times mark the
ground,

" And turn me thrice around, around, around."

Last May-day fair I search'd to find a snail,
That might my secret lover's name reveal. 50

Upon a gooseberry-bush a snail I found
(For always snails near sweetest fruit abound).

I seiz'd the vermine, whom I quickly sped,
And on the earth the milk-white embers spread.

Slow crawl'd the snail, and, if a right can spell,
In the soft ashes mark'd a curious L ;

Oh, may this wond'rous omen lucky prove !

For L is found in Lubberkin and Love. [ground,

" With my sharp heel I three times mark the

" And turn me thrice around, around, around."

Two hazel nuts I threw into the flame, 61
And to each nut I gave a sweetheart's name ;

This with the loudest bounce me fore amaz'd,
That in a flame of brightest colour blaz'd.

As blaz'd the nut, so may thy passion grow ;

For 'twas thy nut that did so brightly glow.

" With my sharp heel I three times mark the
ground,

" And turn me thrice around, around, around."

As peasecods once I pluck'd, I chanc'd to see,
One that was closely fill'd with three times three,

Which when I cropp'd I safely home convey'd, 71

And o'er the door the spell in secret laid ;

My wheel I turn'd, and sung a ballad new,
While from the spindle I the fleeces drew ; 4 [in

The latch mov'd up, when, who should first come
But, in his proper person—Lubberkin.

I broke my yarn, surpris'd the sight to see ;

Sure sign that he would break his word with me.

Eftsoons I join'd it with my wonted flight :

So may again his love with mine unite ! 80

" With my sharp heel I three times mark the
ground,

" And turn me thrice around, around, around."

This lady-fly I take from off the grafs,

Whose spotted back might scarlet red surpass,

" Fly, lady-bird, north, south, or east, or west,

" Fly where the man is found that I love best."

He leaves my hand ; see to the west he's flown,
To call my true-love from the faithless town. 89

" With my sharp heel I three times mark the
ground,

" And turn me thrice around, around, around."

I pare this pippin round and round again,
My shepherd's name to flourish on the plain,
I fling th' unbroken paring o'er my head,
Upon the grafs a perfect L is read ;

Yet on my heart a fairer L is seen,
Than what the paring makes upon the green.

" With my sharp heel I three times mark the
ground,

" And turn me thrice around, around, around."

This pippin shall another trial make,

See from the core two kernels brown I take ; 100

This on my cheek for Lubberkin is worn ;

And Booby-clod on t' other side is borne.

But Booby-clod soon drops upon the ground,

A certain token that his love's unsound ;

While Lubberkin sticks firmly to the last :

Oh were his lips to mine but join'd so fast !

" With my sharp heel I three times mark the
ground,

" And turn me thrice around, around, around."

As Lubberkin once slept beneath a tree,

I twitch'd his dangling garter from his knee. 110

He wist not when the hempen string I drew.

Now mine I quickly doff, of inkle blue.

Together fast I tie the garters twain ;

And while I knit the knot repeat this strain :

" Three times a true-love's knot I tie secure,

" Firm be the knot, firm may his love endure!"

" With my sharp heel I three times mark the
ground,

" And turn me thrice around, around, around."

As I was wont, I trudg'd last market-day,

To town, with new-laid eggs preserv'd in hay. 120

I made my market long before 'twas night,

My purse grew heavy, and my basket light.

Straight to the 'pothecary's shop I went,

And in love-powder all my money spent.

Behap what will, next Sunday after prayers,

When to the ale-house Lubberkin repairs,

These golden flies into his mug I'll throw,

And soon the swain with fervent love shall glow.

" With my sharp heel I three times mark the
ground, 129

" And turn me thrice around, around, around."

But hold—our Lightfoot barks, and cocks his ears,

O'er yonder stile see Lubberkin appears.

He comes ! he comes ! Hobnelia's not bewray'd,

Nor shall she crown'd with willow die a maid.

He vows, he swears, he'll give me a green gown ;

O dear ! I fall adown, adown, adown !

FRIDAY; OR, THE DIRGE *.

BUMKINET, GRUBBINOL.

Bumkinet.

WHY, Grubbinol, dost thou so wistful seem?
 There's sorrow in thy look, if right I deem.
 'Tis true, yon oaks with yellow tops appear,
 And chilly blasts begin to nip the year;
 From the tall elm a shower of leaves is borne,
 And their lost beauty riven beeches mourn.
 Yet ev'n this season pleasure blithe affords,
 Now the squeez'd pears foams with our apple boards.

Come, let us hie, and quaff a cheery bowl,
 Let cyder new "wash sorrow from thy soul." 10

Grubbinol.

Ah, Bumkinet! since thou from hence wert gone,
 From these sad plains all merriment is flown;
 Should I reveal my grief, 'twould spoil thy cheer,
 And make thine eye o'erflow with many a tear.

Bumkinet.

"Hang sorrow!" Let's to yonder hut repair,
 And with trim sonnets "cast away our care."
 "Gillian of Croydon" well thy pipe can play;
 Thou sing'st most sweet, "O'er hills and far away."
 Of "Patient Griffel" I devise to sing,
 And catches quaint shall make the vallies ring. 20
 Come, Grubbinol, beneath this shelter, come;
 From hence we view our flocks securely roam.

Grubbinol.

Yes, blithesome lad, a tale I mean to sing,
 But with my woe shall distant vallies ring.
 The tale shall make our kiddings droop their head,
 For, woes is me!—our Blouzelind is dead;

Bumkinet.

Is Blouzelinda dead? farewell, my glee!
 No happiness is now reserv'd for me.
 As the wood-pigeon coos without his mate,
 So shall my doleful dirge bewail her fate. 30
 Of Blouzelinda fair I mean to tell,
 The peerless maid that did all maids excel.

Henceforth the morn shall dewy sorrow shed,
 And evening tears upon the grass be spread;
 The rolling streams with watery grief shall flow,
 And winds shall moan aloud—when loud they blow.

Henceforth, as oft' as autumn shall return,
 The dropping trees, whene'er it rains, shall mourn,
 The season quire shall strip the country's pride,
 For 'twas in autumn Blouzelinda dy'd. 40

* Dirge, or Dyrge, a mournful ditty, or song of lamentation over the dead; not a contraction of the Latin Dirige, in the Popish Hymn, Dirige gressus meos, as some pretend. But from the Teutonic Dyrke, Laudare, to praise and extol. Whence it is possible their Dyrke, and our dirge, was a laudatory song to commemorate and applaud the dead. COWELL'S Interpreter.

VIRG.

Ver. 27. Glee joy; from the Dutch Glooren, to recreate.

Where'er I gad, I Blouzelind shall view,
 Woods, dairy, barn, and mows, our passion knew.
 When I direct my eyes to yonder wood,
 Fresh rising sorrow curdles in my blood.
 Thither I've often been the damsel's guide,
 When rotten sticks our fuel have supply'd;
 There I remember how her faggots large
 Were frequently these happy shoulders charge.
 Sometimes this crook drew hazel-boughs adown,
 And stuff'd her apron wide with nuts so brown; 50
 Or when her feeding hogs had miss'd their way,
 Or wallowing 'mid a feast of acorns lay;
 Th' untoward creatures to the sty I drove,
 And whistled all the way—or told my love.

If by the dairy's hatch I chanc'd to hie,
 I shall her goodly countenance espy;
 For there her goodly countenance I've seen,
 Set off with kerchief starch'd and pinnars clean.
 Sometimes, like wax, she rolls her butter round,
 Or with the wooden lily prints the pound. 60
 Whilom I've seen her skim the clouted cream,
 And pears from spongy curds the milky stream:
 But now, alas! these ears shall hear no more
 The whining swine surround the dairy door;
 No more her care shall fill the hollow tray,
 To fat the guzzling hogs with floods of whey.
 Lament, ye swine, in grunting spend your grief,
 For you, like me, have lost your sole relief.

When in the barn the sounding flail I ply,
 Where from her sieve the chaff was wont to fly; 71
 The poultry there will seem around to stand,
 Waiting upon her charitable hand.

No succour meet the poultry now can find,
 For they, like me, have lost their Blouzelind.

Whenever by yon barley-mow I pass,
 Before my eyes will trip the tidy lass.
 I pitch'd the sheaves, (oh, could I do so now!)
 Which she in rows pil'd on the growing mow.
 There every deale my heart by love was gain'd,
 There the sweet kiss my courtship has explain'd. 80
 Ah, Blouzelind! that mow I ne'er shall see,
 But thy memorial will revive in me.

Lament, ye fields, and rueful symptoms show;
 Henceforth let not the smelling primrose grow;
 Let weeds, instead of butter-flowers appear,
 And meads, instead of daisies, hemlock bear;
 For cowslips sweet, let dandelions spread;
 For Blouzelinda, blithesome maid, is dead!
 Lament, ye swains, and o'er her grave bemoan,
 And spell ye right this verse upon her stone: 90

"Here Blouzelinda lies—Alas, alas!

"Weep, shepherds—and remember flesh is grass."

Or buns and sugar to the damsel's tooth;
Yet Blouzelinda's name shall tune my lay,
Of her I'll sing for ever and for aye.

When Blouzelind expir'd, the wether's bell 99
Before the drooping flock toll'd forth her knell;
The solemn death-watch click'd the hour she dy'd,
And shrilling crickets in the chimney cry'd;
The boding raven on her cottage fate,
And with hoarse croaking warn'd us of her fate;
The lambkin, which her wonted tendance bred,
Dropp'd on the plains that fatal instant dead;
Swarm'd on a rotten stick the bees I spy'd,
Which erst I saw when Goody Dobson dy'd.

How shall I, void of tears, her death relate,
When on her darling's bed her mother fate! 110
These words the dying Blouzelinda spoke,
And of the dead let none the will revoke:

"Mother, quoth she, let not the poultry need,
And give the goose wherewith to raise her breed:
Be these my sister's care—and every morn
Amid the ducklings let her scatter corn;
The sickly calf that's hous'd be sure to tend,
Feed him with milk, and from bleak colds defend.
Yet ere I die—see, mother, yonder shelf,
There secretly I've hid my worldly pelf. 120
Twenty good shillings in a rag I laid;
Be ten the Parson's, for my sermon paid.
The rest is yours—my spinning-wheel and rake
Let Susan keep for her dear sister's sake;
My new straw hat, that's trimly lin'd with green,
Let Peggy wear, for she's a damsel clean.
My leathern bottle, long in harvests try'd,
Be Grubbinol's—this silver ring beside:
Three silver pennies, and a nine-pence bent,
A token kind to Bumkinet is sent."
Thus spoke the maiden, while the mother cry'd;
And peaceful, like the harmless lamb, she dy'd.

To show their love, the neighbours far and near Follow'd with wistful look the damsel's bier.
Sprigg'd rosemary the lads and lasses bore,
While dismally the Parson walk'd before.
Upon her grave the rosemary they threw,
The daisy, butter-flower, and endive blue.

After the good man warn'd us from his text,
That none could tell whose turn would be the next;

He said, that Heaven would take her soul, no doubt,

And spoke the hour-glass in her praise—quite out.

To her sweet memory, flowery garlands strung,
O'er her now empty seat aloft were hung.

With wicker rods we fenc'd her tomb around,
To ward from man and beast the hallow'd ground;

Left her new grave the Parson's cattle raze,
For both his horse and cow the church-yard graze.

Now we trudg'd homeward to her mother's farm,

To drink new cyder mull'd, with ginger warm.

Ver. 96. An imitation of Theocritus.

For Gaffer Treadwell told us, by the bye, 151
"Excessive sorrow is exceeding dry."

While bulls bear horns upon their curled brow,
Or lasses with soft stroakings milk the cow;
While paddling ducks the standing lake desire,
Or battening hogs roll in the sinking mire;
While moles the crumbled earth in hillocks raise;
So long shall swains tell Blouzelinda's praise.

Thus wail'd the louts in melancholy strain,
Till bonny Susan sped across the plain.
They seiz'd the lass in apron clean array'd,
And to the ale-house forc'd the willing maid;
In ale and kisses they forget their cares,
And Susan Blouzelinda's loss repairs.

SATURDAY; OR, THE FLIGHTS.

Bowzybeus.

SUBLIMER strains, O rustic muse! prepare;
Forget awhile the barn and dairy's care;
Thy homely voice to loftier numbers raise,
The drunkard's flights require sonorous lays;
With Bowzybeus' songs exalt thy verse,
While rocks and woods the various notes rehearse.

'Twas in the season when the reapers' toil
Of the ripe harvest 'gan to rid the soil;
Wide through the field was seen a goodly rout, 9
Clean damsels bound the gather'd sheaves about;
The lads with sharpen'd hook and sweating brow
Cut down the labours of the winter plough.
To the near hedge young Susan steps aside,
She feign'd her coat or garter was unty'd;
Whate'er she did, she stoop'd adown unseen,
And merry reapers what they list will ween.
Soon she rose up, and cry'd with voice so shrill,
That echo answer'd from the distant hill;
The youths and damsels ran to Susan's aid,
Who thought some adder had the lass dismay'd 20

When fast asleep they Bowzybeus spy'd,
His hat and oaken staff lay close beside;
That Bowzybeus who could sweetly sing,
Or with the rosin'd bow torment the string;
That Bowzybeus who, with fingers speed,
Could call soft warblings from the breathing reed;
That Bowzybeus who, with jocund tongue,
Ballads and roundelays and catches sung:
They loudly laugh to see the damsel's fright,
And in disport surround the drunken wight. 30

Ah, Bowzybee, why didst thou stay so long?
The mugs were large, the drink was wond'rous strong!

Thou should'st have left the fair before 'twas night;
But thou sat'st topping till the morning light.

Cicely, brisk maid, steps forth before the rout,
And kiss'd with smacking lip the snoring lout:
(For custom says, "Whoe'er this venture proves,
"For such a kiss demands a pair of gloves.")

spoke:

To you, my lads; I'll sing my carols o'er,
As for the maids—I've something else in store.

No sooner 'gan he raise his tuneful song,
But lads and lasses round about him throng.
Not ballad singer plac'd above the crowd
Sings with a note so shrilling sweet and loud;
Nor parish-clerk, who calls the psalm so clear,
Like Bowzybeus sooths th' attentive ear. 50

Of nature's laws his carols first begun,
Why the grave owl can never face the sun.
For owls, as swains observe, detest the light,
And only sing and seek their prey by night.
How turnips hide their swelling heads below;
And how the closing coleworts upwards grow;
How Will-a-wisp misleads night-faring clowns
O'er hills, and sinking bogs, and pathless downs.
Of stars he told, that shoot with shining trail,
And of the glow-worm's light that gilds his tail.
He sung where wood-cocks in the summer feed,
And in what climates they renew their breed 62
(Some think to northern coasts their flight they tend,

Or to the moon in midnight hours ascend);
Where swallows in the winter's season keep,
And how the drowsy bat and dormouse sleep;
How nature does the puppy's eyelid close
Till the bright sun has nine times set and rose
(For huntsmen by their long experience find,
That puppies still nine rolling suns are blind). 70

Now he goes on, and sings of fairs and shows,
For still new fairs before his eyes arose.
How pedlars' stalls with glittering toys are laid,
The various fairings of the country-maid.
Long silken laces hang upon the twine,
And rows of pins and amber bracelets shine;
How the tight lads, knives, combs, and scissars spies,
And looks on thimbles with desiring eyes.
Of lotteries next with tuneful note he told,
Where silver spoons are won, and rings of gold. 80
The lads and lasses trudge the street along,
And all the fair is crowded in his song.
The mountebank now treads the stage, and sells
His pills, his balsams, and his ague-spells;
Now o'er and o'er the nimble tumbler springs,
And on the rope the venturous maiden swings;

vations:*

*"Namque canebat, uti magnum per inane co-
aeta, &c."*

Jack Pudding in his party-colour'd jacket
Tosses the glove, and jokes at every packet.
Of raree-shows he sung, and Punch's feats,
Of pockets pick'd in crowds, and various cheats. 90

Then sad he sung "the Children in the Wood:"
(Ah, barbarous uncle, stain'd with infant blood!)
How blackberries they pluck'd in deserts wild,
And fearless at the glittering faulchion smil'd;
Their little corpse the robin-red-breasts found,
And strow'd with pious bill the leaves around.
(Ah gentle birds! if this verse lasts so long,
Your names shall live for ever in my song.)

For "Buxom Joan" he sung the doubtful strife,
How the fly sailor made the maid a wife. 100

To louder strains he rais'd his voice, to tell
What woeful wars in "Chevy-chace" befell,
When "Percy drove the deer with hound and horn,

"Wars to be wept by children yet unborn!"
Ah, Witherington, more years thy life had crown'd,
If thou hadst never heard the horn or hound!
Yet shall the squire, who fought on bloody stumps,
By future bards be wail'd in doleful dumps.

"All in the land of Essex" next he chaunts,
How to seek mares starch Quakers turn gal-
lants:

How the grave brother stood on bank so green—
Happy for him if mares had never been! 112

Then he was seiz'd with a religious qualm.
And on a sudden sung the hundredth psalm.

He sung of "Taffey Welch," and "Sawney
Scot,"

"Lilly-bullero" and the "Irish Trot."
Why should I tell of "Bateman," or of "Shore,"
Or "Wantley's Dragon" slain by valiant Moore,
"The Bower of Rosamond," or "Robin Hood,"
And how the "grass now grows where Troy town stood?" 120

His carols ceas'd: the listening maids and swains
Seem still to hear some soft imperfect strains.

Sudden he rose; and, as he reels along,
Swears kisses sweet should well reward his song.

The damsels laughing fly the giddy clown
Again upon a wheat-sheaf drops adown;
The power that guards the drunk, his sleep attends,

Till, ruddy, like his face, the sun descends.

TRIVIA;

OR, THE ART OF WALKING THE STREETS OF LONDON.

IN THREE BOOKS.

"Quo te Mæri pedes? an, quo via ducit, in urbem?" — VIRG.

ADVERTISEMENT.

The world, I believe, will take so little notice of me, that I need not take much of it. The critics may see by this poem, that I walk on foot, which probably may save me from their envy. I should be sorry to raise that passion in men whom I am so much obliged to, since they allow me an honour hitherto only shewn to better writers, That of denying me to be the author of my own works.

Gentlemen, if there be any thing in this poem good enough to displease you, and if it be any advantage to you to ascribe it to some person of greater merit; I shall acquaint you, for your comfort, that, among many other obligations, I owe several hints of it to Dr. Swift. And, if you will so far continue your favour as to write against it, I beg you to oblige me in accepting the following motto:

"—Non tu, in triviis, indocte solebas

"Stridenti, miserum, stipulâ, disperdere carmen."

BOOK I.

OF THE IMPLEMENTS FOR WALKING THE STREETS, AND SIGNS OF THE WEATHER.

THROUGH winter streets to steer your course a-right,

How to walk clean by day, and safe by night;

How jostling crowds with prudence to decline,

When to assert the wall, and when resign,

I sing; thou, Trivia, goddess, aid my song,

Through spacious streets conduct thy bard along;

By thee transported, I securely stray

Where winding alleys lead the doubtful way,

The silent court and opening square explore,

And long perplexing lanes untrod before. 10

To pave thy realm, and smooth the broken ways,

Earth from her womb a flinty tribute pays;

For thee the sturdy pavior thumps the ground,

Whilst every stroke his labouring lungs resound;

For thee the scavenger bids kennels glide

Within their bounds, and heaps of dirt subside.

My youthful bosom burns with thirst of fame,

From the great theme to build a glorious name,

To tread in paths to ancient bards unknown,

And bind my temples with a civic crown: 20

But more my country's love demands my lays;

My country's be the profit, mine the praise!

When the black youth at chosen stands rejoice,

And "clean your shoes" resounds from every voice;

When late their miry sides stage-coaches show,

And their stiff horses through the town move flow;

When all the Mall in leafy ruin lies,

And damsels first renew their oyster-cries:

Then let the prudent walker shoes provide,

Not of the Spanish or Morocco hide; 30

The wooden heel may raise the dancer's bound,

And with the scallop'd top his step be crown'd:

Let firm, well-hammer'd soles protect thy feet

Through freezing snows, and rains, and soaking

Should the big last extend the shoe too wide, [sleet.

Each stone will wrench th' unwary step aside;

The sudden turn may stretch the swelling vein,

Thy cracking joint unhinge, or ankle sprain;

And, when too short the modest shoes are worn,

You'll judge the seasons by your shooting corn.

Nor should it prove thy less important care, 41
 To choose a proper coat for winter's wear,
 Now in thy trunk thy D'Oily habit fold,
 The silken drugget ill can fence the cold;
 The frieze's spongy nap is soak'd with rain,
 And showers soon drench the camlet's cockled grain;
 True Witney * broad-cloth, with its shag unshorn,
 Unpierc'd is in the lasting tempest worn:
 Be this the horseman's fence, for who would wear
 Amid the town the spoils of Russia's bear? 50
 Within the roquelaure's clasp thy hands are pent,
 Hands, that, stretch'd forth, invading harms prevent.

Let the loop'd bavaroy the fop embrace,
 Or his deep cloke bespatter'd o'er with lace.
 That garment best the winter's rage defends,
 Whose ample form without one plait depends,
 By various names † in various counties known,
 Yet held in all the true furtout alone;
 Be thine of kersey firm, though small the cost,
 Then brave unwet the rain, unchill'd the frost. 60

If the strong cane support thy walking hand,
 Chairmen no longer shall the wall command;
 Ev'n sturdy carmen shall thy nod obey,
 And rattling coaches stop to make thee way:
 This shall direct thy cautious tread aright,
 Though not one glaring lamp enliven night.
 Let beaux their canes with amber tip produce;
 Be theirs for empty show, but thine for use.
 In gilded chariots while they loll at ease,
 And lazily ensure a life's disease; 70

While softer chairs the tawdry load convey
 To Court, to White's ‡, assemblies, or the play;
 Rosy complexion'd health thy steps attends,
 And exercise thy lasting youth defends.
 Imprudent men Heaven's choicest gifts profane:
 Thus some beneath their arm support the cane;
 The dirty point oft check the careless pace,
 And miry spots the clean cravat disgrace.
 Oh! may I never such misfortune meet!
 May no such vicious walkers crowd the street! 80
 May Providence o'ershade me with her wings,
 While the bold muse experienc'd danger sings!

Not that I wander from my native home,
 And (tempting perils) foreign cities roam.
 Let Paris be the theme of Gallia's muse,
 Where slavery treads the streets in wooden shoes.
 Nor do I rove in Belgia's frozen clime,
 And teach the clumsy boor to skate in rhyme;
 Where, if the warmer clouds in rain descend,
 No miry ways industrious steps offend: 90
 The rushing flood from sloping pavements pours,
 And blackens the canals with dirty showers.
 Let others Naples' smoother streets rehearse,
 And with proud Roman structures grace their verse,
 Where frequent murders wake the night with groans,

And blood in purple torrents dyes the stones.
 Nor shall the muse through narrow Venice stray,
 Where gondolas their painted oars display.
 O happy streets! to rumbling wheels unknown,
 No carts, no coaches, shake the floating town! 100

* A town in Oxfordshire.

† A Joseph, Wrap-rascal, &c.

‡ A chocolate-house in St. James's Street.

Thus was of old Britannia's city bless'd,
 Ere pride and luxury her sons possess'd;
 Coaches and chariots yet unfashion'd lay,
 Nor late-invented chairs perplex'd the way;
 Then the proud lady tripp'd along the town,
 And tuck'd-up petticoats secur'd her gown;
 Her rosy cheek with distant visits glow'd,
 And exercise unartful charms bestow'd:
 But since in braided gold her foot is bound,
 And a long training mantua sweeps the ground,
 Her shoe disdains the street; the lazy fair 115
 With narrow step affects a limping air.
 Now gaudy pride corrupts the lavish age,
 And the streets flame with glaring equipage;
 The tricking gamester insolently rides,
 With loves and graces on his chariot sides;
 In saucy state the griping broker sits.
 And laughs at honesty and trudging wits.
 For you, O honest men, these useful lays
 The muse prepares! I seek no other praise. 120

When sleep is first disturb'd by morning cries;
 From sure prognostics learn to know the skies,
 Lest you of rheums and coughs at night complain;
 Surpris'd in dreary fogs, or driving rain.
 When suffocating mists obscure the morn,
 Let thy worst wig, long us'd to storms, be worn
 This knows the powder'd footman, and with care;
 Beneath his flapping hat secures his hair.
 Be thou for every season justly dress'd,
 Nor brave the piercing frost with open breast; 130
 And, when the bursting clouds a deluge pour,
 Let thy furtout defend the drenching shower.

The changing weather certain signs reveal.
 Ere winter sheds her snow, or frosts congeal,
 You'll see the coals in brighter flame aspire,
 And sulphur tinge with blue the rising fire;
 Your tender skins the scorching heat decline,
 And at the dearth of coals the poor repine;
 Before her kitchen hearth, the nodding dame,
 In flannel mantle wrapt, enjoys the flame; 140
 Hovering, upon her feeble knees she bends,
 And all around the grateful warmth ascends.

Nor do less certain signs the town advise
 Of milder weather and serener skies.
 The ladies, gaily dress'd, the Mall adorn
 With various dyes, and paint the sunny morn:
 The wanton fawns with frisking pleasure range,
 And chirping sparrows greet the welcome change;
 * Not that their minds with greater skill are fraught,
 Endued by instinct, or by reason taught: 150
 The seasons operate in every breast;
 'Tis hence the fawns are brisk, and ladies dress'd.
 When on his box the nodding coachman snores,
 And dreams of fancy'd fares; when tavern doors
 The chairman idly crowd; then ne'er refuse
 To trust thy busy steps in thinner shoes.

But when the swinging signs your ears offend
 With creaking noise, then rainy floods impend;
 Soon shall the kennels swell with rapid streams,
 And rush in muddy torrents to the Thames. 160
 The bookseller, whose shop's an open square,
 Foresees the tempest, and with early care

* "Haud equidem credo, quia sit divinitus illis
 "Ingenium, aut rerum fato prudentia major."
 VIRG. Georg. i.

Of learning strips the rails; the rowing crew,
To tempt a fare, clothe all their tilts in blue;
On hosiers' poles depending stockings ty'd
Flag with the slacken'd gale from side to side;
Church monuments foretel the changing air,
Then Niobe dissolves into a tear, [sounds
And sweats with sacred grief; you'll hear the
Of whistling winds, ere kennels break their bounds:
Ungrateful odours common-shores diffuse, 171
And dropping vaults distil unwholesome dew,
Ere the tiles rattle with the smoking shower,
And spouts on heedless men their torrents pour.

All superstition from thy breast repel:
Let credulous boys and prattling nurses tell,
How, if the festival of Paul be clear,
Plenty from liberal horn shall strew the year;
When the dark skies dissolve in snow or rain, 179
The labouring hind shall yoke the steer in vain;
But, if the threatening winds in tempests roar,
Then war shall bathe her wasteful sword in gore.
How, if on Swithin's feast the welkin lours,
And every penthouse streams with hasty showers,
Twice twenty days shall clouds their fleeces drain,
And wash the pavements with incessant rain.
Let not such vulgar tales debase thy mind;
Nor Paul nor Swithin rule the clouds and wind.

If you the precepts of the muse despise,
And slight the faithful warning of the skies, 190
Others you'll see, when all the town's afloat,
Wrapt in th' embraces of a kersey coat,
Or double-bottom'd frieze; their guarded feet
Defy the muddy dangers of the street;
While you, with hat unloop'd, the fury dread
Of spouts high streaming, and with cautious tread
Shun every dishing pool, or idly stop,
To seek the kind protection of a shop.
But business summons; now with hasty scud
You jostle for the wall; the spatter'd mud 200
Hides all thy hose behind; in vain you scower,
Thy wig, alas! uncurl'd, admits the shower.
So fierce Alecto's snaky tresses fell,
When Orpheus charm'd the rigorous powers of
hell;

Or thus hung Glaucus' beard, with briny dew
Clotted and strait, when first his amorous view
Surpris'd the bathing fair; the frightened maid
Now stands a rock, transform'd by Circe's aid.

Good housewives all the winter's rage despise,
Defended by the riding-hood's disguise; 210
Or, underneath th' umbrella's oily shed,
Safe through the wet on clinking pattens tread.
Let Persian dames th' umbrella's ribs display,
To guard their beauties from the sunny ray;
Or sweating slaves support the shady load,
When eastern monarchs show their state abroad:
Britain in winter only knows its aid,
To guard from chilly showers the walking maid.
But, O forget not, muse, the patten's praise,
That female implement shall grace thy lays; 220
Say from what art divine th' invention came,
And from its origin deduce its name.

Where Lincoln wide extends her fenny foil,
A goodly yeoman liv'd, grown white with toil;
One only daughter blest'd his nuptial bed,
Who from her infant hand the poultry fed:

Martha (her careful mother's name) she bore,
But now her careful mother was no more.
Whilst on her father's knee the damsel play'd,
Patty he fondly call'd the smiling maid;
As years increas'd, her ruddy beauty grew,
And Patty's fame o'er all the village flew.

Soon as the gray-ey'd morning streaks the skies,
And in the doubtful day the woodcock flies,
Her cleanly pail the pretty housewife bears,
And singing to the distant field repairs;
And, when the plains with evening dew are spread,

The milky burden smokes upon her head,
Deep through a miry lane she pick'd her way,
Above her ankle rose the chalky clay. 240

Vulcan by chance the bloomy maiden spies,
With innocence and beauty in her eyes:
He saw, he lov'd; for yet he ne'er had known
Sweet innocence and beauty meet in one.
Ah, Mulciber! recal thy nuptial vows,
Think on the graces of thy Paphian spouse,
Think how her eyes dart inexhausted charms,
And canst thou leave her bed for Patty's arms?

The Lemnian Power forsakes the realms above,
His bosom glowing with terrestrial love: 250
Far in the lane a lonely hut he found;
No tenant ventur'd on th' unwholesome ground.
Here smokes his forge, he bares his sinewy arm,
And early strokes the sounding anvil warm:
Around his shop the steely sparkles flew,
As for the steed he shap'd the bending shoe.

When blue-ey'd Patty near his window came,
His anvil rests, his forge forgets to flame.
To hear his soothing tales, she feigns delays;
What woman can resist the force of praise? 260

At first she coyly every kiss withstood,
And all her cheek was flush'd with modest blood:
With headless nails he now surrounds her shoes,
To save her steps from rains and piercing dew.
She lik'd his soothing tales, his presents wore,
And granted kisses, but would grant no more.
Yet winter chill'd her feet, with cold she pines,
And on her cheek the fading rose declines;
No more her humid eyes their lustre boast,
And in hoarse sounds her melting voice is lost. 270

This Vulcan saw, and in his heavenly thought
A new machine mechanic fancy wrought.
Above the mire her shelter'd steps to raise,
And bear her safely through the wintry ways.
Strait the new engine on his anvil glows,
And the pale virgin on the patten rose.
No more her lungs are shook with dropping
rheums,

And on her cheek reviving beauty blooms.
The god obtain'd his suit: though flattery fail,
Presents with female virtue must prevail. 280
The patten now supports each frugal dame,
Which from the blue-ey'd Patty takes the name.

BOOK II.

OF WALKING THE STREETS BY DAY.

Thus far the muse has trac'd in useful lays
The proper implements for wintry ways;

Has taught the walker, with judicious eyes,
To read the various warnings of the skies :
Now venture, muse, from home to range the town,
And for the public safety risk thy own.

For ease and for dispatch, the morning's best ;
No tides of passengers the streets molest ;
You'll see a draggled damsel here and there,
From Billigate her fishy traffic bear ; 10
On doors the fallow milk maid chalks her gains :
Ah ! how unlike the milk-maid of the plains !
Before proud gates attending asses bray,
Or arrogate with solemn pace the way ;
These grave physicians with their milky cheer
The love-sick maid and dwindling beau repair ;
Here rows of drummers stand in martial file,
And with their vellum thunder shake the pile,
To greet the new-made bride. Are sounds like these

The proper prelude to a state of peace ? 20
Now industry awakes her busy sons ;
Full-charg'd with news the breathless hawker runs :
Shops open, coaches roll, carts shake the ground,
And all the streets with passing cries resound.

If cloth'd in black you tread the busy town,
Or if distinguish'd by the reverend gown,
Three trades avoid : oft' in the mingling press
The barber's apron soils the fable dress ;
Shun the perfumer's touch with cautious eye,
Nor let the baker's step advance too nigh. 30
Ye walkers too, that youthful colours wear,
Three sullyng trades avoid with equal care :
The little chimney-sweeper skulks along,
And marks with sooty stains the heedless throng :
When small coal murmurs in the hoarser throat,
From smutty dangers guard thy threat'ned coat ;
The dustman's cart offends thy clothes and eyes,
When through the street a cloud of ashes flies ;
But, whether black or lighter dyes are worn,
The chandler's basket, on his shoulders borne, 40
With tallow spots thy coat ; resign the way,
To shun the surly butcher's greasy tray,
Butchers, whose hands are dy'd with blood's foul stain,

And always foremost in the hangman's train.

Let due civilities be strictly paid :
The wall surrender to the hooded maid ;
Nor let thy sturdy elbow's hasty rage
Jostle the feeble steps of trembling age :
And when the porter bends beneath his load, 49
And pants for breath, clear thou the crowded road.
But, above all, the groping blind direct ;
And from the pressing throng the lame protect.

You'll sometimes meet a fop, of nicest tread,
Whose mantling peruke veils his empty head ;
At every step he dreads the wall to lose,
And risks, to save a coach, his red-heel'd shoes ;
Him, like the miller, pass with caution by,
Left from his shoulder clouds of powder fly.
But when the bully, with assuming pace,
Cocks his broad hat, edg'd round with tarnish'd
lace, 60

Yield not the way, defy his strutting pride,
And thrust him to the muddy kennel's side ;
He never turns again, nor dares oppose,
But mutters coward curses as he goes.

If drawn by business to a street unknown,
Let the sworn porter point thee through the town ;
Be sure observe the signs, for signs remain
Like faithful landmarks to the walking train.
Seek not from 'prentices to learn the way,
Those fabling boys will turn thy steps astray ; 70
Ask the grave tradesman to direct thee right,
He ne'er deceives—but when he profits by't.

Where fam'd St. Giles's ancient limits spread,
An inrail'd column rears its lofty head,
Here to seven streets seven dials count the day,
And from each other catch the circling ray.
Here oft' the peasant, with inquiring face,
Bewilder'd, trudges on from place to place ;
He dwells on every sign with stupid gaze,
Enters the narrow alley's doubtful maze, 80
Tries every winding court and street in vain,
And doubles o'er his weary steps again.
Thus hardy Theseus, with intrepid feet,
Travers'd the dangerous labyrinth of Crete ;
But still the wandering passes force his stay,
Till Ariadne's clue unwinds the way.
But do not thou, like that bold chief, confide
Thy venturous footsteps to a female guide ;
She'll lead thee with delusive smiles along,
Dive in thy fob, and drop thee in the throng. 90

When waggish boys the stunted besom ply,
To rid the flabby pavement, pass not by [flirt
Ere thou hast held their hands ; some heedless
Will overspread thy calves with spattering dirt.
Where porters hogheads roll from carts aslope,
Or brewers down steep cellars stretch the rope,
Where counted billets are by carmen toft,
Stay thy rash step, and walk without the post.

What though the gathering mire thy feet be-smeared,

The voice of industry is always near. 100
Hark ! the boy calls thee to his destin'd stand,
And the shoe shines beneath his oily hand,
Here let the muse, fatigued amid the throng,
Adorn her precepts with digressive song ;
Of shirtless youths the secret rise to trace,
And show the parent of the fable race.

Like mortal man, great Jove (grown fond of change)

Of old was wont this nether world to range,
To seek amours ; the vice the monarch lov'd 109
Soon through the wide æthereal court improv'd :
And ev'n the proudest goddesses now and then
Would lodge a night among the sons of men ;
To vulgar deities descends the fashion,
Each, like her betters, had her earthly passion.
Then * Cloacina (goddess of the tide
Whose fable streams beneath the city glide)
Indulg'd the modish flame ; the town she rov'd,
A mortal scavenger she saw, she lov'd ;
The muddy spots that dry'd upon his face,
Like female patches, heighten'd every grace : 120

* Cloacina was a goddess, whose image Tatius (a king of the Sabines) found in the common sewer ; and, not knowing what goddess it was, he called it Cloacina, from the place in which it was found, and paid to it divine honours.—Lactant. i. 20. Minuc. Fel. Oct. p. 232.

She gaz'd; she sigh'd; (for love can beauties spy
In what seem faults to every common eye.)

Now had the watchman walk'd his second
round,
When Cloacina hears the rumbling sound
Of her brown lover's cart (for well she knows
That pleasing thunder): swift the goddess, rose,
And through the streets pursu'd the distant noise,
Her bosom panting with expected joys.
With the night-wandering harlot's airs she past,
Brush'd near his side, and wanton glances cast; 130
In the black form of cinder-wench she came,
When love, the hour, the place, had banish'd shame;

To the dark alley, arm in arm they move:
O may no link-boy interrupt their love! [space,
When the pale moon had nine times fill'd her
The pregnant goddess (cautious of disgrace)
Descends to earth; but sought no midwife's aid,
Nor 'midst her anguish to Lucina pray'd;
No cheerful gossip wish'd the mother joy,
Alone, beneath a bulk she dropt the boy. 140

The child, through various risks in years improv'd,
At first a beggar's brat compassion mov'd;
His infant tongue soon learnt the canting art,
Knew all the prayers and whines to touch the heart.

Oh happy unown'd youths! your limbs can bear
The scorching dog-star, and the winter's air;
While the rich infant, nurs'd with care and pain,
Thirsts with each heat, and coughs with every rain!
The goddess long had mark'd the child's distress,

And long had sought his sufferings to redress. 150
She prays the gods to take the foundling's part,
To teach his hands some beneficial art
Practis'd in streets: the gods her suit allow'd,
And made him useful to the walking crowd;
To cleanse the miry feet, and o'er the shoe
With nimble skill the glossy black renew.
Each power contributes to relieve the poor:
With the strong bristles of the mighty boar
Diana forms his brush; the god of day
A tripod gives, amid the crowded way 160
To raise the dirty foot, and ease his toil;
Kind Neptune fills his vase with fetid oil
Prest from th' enormous whale; the god of fire,
From whose dominions smoky clouds aspire,
Among these generous presents joins his part,
And aids with foot the new japanning art.
Pleas'd she receives the gifts; she downward glides,
Lights in Fleet-ditch, and shoots beneath the tides.

Now dawns the morn, the sturdy lad awakes,
Leaps from his stall, his tangled hair he shakes;
Then leaning o'er the rails, he musing stood, 171
And view'd below the black canal of mud,
Where common shores a lulling murmur keep,
Whose torrents rush from Holborn's fatal steep:
Pensive through idleness, tears flow'd apace,
Which eas'd his loaded heart, and wash'd his face!
At length he sighing cry'd, That boy was blest,
Whose infant lips have drain'd a mother's breast;
But happier far are those (if such be known)
Whom both a father and a mother own: 180

But I, alas! hard fortune's utmost scorn,
Who ne'er knew parent, was an orphan born!
Some boys are rich by birth beyond all wants,
Belov'd by uncles, and kind good old aunts;
When time comes round, a Christmas box they bear,

And one day makes them rich for all the year.
Had I the precepts of a father learn'd,
Perhaps I then the coachman's fare had earn'd,
For lesser boys can drive; I thirsty stand,
And see the double flaggon charge their hand, 190
See them puff off the froth, and gulp amain,
While with dry tongue I lick my lips in vain.

While thus he fervent prays, the heaving tide,
In widen'd circles, beats on either side;
The goddess rose amid the inmost round,
With wither'd turnip-tops her temples crown'd;
Low reach'd her dripping tresses, lank, and black
As the smooth jet, or glossy raven's back;
Around her waist a circling eel was twin'd, 199
Which bound her robe that hung in rags behind.
Now beckoning to the boy, she thus begun:
Thy prayers are granted; weep no more, my son:
Go thrive. At some frequented corner stand;
This brush I give thee, grasp it in thy hand,
Temper the foot within this vase of oil,
And let the little tripod aid thy toil;
On this methinks I see the walking crew,
At thy request, support the miry shoe; [brown'd,
The foot grows black that was with dirt em-
And in thy pocket glingling halfpence sound. 210
The goddess plunges swift beneath the flood,
And dashes all around her showers of mud:
The youth strait chose his post; the labour ply'd
Where branching streets from Charing-Cross divide;
His treble voice resounds along the Meuse,
And Whitehall echoes—"Clean your Honour's
"shoes!"

Like the sweet ballad, this amusing lay
Too long detains the walker on his way;
While he attends, new dangers round him throng;
The busy city asks instructive song. 220

Where, elevated o'er the gaping crowd,
Clasp'd in the board the perjur'd head is bow'd,
Betimes retreat; here, thick as hailstones pour,
Turnips and half-hatch'd eggs (a mingled shower)
Among the rabble rain: some random throw
May with the trickling yolk thy cheek o'erflow.

Though expedition bids, yet never stray
Where no rang'd posts defend the rugged way.
Here laden carts with thundering waggons meet,
Wheels clash with wheels, and bar the narrow
street;

The lashing whip resounds, the horses strain,
And blood in anguish bursts the swelling vein.
O barbarous men! your cruel breasts assuage;
Why vent ye on the generous steed your rage?
Does not his service earn your daily bread?
Your wives, your children, by his labours feed!
If, as the Samian taught, the soul revives,
And, shifting seats, in other bodies lives;
Severe shall be the brutal coachman's change, 239
Doom'd in a hackney horse the town to range;
Carmen, transform'd, the groaning load shall draw,
Whom other tyrants with the lash shall awe.

Who would of Watling-street the dangers share,
When the broad pavement of Cheapside is near?
Or who that rugged street * would traverse o'er,
That stretches, O Fleet-ditch, from thy black shore
To the Tower's moated walls? Here steams ascend
That, in mix'd fumes, the wrinkled nose offend.
Where chandlers' cauldrons boil; where fishy prey
Hide the wet stall, long absent from the sea; 250
And where the cleaver chops the heifer's spoil.
And where huge hogheads sweat with trainy oil;
Thy breathing nostril hold; but how shall I
Pass, where in piles Carnavian † cheeses lie;
Cheese, that the table's closing rites denies,
And bids me with th' unwilling chaplain rise?

O bear me to the paths of fair Pall-mall!
Safe are thy pavements, grateful is thy smell!
At distance rolls along the gilded coach,
Nor sturdy carmen on thy walks encroach; 260
No lets would bar thy ways were chairs deny'd,
The soft supports of laziness and pride: [glow,
Shops breathes perfumes, through fashies ribbons
The mutual arms of ladies and the beau.
Yet still ev'n here, when rains the passage hide,
Oft the loose stone spirts up a muddy tide
Beneath thy careless foot; and from on high,
Where mansions mount the ladder, fragments fly,
Mortar and crumbled lime in showers descend,
And o'er thy head destructive tiles impend. 270

But sometimes let me leave the noisy roads,
And silent wander in the close abodes,
Where wheels ne'er shake the ground; there
pensive stray,

In studious thought, the long uncrowded way.
Here I remark each walker's different face,
And in their look their various business trace.
The broker here his spacious beaver wears,
Upon his brow sit jealousies and cares;
Bent on some mortgage (to avoid reproach)
He seeks by-streets, and saves th' expensive coach.
Soft, at low doors, old lechers tap their cane, 281
For fair recluse, who travels Drury-Lane;
Here roams uncomb'd the lavish rake, to shun
His Fleet-street draper's everlasting dun.

Careful observers, studious of the town,
Shun the misfortunes that disgrace the clown;
Untempted, they condemn the juggler's feats,
Pass by the Meuse, nor try the * thimble's cheats.
When drays bound high, they never cross behind,
Where bubbling yeast is blown by gusts of wind:
And when up Ludgate-hill huge carts move slow,
Far from the straining steeds securely go, 292
Whose dashing hoofs behind them fling the mire,
And mark with muddy blots the gazing 'squire.
The Parthian thus his javelin backward throws,
And as he flies insects pursuing foes.

The thoughtless wits shall frequent forfeits pay,
Who 'gainst the sentry's box discharge their tea.
Do thou some court or secret corner seek, 299
Nor flush with shame the passing virgin's cheek.

Yet let me not descend to trivial song,
Nor vulgar circumstance my verse prolong.

* Thames-street. † Cheshire, anciently so called.

† A cheat commonly practised in the streets with three thimbles and a little ball.

Why should I teach the maid, when torrents pour,
Her head to shelter from the sudden shower?
Nature will best her ready hand inform,
With her spread petticoat to fence the storm.
Does not each walker know the warning sign,
When wisps of straw depend upon the twine
Cross the close street; that then the paver's art
Renews the ways, deny'd to coach and cart? 310
Who knows not that the coachman lashing by
Oft with his flourish cuts the heedless eye;
And when he takes his stand, to wait a fare,
His horses foreheads shun the winter's air?
Nor will I roam where summer's sultry rays
Parch the dry ground, and spread with dust the ways;

With whirling gusts the rapid atoms rise,
Smoke o'er the pavement, and involve the skies.
Winter my theme confines; whose nitry wind
Shall crust the slabby mire, and kennels bind; 320
She bids the snow descend in flaky sheets,
And in her hoary mantle clothe the streets.
Let not the virgin tread these slippery roads,
The gathering fleece the hollow patten loads;
But if thy footstep slide with clotted frost,
Strike off the breaking balls against the post.
On silent wheel the passing coaches roll;
Oft look behind, and ward the threatening pole.
In harden'd orbs the school-boy moulds the snow,
To mark the coachman with a dext'rous throw.
Why do ye, boys, the kennel's surface spread, 331
To tempt with faithless pass the matron's tread?
How can you laugh to see the damsel spurn,
Sink in your frauds, and her green stocking mourn?
At White's the harness'd chairman idly stands,
And swings around his waist his tingling hands;
The sempstress speeds to change with red-tipt
nose;

The Belgian stove beneath her footstool glows;
In half-whipt muslin needles useless lie,
And shuttle-cocks across the counter fly. 340
These sports warm harmless; why then will ye
prove,

Deluded maids, the dangerous flame of love?

Where Covent-garden's famous temple stands,
That boasts the work of Jones' immortal hands;
Columns with plain magnificence appear,
And graceful porches lead along the square:
Here oft my course I bend; when lo! from far
I spy the furies of the foot-ball war:
The 'prentice quits his shop, to join the crew,
Increasing crowds the flying game pursue. 350
Thus, as you roll the ball o'er snowy ground,
The gathering globe augments with every round.
But whither shall I run! the throng draws nigh,
The ball now skims the street, now soars on high;
The dext'rous glazier flying returns the bound,
And jingling fashes on the pent-house sound.

O, roving muse! recal that wondrous year,
When winter reign'd in bleak Britannia's air;
When hoary Thames, with frosted ozers crown'd,
Was three long moons in icy fetters bound. 360
The waterman, forlorn, along the shore,
Pensive reclines upon his useless oar;
See harness'd steeds desert the stony town,
And wander roads unfitable, not their own;

Wheels o'er the harden'd waters smoothly glide,
And rase with whiten'd tracks the slippery tide;
Here the fat cook piles high the blazing fire
And scarce the spit can turn the steer entire;
Booths sudden hide the Thames, long streets ap-
pear,

And numerous games proclaim the crowded fair.
So when a general bids the martial train 371
Spread their encampment o'er the spacious plain:
Thick rising tents a canvas city build,
And the loud dice resound through all the field.

'Twas here the matron found a doleful fate:
Let elegiac lay the woe relate,
Soft as the breath of distant flutes, at hours
When silent evening closes up the flowers;
Lulling as falling water's hollow noise;
Indulging grief, like Philomela's voice. 380

Doll every day had walk'd these treacherous roads;

Her neck grew warpt beneath autumnal loads
Of various fruit: she now a basket bore;
That head, alas! shall basket bear no more.
Each booth she frequent past, in quest of gain,
And boys with pleasure heard her shrilling strain.
Ah, Doll! all mortals must resign their breath,
And industry itself submit to death! 388

The cracking crystal yields; she sinks, she dies,
Her head, chopt off, from her lost shoulders flies;
Pippins she cry'd; but death her voice confounds;
And pip-pip-pip along the ice resounds.

So when the Thracian furies Orpheus tore,
And left his bleeding trunk deform'd with gore,
His sever'd head floats down the silver tide,
His yet warm tongue for his lost consort cry'd;
Eurydice with quivering voice he mourn'd,
And Heber's banks Eurydice return'd.

But now the western gale the flood unbinds,
And blackening clouds move on with warmer
winds; 400

The wooden town its frail foundation leaves,
And Thames' full urn rolls down his plenteous waves;

From every pent-house streams the fleeting
snow,

And with dissolving frost the pavements flow.

Experienc'd men, iur'd to city ways,
Need not the calendar to count their days.
When through the town with flow and solemn air,
Led by the nostril, walks the muzzled bear;
Behind him moves, majestically dull,

The pride of Hockley-hole, the surly bull. 410

Learn hence the periods of the week to name,
Mondays and Thursdays are the days of game.

When fishy stalls with double store are laid;

The golden-belly'd carp, the broad fin'd maid,

Red speckled trouts, the salmon's silver jowl,

The jointed lobster, and unscaley foal,

And luscious 'scallops to allure the tastes

Of rigid zealots to delicious fasts;

Wednesdays and Fridays you'll observe from hence,

Days when our fires were doom'd to abstinence.

When dirty waters from balconies drop, 421

And dext'rous damsels twirl the sprinkling mop,

And cleanse the spatter'd sash, and scrub the stairs;

Know Saturday's conclusive morn appears.

Successive cries the seasons' change declare,
And mark the monthly progress of the year.
Hark! how the streets with treble voices ring,
To sell the bounteous product of the spring:
Sweet-smelling flowers, and alder's early bud,
With nettle's tender shoots, to cleanse the blood;
And, when June's thunder cools the sultry skies,
E'en Sundays are profan'd by mackrel cries. 432
Walnuts the fruiterer's hand in autumn stain,
Blue plumbs and juicy pears augment his gain;
Next oranges the longing boys entice,
To trust their copper fortunes to the dice.

When rosemary, and bays, the poet's crown,
Are bawl'd, in frequent cries, through all the town,
Then judge the festival of Christmas near,
Christmas, the joyous period of the year. 440

Now with bright holly all your temples strow,
With laurel green, and sacred mistletoe.
Now, heaven-born Charity! thy blessings shed;
Bid meagre Want uprear her sickly head;
Bid shivering limbs be warm; let Plenty's bowl
In humble roofs make glad the needy soul!
See, see! the heaven-born maid her blessings shed;
Lo! meagre Want uprears her sickly head;
Cloth'd are the naked, and the needy glad,
While selfish Avarice alone is sad. 450

Proud coaches pass, regardless of the moan
Of infant orphans, and the widow's groan;
While Charity still moves the walker's mind,
His liberal purse relieves the lame and blind.
Judiciously thy halfpence are bestow'd,
Where the laborious beggar sweeps the road.
Whate'er you give, give ever at demand,
Nor let old age long stretch his palsy'd hand.
Those who give late are importun'd each day,
And still are teas'd because they still delay. 460
If e'er the miser durst his farthings spare,
He thinly spreads them through the public square,
Where, all beside the rail, rang'd beggars lie,
And from each other catch the doleful cry;
With Heaven, for two-pence, cheaply wipes his score,

Lifts up his eyes, and hastes to beggar more.

Where the brass-knocker, wrapt in flannel band,
Forbids the thunder of the footman's hand;
Th' upholder, rueful harbinger of death,
Waits with impatience for the dying breath; 470

As vultures o'er a camp, with hovering flight,
Snuff up the future carnage of the fight.

Here canst thou pass, unmindful of a prayer,
That Heaven in mercy may thy brother spare?

Come, Fortescue, sincere, experienc'd friend,
Thy briefs, thy deeds, and ev'n thy fees suspend;
Come let us leave the Temple's silent walls,
Me business to my distant lodging calls;
Through the long Strand together let us stray;
With thee conversing, I forget the way. 480

Eehold that narrow street which steep descends,
Whose building to the slimy shore extends,
Here Arundel's fam'd structure rear'd its frame,
The street alone retains the empty name.

Where Titian's glowing paint the canvas warm'd,
And Raphael's fair design, with judgment, charm'd,
Now hangs the bellman's song, and pasted here
The colour'd prints of Overton appear.

Where statues breath'd the works of Phidias' hands, 489

A wooden pump, or lonely watch-house, stands.
There Essex' stately pile adorn'd the shore,
There Cecil's, Bedford's, Villiers', now no more.
Yet Burlington's fair palace still remains;
Beauty within, without proportion reigns.
Beneath his eye declining art revives,
The wall with animated picture lives;
There Handel strikes the strings, the melting
strain

Transports the soul, and thrills through every vein;

There oft' I enter (but with cleaner shoes),
For Burlington's belov'd by every muse. 500

O ye associate walkers, O my friends,
Upon your state what happiness attends!
What though no coach to frequent visit rolls,
Nor for your shilling chairmen sling their poles;
Yet still your nerves rheumatic pains defy,
Nor lazy jaundice dulls your saffron eye;
No wasting cough discharges sounds of death,
Nor wheezing asthma heaves in vain for breath;
Nor from your restless couch is heard the groan
Of burning gout, or sedentary stone. 510

Let others in the jolting coach confide,
Or in the leaky boat the Thames divide;
Or, box'd within the chair, condemn the street,
And trust their safety to another's feet:
Still let me walk; for oft' the sudden gale
Ruffles the tide, and shifts the dangerous sail;
Then shall the passenger too late deplore
The whelming billow, and the faithless oar;
The drunken chairman in the kennel spurns,
The glasses shatters, and his charge o'erturns. 520
Who can recount the coach's various harms,
The legs disjointed, and the broken arms?

I've seen a beau, in some ill-fated hour,
When o'er the stones choak'd kennels swell the shower,

In gilded chariot loll; he with disdain
Views spatter'd passengers all drench'd in rain.
With mud fill'd high, the rumbling cart draws
near;

Now rule thy prancing steeds, lac'd charioteer:
The dustman lashes on with spiteful rage, 530
His ponderous spokes thy painted wheel engage;
Crush'd is thy pride, down falls the shrieking beau,
The slabby pavement crystal fragments strow;
Black floods of mire th' embroider'd coat disgrace,
And mud enwraps the honours of his face.

So, when dread Jove the son of Phœbus hurl'd,
Scar'd with dark thunder, to the nether world,
The headstrong couriers tore the silver reins,
And the sun's beamy ruin gilds the plains.

If the pale walker pant with weakening ills,
His sickly hand is stor'd with friendly bills; 540
From hence he learns the seventh-born doctor's fame,

From hence he learns the cheapest tailor's name.

Shall the large mutton smoke upon your boards?
Such Newgate's copious market best affords.
Would'st thou with mighty beef augment thy meal?

Seek Leaden hall; St. James's sends thee veal;

Thames-street gives cheeses; Covent-garden fruits;
Moorfields old books; and Monmouth-street old suits.

Hence mayst thou well supply the wants of life,
Support thy family, and clothe thy wife. 550

Volumes on shelter'd stalls expanded lie,
And various science lures the learned eye:
The bending shelves with ponderous scholiasts
groan,

And deep divines, to modern shops unknown;
Here, like the bee, that on industrious wing
Collects the various odours of the spring,
Walkers' at leisure, learning's flowers may spoil,
Nor watch the wasting of the midnight oil;
May morals snatch from Plutarch's tatter'd page,
A mildew'd Bacon, or Stagyra's sage: 560
Here sauntering 'prentices o'er Otway weep,
O'er Congreve smile, or over D'Urfey sleep;
Pleas'd sempstresses the Lock's fam'd Rape unfold;
And * Squirts read Garth, till apozems grow cold.

O Lintot! let my labours obvious lie,
Rang'd on thy stall, for every curious eye!
So shall the poor these precepts gratis know,
And to my verse their future safeties owe.

What walker shall his mean ambition fix
On the false lustre of a coach and fix? 570

Let the vain virgin, lur'd by glaring show,
Sigh for the liveries of th' embroider'd beau.

See yon bright chariot on its braces swing,
With Flanders mares, and on an arched spring.
That wretch, to gain an equipage and place,
Betray'd his sister to a lewd embrace.

This coach that with the blazon'd 'scutcheon
glows,

Vain of his unknown race, the coxcomb shows.
Here the brib'd lawyer, sunk in velvet, sleeps;
The starving orphan, as he passes, weeps; 580

There flames a fool, begirt with tinsel slaves,
Who wastes the wealth of a whole race of knaves;
That other, with a clustering train behind,
Owes his new honours to a sordid mind!

This next in court-fidelity excels,
The public rifles, and his country sells.

May the proud chariot never be my fate,
If purchas'd at so mean, so dear a rate!

Or rather give me sweet content on foot,
Wrapt in my virtue, and a good furtout! 590

BOOK III.

OF WALKING THE STREETS BY NIGHT.

O TRIVIA, goddess! leave these low abodes,
And traverse o'er the wide etherial roads;
Celestial queen! put on thy robes of light,
Now Cynthia nam'd, fair regent of the night.
At sight of thee, the villain sheathes his sword,
Nor scales the wall, to steal the wealthy hoard.
O may thy silver lamp from heaven's high bower
Direct my footsteps in the midnight hour!

When night first bids the twinkling stars appear.

Or with her cloudy vest inwraps the air, 10

* An apothecary's boy, in 'The Dispensary.'

Then swarms the busy street; with caution tread,
Where the shop-windows * falling threat thy head;
Now labourers home return, and join their strength

To bear the tottering plank, or ladder's length;
Still fix thy eyes intent upon the throng,
And, as the paffes open, wind along.

Where the fair columns of St. Clement stand,
Whose straiten'd bounds encroach upon the Strand;
Where the low penthouse bows the walker's head,
And the rough pavement wounds the yielding
wread; 20

Where not a post protects the narrow space,
And, strung in twines, combs dangle in thy face;
Summon at once thy courage, rouse thy care,
Stand firm, look back, be resolute, beware.
Forth issuing from steep lanes, the collier's steeds
Drag the black load; another cart succeeds;
Team follows team, crowds heap'd on crowds ap-
pear,

And wait impatient till the road grow clear.
Now all the pavement sounds with trampling feet,
And the mix'd hurry barricades the street. 30

Entangled here, the waggon's lengthen'd team
Cracks the tough harness; here a ponderous beam
Lies over-turn'd athwart; for slaughter fed,
Here lowing bullocks raise their horned head.
Now oaths grow loud, with coaches coaches jar,
And the smart blow provokes the sturdy war;
From the high box they whirl the thong around,
And with the twining lash their shins resound:
Their rage ferments, more dangerous wounds they try,

And the blood gushes down their painful eye. 40
And now on foot the frowning warriors light,
And with their ponderous fists renew the fight;
Blow answers blow, their cheeks are smear'd with blood,

Till down they fall, and grappling roll in mud.
So when two boars, in wild Ytene † bred,
Or on Westphalia's fattening chesnuts fed, [fire,
Gnash their sharp tusks, and, rous'd with equal
Dispute the reign of some luxurious mire,
In the black flood they wallow o'er and o'er, 49
Till their arm'd jaws distil with foam and gore.

Where the mob gathers, swiftly shoot along,
Nor idly mingle in the noisy throng:
Lur'd by the silver hilt, amid the swarm,
The subtle artist will thy side disarm.
Nor is the flaxen wig with safety worn;
High on the shoulder, in a basket borne,
Lurks the fly boy, whose hand, to rapine bred,
Plucks off the curling honours of thy head.
Here dives the skulking thief, with practis'd sleight,
And unfelt fingers make thy pocket light. 60

Where's now the watch, with all its trinkets, flown?
And thy late snuff-box is no more thy own.
But lo! his bolder thefts some tradesman spies,
Swift from his prey the scudding lurcher flies;
Dext'rous he 'scapes the coach with nimble bounds,
Whilst every honest tongue "stop thief" re-
sounds.

* A species of window now almost forgotten.

† New Forest in Hampshire, anciently so called.

So speeds the wily fox, alarm'd by fear,
Who lately filch'd the turkey's callow care;
Hounds following hounds grow louder as he flies;
And injur'd tenants join the hunter's cries. 70
Breathless, he stumbling falls. Ill-fated boy!
Why did not honest work thy youth employ?
Seiz'd by rough hands, he's dragg'd amid the rout,

And stretch'd beneath the pump's incessant spout,
Or, plung'd in miry ponds, he gasping lies,
Mud choaks his mouth, and plaisters o'er his eyes.

Let not the ballad-finger's shrilling strain
Amid the swarm thy listening ear detain:
Guard well thy pocket; for these syrens stand
To aid the labours of the diving hand; 80
Confederate in the cheat, they draw the throng,
And cambric handkerchiefs reward the song.
But soon as coach or cart drives rattling on,
The rabble part, in shoals they backward run.
So Jove's loud bolts the mingled war divide,
And Greece and Troy retreat on either side.

If the rude throng pour on with furious pace,
And hap to break thee from a friend's embrace,
Stop short; nor struggle through the crowd in
vain,

But watch with careful eye the passing train. 90
Yet I (perhaps too fond), if chance the tide
Tumultuous bear my partner from my side,
Impatient venture back; despising harm,
I force my passage where the thickest swarm.
Thus his lost bride the Trojan fought in vain
Through night, and arms, and flames, and hills of flain.

Thus Nisus wander'd o'er the pathless grove,
To find the brave companion of his love.
The pathless grove in vain he wanders o'er:
Euryalus, alas! is now no more. 100

That walker, who, regardless of his pace,
Turns oft' to pore upon the damsel's face,
From side to side by thrusting elbows toft,
Shall strike his aching breast against a post;
Or water, dash'd from fishy stalls, shall stain
His hapless coat with spirts of scaly rain.
But, if unwarily he chance to stray
Where twirling turnstiles intercept the way,
The thwarting passenger shall force them round,
And beat the wretch half breathless to the ground.

Let constant vigilance thy footsteps guide, 110
And wary circumspection guard thy side;
Then shalt thou walk unharm'd the dangerous
night,

Nor need th' officious linkboys smoky light.
Thou never wilt attempt to cross the road,
Where ale-house benches rest the porter's load,
Grievous to heedless shins; no barrows wheel,
That bruises oft' the truant school-boy's heel,
Behind thee rolling, with insidious pace,
Shall mark thy stocking with a miry trace. 120
Let not thy venturous steps approach too nigh,
Where, gaping wide, low steepy cellars lie.
Should thy shoe wrench aside, down, down you
fall,

And overturn the scolding huckster's stall;
The scolding huckster shall not o'er thee moan,
But pence exact for nuts and pears o'erthrown.

Though you through cleaner allies wind by day,

To shun the hurries of the public way,
Yet ne'er to those dark paths by night retire;
Mind only safety, and condemn the mire. 130

Then no impervious courts thy haste detain.
Nor sneering alewives bid thee turn again.
Where Lincoln's-inn, wide space, is rail'd around,
Cross not with venturous step; there oft' is found
The lurking thief, who while the day-light shone
Made the walls echo with his begging tone:
That crutch, which late compassion mov'd, shall wound

Thy bleeding head, and fell thee to the ground.
Though thou art tempted by the link-man's call,
Yet trust him not along the lonely wall; 140
In the mid-way he'll quench the flaming brand,
And share the booty with the pilfering band.
Still keep the public streets, where oily rays,
Shot from the crystal lamp, o'erspread the ways.

Happy Augusta! law-defended town!
Here no dark lanterns shade the villain's frown;
No Spanish jealousies thy lanes infest,
Nor Roman vengeance stabs th' unwary breast;
Here tyranny ne'er lifts her purple hand,
But liberty and justice guard the land; 150
No bravos here profess the bloody trade,
Nor is the church the murderer's refuge made.

Let not the chairman, with assuming stride,
Press near the wall, and rudely thrust thy side:
The laws have set him bounds; his servile feet
Should ne'er encroach where posts defend the street.

Yet who the footman's arrogance can quell,
Whose flambeau gilds the sashes of Pall-mall,
When in long rank a train of torches flame,
To light the midnight visits of the dame? 160
Others, perhaps, by happier guidance led,
May where the chairman rests with safety tread;
Whene'er I pass, their poles (unseen below)
Make my knee tremble with a jarring blow.

If wheels bar up the road, where streets are cross,

With gentle words the coachman's ear accost:
He ne'er the threat or harsh command obeys,
But with contempt the spatter'd shoe surveys.
Now man with utmost fortitude thy soul, 169
To cross the way where carts and coaches roll;
Yet do not in thy hardy skill confide,
Nor rashly risk the kennel's spacious stride;
Stay till afar the distant wheel you hear,
Like dying thunder in the breaking air;
Thy foot will slide upon the miry stone,
And passing coaches crush thy tortur'd bone,
Or wheels inclose the road; on either hand
Pent round with perils, in the midst you stand,
And call for aid in vain; the coachman swears,
And carmen drive, unmindful of thy prayers. 180
Where wilt thou turn? ah! whither wilt thou fly?

On every side the pressing spokes are nigh.
So sailors, while Charybdis' gulf they shun,
Amaz'd on Scylla's craggy dangers run.

Be sure observe where brown Ostrea stands,
Who boasts her shelly ware from Walfleet sands;

There may'st thou pass with safe unmiry feet,
Where the rais'd pavement leads athwart the
street,

If where Fleet-ditch with muddy current flows,
You chance to roam; where oyster-tubs in rows
Are rang'd beside the posts; there stay thy haste,
And with the savoury fish indulge thy taste: 192
The damsel's knife the gaping shell commands,
While the salt liquor streams between her hands.

The man had sure a palate cover'd o'er
With brass or steel, that on the rocky shore
First broke the oozy oyster's pearly coat,
And risk'd the living morsel down his throat.
What will not luxury taste? Earth, sea, and air,
Are daily ranfack'd for the bill of fare! 200
Blood stuff'd in skins is British Christian's food;
And France robs marshes of the croaking brood!
Spungy morels in strong ragouts are found,
And in the soup the slimy snail is drown'd.

When from high spouts the dashing torrents fall,
Ever be watchful to maintain the wall;
For should'st thou quit thy ground, the rushing
throng

Will with impetuous fury drive along;
All press to gain those honours thou hast lost,
And rudely shove thee far without the post. 210
Then to retrieve the shed you strive in vain,
Draggled all o'er, and soak'd in floods of rain,
Yet rather bear the shower, and toils of mud,
Than in the doubtful quarrel risk thy blood.
O think on Œdipus' detested state,
And by his woes be warn'd to shun thy fate.

Where three roads join'd, he met his fire unknown;

(Unhappy fire, but more unhappy son!)
Each claim'd the way, their swords the strife decide,
The hoary monarch fell, he groan'd, and died! 220
Hence sprung the fatal plague that thinn'd thy reign,

Thy cursed incest! and thy children slain!
Hence wert thou doom'd in endless night to stray,
Through Theban streets, and cheerless grope thy way.

Contemplate, mortal, on thy fleeting years;
See, with black train the funeral pomp appears!
Whether some heir attends in sable state,
And mourns with outward grief a parent's fate;
Or the fair virgin, nipt in beauty's bloom,
A crowd of lovers follow to her tomb: 230
Why is the hearse with 'scutcheons blazon'd round,
And with the nodding plume of ostrich crown'd?
No: the dead know it not, nor profit gain;
It only serves to prove the living vain.
How short is life! how frail is human trust!
Is all this pomp for laying dust to dust?

Where the nail'd hoop defends the painted stall,
Brush not thy sweeping skirt too near the wall:
Thy heedless sleeve will drink the colour'd oil,
And spot indelible thy pocket soil. 240
Has not wise nature strung the legs and feet
With firmest nerves, design'd to walk the street?
Has she not given us hands to grope aright,
Amidst the frequent dangers of the night?
And think'st thou not the double nostril meant,
To warn from oily woes by previous scent?

Who can the various city frauds * recite,
 With all the petty rapines of the night?
 Who now the guinea dropper's bait regards,
 Trick'd by the sharper's dice, or juggler's cards?
 Why should I warn thee ne'er to join the fray, 251
 Where the sham quarrel interrupts the way?
 Lives there in these our days so soft a clown,
 Brav'd by the bully's oaths, or threatening frown?
 I need not strict enjoin the pocket's care,
 When from the crowded play thou lead'st the fair;
 Who has not here or watch or snuff-box lost,
 Or handkerchiefs that India's shuttle boast?
 O! may thy virtue guard thee through the roads
 Of Drury's mazy courts, and dark abodes! 260
 The harlots' guileful paths, who nightly stand
 Where Catharine-street descends into the Strand;
 Say, vagrant muse, their wiles and subtle arts,
 To lure the strangers' unsuspecting hearts:
 So shall our youth on healthful sinews tread,
 And city cheeks grow warm with rural red.

'Tis she who nightly strolls with fauntering pace,
 No stubborn stays her yielding shape embrace;
 Beneath the lamp her tawdry ribbons glare, 269
 The new-scour'd manteau, and the flattern-air;
 High-draggled petticoats her travels show,
 And hollow cheeks with artful blushes glow;
 With flattering sounds she soothes the credulous ear,
 "My noble captain! charmer! love! my dear!"
 In riding-hood, near tavern-doors she plies,
 Or muffled pinner's hide her livid eyes.
 With empty handbox she delights to range,
 And feigns a distant errand from the 'Change;
 Nay, she will oft' the Quaker's hood profane,
 And trudge demure the rounds of Drury-lane. 280
 She darts from farsetnet ambush wily leers,
 Twitches thy sleeve, or with familiar airs
 Her fan will pat thy cheek; these snares disdain,
 Nor gaze behind thee, when she turns again.

I knew a yeoman, who, for thirst of gain,
 To the great city drove, from Devon's plain,
 His numerous lowing herd; his herds he fold,
 And his deep leathern pocket bagg'd with gold.
 Drawn by a fraudulent nymph, he gaz'd, he sigh'd:
 Unmindful of his home, and distant bride, 290
 She leads the willing victim to his doom,
 Through winding alleys to her cobweb room.
 Thence through the street he reels from post to post,

Valiant with wine, nor knows his treasure lost.
 The vagrant wretch th' assembled watchmen spies,
 He waves his hanger, and their poles defies;
 Deep in the round-house pent, all night he snores,
 And the next morn in vain his fate deplores.

Ah, hapless swain! unus'd to pains and ills!
 Canst thou forego roast-beef for nauseous pills? 300
 How wilt thou lift to heaven thy eyes and hands,
 When the long scroll the surgeon's fees demands!
 Or else (ye gods avert that worst disgrace!)
 Thy ruin'd nose falls level with thy face!
 Then shall thy wife thy loathsome kiss disdain,
 And wholesome neighbours from thy mug refrain.
 Yet there are watchmen, who with friendly light,
 Will teach thy reeling steps to tread aright;

* Various cheats formerly in practice.

For sixpence will support thy helpless arm, 310
 And home conduct thee, safe from nightly harm.
 But, if they shake their lanterns, from afar
 To call their brethren to confederate war,
 When rakes resist their power; if hapless you
 Should chance to wander with the scowering crew;
 Though fortune yield thee captive, ne'er despair,
 But seek the constable's considerate ear;
 He will reverse the watchman's harsh decree,
 Mov'd by the rhetoric of a silver fee.
 Thus, would you gain some favourite courtier's word,

Fee not the petty clerks, but bribe my lord. 320
 Now is the time that rakes their revels keep;
 Kindlers of riot, enemies of sleep.

His scatter'd pence the flying nicker * flings,
 And with the copper shower the casement rings.
 Who has not heard the Scowerer's midnight fame?
 Who has not trembled at the Mohock's name?
 Was there a watchman took his hourly rounds,
 Safe from their blows, or new-invented wounds?
 I pass their desperate deeds, and mischiefs done,
 Where from Snow-hill black sleepy torrents run;
 How matrons, hoop'd within the hoghead's
 womb, 331

Were tumbled furious thence; the rolling tomb
 O'er the stones thunders, bounds from side to side:

So Regulus to save his country dy'd.

Where a dim gleam the paly lanthorn throws
 O'er the mid pavement, heapy rubbish grows;
 Or arched vaults their gaping jaws extend,
 Or the dark caves to common-shores descend;
 Oft' by the winds extinct the signal lies,
 Or smother'd in the glimmering socket dies, 440
 Ere night has half roll'd round her ebon throne;
 In the wide gulph the shatter'd coach o'erthrown
 Sinks with the snorting steeds; the reins are broke,
 And from the cracking axle flies the spoke.
 So, when fam'd Eddystone's far-shooting ray,
 That led the sailor through the stormy way,
 Was from its rocky roots by billows torn,
 And the high turret in the whirlwind borne;
 Fleets bulg'd their sides against the craggy land,
 And pitchy ruins blacken'd all the strand. 350

Who then through night would hire the har-ness'd steed?

And who would choose the rattling wheel for speed?

But hark! distress with screaming voice draws nigher,
 And wakes the slumbering street with cries of fire.
 At first a glowing red inwraps the skies,
 And borne by winds the scattering sparks arise;
 From beam to beam the fierce contagion spreads;
 The spiry flames now lift aloft their heads;
 Through the burst sash a blazing deluge pours,
 And splitting tiles descend in rattling showers;
 Now with thick crowds th' enlighten'd pavement
 swarms, 361

The fireman sweats beneath his crooked arms;
 A leathern casque his venturous head defends,
 Boldly he climbs where thickest smoke ascends;

* Gentlemen who delighted to break windows with halfpence.

Mov'd by the mother's streaming eyes and prayers,
 The helpless infant through the flame he bears,
 With no less virtue, than through hostile fire
 The Dardan hero bore his aged fire.
 See forceful engines spout their levell'd streams,
 To quench the blaze that runs along the beams;
 The grappling hook plucks rafters from the walls,
 And heaps on heaps the smoky ruin falls; 372
 Blown by strong winds, the fiery tempest roars,
 Bears down new walls, and pours along the floors;
 The heavens are all a-blaze, the face of night
 Is cover'd with a sanguine dreadful light.
 'Twas such a light involv'd thy towers, O Rome!
 The dire presage of mighty Cæsar's doom,
 When the sun veil'd in rust his mourning head,
 And frightful prodigies the skies o'erspread. 380
 Hark! the drum thunders! far, ye crowds retire;
 Behold! the ready match is tipped with fire,
 The nitrous store is laid, the smutty train
 With running blaze awakes the barrel'd grain;
 Flames sudden wrap the walls; with sudden sound
 The shatter'd pile sinks on the smoky ground.
 So, when the years shall have revolv'd the date,
 Th' inevitable hour of Naples' fate,
 Her sap'd foundations shall with thunders shake,
 And heave and toss upon the sulphurous lake; 390
 Earth's womb at once the fiery flood shall rend,
 And in th' abyfs her plunging towers descend.

Consider, reader, what fatigues I've known;
 The toils, the perils of the wintery town;
 What riots seen, what bustling crowds I bore,
 How oft' I cross'd where carts and coaches roar;
 Yet shall I bless my labours, if mankind
 Their future safety from my dangers find.
 Thus the bold traveller (inur'd to toil,
 Whose steps have printed Asia's desert soil, 400
 The barbarous Arabs haunt; or shivering coast
 Dark Greenland's mountains of eternal frost;
 Whom Providence in length of years restores
 To the wish'd harbour of his native shores)
 Sets forth his journals to the public view,
 To caution, by his woes, the wandering crew.

And now complete my generous labours lie,
 Finish'd, and ripe for immortality.
 Death shall entomb in dust this mouldering frame,
 But never reach th' eternal part, my fame. 410
 When W—— and G——, mighty names! are
 dead;
 Or but at Chelsea under custards read;
 When critics crazy handboxes repair,
 And tragedies, turn'd rockets, bounce in air;
 High rais'd on Fleet-street posts, consign'd to fame,
 This work shall shine, and walkers bless my name.

EPISTLES ON SEVERAL OCCASIONS.

EPISTLE I.

To a Lady. Occasioned by the Arrival of her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales.

MADAM, to all your censures I submit,
 An I frankly own I should long since have writ.
 You told me, silence would be thought a crime,
 And kindly strove to tease me into rhyme:
 No more let trifling themes your muse employ,
 Nor lavish verse, to paint a female toy:
 No more on plains with rural damsels sport;
 But sing the glories of the British court.
 By your commands and inclination sway'd,
 I call'd th' unwilling muses to my aid:
 Resolv'd to write, the noble theme I chose,
 And to the princess thus the poem rose.
 "Aid me, bright Phœbus! aid, ye sacred nine!
 "Exalt my genius, and my verse refine.
 "My strains with Carolina's name I grace,
 "The lovely parent of our royal race.
 "Breathe soft, ye winds! ye waves, in silence sleep!
 "Let prosperous breezes wanton o'er the deep,
 "Swell the white sails, and with the streamers
 "play,
 "To waft her gently o'er the watery way."
 Here I to Neptune form'd a pompous prayer,
 To rein the winds, and guard the royal fair;
 Bid the blue tritons sound their twisted shells,
 And call the nereids from their pearly cells.
 Thus my warm zeal had drawn the muse along,
 Yet knew no method to conduct her song:
 I then resolv'd some model to pursue,
 Perus'd French critics, and began anew.
 Long open panegyric drags at best,
 And praise is only praise when well address'd.
 Straight Horace for some lucky ode I sought:
 And all along I trac'd him thought by thought.
 This new performance to a friend I show'd:
 For shame! says he; what, imitate an ode!
 I'd rather ballads write, and Grub-street lays,
 Than pillage Cæsar for my patron's praise:
 One common fate all imitators share,
 To save mince-pyes, and cap the grocer's ware.

Vex'd at the charge, I to the flames commit
 Rhymes, similes, lords names, and ends of wit:
 In blotted stanzas scraps of odes expire,
 And fustian mounts in pyramids of fire.
 Ladies! to you I next inscrib'd my lay,
 And writ a letter in familiar way:
 For still impatient till the princess came,
 You from description wish'd to know the dame.
 Each day my pleasing labour larger grew,
 For still new graces open'd to my view.
 Twelve lines ran on to introduce the theme;
 And then I thus pursued the growing scheme:
 "Beauty and wit were sure by nature join'd,
 "And charms are emanations of the mind;
 "The soul, transpiercing through the shining
 "frame,
 "Forms all the graces of the princely dame:
 "Benevolence her conversation guides,
 "Smiles on her cheek, and in her eye resides.
 "Such harmony upon her tongue is found,
 "As softens English to Italian sound:
 "Yet in those sounds such sentiments appear,
 "As charm the judgment, while they soothe the
 "ear.
 "Religion's cheerful flame her bosom warms,
 "Calms all her hours, and brightens all her charms.
 "Henceforth, ye fair, at chapel mind your pray-
 "ers,
 "Nor catch your lover's eyes with artful airs;
 "Restrain your looks, kneel more, and whisper less,
 "Nor most devoutly criticise on dress.
 "From her form all your characters of life,
 "The tender mother, and the faithful wife.
 "Oft have I seen her little infant-train,
 "The lovely primrose of a future reign;
 "Observ'd with pleasure every dawning grace,
 "And all the mother opening in their face.
 "The son shall add new honours to the line,
 "And early with paternal virtues shine:
 "When he the tale of Audenard repeats,
 "His little heart with emulation beats;
 "With conquests yet to come his bosom glows,
 "He dreams of triumphs, and of vanquish'd foes;

" Each year with arts shall store his ripening brain,
 " And from his grandfire he shall learn to reign."

Thus far I'd gone: Propitious rising gales
 Now bid the sailor hoist the swelling sails.
 Fair Carolina lands; the cannons roar;
 White Albion's cliffs resound from shore to shore.
 Behold the bright original appear,
 All praise is faint when Carolina's near.
 Thus to the nation's joy, but poet's cost,
 The princess came, and my new plan was lost.

Since all my schemes were baulk'd (my last re-
 I left the muses, to frequent the court: [fort),
 Pensive each night from room to room I walk'd,
 To one I bow'd, and with the other talk'd;
 Inquir'd what news, or such a lady's name,
 And did the next day, and the next, the same.
 Places, I found, were daily given away,
 And yet no friendly gazette mention'd Gay.
 I ask'd a friend what method to pursue;
 He cry'd, I want a place as well as you.
 Another ask'd me, why I had not writ;
 A poet owes his fortune to his wit.
 Straight I reply'd, with what a courtly grace
 Flows easy verse from him that has a place!
 Had Virgil ne'er at court improv'd his strains,
 He still had sung of flocks and homely swains;
 And, had not Horace sweet preferment found,
 The Roman lyre had never learnt to sound.

Once ladies fair in homely guise I sung, [rung.
 And with their names wild woods and mountains
 O teach me now to strike a softer strain!
 The court refines the language of the plain.

You must, cries one, the ministry rehearse,
 And with each patriot's name prolong your verse:
 But sure this truth to poets should be known,
 That praising all alike, is praising none.

Another told me, if I wish'd success,
 To some distinguish'd lord I must address;
 One whose high virtues speak his noble blood,
 One always zealous for his country's good;
 Where valour and strong eloquence unite,
 In council cautious, resolute in fight;
 Whose generous temper prompts him to defend,
 And patronise the man that wants a friend.
 You have, 'tis true, the noble patron shown;
 But I, alas! am to Argyll unknown.

Still every one I met in this agreed,
 That writing was my method to succeed;
 But now preferments so possess'd my brain,
 That scarce I could produce a single strain:
 Indeed I sometimes hammer'd out a line,
 Without connection, as without design.

One morn upon the princess this I writ,
 An epigram that boasts more truth than wit.

" The pomp of titles easy faith might shake,
 " She scorn'd an empire for religion's sake:
 " For this on earth the British crown was given,
 " And an immortal crown decreed in heaven."
 Again, while George's virtues rais'd my thought,
 The following lines prophetic fancy wrought.

" Methinks I see some bard, whose heavenly " rage
 " Shall rise in song, and warm a future age;
 " Look back through time, and, wrapt in wonder,
 " trace

" The glorious series of the Brunswick race.

" From the first George these godlike kings
 " descend,

" A line which only with the world shall end.

" The next a generous prince renown'd in arms,

" And blest'd, long blest'd, in Carolina's charms;

" From these the rest. 'Tis thus, secure in peace,

" We plough the fields, and reap the year's in" crease:

" Now commerce, wealthy goddess, rears her head,

" And bids Britannia's fleets their canvas spread;

" Unnumber'd ships the peopled ocean hide,

" And wealth returns with each revolving tide."

Here paus'd the sullen muse; in haste I dress'd,

And through the crowd of needy courtiers press'd;

Though unsuccessful, happy whilst I see

Those eyes, that glad a nation, shine on me.

EPISTLE II.

To the Right Honourable the Earl of Burlington.

A Journey to Exeter. 1716.

WHILE you, my lord, bid stately piles ascend,
 Or in your Chiswick bowers enjoy your friend;
 Where Pope unloads the boughs within his reach,
 The purple vine, blue plum, and blushing peach;
 I journey far.—You knew fat bards might tire,
 And, mounted, sent me forth your trusty 'squire.

'Twas on the day when city-dames repair
 To take their weekly dose of Hyde-park air;
 When forth we trot: no carts the road infest,
 For still on Sundays country horses rest.
 Thy gardens, Kensington, we leave unseen;
 Through Hammer-smith jog on to Turnham-green.
 That Turnham-green, which dainty pigeons fed,
 But feeds no more: for * Solomon is dead.
 Three daisy miles reach Brentford's tedious town,
 For dirty streets and white-legg'd chickens known:
 Thence, o'er wide shrubby heaths and furrow'd lanes, [Stains.

We come where Thames divides the meads of
 We ferry'd o'er; for late the winter's flood
 Shook her frail bridge, and tore her piles of wood.
 Prepar'd for war, now Bagshot-heath we cross,
 Where broken gamesters oft repair their loss.
 At Hartley-row the foaming bit we press,
 While the fat landlord welcom'd every guest.
 Supper was ended, healths the glasses crown'd,
 Our host extoll'd his wine at every round;
 Relates the justices late meeting there,
 How many bottles drank, and what their cheer;
 What lords had been his guests in days of yore,
 And prais'd their wisdom much, their drinking
 more.

Let travellers the morning-vigils keep:
 The morning rose, but we lay fast asleep.
 Twelve tedious miles we bore the sultry sun,
 And Popham-lane was scarce in sight by one:
 The straggling village harbour'd thieves of old,
 'Twas here the stage-coach'd lass resign'd her gold;
 That gold which had in London purchas'd gowns,
 And sent her home a belle to country towns.

* A man once famous for feeding pigeons.

Yes, I can sagely, when the times are past,
Laugh at those follies which I strove to taste,
And each amusement, which we shar'd, review,
Pleas'd with mere talking, since I talk to you.
But how shall I describe in humble prose
Their balls, assemblies, operas, and beaux?
In prose? you cry: oh no, the muse must aid,
And leave Parnassus for the Tuilleries' shade:
Shall he (who late Britannia's city trod,
And led the draggled muse, with pattens shod,
Through dirty lanes, and alleys' doubtful ways)
Refuse to write, when Paris asks his lays!

Well then, I'll try. Descend, ye beauteous Nine,
In all the colours of the rainbow shine,
Let sparkling stars your neck and ear adorn,
Lay on the blushes of the crimson morn;
So may ye balls and gay assemblies grace,
And at the opera claim the foremost place.

Travellers should ever fit expression choose,
Nor with low phrase the lofty theme abuse.
When they describe the state of eastern lords,
Pomp and magnificence should swell their words;
And, when they paint the serpent's scaly pride,
Their lines should hiss, their numbers smoothly
slide;

But they, unmindful of poetic rules,
Describe alike Mockaws and Great Moguls.
Dampier would thus, without ill-meaning satire,
Dress forth in simple style the Petit-maitre:

"In Paris there's a race of animals
"I've seen them at their operas and balls):
"They stand erect, they dance whene'er they walk,
"Monkeys in action, parroquets in talk;
"They're crown'd with feathers, like the cockatoo,
"And, like camelions, daily change their hue;
"From patches justly plac'd they borrow graces,
"And with vermilion lacquer o'er their faces.
"This custom, as we visibly discern,
"They, by frequenting ladies toilettes, learn."
Thus might the traveller easy truth impart.
Into the subject let me nobly start.

How happy lives the man, how sure to charm,
Whose knot embroider'd flutters down his arm!
On him the ladies cast the yielding glance,
Sigh in his songs, and languish in his dance:
While wretched is the wit, contemn'd, forlorn,
Whose gummy hat no scarlet plumes adorn;
No broider'd flowers his worsted ankle grace,
Nor cane emboss'd with gold directs his pace;
No lady's favour on his sword is hung;
What though Apollo dictate from his tongue,
His wit is spiritless and void of grace,
Who wants th' assurance of brocade and lace.
While the gay fop genteelly talks of weather,
The fair in raptures doat upon his feather;
Like a court-lady though he write and spell,
His minuet-step was fashion'd by Marcell *;
He dresses, fences. What avails to know?
For women choose their men, like silks, for show.
Is this the thing, you cry, that Paris boasts?
Is this the thing renown'd among our toasts?
For such a fluttering sight we need not roam;
Our own assemblies shine with these at home.

* A famous dancing-master.

Let us into th' field of beauty start;
Beauty's a theme that ever warm'd my heart.
Think not, ye fair, that I the sex accuse:
How shall I spare you, prompted by the muse?
(The muses all are prudes!) She rails, she frets,
Amidst this sprightly nation of coquettes:
Yet let not us their loose coquetry blame;
Women of every nation are the same.

You ask me, if Parisian dames, like ours,
With rattling dice profane the Sunday's hours;
If they the gamester's pale-ey'd vigils keep,
And stake their honour while their husbands sleep?
Yes, Sir; like English toasts, the dames of France
Will risk their income on a single chance.
Nannette last night a tricking pharaon play'd,
The cards the Taillier's sliding hand obey'd:
To-day her neck no brilliant circle wears,
Nor the ray-darting pendant loads her ears.
Why does old Chloris an assembly hold?
Chloris each night divides the sharper's gold.
Corinna's cheek with frequent losses burns,
And no bold Trente le va her fortune turns.
Ah, too rash virgin! where's thy virtue flown?
She pawns her person for the sharper's loan.
Yet who with justice can their fair upbraid,
Whose debts of honour are so duly paid?

But let me not forget the toilette's cares,
Where art each morn the languid cheek repairs?
This red's too pale, nor gives a distant grace;
Madame to-day puts on her opera face;
From this we scarce extract the milk maid's bloom:
Bring the deep dye that warms across the room:
Now flames her cheek, so strong her charms prevail,
That on her gown the silken rose looks pale!
Not but that France some native beauty boasts,
Clermont and Charolois might grace our toasts.
When the sweet breathing spring unfolds the buds,
Love flies the dusty town for shady woods.
Then Tottenham-fields with roving beauty swarm,
And Hamstead balls the city virgin warm?
Then Chelsea's meads o'erhear perfidious vows,
And the prest grafs defrauds the grazing cows.
'Tis here the same; but in a higher sphere,
For ev'n court-ladies sin in open air.
What cit with a gallant would trust his sponse
Beneath the tempting shade of Greenwich boughs?
What peer of France would let his duchess rove,
Where Boulogne's closest woods invite to love?
But here no wife can blast her husband's fame,
Cuckold is grown an honourable name.
Stretch'd on the grafs, the shepherd sighs his
pain;

And on the grafs what shepherd sighs in vain?
On Chloe's lap here Damon laid along,
Melts with the languish of her amorous song;
There Iris flies Palæmon through the glade,
Nor trips by chance—till in the thickest shade;
Here Celimene defends her lips and breast,
For kisses are by struggling closer prest:
Alexis there with eager flame grows bold,
Nor can the nymph his wanton fingers hold:
Be wise; Alexis, what, so near the road!
Hark, a coach rolls, and husbands are abroad!
Such were our pleasures in the days of yore,
When amorous Charles Britannia's sceptre bore;

The nightly scene of joy the Park was made,
And Love in couples peopled every shade.
But, since at court the rural taste is lost,
What mighty fums have velvet couches cost!

Sometimes the Tuilleries' gaudy walk I love,
Where I through crowds of rustling mantuas rove.
As here from side to side my eyes I cast,
And gaz'd on all the glittering train that past,
Sudden a fop steps forth before the rest;
I knew the bold embroidery of his vest.

He thus accosts me with familiar air,

"Parbleu! on a fait cet habit en Angleterre!"

"Quelle manche! cegalon est grossièrement rangé;"

"Voilà quelque chose de fort beau et degagé!"

This said: on his red heel he turns, and then

Hums a soft minuet, and proceeds again:

"Well; now you've Paris seen, you'll frankly own

"Your boasted London seems a country town.

"Has Christianity yet reach'd your nation?

"Are churches built? Are masquerades in fashion?

"Do daily soups your dinners introduce?

"Are music, snuff, and coaches, yet in use?"

Pardon me, Sir; we know the Paris mode,

And gather politesse from courts abroad.

Like you, our courtiers keep a numerous train

To load their coach, and tradesmen dun in vain.

Nor has religion left us in the lurch;

And, as in France, our vulgar crowd the church:

Our ladies too support the masquerade;

The sex by nature love th' intriguing trade.

Straight the vain fop in ignorant raptures cries,

"Paris the barbarous world will civilize!"

Pray, Sir, point out among the passing band

The present beauties who the town command.

"See yonder dame; strict virtue chills her breast,

"Mark in her eye demure the prude protest;

"That frozen bosom native fire must want,

"Which boasts of constancy to one gallant!

"This next the spoils of fifty lovers wears,

"Rich Dandin's brilliant favours grace her ears;

"The necklace Florio's generous flame bestow'd,

"Clitander's sparkling gems her finger load;

"But now her charms grow cheap by constant use,

"She sins for scarfs, clock'd-stockings, knots, and

"shoes.

"This next, with sober gait and serious leer,

"Wearies her knees with morn and evening prayer;

"She scorns th' ignoble love of feeble pages,

"But with three abbots in one night engages.

"This with the cardinal her night employs,

"Where holy sinews consecrate her joys.

"Why have I promis'd things beyond my power?

"Five assignations wait me at this hour!

"The sprightly countess first my visit claims,

"To-morrow shall indulge inferior dames.

"Pardon me, Sir, that thus I take my leave;

"Gay Florimella flily twitch'd my sleeve."

Adieu, Monsieur!—The opera hour draws near.

Not see the opera! all the world is there; [France

Where on the stage th' embroider'd youth of

In bright array attract the female glance:

This languishes, this struts, to show his mien,

And not a gold-clock'd stocking moves unseen.

But hark! the full orchestra strike the strings;

The hero struts, and the whole audience sings.

My jarring ear harsh grating murmurs wound,
Hoarse and confus'd, like Babel's mingled sound.
Hard chance had plac'd me near a noisy throat,
That in rough quivers bellow'd every note.
Pray, Sir, says I, suspend awhile your song;
The opera's drown'd; your lungs are wondrous
strong;

I wish to hear your Roland's ranting strain,
While he with rooted forests strows the plain.
Sudden he shrugs surprise, and answers quick,
"Monsieur apparemment n'aime pas la musique!"
Then turning round, he join'd th' ungrateful noise;
And the loud chorus thunder'd with his voice.

O soothe me with some soft Italian air,

Let harmony compose my tortur'd ear!

When Anastasia's voice commands the strain,
The melting warble thrills through every vein;
Thought stands suspense, and silence pleas'd attends,
While in her notes the heavenly choir descends.

But you'll imagine I'm a Frenchman grown,
Pleas'd and content with nothing but my own,
So strongly with this prejudice possess'd,
He thinks French music and French painting best.
Mention the force of learn'd Corelli's notes,
Some scraping fiddler of their ball he quotes;
Talk of the spirit Raphael's pencil gives,
Yet warm with life whose speaking picture lives;
Yes, Sir, says he, in colour and design,
Rigaut and Raphael are extremely fine!

'Tis true his country's love transports his breast
With warmer zeal than your old Greeks profess.

Ulysses lov'd his Ithaca of yore,

Yet that sage traveller left his native shore.

What stronger virtue in the Frenchman shines!

He to dear Paris all his life confines.

I'm not so fond. There are, I must confess,

Things which might make me love my country less.

I should not think my Britain had such charms,

If lost to learning, if enslav'd by arms.

France has her Richlieus and her Colberts known;

And then, I grant it, France in science shone.

We too, I own, without such aids may chance

In ignorance and pride to rival France.

But let me not forget Corneille, Racine, [scene.

Boileau's strong sense, and Moliere's humorous

Let Cambray's name be sung above the rest,

Whose maxims, Pulteney, warm thy patriot breast;

In Mentor's precepts wisdom strong and clear

Dictates sublime, and distant nations hear.

Hear, all ye princes, who the world controul,

What cares, what terrors, haunt the tyrant's soul;

His constant train are, Anger, Fear, Distrust.

To be a king, is to be good and just;

His people he protects, their rights he saves,

And scorns to rule a wretched race of slaves.

Happy, thrice happy, shall the monarch reign,

Where guardian laws despotic power restrain!

There shall the ploughshare break the stubborn land,

And bending harvest tire the peasant's hand:

There Liberty her settled mansion boasts,

There Commerce plenty brings from foreign coasts.

O Britain! guard thy laws, thy rights defend:

So shall these blessings to thy sons descend!

You'll think 'tistime some other theme to choose,

And not with beaux and fops fatigue the muse:

Should I let satire loose on English ground,
There fools of various character abound;
But here my verse is to one race confin'd,
All Frenchmen are of petit-maitre kind.

EPISTLE IV.

To the Right Honourable Paul Metbuen, Esq.

THAT 'tis encouragement makes science spread,
Is rarely practis'd, though 'tis often said.
When learning droops and sickens in the land,
What patron's found, to lend a saving hand?
True generous spirits prosperous vice detest,
And love to cherish virtue when distressed:
But, ere our mighty lords this scheme pursue,
Our mighty lords must think and act like you.

Why must we climb the Alpine mountain's sides,
To find the seat where harmony resides?
Why touch we not so soft the silver lute,
The cheerful hautboy, and the mellow flute?
'Tis not th' Italian clime improves the sound;
But there the patrons of her sons are found.

Why flourish'd verse in great Augustus' reign?
He and Mæcenas lov'd the muse's strain.

But now that wight in poverty must mourn
Who was (O cruel stars!) a poet born.
Yet there are ways for authors to be great;
Write rancorous libels to reform the state:
Or, if you choose more sure and ready ways,
Spatter a minister with fulsome praise:
Launch out with freedom, flatter him enough;
Fear not—all men are dedication proof.

Be bolder yet, you must go farther still,
Dip deep in gall thy mercenary quill.
He, who his pen in party-quarrels draws,
Lifts an hir'd bravo to support the cause;
He must indulge his patron's hate and spleen,
And stab the fame of those he ne'er had seen.
Why then should authors mourn their desperate case?

Be brave, do this, and then demand a place.
Why art thou poor? Exert the gifts to rise,
And banish timorous virtue from thy eyes.

All this seems modern preface, where we're told
That wit is prais'd, but hungry lives and cold:
Against th' ungrateful age these authors roar,
And fancy learning starves because they're poor.
Yet why should learning hope success at court?
Why should our patriots virtue's cause support?
Why to true merit should they have regard?
They know that virtue is its own reward.
Yet let not me of grievances complain,
Who (though the meanest of the muses' train)
Can boast subscriptions to my humble lays,
And mingle profit with my little praise.

Ask Painting, why she loves Hesperian air?
Go view, she cries, my glorious labours there;
There in rich palaces I reign in state,
And on the temples lofty domes create.
The noble view my works with knowing eyes,
They love the science, and the painter prize.

Why didst thou, Kent, forego thy native land,
To emulate in picture Raphael's hand?
Think'st thou for this to raise thy name at home?
Go back, adorn the palaces of Rome;

There on the walls let thy just labours shine,
And Raphael live again in thy design.
Yet stay awhile; call all thy genius forth,
For Burlington unbias'd knows thy worth;
His judgment in thy master-strokes can trace
Titian's strong fire, and Guido's softer grace.
But, oh, consider, ere thy works appear,
Canst thou unhurt the tongue of Envy hear?
Censure will blame; her breath was ever spent
To blast the laurels of the eminent.

While Burlington's proportion'd columns rise,
Does not he stand the gaze of envious eyes?
Doors, windows, are condemn'd by passing fools,
Who know not that they damn Palladio's rules.
If Chandos with a liberal hand bestow,
Censure imputes it all to pomp and show;
When, if the motive right were understood,
His daily pleasure is in doing good. [page,

Had Pope with groveling numbers fill'd his Dennis had never kindled into rage.

'Tis the sublime that hurts the critic's ease;
Write nonsense, and he reads and sleeps in peace.
Were Prior, Congreve, Swift, and Pope, unknown;
Poor slander-selling Curll would be undone.
He, who would free from malice pass his days,
Must live obscure, and never merit praise.
But let this tale to valiant virtue tell
The daily perils of deserving well.

A crow was strutting o'er the stubbled plain,
Just as a lark descending clos'd his strain.
The crow bespoke him thus, with solemn grace:
"Thou most accomplish'd of the feather'd race!
"What force of lungs! how clear! how sweet you
"sing!"

"And no bird soars upon a stronger wing."
The lark, who scorn'd soft flattery, thus replies:
"True, I sing sweet, and on strong pinion rise;
"Yet let me pass my life from envy free,
"For what advantage are these gifts to me?
"My song confines me to the wiry cage,
"My flight provokes the falcon's fatal rage.
"But, as you pass, I hear the fowler's say,
"To shoot at crows is powder flung away."

EPISTLE V.

To her Grace Henrietta, Duchess of Marlborough, 1722.

Excuse me, madam, if amidst your tears
A muse intrudes, a muse who feels your cares;
Numbers, like music, can ev'n grief controul,
And lull to peace the tumults of the soul.

If partners in our woes the mind relieve,
Consider for your loss ten thousand grieve;
Th' affliction burthens not your heart alone;
When Marlborough died, a nation gave a groan.
Could I recite the dangerous toils he chose,
To bless his country with a fix'd repose;
Could I recount the labours he o'ercame,
To raise his country to the pitch of fame;
His councils, sieges, his victorious fights,
To save his country's laws and native rights;
No father (every generous heart must own)
Has stronger fondness to his darling shown.
Britannia's sighs a double loss deplore,
Her father and her hero is no more.

Does Britain only pay her debt of tears?
 Yes. Holland sighs, and for her freedom fears.
 When Gallia's monarch pour'd his wasteful bands,
 Like a wide deluge, o'er her level lands,
 She saw her frontier towers in ruin lie,
 Ev'n Liberty had prun'd her wings to fly:
 Then Marlborough came, defeated Gallia fled;
 And shatter'd Belgia rais'd her languid head;
 In him secure, as in her strongest mound
 That keeps the raging sea within its bound.

O Germany! remember Hockstet's plain,
 Where prostrate Gallia bled at every vein:
 Think on the rescue of th' imperial throne,
 Then think of Marlborough's death without a groan!

Apollo kindly whispers me: "Be wise:
 "How to his glory shall thy numbers rise?
 "The force of verse another theme might raise,
 "But here the merit must transcend the praise.
 "Hast thou, presumptuous bard! that godlike
 "fame
 "Which with the sun shall last, and Marlborough's
 "fame?
 "Then sing the man. But who can boast this fire?
 "Resign the task, and silently admire."

Yet shall he not in worthy lays be read?
 Raise Homer, call up Virgil from the dead.
 But he requires not the strong glare of verse:
 Let punctual history his deeds rehearse;
 Let truth in native purity appear,
 You'll find Achilles and Æneas there.

Is this the comfort which the muse bestows?
 I but indulge and aggravate your woes.
 A prudent friend, who seeks to give relief,
 Ne'er touches on the spring that mov'd the grief.
 Is it not barbarous, to the sighing maid
 To mention broken vows and nymphs betray'd?
 Would you the ruin'd merchant's soul appease,
 With talk of sands, and rocks, and stormy seas?
 Ev'n while I strive on Marlborough's fame to rise,
 I call up sorrow in a daughter's eyes.

Think on the laurels that his temple's shade,
 Laurels that (spite of time) shall never fade.
 Immortal honour has enroll'd his name;
 Detraction's dumb, and Envy put to shame.
 Say, who can soar beyond his eagle flight;
 Has he not reach'd to glory's utmost height?
 What could he more, had Heav'n prolong'd his date?

All human power is limited by fate.

Forbear. 'Tis cruel further to commend;
 I wake your sorrow, and again offend.
 Yet sure your goodness must forgive a crime,
 Which will be spread through every age and clime;
 Though in your life ten thousand summers roll,
 And though you compass earth from pole to pole,
 Where'er men talk of war and martial fame,
 They'll mention Marlborough's and Cæsar's name.

But vain are all the counsels of the muse;
 A soul like yours could not a tear refuse:
 Could you your birth and filial love forego,
 Still sighs must rise, and generous sorrow flow;
 For, when from earth such matchless worth removes,

A great mind suffers. Virtue virtue loves.

EPISTLE VI.

To Mr. Pope, on his having finished his Translation of Homer's Iliad.

A WELCOME FROM GREECE.

I.

LONG hast thou, friend! been absent from my soil,
 Like patient Ithacus at siege of Troy;
 I have been witness of thy six years toil,
 Thy daily labours, and thy night's annoy,
 Lost to thy native land, with great turmoil,
 On the wide sea, oft threatening to destroy:
 Methinks with thee I've trod Sigæan ground,
 And heard the shores of Hellespont resound.

II.

DID I not see thee when thou first sett'st sail
 To seek adventures fair in Homer's land?
 Did I not see thy sinking spirits fail,
 And wish thy bark had never left the strand?
 Ev'n in mid-ocean often didst thou quail,
 And oft lift up thy holy eye and hand,
 Praying the virgin dear, and faintly choir,
 Back to the port to bring thy bark entire.

III.

CHEER up, my friend! thy dangers now are o'er;
 Methinks—nay, sure the rising coasts appear;
 Hark! how the guns salute from either shore,
 As thy trim vessel cuts the Thames so fair:
 Shouts answering shouts from Kent and Essex roar,
 And bells break loud through every gust of air:
 Bonfires do blaze, and bones and cleavers ring,
 As at the coming of some mighty king.

IV.

NOW pass we Gravesend with a friendly wind,
 And Tilbury's white fort, and long Blackwall;
 Greenwich, where dwells the friend of human
 kind,

More visited than our park or hall,
 Withers the good, and (with him ever join'd)
 Facetious Disney, greet thee first of all:
 I see his chimney smoke, and hear him say,
 Duke*! that's the room for Pope, and that for Gay.

V.

COME in, my friends! here shall ye dine and lie,
 And here shall breakfast, and here dine again;
 And sup and breakfast on (if ye comply),
 For I have still some dozens of champagne:
 His voice still lessens as the ship sails by;
 He waves his hand to bring us back in vain;
 For now I see, I see proud London's spires;
 Greenwich is lost, and Deptford dock retires.

VI.

OH, what a concourse swarms on yonder quay!
 The sky re-echoes with new shouts of joy;
 By all this show, I ween, 'tis Lord Mayor's day;
 I hear the voice of trumpet and hautboy.—
 No, now I see them near.—Oh, these are they
 Who come in crowds to welcome thee from Troy.

Hail to the bard, whom long as lost we mourn'd;
 From rage, from battle, and from storm, return'd!

* He was usually called "Duke Disney."

VII.

Of goodly dames, and courteous knights, I view
The silken petticoat, and broider'd vest;
Yea peers, and mighty dukes, with ribbands blue
(True blue, fair emblem of unstained breast).
Others I see, as noble, and more true,
By no court-badge distinguish'd from the rest:
First see I Methuen, of sincerest mind,
As Arthur grave, as soft as womankind.

VIII.

What lady's that, to whom he gently bends?
Who knows not her? ah! those are Wortley's
eyes:
How art thou honour'd, number'd with her friends!
For she distinguishes the good and wise.
The sweet-tongu'd Murray near her side attends;
Now to my heart the glance of Howard flies;
Now Harvey, fair of face, I mark full well,
With thee, youth's youngest daughter, sweet Le-pell.

IX.

I see two lovely sisters, hand in hand,
The fair-hair'd Martha, and Teresa brown;
Madge Bellenden, the tallest of the land;
And smiling Mary, soft and fair as down.
Yonder I see the cheerful duchess stand, [known:
For friendship, zeal, and blithesome humours
Whence that loud shout in such a hearty strain?
Why, all the Hamiltons are in her train.

X.

See next the decent Scudamore advance,
With Winchelsea, still meditating song:
With her perhaps Miss Howe came there by chance,
Nor knows with whom, or why she comes along.
Far off from these see Santlow, fam'd for dance;
And frolic Bicknell, and her sister young;
With other names, by me not to be nam'd,
Much lov'd in private, not in public fam'd!

XI.

But now behold the female band retire,
And the shrill music of their voice is still'd!
Methinks I see fam'd Buckingham admire,
That in Troy's ruin thou hadst not been kill'd;
Sheffield, who knows to strike the living lyre
With hand judicious, like thy Homer skill'd,
Bathurst impetuous hastens to the coast,
Whom you and I strive who shall love the most.

XII.

See generous Burlington, with goodly Bruce
(But Bruce comes wafted in a soft sedan);
Dan Prior next, belov'd by every Muse;
And friendly Congreve, unreprouchful man!
(Oxford by Cunningham hath sent excuse);
See hearty Watkins comes with cup and can;
And Lewis, who has never friend forsaken;
And Laughton whispering asks—Is Troy town taken?

XIII.

Earl Warwick comes, of free and honest mind;
Bold, generous Craggs, whose heart was ne'er
disguis'd;
Ah why, sweet St. John, cannot I thee find!
St. John, for every social virtue priz'd.—
Alas! to foreign climates he's confin'd,
Or else to see thee here I well surmis'd:

VOL. VIII.

Thou too, my Swift, dost breathe Boeotian air;
When wilt thou bring back wit and humour here?

XIV.

Harcourt I see, for eloquence renown'd,
The mouth of justice, oracle of law!
Another Simon is beside him found,
Another Simon, like as straw to straw.
How Lansdown smiles, with lasting laurel crown'd;
What mitred prelate there commands our awe?
See Rochester approving nods his head,
And ranks one modern with the mighty dead.

XV.

Carleton and Chandos thy arrival grace;
Hanmer, whose eloquence th' unbias'd sways;
Harley, whose goodness opens in his face,
And shows his heart the seat where virtue stays.
Ned Blount advances next, with busy pace,
In haste, but sauntering, hearty in his ways:
I see the friendly Carylls come by dozens, [cousins,
Their wives, their uncles, daughters, sons, and

XVI.

Arbuthnot there I see, in physic's art,
As Galen learn'd, or famed Hippocrate;
Whose company drives sorrow from the heart,
As all disease his medicines dissipate:
Kneller amid the triumph bears his part,
Who could (were mankind lost) anew create:
What can th' extent of his vast soul confine?
A painter, critic, engineer, divine!

XVII.

Thee Jervas hails, robust and debonair, [cries:
Now have [we] conquer'd Homer, friends, he
Darteneuf, grave joker, joyous Ford is there,
And wondering Maine, so fat with laughing
eyes,
(Gay, Maine, and Cheney, boon companions dear,
Gay fat, Maine fatter, Cheney huge of size)
Yea Dennis, Gildon (hearing thou hast riches),
And honest, hatless Cromwell, with red breeches,

XVIII.

O Wanley, whence com'st thou with shorten'd hair,
And visage from thy shelves with dust besprent;
"Forsooth (quoth he) from placing Homer there,
"For ancients to compyle is myne entente:
"Of ancients only hath Lord Harley care;
"But hither me hath my meekle lady sent:—
"In manuscript of Greeke rede we thilke same,
"But book yprint best plesyth myn gude dame."

XIX.

Yonder I see, among th' expecting crowd,
Evans with laugh jocose, and tragic Young;
High-buskin'd Booth, grave Mawbert, wandering
Frowde,
And Titcomb's belly waddles flow along.
See Digby faints at Southerne talking loud,
Yea Steele and Tickell mingle in the throng:
Tickell, whose skiff (in partnership they say)
Set forth for Greece, but foundered in the way.

XX.

Lo, the two Doncastles in Berkshire known:
Lo Bickford, Fortescue, of Devon land!
Lo Tooker, Eckerhall, Sykes, Rawlinson!
See hearty Morley takes thee by the hand;
Ays, Graham, Buckridge, joy thy voyage done;
But who can count the leaves, the stars, the sand?

U

Lo Stonor, Fenton, Caldwell, Ward, and Broome!
Lo thousands more; but I want rhyme and room!

XXI.

How lov'd! how honour'd thou! yet be not vain:

And sure thou art not, for I hear thee say,
All this, my friends, I owe to Homer's strain,
On whose strong pinions I exalt my lay.

What from contending cities did he gain?

And what rewards his grateful country pay?
None, none were paid—why then all this for me?
These honours, Homer, had been just to thee.

EPISTLE VII.

To Mr. Thomas Snow, Goldsmith, near Temple-Bar.

A Panegyric, occasioned by his buying and selling of the third South-Sea subscriptions, taken in by the Directors at a thousand per cent.

DISDAIN not, Snow, my humble verse to hear:
Stick thy black pen awhile behind thy ear.

Whether thy compter shine with sums untold,
And thy wide-grasping hand grow black with gold;
Whether thy mien erect, and fable locks,
In crowds of brokers overawe the stocks;
Suspend the worldly business of the day,
And, to enrich thy mind, attend my lay.

O thou, whose penetrative wisdom found
The South-Sea rocks and shelves, where thousands
drown'd!

When credit sunk, and commerce gasping lay,
Thou stood'st; nor sent'st one bill unpaid away.

When not a guinea chink'd on Martin's boards,
And Atwell's self was drain'd of all his hoards,
Thou stood'st (an Indian king in size and hue),
Thy unexhausted shop was our Peru.

Why did 'Change-Alley waste thy precious hours
Among the fools who gap'd for golden showers?

No wonder if we found some poets there,
Who live on fancy, and can feed on air; [schemes,
No wonder they were caught by South-Sea

Who ne'er enjoy'd a guinea, but in dreams;
No wonder they their third subscriptions sold,
For millions of imaginary gold;

No wonder, that their fancies wild can frame
Strange reasons, that a thing is still the same,
Though chang'd throughout in substance and in name.

But you (whose judgment scorns poetic flights)
With contracts furnish boys for paper kites.

Let vulture Hopkins stretch his rusty throat,
Who'd ruin thousands for a single great.

I know thou spurn'st his mean, his sordid mind;
Nor with ideal debts would'st plague mankind.
Why strive his greedy hands to grasp at more?—
The wretch was born to want, whose soul is poor.

Madmen alone their empty dreams pursue,
And still believe the fleeting vision true;
They sell the treasure which their stumbers get,
Then wake, and fancy all the world in debt.

If to instruct thee all my reasons fail,

Yet be diverted by this moral tale. [seat,

Through fam'd Moorfields extends a spacious
Where mortals of exalted wit retreat;

Where, wrapp'd in contemplation and in straw,
The wiser few from the mad world withdraw.

There, in full opulence, a banker dwelt,
Who all the joys and pangs of riches felt:
His sideboard glitter'd with imagin'd plate;
And his proud fancy held a vast estate.

As on a time he pass'd the vacant hours,
In raising piles of straw and twisted bowers;
A poet enter'd, of the neighbouring cell,
And with fix'd eyes observ'd the structure well;
A sharpen'd skewer cross his bare shoulders bound
A tatter'd rug, which dragg'd upon the ground.

The banker cry'd, "Behold my castle walls,
"My statues, gardens, fountains, and canals;
"With land of twenty thousand acres round;
"All these I sell thee for ten thousand pound."

The bard with wonder the cheap purchase saw,
So sign'd the contract (as ordains the law). [clear;

The banker's brain was cool'd, the mist grew
The visionary scene was lost in air.

He now the vanish'd prospect understood,
And fear'd the fancied bargain was not good:

Yet, loath the sum entire should be destroy'd,

"Give me a penny, and thy contract's void."

The startled bard with eye indignant frown'd.
"Shall I, ye gods (he cries), my debts compound!"

So saying, from his rug the skewer he takes,
And on the stick ten equal notches makes;

With just resentment flings it on the ground;

"There, take my tally of ten thousand pound!"

EPISTLE VIII.

Mary Gulliver to Captain Lemuel Gulliver.

Argument.

The captain, some time after his return, being retired, to Mr. Symphon's in the country; Mrs.
Gulliver, apprehending from his late behaviour
some estrangement of his affections, writes him the following expostulating, soothing, and tenderly-complaining epistle.

WELCOME, thrice welcome, to thy native place!
—What! touch me not? What! shun a wife's embrace?

Have I for this thy tedious absence borne, [turn?
And wak'd and wish'd whole nights for thy re-
In five long years I took no second spouse;

What Redriff wife so long hath kept her vows?

Your eyes, your nose, inconstancy betray;

Your nose you stop, your eyes you turn away.

'Tis said that thou should'st cleave unto thy wife;

Once thou didst cleave, and I could cleave for life.

Hear, and relent! hark how thy children moan:

Be kind at least to these—they are thy own!

Be bold, and count them all; secure to find

The honest number that you left behind.

See how they pat thee with their pretty paws;

Why start you? are they snakes? or have they claws?

Thy Christian feed, our mutual flesh and bone:

Be kind at least to these—they are thy own?

* Biddel, like thee, might farthest India rove;

He chang'd his country, but retains his love:

* Names of the sea-captains mentioned in the Travels.

There's Captain * Pannel, absent half his life,
Comes back, and is the kinder to his wife;
Yet Pannel's wife is brown, compar'd to me,
And Mistress Biddel sure is fifty-three!

Not touch me! never neighbour call'd me slut:
Was Flimnap's dame more sweet in Lilliput?
I've no red hair, to breathe an odious fume;
At least thy consort's cleaner than thy groom.
Why then that dirty stable-boy thy care?
What mean those visits to the sorrel mare?
Say, by what witchcraft, or what dæmon led,
Preferr'st thou litter to the marriage-bed?

Some say the devil himself is in that mare:
If so, our dean shall drive him forth by prayer.
Some think you mad; some think you are possess'd;
That Bedlam and clean straw will suit you best.
Vain means, alas, this phrenzy to appease!
That straw, that straw would heighten the disease.

My bed (the scene of all our former joys,
Witness two lovely girls, two lovely boys)
Alone I press; in dreams I call my dear,
I stretch my hand; no Gulliver is there!
I wake, I rise, and, shivering with the frost,
Search all the house: my Gulliver is lost!
Forth in the streets I rush with frantic cries;
The windows open; all the neighbours rise:
Where sleeps my Gulliver? O tell me where!
The neighbours answer, "With the sorrel mare!"

At early morn, I to the market haste
(Studious in every thing to please thy taste);
A curious fowl and 'sparagus I chose
(For I remember'd you were fond of those):
Three shillings cost the first, the last seven groats;
Sullen you turn from both, and call for oats.

Others bring goods and treasure to their houses,
Something to deck their pretty babes and spouses;
My only token was a cup like horn,
That's made of nothing but a lady's corn.
'Tis not for that I grieve; no, 'tis to see
The groom and sorrel mare preferr'd to me!

These for some moments when you deign to quit,
And (at due distance) sweet discourse admit,
'Tis all my pleasure thy past toil to know,
For pleas'd remembrance builds delight on woe.
At every danger pants thy consort's breast,
And gaping infants squall to hear the rest.
How did I tremble when, by thousands bound,
I saw thee stretch'd on Lilliputian ground!
When scaling armies climb'd up every part,
Each step they trod I felt upon my heart.
But when thy torrent quench'd the dreadful blaze,
King, queen, and nation, staring with amaze,
Full in my view how all my husband came!
And what extinguish'd theirs, increas'd my flame.
Those spectacles, ordain'd thine eyes to save,
Were once my present; love that armour gave.
How did I mourn at Bolgolan's decree!
For, when he sign'd thy death, he sentenc'd me.

When folks might see thee all the country
round
For sixpence, I'd have given a thousand pound.
Lord! when that giant babe that head of thine
Got in his mouth, my heart was up in mine!

* Names of the sea-captains mentioned in the Travels.

When in the marrow-bone I see thee ramm'd,
Or on the house-top by the monkey cram'd,
The piteous image renew my pain,
And all thy dangers I weep o'er again.
But on the maiden's nipple when you rid,
Pray Heav'n 'twas all a wanton maiden did!
Glumdalclitch too!—with thee I mourn her case;
Heaven guard the gentle girl from all disgrace!
O may the king that one neglect forgive,
And pardon her the fault by which I live!
Was there no other way to set him free?
My life, alas! I fear, prov'd death to thee.

O teach me, dear, new words to speak my flame!
Teach me to woo thee by thy best-lov'd name.
Whether the style of Grildrig please thee most,
So call'd on Brobdingnag's stupendous coast,
When on the monarch's ample hand you sat,
And halloo'd in his ear intrigues of state;
Or Quibus Flestrin more endearment brings,
When like a mountain you look'd down on kings;
If Ducal Nardac, Lilliputian peer,
Or Glumblum's humbler title sooth thy ear;
Nay, would kind Jove my organs so dispose,
To hymn harmonious Houyhnhnm through the nose,

I'd call the Houyhnhnm, that high-sounding name,
Thy children's noses all should twang the same.
So might I find my loving spouse of course
Endued with all the virtues of a horse.

E P I S T L E IX.

BOUNCE TO FOP.

From a Dog at Twickenham, to a Dog at Court.

To thee, sweet Fop, these lines I send,
Who, though no spaniel, am a friend.
Though once my tail in wanton play,
Now frisking this, and then that way,
Chanc'd, with a touch of just the tip,
To hurt your lady-lap-dog-ship;
Yet thence to think I'd bite your head off,
Sure Bounce is one you never read of.

Fop! you can dance, and make a leg,
Can fetch and carry, cringe and beg;
And (what's the top of all your tricks)
Can stoop to pick up strings and sticks.
We country dogs love nobler sport,
And scorn the pranks of dogs at court.
Fy, naughty Fop! where'er you come
To fart and piss about the room,
To lay your head in every lap,
And when they think not of you—snap:
The worst that envy, or that spite,
E'er said of me is, I can bite;
That sturdy vagrants, rogues in rags,
Who poke at me, can make no brags;
And that to touze such things as flutter,
The honest Bounce is bread and butter.

While you and every courtly fop
Fawn on the devil for a chop;
I've the humanity to hate
A butcher, though he brings me meat:
And, let me tell you, have a nose
(Whatever stinking fops suppose)

U ij

That, under cloth of gold or tissue,
Can smell a plaster, or an issue.
Your pilfering lord, with simple pride,
May wear a pick-lock at his side :
My master wants no key of state,
For Bounce can keep his house and gate.

When all such dogs have had their days,
As knavish Pams, and fawning Trays :
When pamper'd Cupids, beastly Veni's,
And motly, squinting Harlequini's *,
Shall lick no more their lady's breech,
But die of looseness, claps, or itch ;
Fair Thames from either echoing shore
Shall hear and dread my manly roar.

See Bounce, like Berecynthia crown'd,
With thundering offspring all around,
Beneath, beside me, and at top,
A hundred sons ! and not one Fop.
Before my children set your beef,
Not one true Bounce will be a thief ;
Not one without permission feed
(Though some of J——'s hungry breed) ;
But whatsoe'er the father's race,
From me they suck a little grace :
While your fine whelps learn all to steal,
Bred up by hand on chick and veal.

My eldest-born resides not far
Where shines great Stafford's glittering star ;
My second (child of fortune !) waits
At Burlington's Palladian gates ;
A third majestically stalks
(Happiest of dogs) in Cobham's walks !
One ushers friends to Bathurst's door,
One fawns at Oxford's on the poor.

Nobles, whom arms or arts adorn,
Wait for my infants yet unborn.
None but a peer of wit and grace
Can hope a puppy of my race :
And, oh ! would fate the bliss decree
To mine (a bliss too great for me),
That two my tallest sons might grace,
Attending each with stately pace,
Iulus' side, as erst Evander's †,
To keep off flatterers, spies, and panders ;
To let no noble slave come near,
And scare Lord Fannies from his ear :
Then might a royal youth, and true,
Enjoy at least a friend—or two ;
A treasure, which, of royal kind,
Few but himself deserve to find ;
Then Bounce ('tis all that Bounce can crave)
Shall wag her tail within the grave.
And though no doctors, Whig or Tory ones,
Except the sect of Pythagoreans,
Have immortality assign'd
To any beast but Dryden's hind ‡ :
Yet Master Pope, whom truth and sense
Shall call their friend some ages hence,
Though now on loftier themes he sings,
Than to bestow a word on kings,

* Alii legunt Harvequini's.

EPISTLE X.

To the Learned Ingenious Author † of "Licentia Poetica Discussed," or, the "True Test of Poetry." Written in 1709.

THE vulgar notion of poetic fire
Is, that laborious art can ne'er aspire,
Nor constant studies the bright bays acquire ;
And that high flights the unborn bard receives,
And only nature the due laurel gives :
But you, with innate shining flames endow'd,
To wide Castalian springs point out the god ;
Through your perspective we can plainly see
The new-discoverr'd road of poetry ;
To steep Parnassus you direct the way
So smooth, that venturous travellers cannot stray,
But with unerring steps rough ways disdain,
And by you led, the beauteous summit gain,
Where polish'd lays shall raise their growing fames,
And with their tuneful guide enrol their honour'd names.

EPISTLE XI.

*To my Ingenious and Worthy Friend, WILLIAM
LOWNDS, Esq. Author of that Celebrated Treatise, in folio, called "The Land-Tax Bill."*

WHEN poets print their works, the scribbling crew
Stick the bard o'er with bays, like Christmas-pew.
Can meagre poetry such fame deserve ?
Can poetry, that only writes to starve ?
And shall no laurel deck that famous head,
In which the senate's annual law is bred ?
That hoary head, which greater glory fires,
By nobler ways and means true fame acquires.
O had I Virgil's force, to sing the man,
Whose learned lines can millions raise per ann.,
Great Lownds's praise should swell the trump of fame,

And rapes and weapontakes resound his name !

If the blind poet gain'd a long renown
By singing every Grecian chief and town ;
Sure Lownds's prose much greater fame requires,
Which sweetly counts five thousand knights and squires,

Their seats, their cities, parishes, and shires.

Thy copious preamble so smoothly runs,
Taxes no more appear like legal duns : [obey ;
Lords, knights, and 'squires, th' assessor's power
We read with pleasure, though with pain we pay.

Ah ! why did Coningsby thy works defame !
That author's long harangue betrays his name.
After his speeches can his pen succeed ?
Though forc'd to hear, we're not oblig'd to read.

Under what science shall thy works be read ?
All know thou wert not poet born and bred.

* Orig. Sticks ; purposely mis-spelt, to make it "the dread of dogs."

Or dost thou boast th' historian's lasting pen,
Whose annals are the acts of worthy men?
No. Satire is thy talent; and each lash
Makes the rich miser tremble o'er his cash.
What on the drunkard can be more severe,
Than direful taxes on his ale and beer?

Ev'n Button's wits are nought, compar'd to thee,
Who ne'er were known or prais'd but o'er his tea; [spread,
While thou through Britain's distant isle shalt
In every hundred and division read.

Critics in classics oft interpolate,
But every word of thine is fix'd as fate.
Some works come forth at morn, but die at night,
In blazing fringes round a tallow-light.
Some may perhaps to a whole week extend,
Like Steele (when unassisted by a friend):
But thou shalt live a year, in spite of fate;
And where's your author boasts a longer date?
Poets of old had such a wond'rous power,
That with their verses they could raise a tower:
But in thy prose a greater force is found;
What poet ever rais'd ten thousand pound?
Cadmus, by sowing dragons teeth, we read,
Rais'd a vast army from the poisonous seed.
Thy labours, Lownds, can greater wonders do;
Thou raisest armies, and canst pay them too.
Truce with thy dreaded pen; thy annals cease;
Why need we armies when the land's in peace?
Soldiers are perfect devils in their way; [lay.
When once they're rais'd, they're curst hard to

EPISTLE XII.

To a young Lady, with some Lampreys.

WITH lovers 'twas of old the fashion
By presents to convey their passion;
No matter what the gift they sent,
The lady saw that love was meant.
Fair Atalanta, as a favour,
Took the boar's head her hero gave her;
Nor could the bristly thing affront her;
'Twas a fit present from a hunter.
When 'squires send woodcocks to the dame,
It serves to show their absent flame.
Some by a snip of woven hair,
In poesy'd lockets, bribe the fair.
How many mercenary matches
Have sprung from diamond-rings and watches?
But hold—a ring, a watch, a locket,
Would drain at once a poet's pocket;
He should send songs that cost him nought,
Nor ev'n be prodigal of thought.

Why then send lampreys? Fye, for shame!
'Twill set a virgin's blood on flame.
This to fifteen a proper gift!
It might lend sixty-five a lift.

I know your maiden aunt will scold,
And think my present somewhat bold.
I see her lift her hands and eyes:

"What! eat it, niece; eat Spanish flies!

"Lamprey's a most immodest diet:

"You'll neither wake nor sleep in quiet.

"Should I to-night eat Sago-cream,

"I would make me blush to tell my dream:

"If I eat lobster, 'tis so warming.
"That every man I see looks charming.
"Wherefore had not the filthy fellow
Laid Rochester upon your pillow?
"I vow and swear, I think the present
Had been as modest and as decent.
"Who has her virtue in her power?
"Each day has its unguarded hour;
"Always in danger of undoing,
"A prawn, a shrimp, may prove our ruin!
"The shepherdess, who lives on fallad,
"To cool her young, controuls her palate.
"Should Dian's maids turn liquorish livers,
"And of huge lampreys rob the rivers,
"Then, all beside each glade and vilsto,
"You'd see nymphs lying like Calisto.
"The man, who meant to heat your blood,
"Needs not himself such vicious food—"
In this, I own, your aunt is clear,
I sent you what I well might spare:
For, when I see you (without joking),
Your eyes, lips, breasts, are so provoking,
They set my heart more cock-a-hoop,
Than could whole seas of craw-fish soup.

EPISTLE XIII.

To a Lady; on her Passion for Old China.

WHAT ecstasies her bosom fire!
How her eyes languish with desire!
How blest, how happy, should I be,
Were that fond glance bestow'd on me!
New doubts and fears within me war:
What rival's near? a china jar.

China's the passion of her soul:
A cup, a plate, a dish, a bowl,
Can kindle wishes in her breast,
Inflame with joy, or break her rest.
Some gems collect, some medals prize,
And view the rust with lovers eyes;
Some court the stars at midnight hours;
Some doat on nature's charms in flowers;
But every beauty I can trace
In Laura's mind, in Laura's face;
My stars are in this brighter sphere,
My lily and my rose is here.

Philosophers, more grave than wise,
Hunt science down in butterflies;
Or, fondly poring on a spider,
Stretch human contemplation wider.
Fossils give joy to Galen's soul;
He digs for knowledge, like a mole;
In shells so learn'd, that all agree
No fish that swims knows more than he!
In such pursuits if wisdom lies,
Who, Laura, shall thy taste despise?

Where I some antique jar behold,
Or white, or blue, or speck'd with gold;
Vessels so pure, and so refin'd,
Appear the types of woman-kind:
Are they not valued for their beauty,
Too fair, too fine, for household duty?
With flowers, and gold, and azure, dy'd,
Of every house the grace and pride?

How white, how polish'd is their skin,
And valued most when only seen !
She, who before was highest priz'd,
Is for a crack or flaw despis'd.
I grant they're frail; yet they're so rare,
The treasure cannot cost too dear !
But man is made of coarser stuff,
And serves convenience well enough;
He's a strong earthen vessel, made
For drudging, labour, toil, and trade;
And, when wives lose their other self,
With ease they bear the loss of self.

Husbands, more covetous than sage,
Condemn this china-buying rage;
They count that woman's prudence little,
Who sets her heart on things so brittle.
But are those wise men's inclinations
Fix'd on more strong, more sure foundations?
If all that's frail we must despise,
No human view or scheme is wise.
Are not Ambition's hopes as weak?
They swell like bubbles, shine, and break.
A courtier's promise is so flight,
'Tis made at noon, and broke at night.
What pleasure's sure? The mis' you keep Breaks both your fortune and your sleep.
The man who loves a country life
Breaks all the comforts of his wife;
And, if he quit his farm and plough,
His wife in town may break her vow.
Love, Laura, love, while youth is warm,
For each new winter breaks a charm;
And woman's not like china fold,
But cheaper grows in growing old;
Then quickly choose the prudent part,
Or else you break a faithful heart.

EPISTLE XIV.

On a Miscellany of Poems. To Bernard Lintott.

"Ipse varietate tentamus efficere ut alia aliis, quædam fortasse omnibus placeant." PLIN. Epist.

As when some skilful cook, to please each guest,
Would in one mixture comprehend a feast,
With due proportion and judicious care
He fills his dish with different sorts of fare,
Fishes and fowls deliciously unite,
To feast at once the taste, the smell, and sight.

So, Bernard, must a miscellany be Compounded of all kinds of poetry;
The muses olio, which all tastes may fit,
And treat each reader with his darling wit.

Would'st thou for miscellanies raise thy fame,
And bravely rival Jacob's mighty name,
Let all the muses in the piece conspire;
The lyric bard must strike th' harmonious lyre;
Heroic strains must here and there be found,
And nervous sense be sung in lofty sound;
Let elegy in moving numbers flow,
And fill some pages with melodious woe;
Let not your amorous songs too numerous prove,
Nor glut thy reader with abundant love;

I

Satire must interfere, whose pointed rage
May lash the madness of a vicious age;
Satire! the muse that never fails to hit,
For if there's scandal, to be sure there's wit.
Tire not our patience with Pindaric lays,
Those swell the piece, but very rarely please;
Let short-breath'd epigram its force confine,
And strike at follies in a single line. [sown,
Translations should throughout the work be
And Homer's godlike muse be made our own;
Horace in useful numbers should be sung,
And Virgil's thoughts adorn the British tongue.
Let Ovid tell Corinna's hard disdain,
And at her door in melting notes complain;
His tender accents pitying virgins move,
And charm the listening ear with tales of love.
Let every classic in the volume shine,
And each contribute to thy great design;
Through various subjects let the reader range,
And raise his fancy with a grateful change.
Variety's the source of joy below,
From whence still fresh revolving pleasures flow.
In books and love, the mind one end pursues,
And only change th' expiring flame renews.

Where Buckingham will condescend to give,
That honour'd piece to distant times must live;
When noble Sheffield strikes the trembling strings,
The little loves rejoice, and clap their wings;
Anacreon lives, they cry, th' harmonious swain }
Retunes the lyre, and tries his wonted strain, }
'Tis he—our lost Anacreon lives again.
But, when th' illustrious poet soars above
The sportive revels of the God of Love,
Like Maro's muse, he takes a loftier flight,
And towers beyond the wondering Cupid's sight.

If thou would'st have thy volume stand the test,

And of all others be reputed best,
Let Congreve teach the listening groves to mourn,
As when he wept o'er fair Pastora's urn.

Let Prior's muse with softening accents move,
Soft as the strains of constant Emma's love:
Or let his fancy choose some jovial theme,
As when he told Hans Carvel's jealous dream;
Prior th' admiring reader entertains
With Chaucer's humour, and with Spenser's strains.

Waller in Granville lives; when Mira sings,
With Waller's hand he strikes the sounding
strings,

With sprightly turns his noble genius shines,
And manly sense adorns his easy lines.

On Addison's sweet lays attention waits,
And silence guards the place while he repeats;
His muse alike on every subject charms,
Whether she paints the god of love, or arms:
In him pathetic Ovid sings again,
And Homer's Iliad shines in his campaign.

Whenever Garth shall raise his sprightly song,
Sense flows in easy numbers from his tongue;
Great Phœbus in his learned son we see,
Alike in physic, as in poetry.

When Pope's harmonious muse with pleasure
roves, [groves,
Amids the plains, the murmuring streams, and

Attentive echo, pleas'd to hear his songs,
Through the glad shade each warbling note pro-
longs;

His various numbers charm our ravish'd ears,
His steady judgment far out-shoots his years,
And early in the youth the god appears. }

From these successful bards collect thy strains;
And praise with profit shall reward thy pains:
Then, while calves-leather-binding bears the sway,
And sheep-skin to its sleeker gloss gives way;
While neat old Elzevir is reckon'd better
Than Pirate Hill's brown sheets and scurvy letter;

While print admirers careful Aldus choose,
Before John Morphew, or the weekly news;
So long shall live thy praise in books of fame,
And Tonson yield to Lintott's lofty name.

EPISTLE XV.

To the most honourable the Earl of Oxford, the Lord
High Treasurer.

The Epigrammatical Petition of your Lordship's most humble Servant,

JOHN GAY.

I'm no more to converse with the swains,
But go where fine people resort:
One can live without money on plains,
But never without it at court.

If when with the swains I did gambol,
I array'd me in silver and blue;
When abroad and in courts I shall ramble,
Pray, my lord, how much money will do?

ECLOGUES.

THE BIRTH OF THE SQUIRE.

In Imitation of the Pollio of Virgil.

YE sylvan muses, loftier strains recite:
Not at all in shades and humble cots delight.
Hark! the bells ring; along the distant grounds
The driving gales convey the swelling sounds;
Th' attentive swain, forgetful of his work,
With gaping wonder, leans upon his fork.
What sudden news alarms the waking morn?
To the glad Squire a hopeful heir is born.
Mourn, mourn, ye stags, and all ye beasts of chase;
This hour destruction brings on all your race:
See the pleas'd tenants duteous offerings bear,
Turkeys and geese, and grocer's sweetest ware;
With the new health the ponderous tankard flows,
And old October reddens every nose.
Beagles and spaniels round his cradle stand,
Kiss his moist lip, and gently lick his hand.
He joys to hear the shrill horn's echoing sounds,
And learns to list the names of all the hounds.
With frothy ale to make his cup o'erflow,
Barley shall in paternal acres grow;
The bee shall sip the fragrant dew from flowers,
To give metheglin for his morning-hours;
For him the clattering hop shall climb the poles,
And his own orchard sparkle in his bowls.

His sire's exploits he now with wonder hears,
The monstrous tales indulge his greedy ears;
How, when youth strung his nerves and warm'd
his veins,
He rode the mighty Nimrod of the plains.
He leads the staring infant through the hall,
Points out the horny spoils that grace the wall;
Tells, how this stag through three whole counties
fled,

What rivers swam, where bay'd, and where he bled.
Now he the wonders of the fox repeats,
Describes the desperate chase, and all his cheats;

How in one day, beneath his furious speed,
He tir'd seven coursers of the fleetest breed;
How high the pale he leap'd, how wide the ditch,
When the hound tore the haunches of the * witch!
These stories, which descend from son to son,
The forward boy shall one day make his own.

Ah, too fond mother, think the time draws nigh,
That calls the darling from thy tender eye;
How shall his spirit brook the rigid rules,
And the long tyranny of grammar-schools?
Let younger brothers o'er dull authors plod,
Lash'd into Latin by the tingling rod;
No, let him never feel that smart disgrace:
Why should he wiser prove than all his race?
When ripening youth with down o'er shades his chin,

And every female eye incites to sin;
The milk-maid (thoughtless of her future shame)
With smacking lip shall raise his guilty flame;
The dairy, barn, the hay-loft, and the grove,
Shall oft be conscious of their stolen love.
But think, Priscilla, on that dreadful time,
When pangs and watery qualms shall own thy crime.
How wilt thou tremble when thy nipple's prest,
To see the white drops bathe thy swelling breast!
Nine moons shall publicly divulge thy shame,
And the young squire forestall a father's name.

When twice twelve times the reaper's sweeping
hand
With levell'd harvests has bestrown the land;
On sam'd St. Hubert's feast, his winding horn
Shall cheer the joyful hound, and wake the morn:
This memorable day his eager speed
Shall urge with bloody heel the rising steed.
O check the foamy bit, nor tempt thy fate,
Think on the murders of a five-bar gate!

* The most common accident to sportsmen, to hunt a witch in the shape of a hare.

Yet, prodigal of life, the leap he tries,
Low in the dust his groveling honour lies,
Headlong he falls, and on the rugged stone
Distorts his neck, and cracks the collar-bone.
O venturous youth, thy thirst of game allay:
May'st thou survive the perils of this day!
He shall survive; and in late years be sent
To snore away debates in parliament.

The time shall come, when his more solid sense
With nod important shall the laws dispense;
A Justice with grave Justices shall sit;
He praise their wisdom, they admire his wit.
No greyhound shall attend the tenant's pace,
No rusty gun the farmer's chimney grace;
Salmons shall leave their covers void of fear,
Nor dread the thievish net or triple spear;
Poachers shall tremble at his awful name, [game.
Whom vengeance now o'ertakes for murder'd

Assist me, Bacchus, and ye drunken powers,
To sing his friendships and his midnight hours!

Why dost thou glory in thy strength of beer,
Firm-cork'd and mellow'd till the twentieth year;
Brew'd, or when Phœbus warms the fleecy sign,
Or when his languid rays in Scorpio shine?
Think on the mischiefs which from hence have sprung!

It arms with curses dire the wrathful tongue;
Foul scandal to the lying lip affords,
And prompts the memory with injurious words.
O where is wisdom when by this o'erpower'd?
The state is censur'd, and the maid deflower'd!
And wilt thou still, O Squire, brew ale so strong?
Hear then the dictates of prophetic song.

Methinks I see him in his hall appear,
Where the long table floats in clammy beer,
'Midst mugs and glasses shatter'd o'er the floor,
Dead drunk, his servile crew supinely snore;
'Triumphant, o'er the prostrate brutes he stands,
The mighty bumper trembles in his hands;
Boldly he drinks, and, like his glorious fires,
In copious gulps of potent ale expires.

THE TOILETTE,

A TOWN ECLOGUE.

Lydia.

Now twenty springs had cloth'd the park with green,
Since Lydia knew the blossom of fifteen;
No lovers now her morning hours molest,
And catch her at her toilette half undrest;
The thundering knocker wakes the street no more,
No chairs, no coaches, crowd her silent door,
Her midnights once at cards and hazard fled,
Which now, alas! she dreams away in bed.
Around her wait shocks, monkeys, and mockaws,
To fill the place of fops and perjur'd beaux;
In these she views the mimicry of man,
And smiles when grinning Pug gallants her fan;
When Poll repeats, the sounds deceive her ear
(For sounds like his once told her Damon's care);
With these alone her tedious mornings pass;
Or, at the dumb devotion of her glass,
She smooths her brow, and frizzles forth her hairs,
And fancies youthful dress gives youthful airs;

With crimson wool she fixes every grace,
That not a blush can discompose her face.
Reclin'd upon her arm, she pensive sate,
And curs'd th' inconstancy of youth too late.

O youth! O spring of life! for ever lost!
No more my name shall reign the favourite toast;
On glass no more the diamond grave my name,
And rhymes mis-spelt record a lover's flame:
Nor shall side-boxes watch my restless eyes,
And, as they catch the glance, in rows arise
With humble bows; nor white-lov'd beaux encroach

In crowds behind, to guard me to my coach.
Ah, hapless nymph! such conquests are no more;
For Chloe's now what Lydia was before!

'Tis true, this Chloe boasts the peach's bloom.
But does her nearer whisper breathe perfume?
I own, her taper shape is form'd to please.
Yet if you saw her unconfin'd by stays!
She doubly to fifteen may make pretence;
Alike we read it in her face and sense.
Her reputation! but that never yet
Could check the freedoms of a young coquette.
Why will ye then, vain fops, her eyes believe?
Her eyes can, like your perjur'd tongues, deceive.

What shall I do? how spend the hateful day?
At chapel shall I wear the morn away?
Who there frequents at these unmodish hours,
But ancient matrons with their frizzled towers,
And gray religious maids? My presence there
Amid that sober train would own despair;
Nor am I yet so old; nor is my glance
As yet fixt wholly to devotion's trance. [range
Straight then I'll dress, and take my wonted
Through every Indian shop through all the Change;
Where the tall jar erects his costly pride,
With antic shapes in china's azure dy'd;
There careless lies the rich brocade unroll'd;
Here shines a cabinet with burnish'd gold:
But then remembrance will my grief renew,
'Twas there the raffling dice false Damon threw;
The raffling dice to him decide the prize;
'Twas there he first convers'd with Chloe's eyes.
Hence sprung th' ill-fated cause of all my smart;
To me the toy he gave, to her his heart.
But soon thy perjury in the gift was found,
The shiver'd china dropt upon the ground;
Sure omen that thy vows would faithless prove;
Frail was thy present, frailer is thy love.

O happy Poll, in wiry poison pent;
Thou ne'er hast known what love or rivals meant,
And Pug with pleasure can his fetters bear,
Who ne'er believ'd the vows that lovers swear!
How am I curst (unhappy and forlorn)
With perjury, with love, and rival's scorn!
False are the loose coquette's inveigling airs,
False is the pompous grief of youthful heirs,
False is the cringing courtier's plighted word,
False are the dice when gamesters stamp the board,
False is the sprightly widow's public tear;
Yet these to Damon's oaths are all sincere.

Fly from perfidious man, the sex disdain;
Let servile Chloe wear the nuptial chain.
Damon is practis'd in the modish life,
Can hate, and yet be civil to a wife.

He games; he swears; he drinks; he fights; he roves;

Yet Chloe can believe he fondly loves.
Mistress and wife can well supply his need;
A mistress for pleasure, and a wife for bread.
But Chloe's air is unconfin'd and gay,
And can perhaps an injur'd bed repay;
Perhaps her patient temper can behold
The rival of her love adorn'd with gold.
Powder'd with diamonds; free from thought and care,

A husband's sullen humours she can bear. [eyes?]

Why are these sobs? and why these streaming
Is love the cause? No, I the sex despise;
I hate, I loathe his base perfidious name.
Yet if he should but feign a rival flame?
But Chloe boasts and triumphs in my pains;
To her he's faithful, 'tis to me he feigns.

Thus love-sick Lydia rav'd. Her maid appears;
A band-box in her steady hand she bears.
How well this ribband's gloss becomes your face;
She cries, in raptures; then, so sweet a lace!
How charmingly you look! so bright! so fair!
'Tis to your eyes the head-dress owes its air.
Straight Lydia smil'd; the comb adjusts her locks
And at the playhouse Harry keeps her box.

THE TEA-TABLE,

A TOWN ECLOGUE.

Doris and Melanthe.

SAINT James's noon-day bell for prayers had toll'd,
And coaches to the patron's levee roll'd,
When Doris rose. And now through all the room
From flowery tea exhales a fragrant fume.
Cup after cup they sip, and talk'd by fits,
For Doris here, and there Melanthe sits.
Doris was young, a laughter-loving dame,
Nice of her own alike and others' fame:
Melanthe's tongue could well a tale advance,
And sooner gave than sunk a circumstance;
Lock'd in her memory, secrets never dy'd.
Doris begun: Melanthe thus reply'd.

Doris.

Sylvia the vain fantastic fop admires;
The rake's loose gallantry her bosom fires:
Sylvia like that is vain, like this she roves;
In liking them, she but herself approves.

Melanthe.

Laura rails on at men, the sex reviles,
Their vice condemns, or at their folly smiles.
Why should her tongue in just resentment fail,
Since men at her with equal freedom rail?

Doris.

Last masquerade was Sylvia nymph-like seen,
Her hand a crook sustain'd, her dress was green;
An amorous shepherd led her through the crowd,
The nymph was innocent, the shepherd vow'd;
But nymphs their innocence with shepherds trust;
So both withdrew, as nymph and shepherd must.

Melanthe.

Name but the licence of the modern stage,
Laura takes fire, and kindles into rage;
The whining tragic love she scarce can bear,
But nauseous comedy ne'er shock'd her ear;

Yet, in the gallery mobb'd, she sits secure,
And laughs at jests that turn the box demure.

Doris.

Trust not, ye ladies, to your beauty's power,
For beauty withers like a shrivel'd flower;
Yet those fair flowers, that Sylvia's temples bind,
Fade not with sudden blights or winter's wind;
Like those, her face defies the rolling years;
For art her roses and her charms repairs.

Melanthe.

Laura despises every outward grace,
The wanton sparkling eye, the blooming face;
The beauties of the soul are all her pride,
For other beauties nature has deny'd:
If affectation show a beauteous mind,
Lives there a man to Laura's merits blind?

Doris.

Sylvia be sure defies the town's reproach,
Whose dishabille is soil'd in hackney coach;
What though the fash was clos'd, must we conclude,

That she was yielding, when her fop was rude?

Melanthe.

Laura learnt caution at too dear a cost,
What fair could e'er retrieve her honour lost?
Secret she loves; and who the nymph can blame,
Who durst not own a footman's vulgar flame?

Doris.

Though Laura's homely taste descends so low;
Her footman well may vie with Sylvia's beau.

Melanthe.

Yet why should Laura think it a disgrace,
When proud Miranda's groom wears Flanders
lace?

Doris.

What though for music Cynthia boasts an ear?
Robin perhaps can hum an opera air.
Cynthia can bow, takes snuff, and dances well;
Robin talks common-sense, can write and spell.
Sylvia's vain fancy dress and show admires;
But 'tis the man alone whom Laura fires.

Melanthe.

Plato's wife morals Laura's soul improve;
And this, no doubt, must be Platonic love!
Her soul to generous acts was still inclin'd.
What shows more virtue than an humble mind?

Doris.

What though young Sylvia love the park's cool
shade,

And wander in the dusk the secret glade?
Masqu'd and alone (by chance) she met her spark;
That innocence is weak which shuns the dark.

Melanthe.

But Laura for her flame has no pretence;
Her footman is a footman too in sense.
All prudes I hate; and those are rightly curst
With scandal's double load, who censure first.

Doris.

And what if Cynthia Sylvia's garter ty'd?
Who such a foot and such a leg would hide;
When crook-kneed Phyllis can expose to view
Her gold-clock'd stocking, and her tawdry shoe?

Melanthe.

If pure devotion centre in the face,
If censuring others show intrinsic grace,

If guilt to public freedoms be combin'd,
Prudes (all must own) are of the holy kind!

Doris.

Sylvia disdains reserve, and flies constraint;
She neither is, nor would be thought, a saint.

Melanthe.

Love is a trivial passion, Laura cries:
May I be blest with friendship's stricter ties!
To such a breast all secrets we commend;
Sure the whole drawing-room is Laura's friend.

Doris.

At marriage Sylvia rails; who men would trust?
Yet husbands' jealousies are sometimes just.
Her favours Sylvia shares among mankind:
Such generous love should never be confin'd.

As thus alternate chat employ'd their tongue.
With thundering raps the brazen knocker rung.
Laura and Sylvia came; the nymphs arise;
"This unexpected visit," Doris cries,
"Is doubly kind!" Melanthe Laura led:
"Since I was last so blest, my dear," she said,
"Sure 'tis an age." They sat; the hour was set;
And all again that night at ombre met.

THE FUNERAL.

A TOWN ECLOGUE.

Sabina. Lucy.

Twice had the moon perform'd her earthly race,
Since first the veil o'ercast Sabina's face.
Then dy'd the tender partner of her bed.
And lives Sabina when Fidelio's dead?
Fidelio's dead, and yet Sabina lives.
But see the tribute of her tears she gives;
Their absent lord her rooms in sable mourn,
And all the day the glimmering tapers burn;
Stretch'd on the couch of state she pensive lies,
While oft' the snowy cambric wipes her eyes.
Now enter'd Lucy: trusty Lucy knew
To roll a sleeve, or bear a billet-doux;
Her ready tongue, in secret service try'd,
With equal fluency spoke truth or ly'd;
She well could flush or humble a gallant,
And serve at once as maid and confidant!
A letter from her faithful stays she took,
Sabina snatch'd it with an angry look,
And thus in hasty words her grief confess'd;
While Lucy strove to soothe her troubled breast.

Sabina.

What, still Myrtillo's hand! his flame I scorn;
Give back his passion with the seal untorn.
To break our soft repose, has man a right?
And are we doom'd to read what'er they write?
Not all the sex my firm resolves shall move;
My life's a life of sorrow, not of love.
May Lydia's wrinkles all my forehead trace,
And Celia's paleness sicken o'er my face;
May fops of mine, as Flavia's favours, boast,
And coquettes triumph in my honour lost;
May cards employ my nights, and never more
May these curst eyes behold a matadore;
Break china, perish shock, die perroquet;
When I Fidelio's dearer love forget!
Fidelio's judgment scorn'd the foppish train;
His air was easy, and his dress was plain;

His words sincere, respect his presence drew,
And on his lips sweet conversation grew.
Where's wit, where's beauty, where is virtue fled?
Alas! they're now no more; Fidelio's dead!

Lucy.

Yet, when he liv'd, he wanted every grace;
That easy air was then an awkward pace:
Have not your sighs in whispers often said,
His dress was slovenly, his speech ill-bred?
Have not I heard you, with a secret tear,
Call that sweet converse sullen and severe?
Think not I come to take Myrtillo's part:
Let Chloe, Daphne, Doris, share his heart;
Let Chloe's love in every ear express
His graceful person and genteel address;
All well may judge what shaft has Daphne hit,
Who suffers silence, to admire his wit.
His equipage and liveries Doris move;
But Chloe, Daphne, Doris, fondly love.
Sooner shall cits in fashions guide the court,
And beaux upon the busy Change resort;
Sooner the nation shall from snuff be freed,
And fops apartments smoke with India's weed;
Sooner I'd wish and sigh through nunnery grates;
Than recommend the flame Sabina hates.

Sabina.

Because some widows are in haste subdued;
Shall every fop upon our tears intrude?
Can I forget my lov'd Fidelio's tongue,
Soft as the warbling of Italian song?
Did not his rosy lips breathe forth perfume,
Fragrant as steams from tea's imperial bloom?

Lucy.

Yet once you thought that tongue a greater curse
Than squalls of children for an absent nurse.
Have you not fancy'd, in his frequent kisses,
Th' ungrateful leavings of a filthy mis?

Sabina.

Love, I thy power defy; no second flame
Shall ever raze my dear Fidelio's name.
Fannia without a tear might lose her lord,
Who ne'er enjoy'd his presence but at board.
And why should sorrow sit on Lesbia's face?
Are there such comforts in a sot's embrace?
No friend, no lover, is to Lesbia dead;
For Lesbia long had known a separate bed. [breast;
Gush forth, ye tears; waste, waste, ye sighs, my
My days, my nights, were by Fidelio blest!

Lucy.

You cannot sure forget how oft' you said,
His teasing fondness jealousy betray'd!
When at the play the neighbouring box he took,
You thought you read suspicion in his look.
When cards and counters flew around the board,
Have you not wish'd the absence of your lord?
His company was then a poor pretence,
To check the freedom of a wife's expence.

Sabina.

But why should I Myrtillo's passion blame,
Since love's a fierce involuntary flame?

Lucy.

Could he the fallies of his heart withstand,
Why should he not to Chloe give his hand?
For Chloe's handsome; yet he flights her flame;
Last night she fainted at Sabina's name.

Why, Daphne, dost thou blame Sabina's charms?
 Sabina keeps no lover from thy arms.
 At crimp Myrtillo play'd; in kind regards
 Doris threw love, unmindful of the cards;
 Doris was touch'd with spleen; her fan he rent,
 Flew from the table, and to tears gave vent.
 Why, Doris, dost thou curse Sabina's eyes?
 To her Myrtillo is a vulgar prize.

Sabina.

Yet say, I lov'd; how loud would censure rail!
 So soon to quit the duties of the veil!
 No, sooner plays and operas I'd forswear,
 And change these china jars for Tunbridge ware;
 Or trust my mother as a confidant,
 Or fix a friendship with my maiden aunt;
 Than till—to-morrow throw my weeds away.
 Yet let me see him, if he comes to-day!

THE ESPOUSAL,

A SOBER ECLOGUE.

Between two of the People called Quakers.

CALEB. TABITHA.

BENEATH the shadow of a beaver hat,
 Meek Caleb at a silent meeting sat;
 His eye-balls oft' forgot the holy trance,
 While Tabitha demure return'd the glance.
 The meeting ended, Caleb silence broke,
 And Tabitha her inward yearnings spoke.

Caleb.

Beloved, see how all things follow love;
 Lamb fondleth lamb, and dove disports with dove;
 Yet fondled lambs their innocence secure,
 And none can call the turtle's bill impure.
 O fairest of our sisters, let me be
 The billing dove and fondling lamb to thee.

Tabitha.

But, Caleb, know that birds of gentle mind
 Elect a mate among the sober kind;
 Not the mockaws, all deck'd in scarlet pride,
 Entice their mild and modest hearts aside;
 But thou, vain man! beguil'd by Popish shows,
 Doatest on ribbands, flounces, furbelows.
 If thy false heart be fond of tawdry dyes,
 Go, wed the painted arch in summer-skies;
 Such love will like the rainbow's hue decay,
 Strong at the first, but passeth soon away.

Caleb.

Name not the frailties of my youthful days,
 When vice misled me through the harlot's ways;
 When I with wanton look the sex beheld,
 And nature with each wanton look rebell'd;
 Then party-colour'd pride my heart might move
 With lace, the net to catch unhallow'd love.
 All such like love is fading as the flower,
 Springs in a day, and withereth in an hour:
 But now I feel the spousal love within,
 And spousal love no sister holds a sin.

Tabitha.

I know thou longest for the flaunting maid,
 Thy falsehood own, and say I am betray'd;
 The tongue of man is blister'd o'er with lies,
 But truth is ever read in woman's eyes.
 O that my lip obey'd a tongue like thine!
 Or that thine eye bewray'd a love like mine!

Caleb.

How bitter are thy words! forbear to tease,
 I too might blame—but love delights to please.
 Why should I tell thee, that, when last the sun
 Painted the downy peach of Newington,
 Josiah led thee through the garden's walk,
 And mingled melting kisses with his talk?
 Ah, jealousy! turn, turn thine eyes aside:
 How can I see that watch adorn thy side?
 For verily no gift the sisters take,
 For lust of gain, but for the giver's sake.

Tabitha.

I own, Josiah gave the golden toy,
 Which did the righteous hand of Quare employ.
 When Caleb hath assign'd some happy day,
 I look on this, and chide the hours delay:
 And, when Josiah would his love pursue,
 On this I look, and shun his wanton view.
 Man but in vain with trinkets tries to move;
 The only present love demands is love.

Caleb.

Ah, Tabitha, to hear these words of thine,
 My pulse beats high, as if inflam'd with wine!
 When to the brethren first with fervent zeal
 The spirit mov'd the yearnings to reveal,
 How did I joy thy trembling lip to see
 Red as the cherry from the Kentish tree!
 When ecstacy had warm'd thy look so meek,
 Gardens of roses blush'd on thy cheek! [eyes!
 With what sweet transport didst thou roll thine
 How did thy words provoke the brethren's sighs!
 Words that with holy sighs might others move,
 But, Tabitha, my sighs were sighs of love.

Tabitha.

Is Tabitha beyond her wishes blest?
 Does no proud worldly dame divide thy breast?
 Then hear me, Caleb, witness what I speak,
 This solemn promise death alone can break:
 Sooner I would bedeck my brow with lace,
 And with immodest favourites shade my face,
 Sooner like Babylon's lewd whore be drest
 In flaring diamonds and a scarlet vest,
 Or make a curtsy in Cathedral pew,
 Than prove inconstant, while my Caleb's true.

Caleb.

When I prove false, and Tabitha forsake,
 Teachers shall dance a jig at country wake;
 Brethren unbeaver'd then shall bow their head,
 And with profane mince pies our babes be fed.

Tabitha.

If that Josiah were with passion fir'd,
 Warm as the zeal of youth when first inspir'd;
 In steady love though he might persevere,
 Unchanging as the decent garb we wear,
 And thou wert fickle as the wind that blows,
 Light as the feather on the head of beaux;
 Yet I for thee would all thy sex resign:
 Sisters, take all the rest—be Caleb mine.

Caleb.

Though I had all that sinful love affords,
 And all the concubines of all the lords,
 Whose couches creak with whoredom's sinful shame,
 Whose velvet chairs are with adultery lame;
 Ev'n in the harlot's hall, I would not sip
 The dew of lewdness from her lying lip;

I'd shun her paths, upon thy mouth to dwell,
 More sweet than powder which the merchants sell.
 O solace me with kisses pure like thine !
 Enjoy, ye lords, the wanton concubine.
 The spring now calls us forth; come, sister, come,
 To see the primrose and the daisy bloom.
 Let ceremony bind the worldly pair;
 Sisters esteem the brethren's words sincere.

Tabitha.

Esponsals are but forms. O lead me hence,
 For secret love can never give offence.

Then hand in hand the loving mates withdraw :
True love is nature unrestrain'd by law.
 This tenet all the holy sect allows;
 So Tabitha took earnest of a spouse.

ELEGIES.

PANTHEA.

LONG had Panthea felt love's secret smart,
 And hope and fear alternate rul'd her heart;
 Consenting glances had her flame confess'd :
 In woman's eyes her very soul's express'd.
 Perjur'd Alexis saw the blushing maid,
 He saw, he swore, he conquer'd, and betray'd.
 Another love now calls him from her arms,
 His fickle heart another beauty warms;
 Those oaths, oft' whisper'd in Panthea's ears,
 He now again to Galatea swears.
 Beneath a beech th' abandon'd virgin laid,
 In grateful solitude enjoys the shade; [strains,
 There with faint voice she breath'd these moving
 While sighing zephyrs shar'd her amorous pains.

Pale settled sorrow hangs upon my brow,
 Dead are my charms; Alexis breaks his vow !
 Think, think, dear shepherd, on the days you
 knew,
 When I was happy, when my swain was true;
 Think how thy looks and tongue are form'd to
 move;
 And think yet more—that all my fault was love.
 Ah, could you view me in this wretched state,
 You might not love me, but you could not hate.
 Could you behold me in this conscious shade,
 Where first thy vows, where first my love was paid,

Worn out with watching, sullen with despair,
 And see each eye swell with a gushing tear;
 Could you behold me on this mossy bed,
 From my pale cheek the lively crimson fled,
 Which in my softer hours you oft' have sworn,
 With rosy beauty far outblush'd the morn;
 Could you untouch'd this wretched object bear,
 And would not lost Panthea claim a tear? [steal,
 You could not, sure—tears from your eyes would
 And unawares thy tender soul reveal.
 Ah no! thy soul with cruelty is fraught,
 No tenderness disturbs thy savage thought;
 Sooner shall tigers spare the trembling lambs,
 And wolves with pity hear their bleating dams;
 Sooner shall vultures from their quarry fly;
 Than false Alexis for Panthea sigh.

Thy bosom ne'er a tender thought confess'd,
 Sure stubborn flint has arm'd thy cruel breast;
 But hardest flints are worn by frequent rains,
 And the soft drops dissolve their solid veins;
 While thy relentless heart more hard appears,
 And is not soften'd by a flood of tears.

Ah, what is love! Panthea's joys are gone,
 Her liberty, her peace, her reason, flown!
 And when I view me in the watery glass,
 I find Panthea now, not what she was.

As northern winds the new-blown roses blast,
 And on the ground their fading ruins cast;
 As sudden blights corrupt the ripen'd grain,
 And of its verdure spoil the mournful plain;
 So hapless love on blooming features preys,
 So hapless love destroys our peaceful days.

Come, gentle sleep, relieve these weary'd eyes,
 All sorrow in thy soft embraces dies:
 There, spite of all thy perjur'd vows, I find
 Faithless Alexis languishingly kind:
 Sometimes he leads me by the mazy stream,
 And pleasingly deludes me in my dream;
 Sometimes he guides me to the secret grove,
 Where all our looks, and all our talk is love.
 Oh, could I thus consume each tedious day,
 And in sweet slumbers dream my life away!
 But sleep, which now no more relieves these eyes,
 To my sad soul the dear deceit denies.

Why does the sun dart forth its cheerful rays?
 Why do the woods resound with warbling lays?
 Why does the rose her grateful fragrance yield,
 And yellow cowslips paint the smiling field?
 Why do the streams with murmuring music flow,
 And why do groves their friendly shade bestow?
 Let sable clouds the cheerful sun deface,
 Let mournful silence seize the feather'd race;
 No more, ye roses, grateful fragrance yield,
 Droop, droop, ye cowslips, in the blasted field;
 No more, ye streams, with murmuring music
 flow,

And let not groves a friendly shade bestow:
 With sympathizing grief let nature mourn,
 And never know the youthful spring's return.

And shall I never more Alexis see?
 Then what is spring, or grove, or stream, to me?
 Why sport the skipping lambs on yonder plain?
 Why do the birds their tuneful voices strain?
 Why frisk those heifers in the cooling grove?
 Their happier life is ignorant of love.

Oh, lead me to some melancholy cave,
 To lull my sorrows in a living grave;
 From the dark rock where dashing waters fall,
 And creeping ivy hangs the craggy wall;
 Where I may waste in tears my hours away,
 And never know the seasons or the day?
 Die, die, Panthea—fly this hateful grove;
 For what is life without the swain I love?

A R A M I N T A.

AN ELEGY.

Now Phœbus rose, and with his early beams
 Wak'd slumbering Delia from her pleasing dreams;
 Her wishes by her fancy were supply'd,
 And in her sleep the nuptial knot was ty'd.
 With secret joy she saw the morning ray
 Chequer the floor, and through the curtains play;
 The happy morn that shall her bliss complete,
 And all her rivals' envious hopes defeat.
 In haste she rose, forgetful of her prayers,
 Flew to the glass, and practis'd o'er her airs:
 Her new-set jewels round her robe are plac'd,
 Some in a brilliant buckle bind her waist,
 Some round her neck a circling light display,
 Some in her hair diffuse a trembling ray;
 The silver knot o'erlooks the Mechlin lace,
 And adds becoming beauties to her face;
 Brocaded flowers o'er the gay mantua shine,
 And the rich stays her taper shape confine;
 Thus all her dress exerts a graceful pride,
 And sporting loves surround th' expecting bride;
 For Daphnis now attends the blushing maid,
 Before the priest the solemn vows are paid;
 This day, which ends at once all Delia's cares,
 Shall swell a thousand eyes with secret tears.
 Cease, Araminta, 'tis in vain to grieve,
 Canst thou from Hymen's bonds the youth retrieve?

Disdain his perjuries, and no longer mourn:
 Recal my love, and find a sure return.

But still the wretched maid no comfort knows,
 And with resentment cherishes her woes:
 Alone she pines, and, in these mournful strains,
 Of Daphnis' vows, and her own fate complains:

Was it for this I sparkled at the Play,
 And loiter'd in the Ring whole hours away?
 When if thy chariot in the circle shone,
 Our mutual passion by our looks was known:
 Through the gay crowd my watchful glances flew,
 Where'er I pass, thy grateful eyes pursue. [pain;
 " Ah, faithless youth! too well you saw my
 " For eyes the language of the soul explain."

Think, Daphnis, think that scarce five days are fled, [you said;
 Since (O false tongue!) those treacherous things
 How did you praise my shape and graceful air:
 And woman thinks all compliments sincere.
 Didst thou not then in rapture speak thy flame,
 And in soft sighs breathe Araminta's name?

Didst thou not then with oaths thy passion prove,
 And with an awful trembling, say—I love? [pain;
 " Ah, faithless youth! too well you saw my
 " For eyes the language of the soul explain."
 How could'st thou thus, ungrateful youth, deceive?

How could I thus, unguarded maid, believe?
 Sure thou canst well recal that fatal night,
 When subtle love first enter'd at my sight:
 When in the dance I was thy partner chose,
 Gods! what a rapture in my bosom rose!
 My trembling hand my sudden joy confess'd,
 My glowing cheeks a wounded heart express'd;
 My looks spoke love; while you, with answering
 eyes,

In killing glances made as kind replies. [said,
 Think, Daphnis, think what tender things you
 Think what confusion all my soul betray'd.

You call'd my graceful presence Cynthia's air;
 And, when I sung, the syrens charm'd your ear:
 My flame, blown up by flattery, stronger grew;
 A gale of love in every whisper flew. [" pain;
 " Ah, faithless youth! too well you saw my
 " For eyes the language of the soul explain."
 Where'er I dress'd, my maid, who knew my flame,

Cherish'd my passion with thy lovely name;
 Thy picture in her talk so lively grew,
 That thy dear image rose before my view;
 She dwelt whole hours upon thy shape and mien,
 And wounded Delia's fame, to sooth my spleen:
 When she beheld me at the name grow pale,
 Strait to thy charms she chang'd her artful tale;
 And, when thy matchless charms were quite run
 o'er,

I bid her tell the pleasing tale once more.
 Oh, Daphnis! from thy Araminta fled!
 Oh, to my love for ever, ever dead!
 Like death, his nuptials all my hope remove,
 And ever part me from the man I love. [" pain;
 " Ah, faithless youth! too well you saw my
 " For eyes the language of the soul explain."

O might I by my cruel fate be thrown,
 In some retreat far from this hateful town!
 Vain dress and glaring equipage, adieu!
 Let happier nymphs those empty shows pursue.
 Me let some melancholy shade surround,
 Where not the print of human step is found.
 In the gay dance my feet no more shall move,
 But bear me faintly through the lonely grove.
 No more these hands shall o'er the spinnet bound,
 And from the sleeping strings call forth the sound:
 Music, adieu! farewell, Italian airs
 The croaking raven now shall sooth my cares.
 On some old ruin, lost in thought, I rest,
 And think how Araminta once was blest;
 There o'er and o'er thy letters I peruse,
 And all my grief in one kind sentence lose;
 Some tender line by chance my woe beguiles,
 And on my cheek a short-liv'd pleasure smiles.
 Why is this dawn of joy? flow, tears again!
 Vain are these oaths, and all these vows are vain;
 Daphnis, alas! the Gordian knot has ty'd;
 Nor force nor cunning can the band divide. [plain,
 " Ah, faithless youth! since eyes the soul ex-
 " Why knew I not that artful tongue could feign."

AN ELEGY ON A LAP-DOG.

Shock's fate I mourn; poor Shock is now no more;

Ye muses, mourn; ye chambermaids, deplore.

Unhappy Shock! yet more unhappy fair,

Doom'd to survive thy joy and only care!

Thy wretched fingers now no more shall deck,

And tie the favourite ribband round his neck;

No more thy hand shall smooth his glossy hair,

And comb the wavings of his pendent ear.

Yet cease thy flowing grief, forsaken maid;

All mortal pleasures in a moment fade;

Our surest hope is in an hour destroy'd;

And love, best gift of Heaven, not long enjoy'd.

Methinks I see her frantic with despair,

Her streaming eyes, wrung hands, and flowing hair;

Her Mechlin pinnets, rent, the floor bestrow,

And her torn fan gives real signs of woe.

Hence superstition that tormenting guest,

That haunts with fancy'd fears the coward breast;

No dread events upon this fate attend,

Stream eyes no more, no more thy tresses rend.

Though certain omens oft' forewarn a state,

And dying lions show the monarch's fate;

Why should such fears bid Cælia's sorrow rise?

For, when a lap-dog falls, no lover dies.

Cease, Cælia, cease; restrain thy flowing tears;

Some warmer passion will dispel thy cares.

In man you'll find a more substantial bliss,

More grateful toying, and a sweeter kiss.

He's dead. Oh lay him gently in the ground!

And may his tomb be by this verse renown'd:

"Here Shock, the pride of all his kind, is laid:

"Who fawn'd like man, but ne'er like man be-
"tray'd."

SONGS AND BALLADS.

SWEET WILLIAM'S FAREWELL TO BLACK-EYED SUSAN.

ALL in the Downs the fleet was moor'd,

The streamers waving in the wind,

When black-ey'd Susan came aboard.

Oh! where shall I my true-love find?

Tell me, ye jovial sailors, tell me true,

If my sweet William fails among the crew.

William, who high upon the yard

Rock'd with the billow to and fro,

Soon as her well-known voice he heard,

He sigh'd, and cast his eyes below:

The cord slides swiftly through his glowing hands,

And (quick as lightning) on the deck he stands.

So the sweet lark, high pois'd in air,

Shuts close his pinions to his breast

(If chance his mate's shrill call he hear),

And drops at once into her nest.

The noblest captain in the British fleet

Might envy William's lip those kisses sweet.

O Susan, Susan, lovely dear,

My vows shall ever true remain;

Let me kiss off that falling tear;

We only part to meet again.

Change, as ye list, ye winds; my heart shall be

The faithful compass that still points to thee.

Believe not what the landmen say,

Who tempt with doubts thy constant mind.

They'll tell thee, sailors, when away,

In every port a mistress find:

Yes, yes, believe them when they tell thee so,

For thou art present wheresoe'er I go.

If to fair India's coast we sail,

Thy eyes are seen in diamonds bright,

Thy breath is Afric's spicy gale,

Thy skin is ivory so white.

Thus every beauteous object that I view,

Wakes in my soul some charm of lovely Sue.

Though battle call me from thy arms,

Let not my pretty Susan mourn;

Though cannons roar, yet, safe from harms,

William shall to his dear return.

Love turns aside the balls that round me fly,

Left precious tears should drop from Susan's eye.

The boatswain gave the dreadful word,

The sails their swelling bosom spread;

No longer must she stay aboard:

They kiss'd, she sigh'd, he hung his head.

Her lessening boat unwilling rows to land:

Adieu! she cries; and wav'd her lily hand.

A BALLAD,

FROM THE WHAT-D'YE-CALL-IT.

'Twas when the seas were roaring

With hollow blasts of wind;

A damsel lay deploring,

All on a rock reclin'd.

Wide o'er the foaming billows

She cast a wistful look;

Her head was crown'd with willows,

That trembled o'er the brook.

Twelve months are gone and over,

And nine long tedious days.

Why didst thou, venturous lover,

Why didst thou trust the seas;

Cease, cease, thou cruel ocean,
 And let my lover rest :
 Ah ! what's thy troubled motion
 To that within my breast ?
 The merchant, robb'd of pleasure,
 Sees tempests in despair ;
 But what's the loss of treasure,
 To losing of my dear ?
 Should you some coast be laid on,
 Where gold and diamonds grow,
 You'd find a richer maiden,
 But none that loves you so.
 How can they say that nature
 Has nothing made in vain ;
 Why then beneath the water
 Should hideous rocks remain ?
 No eyes the rocks discover,
 That lurk beneath the deep,
 To wreck the wandering lover,
 And leave the maid to weep.
 All melancholy lying,
 Thus wail'd she for her dear ;
 Repay'd each blast with sighing,
 Each billow with a tear ;
 When o'er the white wave stooping,
 His floating corpse she spy'd ;
 Then, like a lily drooping,
 She bow'd her head, and dy'd.

THE LADY'S LAMENTATION.

A BALLAD.

PHYLLIDA, that lov'd to dream
 In the grove, or by the stream ;
 Sigh'd on velvet pillow.
 What alas ! should fill her head,
 But a fountain, or a mead,
 Water and a willow ?
 Love in cities never dwells,
 He delights in rural cells
 Which sweet woodbine covers.
 What are your assemblies then ?
 There, 'tis true, we see more men ;
 But much fewer lovers.
 Oh, how chang'd the prospect grows !
 Flocks and herds to fops and beaux,
 Coxcombs without number !
 Moon and stars that shone so bright,
 To the torch and waxen light,
 And whole nights at ombre.
 Pleasant as it is, to hear
 Scandal tickling in our ear,
 Ev'n of our own mothers ;
 In the chit-chat of the day,
 To us is pay'd, when we're away,
 What we lent to others.
 Though the favourite toast I reign ;
 Wine, they say, that prompts the vain,
 Heightens defamation.
 Must I live 'twixt spite and fear,
 Every day grow handsomer,
 And lose my reputation ?

Thus the fair to sighs gave way,
 Her empty purse beside her lay.
 Nymph, ah, cease thy sorrow.
 Though curst fortune frown to-night,
 This odious town can give delight,
 If you win to-morrow.

DAMON AND CUPID.

A SONG.

THE sun was now withdrawn,
 The shepherds home were sped ;
 The moon wide o'er the lawn
 Her silver mantle spread ;
 When Damon stay'd behind,
 And saunter'd in the grove.
 Will ne'er a nymph be kind,
 And give me love for love ?
 Oh ! those were golden hours,
 When love, devoid of cares,
 In all Arcadia's bowers
 Lodg'd swains and nymphs by pairs ;
 But now from wood and plain
 Flies every sprightly lass ;
 No joys for me remain,
 In shades, or on the grass.
 The winged boy draws near,
 And thus the swain reproves :
 While beauty revel'd here,
 My game lay in the groves ;
 At court I never fail
 To scatter round my arrows ;
 Men fall as thick as hail,
 And maidens love like sparrows.
 Then, swain, if me you need,
 Straight lay your sheep-hook down ;
 Throw by your oaten reed,
 And haste away to town.
 So well I'm known at court,
 None asks where Cupid dwells ;
 But readily resort
 To Bellenden's or Lepell's.

DAPHNIS AND CHLOE.

A SONG.

DAPHNIS stood pensive in the shade,
 With arms across, and head reclin'd ;
 Pale looks accus'd the cruel maid,
 And sighs reliev'd his love-sick mind :
 His tuneful pipe all broken lay ;
 Looks, sighs, and actions, seem'd to say,
 My Chloe is unkind.
 Why ring the woods with warbling throats ?
 Ye larks, ye linnets, cease your strains ;
 I faintly hear in your sweet notes
 My Chloe's voice that wakes my pains :
 Yet why should you your song forbear ?
 Your mates delight your song to hear ;
 But Chloe mine disdains.
 As thus he melancholy stood,
 Dejected as the lonely dove,
 Sweet sounds broke gently through the wood.
 I feel the sound ; my heart-strings move.

'Twas not the nightingale that sung;
No. 'Tis my Chloe's sweeter tongue.
Hark, hark, what says my love?

How foolish is the nymph (she cries)
Who trifles with her lover's pain!
Nature still speaks in woman's eyes,
Our artful lips were made to feign.
O Daphnis, Daphnis, 'twas my pride,
'Twas not my heart thy love deny'd;
Come back, dear youth, again.

As t'other day my hand he seiz'd,
My blood with thrilling motion flew;
Sudden I put on looks displeas'd,
And hasty from his hold withdrew.
'Twas fear alone, thou simple swain;
Then hadst thou prest my hand again,
My heart had yielded too!

'Tis true, thy tuneful reed I blam'd,
That swell'd thy lip and rosy cheek;
Think not thy skill in song defam'd,
That lip should other pleasures seek:
Much, much thy music I approve;
Yet break thy pipe, for more I love,
Much more to hear thee speak.

My heart forbodes that I'm betray'd,
Daphnis, I fear, is ever gone;
Last night with Delia's dog he play'd,
Love by such trifles first comes on.
Now, now, dear shepherd, come away,
My tongue would now my heart obey.
Ah, Chloe, thou art won!

The youth stepp'd forth with hasty pace,
And found where wishing Chloe lay;
Shame sudden lighten'd in her face,
Confus'd, she knew not what to say.
At last, in broken words, she cry'd;
To-morrow you in vain had try'd,
But I am lost to-day!

THE COQUETTE MOTHER AND DAUGHTER.

A SONG.

At the close of the day,
When the bean-flower and hay
Breath'd odours in every wind;
Love enliven'd the veins
Of the damsels and swains;
Each glance and each action was kind.

Molly, wanton and free,
Kiss'd, and sat on each knee,
Fond ecstasy swam in her eyes.
See, thy mother is near;
Hark! she calls thee to hear
What age and experience advise.
Hast thou seen the blithe dove
Stretch her neck to her love,
All glossy with purple and gold?
If a kiss he obtain,
She returns it again:
What follows, you need not be told.

Look ye, mother, she cry'd,
You instruct me in pride,
And men by good manners are won.
She who trifles with all
Is less likely to fall

Than she who but trifles with one.
Pr'ythee, Molly, be wise,
Lest by sudden surprise
Love should tingle in every vein:
Take a shepherd for life,
And when once you're a wife,
You safely may trifle again.

Molly smiling reply'd,
Then I'll soon be a bride;
Old Roger has gold in his chest.
But I thought all you wives
Chose a man for your lives,
And trifled no more with the rest.

MOLLY MOG:

*Or, the Fair Maid of the Inn. A Ballad.

SAYS my uncle, I pray discover
What hath been the cause of your woes;
Why you pine and you whine like a lover!
—I have seen Molly Mog of the Rose.

O nephew! your grief is but folly,
In town you may find better prog;
Half a crown there will get you a Molly,
A Molly much better than Mog.

I know that by wits 'tis recited
That women are best at a clog;
But I am not so easily frightened
From loving of sweet Molly Mog.

The school-boy's desire is a play-day;
The schoolmaster's joy is to flog;
The milk-maid's delight is on May-day;
But mine is on sweet Molly Mog.

Will-a-wisp leads the traveller gadding [bog;
Through ditch, and through quagmire, and
But no light can set me a-madding
Like the eyes of my sweet Molly Mog.

For guineas in other men's breeches
Your gamesters will palm and will cog;
But I envy them none of their riches,
So I may win sweet Molly Mog.

The heart when half wounded is changing,
It here and there leaps like a frog;
But my heart can never be ranging,
'Tis so fix'd upon sweet Molly Mog.

Who follows all ladies of pleasure,
In pleasure is thought but a hog;
All the sex cannot give so good measure
Of joys, as my sweet Molly Mog.

I feel I'm in love to distraction,
My senses all lost in a fog;
And nothing can give satisfaction,
But thinking of sweet Molly Mog.

* This ballad was written on an inn-keeper's daughter at Oakingham in Berkshire, who in her youth was a celebrated beauty and toast: she lived to a very advanced age, dying so lately as the month of March, 1766.

A letter when I am inditing,
 Comes Cupid and gives me a jog,
 And I fill all the paper with writing
 Of nothing but sweet Molly Mog.
 If I would not give up the three Graces,
 I wish I were hang'd like a dog,
 And at court all the drawing-room faces,
 For a glance of my sweet Molly Mog.
 Those faces want nature and spirit,
 And seem as cut out of a log:
 Juno, Venus, and Pallas's merit,
 Unite in my sweet Molly Mog.
 Those who toast all the Family Royal,
 In bumpers of Hogan and Nog,
 Have hearts not more true or more loyal
 Than mine to my sweet Molly Mog.
 Were Virgil alive with his Phyllis,
 And writing another eclogue;
 Both his Phyllis and fair Amaryllis
 He'd give up for sweet Molly Mog.
 When she smiles on each guest, like her liquor,
 Then jealousy sets me agog;
 To be sure she's a bit for the Vicar.
 And so I shall lose Molly Mog.

B A L L A D

Or all the girls that e'er were seen,
 There's none so fine as Nelly,
 For charming face, and shape, and mien,
 And what's not fit to tell ye:
 Oh! the turn'd neck, and smooth white skin,
 Of lovely dearest Nelly!
 For many a swain it well had been
 Had she ne'er been at Calai-.
 For when as Nelly came to France
 (Invited by her cousins),
 Across the Tuilleries each glance
 Kill'd Frenchmen by whole dozens.
 The king, as he at dinner sat,
 Did beckon to his huffar,
 And bid him bring his tabby cat,
 For charming Nell to buss her.
 The ladies were with rage provok'd,
 To see her so respected;
 The men look'd arch, as Nelly strok'd,
 And pufs her tail erected.
 But not a man did look employ,
 Except on pretty Nelly;
 Then said the Duke de Villeroy,
 "Ah! qu'elle est bien jolie!"
 But who's that great philosopher,
 That carefully looks at her?
 By his concern it should appear,
 The fair one is his daughter.
Ma foy! (quoth then a courtier sly)
 He on his child does leer too:
 I wish he has no mind to try
 What some papa's will here do.
 The courtiers all, with one accord,
 Broke out in Nelly's praises,
 Admir'd her rose, and lys sans farde,
 (Which are your termes Françoises).
 VOL. VIII.

Then might you see a painted ring
 Of dames that stood by Nelly;
 She like the pride of all the spring,
 And they, like Fleurs de Palais.
 In Marli's gardens, and St. Clou,
 I saw this charming Nelly,
 Where shameless nymphs, expos'd to view,
 Stand naked in each allée:
 But Venus had a brazen face
 Both at Versailles and Meudon,
 Or else she had resign'd her place,
 And left the stone she stood on.
 Were Nelly's figure mounted there,
 'Twould put down all th' Italian:
 Lord! how those foreigners would stare!
 But I should turn Pygmalion:
 For, spite of lips, and eyes, and mien,
 Me nothing can delight so,
 As does that part that lies between
 Her left toe and her right toe.

A BALLAD ON QUADRILLE.

WHEN as corruption hence did go,
 And left the nation free;
 When Ay said ay, and No said no,
 Without or place or fee;
 Then Satan, thinking things went ill,
 Sent forth his spirit called Quadrille.
 Quadrille, Quadrille, &c.
 Kings, queens, and knaves, made up his pack,
 And four fair suits he wore;
 His troops they were with red and black
 All blotch'd and spotted o'er;
 And every house, go where you will,
 Is haunted by this imp Quadrille, &c.
 Sure cards he has for every thing,
 Which well court cards they name,
 And, statesman-like, calls in the king,
 To help out a bad game;
 But, if the parties manage ill,
 The king is forc'd to lose Codille, &c.
 When two and two were met of old,
 Though they ne'er meant to marry,
 They were in Cupid's books enroll'd,
 And call'd a Partie Quarrée;
 But now, meet when and where you will,
 A Partie Quarrée is Quadrille, &c.
 The commoner, and knight, and peer,
 Men of all ranks and fame,
 Leave to their wives the only care
 To propagate their name;
 And well that duty they fulfil,
 When the good husband's at Quadrille, &c.
 When patients lie in piteous case,
 In comes th' apothecary;
 And to the doctor cries, Alas!
Non debes Quadrillare:
 The patient dies without a pill:
 For why? the doctor's at Quadrille, &c.
 Should France and Spain again grow loud,
 The Muscovite grow louder;
 Britain, to curb her neighbours proud,
 Would want both ball and powder!

Must want both sword and gun to kill :
For why ? the general's at Quadrille, &c.

The king of late drew forth his sword
(Thank God 'twas not in wrath),
And made, of many a 'squire and lord,
An unwash'd Knight of Bath :
What are their feats of arms and skill ?
'They're but nine parties at Quadrille, &c.

A party late at Cambray met,
Which drew all Europe's eyes ;
'Twas call'd in Post-Boy and Gazette
The Quadruple Allies ;
But somebody took something ill,
So broke this party at Quadrille, &c.
And now God save this noble realm,
And God save eke Hanover ;
And God save those who hold the helmi,
When as the king goes over ;
But let the king go where he will,
His subjects must play at Quadrille,
Quadrille, Quadrille, &c.

A NEW SONG OF NEW SIMILIES.

My passion is as mustard strong ;
I fit all sober sad ;
Drunk as a piper all day long,
Or like a March-hare mad.

Round as a hoop the bumpers flow ;
I drink, yet can't forget her ;
For, though as drunk as David's fow,
I love her still the better.

Pert as a pear-monger I'd be,
If Molly were but kind ;
Cool as a cucumber could see
The rest of womankind.

Like a stuck pig I gaping stare,
And eye her o'er and o'er ;
Lean as a rake with sighs and care,
Sleek as a mouse before.

Plump as a partridge was I known,
And soft as silk my skin,
My cheeks as fat as butter grown ;
But as a groat now thin !

I, melancholy as a cat,
And kept awake to weep ;
But she, insensible of that,
Sound as a top can sleep.

Hard is her heart as flint or stone,
She laughs to see me pale ;
And merry as a grig is grown,
And brisk as bottled ale.

The God of Love at her approach
Is busy as a bee ;
Hearts, found as any bell or roach,
Are smit and sigh like me.

Ay me ! as thick as hops or hail,
The fine men crowd about her ;
But soon as dead as a door nail
Shall I be, if without her.

Straight as my leg her shape appears ;
O were we join'd together !

My heart would be scot-free from cares,
And lighter than a feather.

As fine as fivepence is her mien,
No drum was ever tighter ;
Her glance is as the razor keen,
And not the sun is brighter.

As soft as pap her kisses are,
Methinks I taste them yet ;
Brown as a berry is her hair,
Her eyes as black as jet :

As smooth as glass, as white as curds,
Her pretty hand invites ;
Sharp as a needle are her words ;
Her wit, like pepper, bites :

Brisk as a body-louse she trips,
Clean as a penny drest ;
Sweet as a rose her breath and lips,
Round as the globe her breast.

Full as an egg was I with glee ;
And happy as a king.
Good Lord ! how all men envy'd me !
She lov'd like any thing.

But, false as hell ! she, like the wind,
Chang'd, as her sex must do ;
Though seeming as the turtle kind,
And like the gospel true.

If I and Molly could agree,
Let who would take Peru !
Great as an emperor should I be,
And richer than a Jew.

Till you grow tender as a chick,
I'm dull as any post ;
Let us, like burs, together stick,
And warm as any toast.

You'll know me truer than a dye ;
And wish me better sped ;
Flat as a flounder when I lie,
And as a herring dead.

Sure as a gun, she'll drop a tear,
And sigh, perhaps, and wish,
When I am rotten as a pear,
And mute as any fish.

NEWGATE'S GARLAND :

BEING A NEW BALLAD,

Showing how Mr. JONATHAN WILD's Throat was cut from Ear to Ear with a Penknife, by Mr. BLAKE, alias BLUESKIN, the bold Highwayman, as he stood at his Trial in the Old-Bailey, 1725.

To the Tune of—"The Cut-purse."

YE gallants of Newgate, whose fingers are nice,
In diving in pockets, or cogging of dice ;
Ye sharpers so rich, who can buy off the noose ;
Ye honest poor rogues, who die in your shoes ;
Attend and draw near,
Good news you shall hear, [ear ;
How Jonathan's throat was cut from ear to How Blueskin's sharp penknife hath set you at ease,
And every man round me may rob if he please.

When to the Old-Bailey this Blue-skin was led,
He held up his hand, his indictment was read,
Loud rattled his chains, near him Jonathan stood,
For full forty pounds was the price of his blood.

Then, hopeless of life,

He drew his penknife,

And made a sad widow of Jonathan's wife.

But forty pounds paid her, her grief shall appease,
And every man round me may rob if he please.

Some say there are courtiers of highest renown,
Who steal the king's gold, and leave him but a crown; [men,

Some say there are peers, and some parliament-
Who meet once a year, to rob courtiers again:

Let them all take their swing,

To pillage the king,

And get a blue ribbon instead of a string.

Now Blue-skin's sharp penknife hath set you at ease,
And every man round me may rob if he please.

Knaves of old, to hide guilt by their cunning inventions, [sions;

Call'd briberies grants, and plain robberies pen-
Physicians and lawyers (who take their degrees
To be learned rogues) call'd their pilfering fees:

Since this happy day,

Now every man may

Rob (as safe as in office) upon the highway,
For Blue-skin's sharp penknife hath set you at ease,
And every man round me may rob if he please.

Some cheat in the customs, some rob the excise,
But he who robs both is esteemed most wise.

Church-wardens, too prudent to hazard the halter,
As yet only venture to steal from the altar:

But now to get gold,

They may be more bold, [cold.

And rob on the highway, since Jonathan's
For Blue-skin's sharp penknife hath set you at ease,
And every man round me may rob if he please.

MISCELLANIES.

PROLOGUE,

Designed for the Pastoral Tragedy of Dione.

THERE was a time (O were those days renew'd!)
Ere tyrant-laws had woman's will subdued;
Then nature rul'd; and love, devoid of art,
Spoke the consenting language of the heart.
Love uncontroul'd! insipid, poor delight!
'Tis the restraint that whets our appetite.
Behold the beasts who range the forests free;
Behold the birds who fly from tree to tree;
In their amours see nature's power appear!
And do they love? Yes—one month in the year.
Were these the pleasures of the golden reign?
And did free nature thus instruct the swain?
I envy not, ye nymphs, your amorous bowers:
Such harmless swains!—I'm ev'n content with ours.

But yet there's something in these sylvan scenes,
That tells our fancy what the lover means.
Name but the mossy bank, and moon-light grove,
Is there a heart that does not beat with love?

To-night we treat you with such country fare:
Then for your lover's sake our author spare.

He draws no Hemskirk boors, or home-bred clowns,

But the soft shepherds of Arcadia's downs.

When Paris on the three his judgment pass'd;
I hope you'll own the shepherd show'd his taste:
And Jove, all know, was a good judge of beauty,
Who made the nymph Calisto break her duty;
Then was the country-nymph no awkward thing.
See what strange revolutions time can bring!

Yet still methinks an author's fate I dread,
Were it not safer beaten paths to tread
Of tragedy; than o'er wide heaths to stray,
And seeking strange adventures lose his way?

No trumpet's clangour makes his heroine start,
And tears the soldier from her bleeding heart.
He, foolish bard! nor pomp nor show regards.
Without the witness of a hundred guards
His lovers sigh their vows.—If sleep should take ye,
He has no battle, no loud drum to wake ye.
What, no such shifts? there's danger in't, 'tis true;
Yet spare him, as he gives you something new.

A CONTEMPLATION ON NIGHT.

WHETHER amid the gloom of night I stray,
Or my glad eyes enjoy revolving day,
Still nature's various face informs my sense,
Of an all-wise, all-powerful Providence.

When the gay sun first breaks the shades of night,
And strikes the distant eastern hills with light,
Colour returns, the plains their livery wear,
And a bright verdure clothes the smiling year;
The blooming flowers with opening beauties glow,
And grazing flocks their milky fleeces show;
The barren cliffs with chalky fronts arise,
And a pure azure arches o'er the skies.
But when the gloomy reign of night returns,
Stript of her fading pride all nature mourns:
The trees no more their wonted verdure boast,
But weep in dewy tears their beauty lost:
No distant landscapes draw our curious eyes;
Wrapt in night's robe the whole creation lies.
Yet still, ev'n now, while darkness clothes the land,
We view the traces of th' Almighty hand;
Millions of stars in heaven's wide vault appear,
And with new glories hangs the boundless sphere;
The silver moon her western couch forsakes,
And o'er the skies her nightly circle makes;
Her solid globe beats back the sunny rays,
And to the world her borrow'd light repays.

Whether those stars, that twinkling lustre send,
Are suns, and rolling worlds those suns attend,
Man may conjecture, and new schemes declare;
Yet all his systems but conjectures are.
But this we know, that heaven's eternal King,
Who bade this universe from nothing spring,
Can at his word bid numerous worlds appear,
And rising worlds th' all-powerful word shall hear.

When to the western main the sun descends,
To other lands a rising day he lends;
'The spreading dawn another shepherd spies,
'The wakeful flocks from their warm folds arise;
Refresh'd, the peasant seeks his early toil,
And bids the plough correct the fallow soil.
While we in sleep's embraces waste the night,
'The climes oppos'd enjoy meridian light:
And when those lands the busy sun forsakes,
With us again the rosy morning wakes;
In lazy sleep the night rolls swift away,
And neither clime laments his absent ray.

When the pure soul is from the body flown,
No more shall night's alternate reign be known:
'The sun no more shall rolling light bestow,
But from th' Almighty streams of glory flow.
Oh, may some nobler thought my soul employ,
'Than empty, transient, sublunary joy!
'The stars shall drop, the sun shall lose his flame:
But thou, O God! for ever shine the same.

A THOUGHT ON ETERNITY.

ERE the foundations of the world were laid,
Ere kindling light th' Almighty word obey'd,
'Thou wert; and when the subterraneous flame
Shall burst its prison, and devour this frame,
From angry heaven when the keen lightning flies,
When fervent heat dissolves the melting skies,
'Thou still shalt be; still as thou wert before,
And know no change, when time shall be no more.
O endless thought! divine Eternity!

'Th' immortal soul shares but a part of thee!
For thou wert present when our life began,
When the warm dust shot up in breathing man.

Ah! what is life? with ills encompass'd round,
Amidst our hopes, fate strikes the sudden wound:
'To-day the statesman of new honour dreams,
'To-morrow death destroys his airy schemes;
Is mouldy treasure in thy chest confin'd?

Think all that treasure thou must leave behind;
Thy heir with smiles shall view thy blazon'd
herse,

And all thy hoards with lavish hand disperse.
Should certain fate th' impending blow delay,
'Thy mirth will sicken, and thy bloom decay;
Then feeble age will all thy nerves disarm,
No more thy blood its narrow channels warm.
Who then would wish to stretch this narrow span,

To suffer life beyond the date of man?

The virtuous soul pursues a nobler aim,
And life regards but as a fleeting dream:
She longs to wake, and wishes to get free,
To launch from earth into eternity.

For while the boundless theme extends our thought,
Ten thousand thousand rolling years are nought.

A N

EPIGRAMMATICAL EXPOSTULATION.

FROM Mohock and from Hawkubite,
Good Lord deliver me!
Who wander through the streets by night,
Committing cruelty.

They slash our sons with bloody knives,
And on our daughters fall;
And if they ravish not our wives,
We have good luck withal.

Coaches and chairs they overturn,
Nay carts most easily:
Therefore from Gog, and cke Magog,
Good Lord deliver me!

EPITAPH OF BYE-WORDS.

HERE lies a round woman, who thought mighty odd [God.
Every word she e'er heard in this church about
To convince her of God, the good dean did endeavour,
But still in her heart she held nature more clever.
Though he talk'd much of virtue, her head always run
Upon something or other, she found better fun.
For the dame, by her skill in affairs astronomical,
Imagin'd to live in the clouds was but comical.
In this world she despis'd every soul she met here,
And now she's in t' other, she thinks it but queer.

MY OWN EPITAPH.

LIFE is a jest, and all things show it;
I thought so once, but now I know it.

A MOTTO

For the Opera of Mutius Scævola †.

WHO here blames words, or verses, songs, or fingers,
Like Mutius Scævola will burn his fingers.

W I N E:

A POEM.

"Nulla placere diu, nec vivere carmina possunt,
Quæ scribuntur aquæ potoribus."

OF happiness terrestrial, and the source [muse;
Whence human pleasures flow, sing, heavenly
Of sparkling juices, of th' enlivening grape,
Whose quickening taste adds vigour to the soul,
Whose sovereign power revives decaying nature,
And thaws the frozen blood of hoary age,
A kindly warmth diffusing;—youthful fires
Gild his dim eyes, and paint with ruddy hue
His wrinkled visage, ghastly wan before:
Cordial restorative to mortal man,
With copious hand by bounteous gods bestow'd!

* Annexed, in 1712, to Gay's "Wonderful Prophesy," a humorous treatise on the Mohocks.

Bacchus divine, and my adventurous song,
That with no middle flight intends to soar.
Inspir'd, sublime, on Pegasean wing,
By thee upborne, I draw Miltonic air.

When fummy vapours clog our loaded brows
With furrow'd frowns; when stupid, downcast eyes,
Th' external symptoms of remorse within,
Express our grief; or when in sullen dumps,
With head incumbent on expanded palm,
Moping we sit, in silent sorrow drown'd:
Whether inveigling Hymen has trepann'd
Th' unwary youth, and tied the Gordian knot
Of jangling wedlock not to be dissolv'd;
Worry'd all day by loud Xantippe's din,
Who fails not to exalt him to the stars,
And fix him there among the branched crew
(Taurus, and Aries, and Capricorn,
The greatest monsters of the zodiac):
Or for the loss of anxious worldly pelf,
Or Cælia's scornful flights, and cold disdain,
Which check'd his amorous flame with coy repulse;
The worst events that mortals can befall:
By cares depress'd, in pensive hyppish mood,
With slowest pace the tedious minutes roll.
Thy charming sight, but much more charming gust,
New life incites, and warms our chilly blood.
Straight with pert looks, we raise our drooping fronts,

And pour in crystal pure, thy purer juice;—
With cheerful countenance and steady hand
Raise it lip-high, then fix the spacious rim
To the expecting mouth;—with grateful taste,
The ebbing wine glides swiftly o'er the tongue;
The circling blood with quicker motion flies:
Such is thy powerful influence, thou straight
Dispell'st those clouds, that, lowering dark, eclips'd
The whilom glories of the gladsome face;—
While dimpled cheeks, and sparkling, rolling eyes,
Thy cheering virtues and thy worth proclaim.
So mists and exhalations, that arise
From hills or steamy lake, dusky or gray,
Prevail; till Phœbus sheds Titanian rays,
And paints their fleecy skirts with shining gold:
Unable to resist, the foggy damps,
That veil'd the surface of the verdant fields,
At the god's penetrating beams disperse;
The earth again in former beauty smiles,
In gaudiest livery dress'd, all gay and clear.

When disappointed Strephon meets repulse,
Scoff'd at, despis'd, in melancholic mood,
Joyless he wastes in sighs the lazy hours;
Till, reinforc'd by thy most potent aid,
He storms the breach, and wins the beauteous fort.

To pay thee homage, and receive thy blessing,
The British seamen quits his native shore,
And ventures through the trackless, deep abyss,
Ploughing the ocean, w'ile the upheav'd oak,
"With beaked prow, rides tilting o'er the waves;"
Shock'd by tempestuous jarring winds, she rolls
In dangers imminent, till she arrives [sence.
At those best climes thou favour'st with thy pre-
Whether at Lusitania's sultry coast,
Or lofty Teneriff, Palma, Ferro,
Provence, or at the Celtiberian shores;
With gazing pleasure and astonishment

At Paradise (seat of our ancient fire)
He thinks himself arriv'd; the purple grapes,
In largest clusters pendant, grace the vines
Innumerable; in fields grotesque and wild
They with implicit curls the oak entwine,
And load with fruit divine his spreading boughs;
Sight most delicious! not an irksome thought,
Or of lost native isle, or absent friends,
Or dearest wife, or tender sucking babe,
His kindly-treacherous memory now presents;
The jovial god has left no room for cares.

Celestial liquor! thou that didst inspire
Maro and Flaccus, and the Grecian bard,
With lofty numbers, and heroic strains
Unparallel'd; with eloquence profound,
And arguments convictive, didst enforce
Fam'd Tully, and Demosthenes renown'd;
Ennius, first fam'd in Latin song, in vain
Draw Heliconian streams, ungrateful whet
To jaded muse, and oft, with vain attempt,
Heroic acts, in flagging numbers dull,
With pains essay'd; but, abject still and low,
His unrecruited muse could never reach
The mighty theme, till, from the purple fount
Of bright Lenzan fire, her barren drought
He quench'd, and with inspiring nectarous juice
Her drooping spirits cheer'd;—aloft she towers,
Borne on stiff pennons, and of war's alarms,
And trophies won, in loftiest numbers sings.
'Tis thou the hero's breast to martial acts,
And resolution bold, and ardour brave,
Excit'st: thou check'st inglorious, lolling ease,
And sluggish minds with generous fires inflam'st.
O thou, that first my quicken'd soul didst warm,
Still with thy aid assist me, that thy praise,
Thy universal sway o'er all the world,
In everlasting numbers, like the theme,
I may record, and sing thy matchless worth.

Had the Oxonian bard thy praise rehears'd,
His muse had yet retain'd her wonted height;
Such as of late o'er Blenheim's field she soar'd
Aërial: now in Ariconian bogs
She lies inglorious floundering, like her theme
Languid and faint, and on damp wing, immerg'd
In acid juice, in vain attempts to rise.

With what sublimest joy from noisy town,
At rural seat, Lucretius retir'd;
Flaccus, untainted by perplexing cares,
Where the white poplar, and the lofty pine,
Join neighbouring boughs, sweet hospitable shade
Creating, from Phœbean rays secure,
A cool retreat, with few well-chosen friends,
On flowery mead recumbent, spent the hours
In mirth innocuous, and alternate verse!
With roses interwoven, poplar wreaths
Their temples bind, dress of sylvestrian gods!
Choicest nectarean juice crown'd largest bowls,
And overlook'd the brim, alluring sight,
Of fragrant scent, attractive, taste divine!
Whether from Formian-grape depress'd, Falern,
Or Setin, Massic, Gauran, or Sabine,
Lesbian, or Cœcuban, the cheering bowl
Mov'd briskly round, and spurr'd their heighten'd
wit

To sing Mæcenas' praise, their patron kind.

But we not as our pristine fires repair
 T' umbrageous grot or vale; but, when the sun
 Falatly from western skies his rays oblique
 Darts sloping, and to Thetis' watery lap
 Hastens in prone career, with friends select Swiftly we hie to Devil *, young or old,
 Jocund and boon, where at the entrance stands
 A stripling, who with scrapes and humil cringe
 Greet us in winning speech, and accent bland;
 With lightest bound, and safe, unerring step,
 He skips before, and nimbly climbs the stairs:
 Melampus thus, panting with lolling tongue,
 And wagging tail, gambols, and frisks before
 His sequent lord, from pensive walk return'd,
 Whether in shady wood, or pasture green,
 And waits his coming at the well-known gate—
 Nigh to the stairs' ascent, in regal port,
 Sits a majestic dame, whose looks denounce
 Command and sovereignty; with haughty air,
 And studied mien, in semi-circular throne
 Enclos'd, she deals around her dread commands;
 Behind her (dazzling sight!) in order rang'd,
 Pile above pile, crystalline vessels shine;
 Attendant slaves with eager strides advance,
 And, after homage paid, bawl out aloud
 Words unintelligible, noise confus'd:
 She knows the jargon sounds, and straight describes,

In characters mysterious, words obscure;
 More legible are algebraic signs,
 Or mystic figures by magicians drawn,
 When they invoke th' infernal spirits aid.

Drive hence the rude and barbarous dissonance
 Of savage Thracians, and Croation boors;
 The loud Centaurian broils with Lapithæ
 Sound harsh and grating to Lenzæan god;
 Chase brutal feuds of Belgian skippers hence
 (Amid their cups, whose innate temper's shown),
 In clumsy fist wielding scymmetarian knife,
 Who flash each other's eyes and blubber'd face,
 Profaning Bacchanalian, solemn rites:
 Music's harmonious numbers better suit
 His festivals, from instruments or voice,
 Or Gasperini's hand the trembling string
 Should touch; or from the dulcet Tuscan dames,
 Or warbling Toft's far more melodious tongue,
 Sweet Symphonies should flow, the Delian god
 For airy Bacchus is associate meet.

The stairs ascent now gain'd, our guide unbars
 The doors of spacious room, and creaking chairs
 (To ear offensive) round the table sets.
 We sit, when thus his florid speech begins:
 "Name, Sirs, the wine that most invites your taste,

"Champaign, or Burgundy, or Florence pure,
 "Or Hock antique, or Lisbon new or old,
 "Bordeaux, or neat French wine, or Alicant."
 For Bordeaux we with voice unanimous
 Declare (such sympathy's in boon compeers).
 He quits the room alert, but soon returns;
 One hand capacious glistening vessels bears
 Relplendent; t'other with a grasp secure;

* The Devil-tavern, Temple-bar, frequented by his friends.

A bottle (mighty charge)! upstaid, full-fraught
 With goodly wine. He, with extended hand
 Rais'd high, pours forth his sanguine frothy juice,
 O'erspread with bubbles, dissipated soon:
 We strait to arms repair, experien'd chiefs;
 Now glasses clash with glasses (charming sound!)
 And glorious Anna's health, the first, the best,
 Crowns the full glass;—at her inspiring name,
 The sprightly wine results, and seems to smile;
 With hearty zeal, and wish unanimous,
 Her health we drink, and in her health our own.

A pause ensues; and now with grateful chat
 W' improve the interval; and joyous mirth
 Engages our rais'd souls, pat repartee,
 Or witty joke our airy senses moves
 To pleasant laughter; straight the echoing room
 With universal peals and shouts resounds.

The royal Dane, blest consort of the queen,
 Next crowns the ruby'd nectar, all whose bliss
 In Anna's plac'd:—with sympathetic flame,
 And mutual endearments, all her joys,
 Like the kind turtle's pure untainted love,
 Centre in him, who shares the grateful hearts
 Of loyal subjects with his sovereign queen;
 For by his prudent care, united shores
 Were sav'd from hostile fleets invasion dire.

The hero Marlborough next, whose vast exploits
 Fame's clarion sounds; fresh laurels triumphs new,
 We wish, like those he won at Hochstet's field.

Next Devonshire illustrious, who from race
 Of noblest patriots sprang, whose worthy soul
 Is with each fair and virtuous gift adorn'd.
 That shone in his most worthy ancestors:
 For then distinct in separate breasts were seen
 Virtues distinct, but all in him unite.

Prudent Godolphin, of the nation's weal
 Frugal, but free and generous of his own,
 Next crowns the bowl; with faithful Sunderland,
 And Halifax, the muses' darling son,
 In whom conspicuous, with full lustre, shine
 The surest judgment, and the brightest wit,
 Himself Mæcenæ and a Flaccus too—
 And all the worthies of the British realm,
 In order rang'd, succeed; such healths as tinge
 The dulcet wine with a more charming gust.

Now each his mistress toasts, by whose bright eye

He's fir'd; Cosmelia fair, or Dulcibel',
 Or Sylvia, comely black, with jetty eyes
 Piercing; or airy Celia, sprightly maid!—
 Insensibly thus flow unnumber'd hours;
 Glass succeeds glass, till the Dircean god
 Shines in our eyes, and with his fulgent rays
 Enlightens our glad looks with lovely dye;
 All blithe and jolly, that, like Arthur's knights,
 Of rotund table, fam'd in old records,
 Now most we seem'd—such is the power of Wine.

Thus we the winged hours in harmless mirth
 And joys unfully'd pass, till humid night
 Has half her race perform'd; now all abroad
 Is hush'd and silent, nor the rumbling noise
 Of coach or cart, or smoky link-boy's call,
 Is heard—but universal silence reigns:
 When we in merry plight, airy and gay,

Surpris'd to find the hours so swiftly fly,
With hasty knock, or twang of pendent cord,
Alarm the drowsy youth from slumbering nod;
Startled he flies, and stumbles o'er the stairs
Erroneous, and with busy knuckles plies
His yet clung eye-lids, and with staggering reel
Enters confus'd, and muttering asks our wills;
When we with liberal hand the score discharge,
And homeward each his course with steady step
Unerring steers, of cares and coin bereft.

THE LAMENTATION OF GLUMDALCLITCH

For the Loss of Grildrig.*

A PASTORAL.

Soon as Glumdalclitch miss'd her pleasing care,
She wept, she blubber'd, and she tore her hair.
No British miss sincerer grief has known,
Her squirrel missing, or her sparrow flown.
She furl'd her sampler, and haul'd in her thread,
And stuck her needle into Grildrig's bed;
Then spread her hands, and with a bounce let fall
Her baby, like the giant in Guildhall.
In peals of thunder now she roars, and now
She gently whimpers, like a lowing cow:
Yet lovely in her sorrow still appears;
Her locks dishevel'd, and her flood of tears,
Seem like the lofty barn of some rich swain,
When from the thatch drips fast a shower of rain.

In vain she search'd each cranny of the house,
Each gaping chink impervious to a mouse.

"Was it for this (she cry'd) with daily care
Within thy reach I set the vinegar;
And fill'd the cruet with the acid tide,
While pepper-water worms thy bait supply'd,
Where twin'd the silver eel around thy hook,
And all the little monsters of the brook?
Sure in that lake he dropt: My Grilly's
drown'd."—

She dragg'd the cruet, but no Grildrig found.

"Vain is thy courage, Grilly, vain thy boast:
But little creatures enterprize the most.
Trembling, I've seen thee dare the kitten's paw,
Nay, mix with children as they play'd at taw,
Nor fear'd the marbles, as they bounding flew:
Marbles to them, but rolling rocks to you.
Why did I trust thee with that giddy youth!
Who from a page can ever learn the truth?
Vers'd in court-tricks, that money-loving boy
To some lord's daughter sold the living toy;
Or rent him limb from limb in cruel play,
As children tear the wings of flies away.
From place to place o'er Brobdingnag I'll roam,
And never will return or bring thee home.
But who hath eyes to trace the passing wind?
How then thy fairy footsteps can I find?
Dost thou bewilder'd wander all alone,
In the green thicket of a mossy stone;
Or, tumbled from the toadstool's slippery round,
Perhaps, all maim'd, lie grovelling on the
ground?"

* In Faulkener's edition, this poem is ascribed to Pope, and the Lilliputian Ode to Arbuthnot.

"Dost thou, imbosom'd in the lovely rose,
Or sunk within the peach's down, repose?
Within the king-cup if thy limbs are spread,
Or in the golden cowslip's velvet head:
O show me, Flora, 'midst those sweets, the flower,
Where sleeps my Grildrig in his fragrant bower!
But ah! I fear thy little fancy roves
On little females, and on little loves;
Thy pigmy children, and thy tiny spouse,
The baby-playthings that adorn thy house,
Doors, windows, chimneys, and the spacious rooms
Equal in size to cells of honeycombs.
Hast thou for these now ventur'd from the shore,
Thy bark a bean-shell, and a straw thy oar?
Or in thy box now bounding on the main?
Shall I ne'er bear thyself and house again?
And shall I set thee on my hand no more,
To see thee leap the lines, and traverse o'er
My spacious palm? of stature scarce a span,
Mimic the actions of a real man?
No more behold thee turn my watch's key,
As seamen at a capstan anchors weigh? [tread,
How wast thou wont to walk with cautious
A dish of tea, like milk-pail on thy head!
How chase the mite that bore thy cheese away,
And keep the rolling maggot at a bay!"

She said; but broken accents stopt her voice,
Soft as the speaking trumpet's mellow noise.
She sobb'd a storm, and wip'd her flowing eyes,
Which seem'd like two broad suns in misty skies!—
O! squander not thy grief; those tears command
To weep upon our cod in Newfoundland:
The plenteous pickle shall preserve the fish,
And Europe taste thy sorrows in a dish.

TO QUINBUS FLESTRIN,

The Man-Mountain.—A Lilliputian Ode.

I.

In amaze
Loft, I gaze.
Can our eyes
Reach thy size?
May my lays
Swell'd with praise,
Worthy thee!
Worthy me!
Muse, inspire
All thy fire!
Bards of old
Of him told,
When they said
Atlas' head
Propt the skies: [eyes!
See! and believe, your

See him stride
Valleys wide:
Over woods,
Over floods.
When he treads,
Mountains heads
Groan and shake:
Armies quake,
Lest his spurn

Man and steed.
Troops, take heed!
Left and right
Speed your flight!
Lest an host
Beneath his foot be

From his hide,
Safe from wound
Darts rebound.
From his nose
Clouds he blows;
When he speaks,
Thunder breaks!
When he eats,

When he drinks,
Neptune shrinks!
Nigh thy ear,
In mid air,
On thy hand,
Let me stand,
So shall I

VERSES

To be placed under the Picture of SIR RICHARD BLAKMORE, England's Arch-poet, containing a complete Catalogue of his Works.

SEE who ne'er was nor will be half read :
 Who first sang (1) Arthur, then sang (2) Alfred,
 Prais'd great (3) Eliza in God's anger,
 Till all true Englishmen cry'd, Hang her !
 Made William's virtues wipe the bare a—
 And hang'd up Marlborough in (4) arras ;
 Then, hiss'd from earth, grew heavenly quite ;
 Made every reader curse the (5) light :
 Maul'd human wit in one thick (6) satire,
 Next in three books spoil'd (7) human nature ;
 Undid (8) creation at a jirk,
 And of (9) redemption made damn'd work.
 Then took his muse at once and dipt her
 Full in the middle of the Scripture.
 What wonders there the man, grown old, did ?
 Sternhold himself, he out-Sternholded,
 Made (10) David seem so mad and freakish,
 All thought him just what thought king Achish.
 No mortal read his (11) Solomon,
 But judg'd Re'boam his own son.
 Moses he serv'd as Moses Pharaoh,
 And Deborah (12), as she Sise-rah :
 Made (13) Jeremy full sore to cry,
 And (14) Job himself curse God and die.
 What punishment all this must follow ?
 Shall Arthur use him like King Tollo ?
 Shall David as Uriah slay him ?
 Or dext'rous Deborah Sifera-him ?
 Or shall Eliza lay a plot,
 To treat him like her sister Scot ?
 Shall William dub his better end *,
 Or Marlborough serve him like a friend ?
 No !—none of these !—Heaven spare his life !
 But send him, honest Job, thy wife !

ACIS AND GALATEA,

A SERENATA.

The Music by Mr. Handel.

PART I.

[A rural prospect, diversified with rocks, groves, and a river. Acis and Galatea seated by a fountain. Chorus of nymphs and shepherds, distributed about the landscape ; and Polyphemus discovered sitting upon a mountain.]

CHORUS.

O THE pleasure of the plains !
 Happy nymphs and happy swains
 (Harmless, merry, free, and gay)
 Dance and sport the hours away.
 For us the zephyr blows,
 For us distils the dew,
 For us unfolds the rose,
 And flowers display their hue :
 For us the winters rain ;
 For us the summers shine ;
 Spring swells for us the grain,
 And autumn bleeds the vine.

Da Capo.

RECITATIVE.

Galatea.

Ye verdant plains, and woody mountains,
 Purling streams, and bubbling fountains,

† Vulgo, salary.

 Of this composition, see the works of the Copper-farthing Dean.

Ye painted glories of the field,
Vain are the pleasures which you yield;
Too thin the shadow of the grove,
Too faint the gales, to cool my love.

AIR.

Hush, you pretty warbling choir,
Your thrilling strains
Awake my pains,
And kindle fierce desire:
Cease your song, and take your flight;
Bring back my Acis to my sight.

Da Capo.

AIR.

Acis.

Where shall I seek the charming fair?
Direct the way, kind genius of the mountains;
O tell me if you saw my dear;
Seeks she the groves, or bathes in crystal fountains?

Da Capo.

RECITATIVE.

Damon.

Stay, shepherd, stay!
See how thy flocks in yonder valley stray.
What means this melancholy air?
No more thy tuneful pipe we hear.

AIR.

Shepherd, what art thou pursuing,
Heedless running to thy ruin?
Share our joy, our pleasure share:
Leave thy passion till to-morrow;
Let the day be free from sorrow,
Free from love, and free from care.

Da Capo.

RECITATIVE.

Acis.

Lo here, my love!
Turn, Galatea, hither turn thine eyes;
See at thy feet the longing Acis lies.

AIR.

Love in her eyes sits playing,
And sheds delicious death;
Love in her lips is straying,
And warbling in her breath:
Love on her breast sits panting,
And swells with soft desire;
Nor grace, nor charm, is wanting
To set the heart on fire.

RECITATIVE.

Galatea.

O! didst thou know the pains of absent love,
Acis would ne'er from Galatea rove.

AIR.

As when the dove
Laments his love,
All on the naked spray;
When he returns,
No more she mourns,
But loves the live-long day.
Billing, cooing,
Panting, wooing,
Melting murmurs fill the grove;
Melting murmurs, lasting love.

DUET.

Acis and Galatea.

Happy we!
What joys I feel!—What charms I see!

Of all youths, thou dearest boy!
Of all nymphs, thou brightest fair!
Thou all my bliss, thou all my joy!

Da Capo.

CHORUS.

Happy we, &c.

PART II.

A Concerto on the Organ.

CHORUS.

WRETCHED lovers! fate has pass'd
This sad decree—no joy shall last.
Wretched lovers! quit your dream;
Behold the monster Polypheme.
See what ample strides he takes;
The mountain nods, the forest shakes;
The waves run frighten'd to the shores;
Hark, how the thundering giant roars!

RECITATIVE accompanied.

Polypheme.

I rage, I melt, I burn,
The feeble god has stabb'd me to the heart.
Thou trusty pine,
Prop of my godlike steps, I lay thee by.
Bring me a hundred reeds, of decent growth;
To make a pipe for my capacious mouth;
In soft enchanting accents let me breathe
Sweet Galatea's beauty, and my love.

AIR.

O ruddier than the cherry!
O sweeter than the berry!
O nymph more bright
Than moon-shine night,
Like kidlings blithe and merry!
Ripe as the melting cluster!
No lily has such lustre;
Yet hard to tame
As raging flame,
And fierce as storms that bluster!

Da Capo.

RECITATIVE.

Polyphemus, Galatea.

Poly. Whither, fairest, art thou running,
Still my warm embraces shunning?

Gal. The lion calls not to his prey;
Nor bids the wolf the lambkin stay.

Poly. Thee Polyphemus, great as Jove,
Calls to empire, and to love:
To his palace in the rock,
To his dairy, to his flock;
To the grape of purple hue,
To the plum of glossy blue;
Wildings which expecting stand,
Proud to be gather'd by thy hand.

Gal. Of infant-limbs to make my food,
And swirl full draughts of human blood!
Go, monster! bid some other guest:
I lothe the host; I lothe the feast.

AIR.

Polyphemus.

Cease to beauty to be suing:
Ever whining love disdaining,
Let the brave, their aims pursuing,
Still be conquering, not complainig.

Da Capo.

AIR.

Damon.

Would you gain the tender creature?
Softly, gently, kindly treat her:
Suffering is the lover's part:
Beauty by constraint possessing,
You enjoy but half the blessing,
Lifeless charms without the heart.

Da Capo.

RECITATIVE.

Acis.

His hideous love provokes my rage;
Weak as I am, I must engage:
Inspir'd with thy victorious charms,
The god of love will lend his arms.

AIR.

Love sounds th' alarm,
And fear is a flying:
When beauty's the prize,
What mortal fears dying?
In defence of my treasure,
I'd bleed at each vein:
Without her no pleasure;
For life is a pain.

Da Capo.

AIR.

Damon.

Consider, fond shepherd,
How fleeting's the pleasure.
That flatters our hopes
In pursuit of the fair:
The joys that attend it,
By moments we measure;
But life is too little
To measure our care.

Da Capo.

RECITATIVE.

Galatea.

Cease, O cease, thou gentle youth;
Trust my constancy and truth;
Trust my truth, and powers above,
The powers propitious still to love.

TRIO.

Acis, Galatea, and Polypheme.

Acis and Gal. The flocks shall leave the mountains,
The woods the turtle-dove,
The nymphs forsake the fountains,
Ere I forsake my love.

Poly. Torture! fury! rage! despair!
I cannot, cannot, cannot bear.

Acis and Gal. Not showers to larks so pleasing,
Nor sun-shine to the bee;

Not sleep to toil so easing,
As these dear smiles to me.

Poly. Fly swift, thou massy ruin, fly:
Die, presumptuous Acis, die.

RECITATIVE.

Acis.

Help, Galatea! help, ye parent gods!
And take me dying to your deep abodes!

CHORUS.

Mourn, all ye muses; weep, ye swains;
Tune, tune your reeds to doleful strains;
Groans, cries, and howlings, fill the neighbouring
shore,
Ah!—the gentle Acis is no more.

SONG AND CHORUS.

Galatea.

Must I my Acis still bemoan,
Inglorious crush'd beneath that stone?
Must the lovely charming youth
Die for his constancy and truth?
Say, what comfort can you find?
For dark despair o'erclouds my mind.

CHORUS.

Cease, Galatea, cease to grieve;
Bewail not, when thou canst relieve:
Call forth thy power, employ thy art;
The goddess soon can heal thy smart:
To kindred gods the youth return,
Through verdant plains to roll his urn.

RECITATIVE.

Galatea.

'Tis done: thus I exert my power divine;
Be thou immortal, though thou art not mine.

AIR.

Heart, thou seat of soft delight!
Be thou now a fountain bright;
Purple be no more thy blood,
Glide thou like a crystal flood;
Reck, thy hollow womb disclose:
The bubbling fountain, lo! it flows.
Through the plains he joys to rove,
Murmuring still his gentle love.

CHORUS.

Galatea, dry thy tears:
Acis now a god appears.
See how he rears him from his bed;
See the wreath that binds his head.
Hail! thou gentle murmuring stream,
Shepherds' pleasure, muses' theme;
Through the plain still joy to rove,
Murmuring still thy gentle love.

TRANSLATIONS.

THE STORY OF ACHELOUS AND HERCULES.

FROM OVID'S METAMORPHOSES. BOOK IX.

The Argument.

Theseus, returning from a great hunting-match in Calydon, is stopped from proceeding by the overflowing of the river Achelous. The god of the stream courteously invites him into his cave, where they pass the time in discoursing of various metamorphoses. At last, to prove the possibility of such changes, he asserts that he has himself the power of varying his form within certain limitations, among which he mentions his having lost one of his horns when in the shape of a bull; and this gives rise to the following story.

THESEUS requests the god to tell his woes,
Whence his maim'd brow, and whence his groans
arose;

When thus the Calydonian stream reply'd,
With twining reeds his careless tresses tied:
"Ungrateful is the tale; for who can bear,
"When conquer'd, to rehearse the shameful war?
"Yet I'll the melancholy story trace;
"So great a conqueror softens the disgrace;
"Nor was it still so mean the prize to yield,
"As great and glorious to dispute the field,
"Perhaps you've heard of Deianira's name,
"For all the country spoke her beauty's fame.
"Long was the nymph by numerous suitors woo'd,
"Each with address his envy'd hopes pursued:
"I join'd the loving band; to gain the fair,
"Reveal'd my passion to her father's ear.
"Their vain pretensions all the rest resign;
"Alcides only strove to equal mine:
"He boasts his birth from Jove, recounts his spoils,
"His step-dame's hate subdued, and finish'd toils.
"Can mortals then (said I) with gods compare?
"Behold a god; mine is the watery care:
"Through your wide realms I take my mazy way,
"Branch into streams, and o'er the region stray:
"No foreign guest your daughter's charms adores,
"But one who rises in your native shores.
"Let not his punishment your pity move;
"Is Juno's hate an argument for love?
"Though you your life from fair Alcmena drew,
"Jove's a feign'd father, or by fraud a true.
"Choose then; confess thy mother's honour lost,
"Or thy descent from Jove no longer boast."

While thus I spoke, he look'd with stern disdain,
Nor could the fallies of his wrath restrain,
Which thus broke forth: "This arm decides our right: [fight!"]

"Vanquish'd in words; be mine the prize in "Bold he rush'd on. My honour to maintain,
"I fling my verdant garments on the plain,

"My arms stretch forth, my pliant limbs prepare,
"And with bent hands expect the furious war.
"O'er my sleek skin now gather'd dust he throws,
"And yellow sand his mighty muscles strows.
"Oft' he my neck and nimble legs assails,
"He seems to grasp me, but as often fails:
"Each part he now invades with eager hand;
"Safe in my bulk, immoveable I stand.
"So when loud storms breaks high, and foam
"and roar
"Against some mole that stretches from the shore;
"The firm foundation lasting tempests braves,
"Defies the warring winds, and driving waves.
"Awhile we breathe, then forward rush amain,
"Renew the combat, and our ground maintain;
"Foot strove with foot, I prone extend my breast,
"Hands war with hands, and forehead forehead
"press'd.
"Thus have I seen two furious bulls engage,
"Inflam'd with equal love, and equal rage;
"Each claims the fairest heifer of the grove,
"And conquest only can decide their love:
"The trembling herds survey the fight from far,
"Till victory decides th' important war.
"Three times in vain he strove my joints to wrest;
"To force my hold, and throw me from his breast;
"The fourth he broke my gripe, that clasp'd him
"round.
"Then with new force he stretch'd me on the
ground;
"Close to my back the mighty burden clung,
"As if a mountain o'er my limbs were flung.
"Believe my tale; nor do I, boastful aim
"By feign'd narration to extol my fame.
"No sooner from his gasp I freedom get,
"Unlock my arms, that flow'd with trickling
"sweat,
"But quick he seiz'd me, and renew'd the strife,
"As my exhausted bosom pants for life;
"My neck he gripes, my knee to earth he strains;
"I fall, and bite the sand with shame and pains.

“ O’er-match’d in strength, to wiles and arts I
take,
“ And slip his hold, in form of speckled snake;
“ Who, when I wreath’d in spires my body round,
“ Or show’d my forked-tongue with hissing sound,
“ Smiles at my threats. Such foes my cradle
“ knew,
“ He cries; dire snakes my infant hand o’erthrew;
“ A dragon’s form might other conquests gain;
“ To war with me you take that shape in vain.
“ Art thou proportion’d to the Hydra’s length,
“ Who by his wounds receiv’d augmented strength?
“ He rais’d a hundred hissing heads in air;
“ When one I lopp’d, up sprung a dreadful pair.
“ By his wounds fertile, and with slaughter strong,
“ Singly I quell’d him, and stretch’d dead along.
“ What canst thou do, a form precarious, prone,
“ To rouse my rage with terrors not thy own?”
“ He said; and round my neck his hands he cast,
“ And with his straining fingers wrung me fast:
“ My throat he tortur’d, close as pincers clasp,
“ In vain I strove to loose the forceful grasp.
“ Thus vanquish’d too, a third form still remains,
“ Chang’d to a bull, my lowing fills the plains.
“ Straight on the left his nervous arms were thrown “ Upon my brindled neck, and tugg’d it down;
“ Then deep he struck my horn into the sand,
“ And fell’d my bulk along the dusty land.
“ Nor yet his fury cool’d; ’twixt rage and scorn,
“ From my maim’d front he tore the stubborn
“ horn; [bear,
“ This, heap’d with flowers and fruits, the Naiads
“ Sacred to plenty, and the bounteous year.”

He spoke; when lo! a beauteous nymph appears,
Girt, like Diana’s train, with flowing hairs;
The horn she brings, in which all autumn’s stor’d,
And ruddy apples for the second board.

Now morn begins to dawn, the sun’s bright fire
Gilds the high mountains, and the youths retire;
Nor stay’d they, till the troubled stream subsides,
And in its bound with peaceful current glides.
But Achelous in his oozy bed
Deep hides his brow deform’d, and rustic head:
No real wound the victor’s triumph show’d,
But his lost honours griev’d the watery god;
Yet ev’n that loss the willow’s leaves o’erspread,
And verdant reeds, in garlands, bind his head.

The Death of Nessus the Centaur.

THIS virgin too, thy love, O Nessus, found,
To her alone you owe the fatal wound.
As the strong son of Jove his bride conveys,
Where his paternal lands their bulwarks raise;
Where from her slopy urn Evenus pours
Her rapid current, swell’d by wintry showers,
He came. The frequent eddies whirl’d the tide,
And the deep rolling waves all pass deny’d.
As for himself, he stood unmov’d by fears,
For now his bridal charge employ’d his cares.
The strong-limb’d Nessus thus officious cry’d
(For he the shallows of the stream had try’d),
Swim thou, Alcides, all thy strength prepare;
On yonder bank I’ll lodge thy nuptial care.

Th’ Aonian chief to Nessus trusts his wife,
All pale, and trembling for her hero’s life;

Cloth’d as he stood in the fierce lion’s hide,
The laden quiver o’er his shoulder ty’d
(For cross the stream his bow and club were cast);
Swift he plung’d in; these billows shall be pass’d,
He said, nor sought where smoother waters glide,
But stemm’d the rapid dangers of the tide.
The bank he reach’d: again the bow he bears;
When, hark! his bride’s known voice alarms his ears.

Nessus, to thee I call (aloud he cries);
Vain is thy trust in flight, be timely wife:
Thou monster double-shap’d, my right set free:
If thou no reverence owe my fame and me,
Yet kindred should thy lawless lust deny.
Think not, perfidious wretch, from me to fly,
Though wing’d with horse’s speed; wounds shall pursue;

Swift as his words the fatal arrow flew:
The Centaur’s back admits the feather’d wood,
And through his breast the barbed weapon stood;
Which when, in anguish, through the flesh he tore,
From both the wounds gush’d forth the spumy gore
Mix’d with Lernaean venom; this he took,
Nor dire revenge his dying breast forsook.
His garment, in the reeking purple dy’d,
To rouse love’s passion, he presents the bride.

The Death of Hercules.

Now a long interval of time succeeds,
When the great son of Jove’s immortal deeds,
And stepdame’s hate, had fill’d earth’s utmost
round;

He from Oechalia, with new laurels crown’d,
In triumph was return’d. He rites prepares,
And to the king of gods directs his prayers,
When Fame (who falsehood clothes in truth’s disguise,

And swells her little bulk with growing lies)
Thy tender ear, O Deianira, mov’d,
That Hercules the fair Iole lov’d,

Her love believes the tale; the truth she fears
Of his new passion, and gives way to tears.
The flowing tears diffus’d her wretched grief,
Why seek I thus, from streaming eyes, relief?
She cries; indulge not thus these fruitless cares,
The harlot will but triumph in thy tears:
Let something be resolv’d, while yet there’s time;
My bed not conscious of a rival’s crime.

In silence shall I mourn, or loud complain?

Shall I seek Calydon, or here remain?

What though, ally’d to Meleager’s fame,

I boast the honours of a sister’s name?

My wrongs, perhaps, now urge me to pursue
Some desperate deed, by which the world shall view

How far revenge and woman’s rage can rise,
When weltering in her blood the harlot dies.

Thus various passions rul’d by turns her breast.
She now resolves to send the fatal vest, [move
Dy’d with Lernaean gore, whose power might
His soul anew, and rouse declining love.

Nor knew she what her sudden rage bestows,
When she to Lichas trusts her future woes;
With soft endearments she the boy commands
To bear the garment to her husband’s hands.

Th' unwitting hero takes the gift in haste,
 And o'er his shoulders Lerna's poison cast.
 As first the fire with frankincense he strows,
 And utters to the gods his holy vows;
 And on the marble altar's polish'd frame
 Pours forth the grapy stream; the rising flame
 Sudden dissolves the subtle poisonous juice,
 Which taints his blood, and all his nerves bedews.
 With wonted fortitude he bore the smart,
 And not a groan confess'd his burning heart.
 At length his patience was subdued by pain,
 He rends the sacred altar from the plain;
 Oete's wide forests echo with his cries!
 Now to rip off the deathful robe he tries.
 Where'er he plucks the vest, the skin he tears,
 The mangled muscles and huge bones he bares,
 (A ghastly sight!) or, raging with his pain,
 To rend the sticking plague he tugs in vain.

As the red iron hisses in the flood,
 So boils the venom in his curdling blood.
 Now with the greedy flame his entrails glow,
 And livid sweats down all his body flow;
 The cracking nerves burnt up are burst in twain,
 The lurking venom melts his swimming brain.

Then, lifting both his hands aloft, he cries,
 Glut thy revenge, dread empress of the skies;
 Sate with my death the rancour of thy heart,
 Look down with pleasure, and enjoy my smart.
 Or, if e'er pity mov'd a hostile breast
 (For here I stand thy enemy profess),
 Take hence this hateful life, with tortures torn,
 Inur'd to trouble, and to labours born.
 Death is the gift most welcome to my woe,
 And such a gift a stepdame may bestow.
 Was it for this Busiris was subdued, [blood?
 Whose barbarous temples reek'd with strangers'
 Press'd in these arms, his fate Antæus found,
 Nor gain'd recruited vigour from the ground.
 Did I not triple-form'd Geryon fell?
 Or did I fear the triple dog of hell?
 Did not these hands the bull's arm'd forehead hold?
 Are not our mighty toils in Elis told?
 Did not Stymphalian lakes proclaim my fame?
 And fair Parthenian woods resound my name?
 Who seiz'd the golden belt of Thermodon?
 And who the dragon-guarded apples won?
 Could the fierce Centaur's strength my force withstand;
 Or the fell boar that spoil'd th' Arcadian land?
 Did not these arms the Hydra's rage subdue,
 Who from his wounds to double fury grew?
 What if the Thracian horses, fat with gore,
 Who human bodies in their mangers tore,
 I saw, and with their barbarous lord o'erthrew?
 What if these hands Nemæa's lion slew?
 Did not this neck the heavenly globe sustain?—
 The female partner of the thunderer's reign,
 Fatigu'd, at length suspends her harsh commands;
 Yet no fatigue hath slack'd these valiant hands.
 But now new plagues pursue me; neither force,
 Nor arms, nor darts, can stop their raging course.
 Devouring flame through my rack'd entrails strays,
 And on my lungs and shrivell'd muscles preys;
 Yet still Eurystheus breathes the vital air!
 What mortal now shall seek the gods with prayer?

The Transformation of Lychas into a Rock.

THE hero said; and, with the torture stung,
 Furious o'er Oete's lofty hills he sprung:
 Stuck with the shaft, thus scours the tiger round,
 And seeks the flying author of his wound.
 Now might you see him trembling, now he vents
 His anguish'd soul in groans and loud laments;
 He strives to tear the clinging vest in vain,
 And with up-rooted forests strews the plain;
 Now, kindling into rage, his hands he rears,
 And to his kindred gods directs his prayers.
 When Lychas, lo, he spies, who trembling flew,
 And, in a hollow rock conceal'd from view,
 Had shunn'd his wrath. Now grief renew'd his pain,

His madness chaf'd, and thus he raves again:
 Lychas, to thee alone my fate I owe,
 Who bore the gift, the cause of all my woe.
 The youth all pale with shivering fear was stung,
 And vain excuses falter'd on his tongue.
 Alcides snatch'd him, as with suppliant face
 He strove to clasp his knees, and beg for grace.
 He toss'd him o'er his head with airy course,
 And hurl'd with more than with an engine's
 force;

Far o'er th' Eubœan main aloft he flies,
 And hardens by degrees amid the skies.
 So showery drops, when chilly tempests blow,
 Thicken at first, then whiten into snow;
 In balls congeal'd the rolling fleeces bound,
 In solid hail result upon the ground.

Thus, whirl'd with nervous force through distant air,

The purple tide forsook his veins with fear;
 All moisture left his limbs. Transform'd to stone,
 In ancient days the craggy flint was known:
 Still in th' Eubœan waves his front he rears,
 Still the small rock in human form appears,
 And still the name of hapless Lychas bears.

The Apotheosis of Hercules.

BUT now the hero of immortal birth
 Fells Oete's forests on the groaning earth;
 A pile he builds; to Philoctetes' care
 He leaves his deathful instruments of war;
 To him commits those arrows, which again
 Must see the bulwarks of the Trojan reign.
 The son of Pæan lights the lofty pyre,
 High round the structure climbs the greedy fire;
 Plac'd on the top, thy nervous shoulders spread
 With the Nemæan spoils thy careless head;
 Rais'd on the knotty club, with look divine;
 Here thou, dread hero of celestial line,
 Wast stretch'd at ease; as when, a cheerful guest,
 Wine crown'd thy bowls, and flowers thy temples
 dress'd.

Now on all sides the potent flames aspire,
 And crackle round those limbs that mock the fire.
 A sudden tremor seiz'd th' immortal host,
 Who thought the world's profess'd defender lost.

This when the thunderer saw, with smiles he cries,

'Tis from your fears, ye gods, my pleasures rise;
 Joy swells my breast, that my all ruling hand
 O'er such a grateful people boasts command,

That you my suffering progeny would aid;
 Though to his deeds this just respect be paid,
 Me you've oblig'd. Be all your fears forborn,
 Th' Oetean fires do thou, great hero, scorn.
 Who vanquish'd all things, shall subdue the flame.
 That part alone of gross maternal frame
 Fire shall devour; while what from me he drew
 Shall live immortal, and its force subdue;
 That, when he's dead, I'll raise to realms above;
 May all the powers the righteous act approve!
 If any god dissent, and judge too great
 The sacred honours of the heavenly seat,
 Ev'n he shall own, his deeds deserve the sky,
 Ev'n he, reluctant, shall at length comply.
 Th' assembled powers assent. No frown till now
 Had mark'd with passion vengeful Juno's brow.
 Mean while whate'er was in the power of flame
 Was all consum'd, his body's nervous frame
 No more was known;—of human form bereft,
 Th' eternal part of Jove alone was left.

As an old serpent casts his scaly vest,
 Wreathes in the sun, in youthful glory drest;
 So when Alcides mortal mould resign'd,
 His better part enlarg'd, and grew refin'd,
 August his visage shone; almighty Jove
 In his swift car his honour'd offspring drove;
 High o'er the hollow clouds the couriers fly,
 And lodge the hero in the starry sky.

The Transformation of Galanthis.

ATLAS perceiv'd the load of heaven's new guest.
 Revenge still rancour'd in Eurytheus' breast
 Against Alcides' race. Alcmena goes
 To Iole, to vent maternal woes;
 Here she pours forth her grief, recounts the spoils
 Her son had bravely reap'd in glorious toils.
 This Iole, by Hercules' commands,
 Hyllus had lov'd, and join'd in nuptial bands.
 Her swelling womb the teeming birth confess'd;—
 To whom Alcmena thus her speech address'd:
 O may the gods protect thee, in that hour,
 When 'midst thy throes thou call'st th' Ilithyan
 May no delays prolong thy racking pain, [power!
 As when I sued for Juno's aid in vain!
 When now Alcides' mighty birth drew nigh,
 And the tenth sign roll'd forward on the sky,
 My womb extends with such a mighty load,
 As Jove the parent of the burden show'd.
 I could no more th' increasing smart sustain:
 My horror kindles to recount the pain;
 Cold chills my limbs while I the tale pursue,
 And now methinks I feel my pangs anew.
 Seven days and nights amidst incessant throes,
 Fatigued with ills I lay, nor knew repose;
 When lifting high my hands, in shrieks I pray'd,
 Implor'd the gods, and call'd Lucina's aid.

She came, but prejudic'd to give my fate
 A sacrifice to vengeful Juno's hate.
 She hears the groaning anguish of my fits,
 And on the altar at my door she sits;
 O'er her left knee her crossing leg she cast,
 Then knits her fingers close, and wrings them fast:
 This stay'd the birth; in muttering verse she
 pray'd,
 The muttering verse th' unfinish'd birth delay'd.

Now with fierce struggles, raging with my pain,
 At Jove's ingratitude I rave in vain.
 How did I wish for death! such groans I sent,
 As might have made the flinty heart relent.
 Now the Gadmeian matrons round me press,
 Offer their vows, and seek to bring redress.
 Among the Theban dames Galanthis stands,
 Strong-limb'd, red-hair'd, and just to my commands:

She first perceiv'd that all these racking woes
 From the persisting hate of Juno rose.
 As here and there she pass'd, by chance she sees
 The seated goddess; on her close-press'd knees
 Her fast-knit hands she leans: with cheerful voice
 Galanthis cries, Whoe'er thou art, rejoice;
 Congratulate the dame, she lies at rest,
 At length the gods Alcmena's womb have blest.
 Swift from her seat the startled goddess springs,
 No more conceal'd, her hands abroad she flings;
 The charm unloos'd, the birth my pangs reliev'd;
 Galanthis' laughter vex'd the power deceiv'd.
 Fame says, the goddess dragg'd the laughing maid
 Fast by the hair; in vain her force essay'd
 Her groveling body from the ground to rear;
 Chang'd to fore feet her shrinking arms appear;
 Her hairy back her former hue retains,
 The form alone is lost; her strength remains;
 Who, since the lie did from her mouth proceed,
 Shall from her pregnant mouth bring forth her breed;
 Nor shall she quit her long-frequented home,
 But haunt those houses where she lov'd to roam.

The Story of Iolaüs Restored to Youth.

ARGUMENT.

Iolë having related the fable of her sister Dryope, who was changed into a tree for violating the blossoms of the plant Lotis (once a nymph);
 while she is discoursing on these matters with Alcmena, she finds new matter of wonder, in the sudden change of Iolaüs to a youth.

WHILE Iolë the fatal change declares,
 Alcmena's pitying hand oft wip'd her tears. [flies,
 Grief too stream'd down her cheeks; soon sorrow
 And rising joy the trickling moisture dries:
 Lo Iolaüs stands before their eyes.
 A youth he stood; and the soft down began
 O'er his smooth chin to spread, and promise man.
 Hebe submitted to her husband's prayers,
 Instill'd new vigour, and restor'd his years.

The Prophecy of Themis.

Now from her lips a solemn oath had pass'd,
 That Iolaüs the gift alone should taste,
 Had not just Themis thus maturely said
 (Which check'd her vow, and aw'd the blooming maid):
 Thebes is embroil'd in war. Capaneus stands
 Invincible; but by the thunderer's hands
 Ambition shall the guilty * brothers fire,
 Both rush to mutual wounds, and both expire.

* Eteocles and Polynices.

The reeling earth shall ope her gloomy womb,
Where the * yet breathing bard shall find his tomb.—

The † son shall bathe his hands in parent's blood,
And in one act be both unjust and good.
Of home and sense depriv'd, where'er he flies,
The furies and his mother's ghost he spies.
His wife the fatal bracelet shall implore,
And Phegeus stain his sword in kindred gore.
Callirhoe shall then with suppliant prayer
Prevail on Jupiter's relenting ear.
Jove shall with youth her infant sons inspire,
And bid their bosoms glow with manly fire.

The Debate of the Gods.

WHEN Themis thus with prescient voice had spoke
Among the gods a various murmur broke;
Dissension rose in each immortal breast,
That one should grant what was deny'd the rest.

Aurora for her aged spouse complains,
And Ceres grieves for Jason's freezing veins;
Vulcan would Erichthonius' years renew;
Her future race the care of Venus drew,
She would Anchises' blooming age restore;
A different care employ'd each heavenly power.
Thus various interests did their jars increase,
Till Jove arose;—he spoke, their tumults cease.

—Is any reverence to our presence given?
Then why this discord 'mong the powers of heaven?

Who can the settled will of Fate subdue?
'Twas by the fates that Iolaüs knew
A second youth. The fates' determin'd doom
Shall give Callirhoe's race a youthful bloom.
Arms nor ambition can this power obtain:
Quell your desires; even me the fates restrain.
Could I their will controul, no rolling years
Had Æacus bent down with silver hairs;
Then Rhadamanthus still had youth possess'd,
And Minos with eternal bloom been bless'd.

Jove's words the synod mov'd; the power give o'er,

And urge in vain unjust complaint no more.
Since Rhadamanthus' veins now slowly flow'd,
And Æacus and Minos bore the load;
Minos, who, in the flower of youth and fame,
Made mighty nations tremble at his name,
Infirm with age, the proud Miletus fears,
Vain of his birth, and in the strength of years;
And now, regarding all his realms as lost,
He durst not force him from his native coast.
But you by choice, Miletus, fled his reign,
And your swift vessel plow'd th' Ægean main;
On Asiatic shores a town you frame,
Which still is honour'd with the founder's name.
Here you Cyanée knew, the beauteous maid,
As on her father's winding banks she stray'd:
Cæunus and Byblis hence their lineage trace,
The double offspring of your warm embrace.

The Story of Arachne,

FROM THE BEGINNING OF THE SIXTH BOOK OF OVID'S METAMORPHOSES.

ARGUMENT.

Pallas, visiting the muses on their hill to see the fountain Hippocrene, is by them informed how the Pierides were changed into chattering pies for rivaling the nine sisters in song.—This stimulating the goddess to take vengeance on Arachne, the daughter of Idmon, who defied her in her own art, gives rise to the following story.

PALLAS, attentive, heard the muses' song,
Pleas'd that so well they had reveng'd their wrong:
Reflecting thus—A vulgar soul can praise,
My fame let glorious emulation raise:
Swift vengeance shall pursue th' audacious pride
That dares my sacred deity deride:
Revenge the goddess in her breast revolves;
And, straight the bold Arachne's fate resolves;
Her haughty mind to Heaven disdain'd to bend,
And durst with Pallas in her art contend.
No famous town she boasts, or noble name;
But to her skilful hand owes all her fame;
Idmon her father on his trade rely'd,
And thirsty wool in purple juices dy'd;
Her mother, whom the shades of death confine,
Was, like her husband, born of vulgar line.
At small Hypæpe though she did reside,
Yet industry proclaim'd what birth deny'd:
All Lydia to her name due honour pays,
And every city speaks Arachne's praise.
Nymphs of Timolus quit their shady woods,
Nymphs of Pactolus leave their golden floods,
And oft with pleasure round her gazing stand,
Admire her work, and praise her artful hand:
They view'd each motion, with new wonder seiz'd;
More than the work her graceful manner pleas'd.

Whether raw wool in its first orbs she wound,
Or with swift fingers twirl'd the spindle round;
Whether she pick'd with care the knotty piece,
Or comb'd like streaky clouds the stretching fleece;
Whether her needle play'd the pencil's part;
'Twas plain from Pallas she deriv'd her art.
But she, unable to sustain her pride,
The very mistress of her art defy'd.—

Pallas obscures her bright celestial grace,
And takes an old decrepit beldame's face.
Her head is scatter'd o'er with silver hairs,
Which seems to bend beneath a load of years.
Her trembling hand, emboss'd with livid veins,
On trusty staff her feeble limbs sustains.

She thus accosts the nymph: "Be timely wise,
"Do not the wholesome words of age despise,
"For in the hoary head experience lies:
"On earth contend the greatest name to gain;
"To Pallas yield;—with Heaven you strive in
"vain."

Contempt contracts her brow, her passions rise,
Wrath and disdain enflame her rolling eyes:
At once the tangling thread away she throws,
And scarce can curb her threatening hands from blows.

"Worn out with age, and by disease declin'd,
 "(She cries) thy carcase has surviv'd thy mind;
 "These lectures might thy servile daughters move,
 "And wary doctrines for thy nieces prove:
 "My counsel's from myself, my will commands,
 "And my first resolution always stands:
 "Let her contend; or does her fear impart
 "That conquest waits on my superior art?"

The goddess straight throws off her old disguise,
 And heavenly beauty sparkles in her eyes,
 A youthful bloom fills up each wrinkled trace,
 And Pallas smiles with every wonted grace.
 The nymphs surpris'd, the Deity adore,
 And Lydian dames confess her matchless power;
 The rival maid alone unmov'd remains,
 Yet a swift blush her guilty feature stains;
 In her unwilling cheek the crimson glows,
 And her check'd pride a short confusion knows.
 So when Aurora first unveils her eyes,
 A purple dawn invests the blushing skies;
 But soon bright Phœbus gains th' horizon's height,
 And gilds the hemisphere with spreading light.

Desire of conquest sways the giddy maid,
 To certain ruin by vain hopes betray'd:
 The goddess with her stubborn will comply'd,
 And deign'd by trial to convince her pride.
 Both take their stations, and the piece prepare,
 And order every slender thread with care.
 The web enwraps the beam; the reed divides,
 While through the widening space the shuttle

glides,
 Which their swift hands receive; then, pois'd with lead, [thread.

The swinging weight strikes close th' inserted
 They gird their flowing garments round the waist,
 And ply their feet and arms with dext'rous haste.
 Here each inweaves the richest Tyrian dye,
 There fainter shades in soften'd order lie;
 Such various mixtures in the texture shine,
 Set off the work, and brighten each design.
 As when the sun his piercing rays extends, [cends,
 When from thin clouds some drizzling shower descends,
 We see the spacious humid arch appear,
 Whose transient colours paint the splendid air:
 By such degrees the deepening shadows rise
 As pleasingly deceive our dazzled eyes;
 And though the same th' adjoining colour seems,
 Yet hues of different natures dye th' extremes.
 Here heightening gold they 'midst the woof dis-
 pose,

And in the web this antique story rose.

Pallas the lofty mount of Mars designs,
 Celestial judgment guides th' unerring lines;
 Here, in just view, th' Athenian structures stand,
 And there the gods contend to name the land;
 Twelves deities she frames with stately mien,
 And in the midst superior Jove is seen;
 A glowing warmth the blended colours give,
 The figures in the picture seem to live.
 Heaven's thundering monarch sits with awful grace,
 And dread omnipotence imprints his face;
 There Neptune stood, disdainfully he frown'd,
 And with his trident smote the trembling ground;
 The parting rocks a spacious chasm disclose,
 From whence a fiery, prancing steed arose;

And on that useful gift he founds his claim,
 To grace the city with his honour'd name.
 See her own figure next with martial air,
 A shining helmet decks her flowing hair;
 Her thoughtful breast her well-pois'd shield defends,
 And her bare arm a glittering spear extends,
 With which she wounds the plain; from thence arose

A spreading tree; green olives load the boughs.
 The powers her gift behold with wandering eyes,
 And to the goddess give the rightful prize.

Such mercy checks her wrath, that, to dissuade
 By others fate the too presumptuous maid,
 With miniatures she fills each corner space,
 To curb her pride, and save her from disgrace.

Hæmus and Rhodope in this she wrought,
 The beauteous colours spoke her lively thought!
 With arrogance and fierce ambition fir'd,
 They to the sacred names of gods aspir'd;
 To mountains chang'd, their lofty heads arise,
 And lose their lessening summits in the skies.

In that, in all the strength of art was seen
 The wretched fate of the Pygmean queen;
 Juno, enrag'd, resents th' audacious aim,
 And to a crane transforms the vanquish'd dame;
 In that voracious shape she still appears,
 And plagues her people with perpetual wars.

In this, Antigone for beauty strove
 With the bright consort of imperial Jove;
 Juno, incens'd, her royal power display'd,
 And to a bird converts the haughty maid.
 Laomedon his daughter's fate bewails,
 Nor his, nor Ilion's fervent prayer prevails,
 But on her lovely skin white feathers rise;
 Chang'd to a clamorous stork, she mounts the skies.

In the remaining orb, the heavenly maid
 The tale of childless Cynaras display'd;
 A settled anguish in his look appears,
 And from his bloodshot eyes flow streams of tears;

On the cold ground, no more a father, thrown,
 He for his daughters clasp'd the polish'd stone.
 And, when he sought to hold their wonted charms,
 The temple's steps deceiv'd his eager arms.
 Wreathes of green olive round the border twine,
 And her own tree encloses the design.

Arachne paints th' amours of mighty Jove,
 How in a bull the god disguis'd his love;
 A real bull seems in the piece to roar,
 And real billows breaking on the shore:
 In fair Europa's face appears surprise,
 To the retreating land she turns her eyes,
 And seems to call her maids, who wondering stood,
 And with her tears increas'd the briny flood.
 Her trembling feet she by contraction saves
 From the rude insult of the rising waves.

Here amorous Jove dissolving Læda trod,
 And in the vigorous swan conceal'd the god.
 Love lends him now an eagle's new disguise,
 Beneath his fluttering wings Asteria lies,
 Th' enlivening colours here with force express'd
 How Jove the fair Antiope caress'd.
 In a strong satyr's muscled form he came,
 Instilling love transports the glowing dame,
 And lusty twins reward his nervous flame.

Here how he sooth'd the bright Alcmena's love,
 Who for Amphitryon took th' impostor Jove;
 And how the god in golden shower allur'd
 The guarded nymph, in brazen walls immur'd:
 How, in a swain, Mnemosyne he charms;
 How lambent flame the fair Ægina warms:
 And how with various glittering hues inlaid
 In serpent's form Deois he betray'd.
 Here you, great Neptune, with a short-liv'd flame
 In a young bull enjoy th' Æolian dame.
 Then in Enipeus' shape intrigues pursue:
 'Tis thus th' Aloids boast descent from you.
 Here to Bifaltis was thy love convey'd,
 When a rough ram deceiv'd the yielding maid.

Ceres, kind mother of the bounteous year,
 Whose golden locks a sheafy garland bear;
 And the dread dame, with hissing serpents hung,
 (From whom the Pegasus courier sprung)
 Thee in a snuffling stallion's form enjoy,
 Exhaust thy strength, and every nerve employ;
 Melanthio as a dolphin you betray,
 And sport in pleasures on the rolling sea:
 Such just proportion graces every part,
 Nature herself appears improv'd by art.
 Here in disguise was mighty Phœbus seen,
 With clownish aspect, and a rustic mien;
 Again transform'd, he's dress'd in falcon's plumes,
 And now the lion's noble shape assumes;
 Now, in a shepherd's form, with treacherous smiles
 He Macareian Isle's heart beguiles.
 Here his plump shape enamour'd Bacchus leaves,
 And in the grape Erigone deceives.
 There Saturn, in a neighing horse, she wove,
 And Chiron's double form rewards his love.

Festoons of flowers, inwove with ivy, shine,
 Border the wondrous piece, and round the texture twine.

Not Pallas, nor ev'n spleen itself, could blame
 The wondrous work of the Mæonian dame;
 With grief her vast success the goddess bore,
 And of celestial crimes the story tore.
 Her boxen shuttle now, enrag'd, she took,
 And thrice the proud Idmonian artist struck:
 Th' unhappy maid, to see her labours vain,
 Grew resolute with pride, and shame, and pain:
 Around her neck a fatal noose she ty'd,
 And sought by sudden death her guilt to hide.
 Pallas with pity saw the desperate deed,
 And thus the virgin's milder fate decreed:
 "Live, impious rival, mindful of thy crime,
 "Suspended thus to waste thy future time;
 "Thy punishment involves thy numerous race,
 "Who for thy fault shall share in thy disgrace."
 Her incantation magic juices aid,
 With sprinkling drops she bath'd the pendent
 maid,

And thus the charm its noxious power display'd.
 Like leaves in autumn drop her falling hairs,
 With these her nose, and next her rising ears.
 Her head to the minutest substance shrunk,
 The potent juice contracts her changing trunk;
 Close to her sides her slender fingers clung,
 There chang'd to nimble feet in order hung;
 Her bloated belly swells to larger size,
 Which now with smallest threads her work supplies;
 The virgin in the spider still remains;
 And in that shape her former art retains.

AN ANSWER

TO THE SOMPNER'S PROLOGUE OF CHAUCER.

In Imitation of Chaucer's Style.

THE Sompner lewdly hath his prologue told,
 And saine on the Freers his tale japing and bold;
 How that in Hell they searchen near and wide,
 And ne ðne Freer in all thiske place espyde:
 But lo! the devil turn'd his eric about,
 And twenty thousand Freers wend in and out.
 By which in Geoffry's rhyming it appears,
 The devil's belly is the hive of Freers.
 Now listneth lordings! forthwith ye shall hear,
 What happen'd at a house in Lancashire.
 A misere that had londs and tenement,
 Who raketh from his villaines taxes and rent,
 Owned a house which emptye long ystood,
 Full deeply fited in a derkning wood;
 Murmring a shallow brook runneth along,
 Miong the round stones it maken doleful song.

Now there spreaden a rumour that everich night
 The rooms yhaunted been by many a sprite;

VOL. VIII.

The miller avoucheth, and all thereabout,
 That they full oft hearen the hellish rout;
 Some saine they hear the jingling of chains,
 And some hath yheard the psautries straines;
 At midnight some the heedless horse ymeet,
 And some espie a corse in a white sheet,
 And oother things, faye, elfin, and else,
 And shapes that fear createn to itselfe.

Now it so hapt, there was not ferre away,
 Of grey Freers a fair and rich Abbaye,
 Were liven a Freer ycleped Pere Thomas,
 Who daren alone in derke through church-ycrd pass.

This Freer would lye in thiske house all night,
 In hope he might espyen a dreadful sprite.
 He taketh candle, beades, and holy water,
 And legends eke of saintes, and bookes of prayere.
 He entereth the room, and looketh round about,
 And haspen the-door, to haspen the goblin out.
 The candle hath he put close by the bed,
 And in low tone his ave maryl said.
 With water now besprinkled hath the floore,
 And maken cross on key-hole of the doore.

Y

Ne was there not a mouse-hole in thilke place,
But he ycrossed hath by God his grace :
He crossed hath this, and eke he crossed that,
With benedicite and God knows what.

Now he goeth to bed and lieth adown,
When the clock had just stricken the twelfth soun.
Bethinketh him now what the cause had ybeen,
Why many sprites by mortals have been seen.
Hem remembreth how Dan Plutarch hath yfed
That Cæsar's sprite came to Brute his bed;
Of chains that frighten erst Artemidore,
The tales of Pline, Valere, and many more.

Hem thinketh that some murdere here been done,
And he mought see some bloodye ghost anone,
Or that some orphlines writings here be stor'd,
Or pot of gold laine deep beneath a board :
Or thinketh hem, if he might see no sprite,
The Abbayemought buy this house cheap outright.

As hem thus thinketh, anone asleep he lies,
Up starten Sathanas with faucer eyes.
He turned the Freer upon his face downright,
Displaying his nether cheeks full broad and white.
Then quoth Dan Sathanas as he thwacked him fore,
Thou didst forget to guard thy postern-dore.
There is an hole which hath not crossed been :
Farewell, from whence I came, I creepen in.

Now plain it is ytellen in my verse,
If devils in hell bear Freers in their erse,
On earth the devil in Freers doth ydwell ;
Were there no Freers, the devil mought keep in hell.

WORK FOR A COOPER.

A MAN may lead a happy life,
Without that needful thing a wife :
This long have lusty abbots known,
Who ne'er knew spouses—of their own.

What though your house be clean and neat,
With couches, chairs, and beds complete ;
Though you each day invite a friend,
Though he should every dish commend ;
On Bagshot-heath your mutton fed,
Your fowls at Brentford born and bred ;
Though purest wine your cellars boast,
Wine worthy of the fairest toast ;
Yet there are other things requir'd :
Ring, and let's see the maid you hir'd.—
Bless me ! those hands might hold a broom.
Twirl round a mop, and wash a room :
A bachelor his maid should keep,
Not for that servile use to sweep ;
Let her his humour understand,
And turn to every thing her hand.
Get you a las that's young and tight,
Whose arms are, like her apron, white.
What though her shift be seldom seen,
Let that, though coarse, be always clean ;
She might each morn your tea attend,
And on your wrist your ruffle mend ;
Then, if you break a roguish jest,
Or squeeze her hand, or pat her breast,
She cries, Oh, dear Sir, don't be naught !
And blushes speak her last night's fault.
To her your household cares confide,
Let your keys jingle at her side.

A footman's blunders teaze and fret ye ;
Ev'n while you chide, you smile on Betty.
Discharge him then, if he's too spruce ;
For Betty's for his master's use.

Will you your amorous fancy baulk,
For fear some prudish neighbour talk ?
But you'll object, that you're afraid
Of the pert freedoms of a maid.
Besides, your wiser heads will say,
That she who turns her hand this way,
From one vice to another drawn,
Will lodge your silver spoons in pawn.
Has not the homely wrinkled jade
More need to learn the pilfering trade ?
For love all Betty's wants supplies,
Laces her shoes, her mantua dyes,
All her stuff-suits she flings away,
And wears thread-sattin every day.

Who then a dirty drab would hire,
Brown as the hearth of kitchen fire ;
When all must own, were Betty put
To the black duties of the slut,
As well she scours or scrubs a floor,
And still is good for something more ?

Thus, to avoid the greater vice,
I knew a priest, of conscience nice,
To quell his lust for neighbour's spouse,
Keep fornication in his house.

But you're impatient all this time,
Fret at my counsel, curse my rhyme.
Be satisfy'd : I'll talk no more,
For thus my tale begins—Of yore
There dwelt at Blois a priest full fair,
With rolling eye and crisped hair ;
His chin hung low, his brow was sleek,
Plenty lay basking on his cheek ;
Whole days at cloyster-grates he fate,
Ogled, and talk'd of this and that
So feelingly, the nuns lamented
That double bars were e'er invented.
If he the wanton wife confest,
With downcast eye, and heaving breast ;
He stroak'd her cheek to still her fear,
And talk'd of sins en cavalier ;
Each time enjoin'd her penance mild,
And fondled on her like his child.
At every jovial gossip's feast
Pere Bernard was a welcome guest ;
Mirth suffer'd not the least restraint,
He could at will shake off the saint ;
Nor frown'd he when they freely spoke,
But shook his sides, and took the joke ;
Nor fail'd he to promote the jest,
And shar'd the sins which they confest.

Yet, that he might not always roam,
He kept conveniencies at home.
His maid was in the bloom of beauty,
Well-limb'd for every social duty ;
He meddled with no household cares,
To her consign'd his whole affairs :
She of his study kept the keys,
For he was studious—of his ease :
She had the power of all his locks,
Could rummage every chest and box ;
Her honesty such credit gain'd,
Not ev'n the cellar was restrain'd.

In troth it was a goodly show;
 Lin'd with full hogsheds all a-row:
 One vessel, from the rank remov'd,
 Far dearer than the rest he lov'd;
Pour la bonne bouche 'twas set aside,
 To all but choicest friends deny'd.
 He now and then would send a quart,
 To warm some wife's retentive heart,
 Against confession's sullen hour:
 Wine has all secrets in its power.
 At common feasts it had been waste,
 Nor was it fit for layman's taste.
 If monk or friar were his guest,
 They drank it; for they know the best:
 Nay, he at length so fond was grown,
 He always drank it when—alone.

Who shall recount his civil labours,
 In pious visits to his neighbours?
 Whene'er weak husbands went astray,
 He guess'd their wives were in the way:
 'Twas then his charity was shown,
 He chose to see them when alone.

Now was he bent on cuckoldom:
 He knew friend Dennis was from home:
 His wife (a poor neglected beauty,
 Defrauded of a husband's duty)
 Had often told him at confession,
 How hard she struggled 'gainst transgression,
 He now resolves, in heat of blood,
 To try how firm her virtue stood.
 He knew that wine (to love best aid)
 Has oft made bold the shame-fac'd maid,
 Taught her to romp, and take more freedoms,
 Than nymphs train'd up at Smith's or Needham's.

A mighty bottle strait he chose,
 Such as might give two friars their dose.
 Nannette he call'd: the cellar door
 She straight unlocks, descends before;
 He follow'd close. But when he spies
 His favourite cask; with lifted eyes
 And lifted hands aloud he cries,
 Heigh-day! my darling wine astoop!
 It must alas! have sprung a hoop.
 That there's a leak is past all doubt,
 (Reply'd the maid)—I'll find it out.
 She sets the candle down in haste,
 Tucks her white apron round her waist.
 The hogsheds mouldy side ascends;
 She straddles wide, and downward bends:
 So low she stoops to seek the flaw,
 Her coats rose up, her master saw—
 I see—he cries—(then clasp'd her fast)
 The leak through which my wine has pass'd.

Then all in haste the maid descended,
 And in a trice the leak was mended.
 He found in Nannette all he wanted,
 So Dennis' brows remain'd unplanted.

Ere since this time, all lusty friars
 (Warm'd with predominant desires,
 Whene'er the flesh with spirit quarrels)
 Look on the sex as leaky barrels.
 Beware of these, ye jealous spouses!
 From such like coopers guard your houses;
 For, if they find not work at home,
 For jobs through all the town they roam.

THE EQUIVOCATION.

AN abbot rich (whose taste was good Alike in science and in food)
 His bishop had resolv'd to treat;
 The bishop came, the bishop eat.
 'Twas silence, till their stomachs fail'd;
 And now at heretics they rail'd.
 What heresy (the prelate said)
 Is in that church where priests may wed!
 Do not we take the church for life?
 But those divorce her for a wife;
 Like laymen, keep her in their houses,
 And own the children of their spouses.
 Vile practises! the abbot cry'd,
 For pious use we're set aside!
 Shall we take wives? Marriage at best
 Is but carnality profess!

Now, as the bishop took his glass,
 He spy'd our abbot's buxom lass,
 Who cross'd the room; he mark'd her eye
 That glow'd with love; his pulse beat high.
 Fye, father, fye, (the prelate cries)
 A maid so young! for shame, be wise.
 These indiscretions lend a handle
 To lewd lay-tongues, to give us scandal.
 For your vow's sake, this rule I give t' ye;
 Let all your maids be turn'd of fifty.

The priest reply'd, I have not swerv'd,
 But your chaste precept well observ'd:
 That lass full twenty-five has told;
 I've yet another who's as old;
 Into one sum their ages cast;
 So both my maids have fifty past.

The prelate smil'd, but durst not blame;
 For why? his lordship did the same.

Let those who reprimand their brothers,
 First mend the faults they find in others.

A TRUE STORY OF AN APPARITION.

SCPTICS (whose strength of argument makes out,
 That wisdom's deep inquiries end in doubt)
 Hold this assertion positive and clear,
 That sprites are poor delusions, rais'd by fear.
 Not that fam'd ghost, which in presaging sound
 Call'd Brutus to Philippi's fatal ground,
 Nor can Tiberius Gracchus' goary shade,
 These ever-doubting disputants persuade.
 Straight they with smiles reply, those tales of old
 By visionary priests were made and told.
 Oh, might some ghost at dead of night appear,
 And make you own conviction by your fear!
 I know your sneers my easy faith accuse,
 Which with such idle legends scares the muse:
 But think not that I tell those vulgar sprites,
 Which frighted boys relate on winter nights,
 How cleanly milk-maids meet the fairy train,
 How heedless horses drag the clinking chain,
 Night-roaming ghosts, by faucer eye-balls known;
 The common spectres of each country-town.
 No, I such fables can like you despise,
 And laugh to hear these nurse-invented lies.
 Yet has not oft the fraudulent guardian's fright
 Compell'd him to restore an orphan's right?

And can we doubt that horrid ghosts ascend,
Which on the conscious murderer's steps attend?
Hear then, and let attested truth prevail;
From faithful lips I learnt the dreadful tale.

Where Arden's forest spreads its limits wide,
Whose branching paths the doubtful road divide,
A traveller took his solitary way,
When low beneath the hills was sunk the day.
And now the skies with gathering darkness lour,
The branches rustle with the threaten'd shower;
With sudden blasts the forest murmurs loud,
Indented lightnings cleave the sable cloud,
Thunder on thunder breaks, the tempest roars,
And heaven discharges all its watery stores.
The wandering traveller shelter seeks in vain,
And shrinks and shivers with the beating rain:
On his steed's neck the slacken'd bridle lay,
Who chose with cautious step th' uncertain way;
And now he checks the rein, and halts to hear
If any noise foretold a village near.
At length from far a stream of light he sees
Extend its level ray between the trees;
Thither he speeds, and, as he nearer came,
Joyful he knew the lamp's domestic flame
That trembled through the window; cross the way
Darts forth the barking cur, and stands at bay.

It was an ancient lonely house, that stood
Upon the borders of the spacious wood;
Here towers and antique battlements arise,
And there in heaps the moulder'd ruin lies.
Some lord this mansion held in days of yore,
To chase the wolf, and pierce the foaming boar:
How chang'd, alas, from what it once had been!
'Tis now degraded to a public inn.

Straight he dismounts, repeats his loud commands:

Swift at the gate the ready landlord stands;
With frequent cringe he bows, and begs excuse,
His house was full, and every bed in use.
What, not a garret, and no straw to spare?
Why then the kitchen-fire and elbow-chair
Shall serve for once to nod away the night.
The kitchen ever is the servant's right,
Replies the host; there, all the fire around,
The count's tir'd footmen snore upon the ground.

The maid, who listen'd to this whole debate,
With pity learn'd the weary stranger's fate.
Be brave, she cries, you still may be our guest;
Our haunted room was ever held the best;
If then your valour can the fright sustain
Of rattling curtains and the clinking chain;
If your courageous tongue have power to talk,
When round your bed the horrid ghost shall walk;
If you dare ask it, why it leaves its tomb;
I'll see your sheets well air'd, and show the room.
Soon as the frightened maid her tale had told,
The stranger enter'd, for his heart was bold.

The damsel led him through a spacious hall,
Where ivy hung the half-demolish'd wall:
She frequent look'd behind, and chang'd her hue,
While fancy tipt the candle's flame with blue.
And now they gain'd the winding stairs ascent,
And to the lonesome room of terrors went.
When all was ready, swift retir'd the maid, [laid
The watch-lights burn, tuck'd warm in bed was

The hardy stranger, and attends the sprite
Till his accustom'd walk at dead of night.

At first he hears the wind with hollow roar
Shake the loose lock, and swing the creaking door;
Nearer and nearer draws the dreadful sound
Of rattling chains, that dragg'd upon the ground:
When lo! the spectre came with horrid stride,
Approach'd the bed, and drew the curtains wide!
In human form the ghastful phantom stood,
Expos'd his mangled bosom dy'd with blood.
Then, silent pointing to his wounded breast,
Thrice wav'd his hand: Beneath the frightened guest
The bed-cords trembled, and with shuddering fear,
Sweat chill'd his limbs, high rose his bristled hair;
Then muttering hasty prayers, he mann'd his heart,
And cry'd aloud—say, whence and who thou art?
The stalking ghost with hollow voice replies,
Three years are counted since with mortal eyes
I saw the sun, and vital air respir'd.

Like thee benighted, and with travel tir'd,
Within these walls I slept. O thirst of gain!
See, still the planks the bloody mark retain.
Stretch'd on this very bed, from sleep I start,
And see the steel impending o'er my heart;
The barbarous hostess held the lifted knife,
The floor ran purple with my gushing life.
My treasure now they seize, the golden spoil
They bury deep beneath the grass-grown soil,
Far in the common field. Be bold, arise,
My steps shall lead thee to the secret prize;
There dig and find; let that thy care reward:
Call loud on justice, bid her not retard
To punish murder; lay my ghost at rest:
So shall with peace secure thy nights be blest;
And when beneath these boards my bones are found,
Decent inter them in some sacred ground. [bed.

Here ceas'd the ghost. The stranger springs from
And boldly follows where the phantom led:
The half-worn stony stairs they now descend,
Where passages obscure their arches bend.
Silent they walk; and now through groves they pass, [grass.

Now through wet meads their steps imprint the
At length amidst a spacious field they came:
There stops the spectre, and ascends in flame.
Amaz'd he stood, no bush or brier was found,
To teach his morning search to find the ground.
What could he do? the night was hideous dark,
Fear shook his joints, and nature dropt the mark:
With that he starting wak'd, and rais'd his head,
But found the golden mark was left in bed.

What is the statesman's vast ambitious scheme,
But a short vision and a golden dream?
Power, wealth, and title, elevate his hope;
He wakes: but, for a garter, finds a rope.

THE MAD-DOG.

A PRUDE, at morn and evening prayer,
Had worn her velvet-cushion bare;
Upward she taught her eyes to roll,
As if she watch'd her soaring soul;
And, when devotion warm'd the crowd,
None sung, or smote their breast so loud:
Pale penitence had mark'd her face
With all the meagre signs of grace.

Her mass book was completely lin'd
With painted saints of various kind :
But when in every page she view'd
Fine ladies who the flesh subdu'd,
As quick her beads she counted o'er,
She cry'd—such wonders are no more !
She chose not to delay confession,
To bear at once a year's transgression ;
But every week set all things even,
And balanc'd her accounts with heaven.

Behold her now in humble guise,
Upon her knees with down-cast eyes
Before the priest : she thus begins,
“ And, sobbing, blubbers forth her sins :
“ Who could that tempting man resist ;
“ My virtue languish'd as he kiss'd ;
“ I strove—till I could strive no longer :
“ How can the weak subdue the stronger ?”

The father ask'd her where and when ?
How many ? and what sort of men ?
By what degrees her blood was heated ?
How oft the frailty was repeated ?
Thus have I seen a pregnant wench
All flush'd with guilt before the bench :
The judges (wak'd by wanton thought)
Dive to the bottom of her fault ;
They leer, they smiler at her shame,
And make her call all things by name.

And now to sentence he proceeds,
Prescribes how oft to tell her beads ;
Shows her what saints could do her good,
Doubles her fasts, to cool her blood.
Eas'd of her sins, and light as air,
Away she trips, perhaps to prayer.
'Twas no such thing. Why then this haste ?
The clock has struck, the hour is past ;
And, on the spur of inclination,
She scorn'd to birk her assignation.

Whate'er she did, next week she came,
And piously confess the same.
The priest, who female frailties pity'd,
First chid her, then her sins remitted.

But did she now her crime bemoan
In penitential sheets alone ?
And was no bold, no beastly fellow
The nightly partner of her pillow ?
No, none : for next time in the grove
A bank was conscious of her love.

Confession-day was come about,
And now again it all must out.
She seems to wipe her twinkling eyes :
“ What now, my child ?” the father cries.
“ Again !” says she.—With threatening looks,
He thus the prostrate dame rebukes :

“ Madam, I grant there's something in it,
“ That virtue has th' unguarded minute ;
“ But pray now tell me what are whores,
“ But women of unguarded hours ?
“ Then you must sure have lost all shame.
“ What ! every day, and still the same,
“ And no fault else ! 'tis strange to find
“ A woman to one sin confin'd !
“ Pride is this day her darling passion,
“ The next day slander is in fashion ;
“ Gaming succeeds ; if fortune crosses,
“ Then virtue's mortgaged for her losses ;

“ By use her favourite vice she lothes,
“ And loves new follies like new clothes ;
“ But you, beyond all thought unchaste,
“ Have all sin center'd near your waist !
“ Whence is this appetite so strong ?
“ Say, madam, did your mother long ?
“ Or is it luxury and high diet
“ That won't let virtue sleep in quiet ?”
She tells him now, with meekest voice,
That she had never err'd by choice ;
Nor was there known a virgin chaster,
Till ruin'd by a sad disaster.

That she a favourite lap-dog had,
Which (as she stroak'd and kiss'd) grew mad ;
And on her lip a wound indenting,
First set her youthful blood fermenting.

The priest reply'd, with zealous fury,
“ You should have sought the means to cure ye.
“ Doctors by various ways, we find,
“ Treat these distempers of the mind.

“ Let gaudy ribbands be deny'd
“ To her who raves with scornful pride ;
“ And, if religion crack her notions,
“ Lock up her volumes of devotions ;
“ But, if for man her rage prevail,
“ Bar her the sight of creatures male.
“ Or else, to cure such venom'd bites,
“ And set the shatter'd thoughts arights ;
“ They send you to the ocean's shore,
“ And plunge the patient o'er and o'er.”

The dame reply'd, “ Alas ! in vain
“ My kindred forc'd me to the main ;
“ Naked, and in the face of day :
“ Look not, ye fishermen, this way !
“ What virgin had not done as I did ?
“ My modest hand, by nature guided,
“ Debarr'd at once from human eyes
“ The seat where female honour lies ;
“ And though thrice dipt from top to toe,
“ I still secur'd the post below,
“ And guarded it with grasp so fast
“ Not one drop through my fingers past.
“ Thus owe I to my bashful care,
“ That all the rage is settled there.”

Weigh well the projects of mankind ;
Then tell me, reader, canst thou find
The man from madness wholly free ?
They all are mad—save you and me,
Do not the statesman, fop, and wit,
By daily follies prove they're bit ?
And, when the briny cure they try'd,
Some part still kept above the tide ?

Some men (when drench'd beneath the wave)
High o'er their heads their fingers save ;
Those hands by mean extortion thrive,
Or in the pocket lightly dive :
Or, more expert in pilfering vice,
They burn and itch to cog the dice.

Plunge in a courtier ; straight his fears
Direct his hands to stop his ears.
And now truth seems a grating noise,
He loves the slanderer's whispering voice ;
He hangs on flattery with delight,
And thinks all fulsome praise is right.
All women dread a watery death :
They shut their lips, to hold their breath ;

And, though you duck them ne'er so long,
Not one salt drop e'er wets their tongue :
'Tis hence they scandal have at will,
And that this member ne'er lies still.

THE QUIDNUNKI'S :

Occasioned by the Death of the Duke Regent of France.

How vain are mortal man's endeavours?
(Said, at Dame Elliot's *, Master Travers)
Good Orleans dead ! in truth 'tis hard :
Oh, may all statesmen die prepar'd !
I do foresee (and for foreseeing
He equals any man in being)
The army ne'er can be disbanded.
—I wish the king were safely landed.
Ah, friends ! great changes threat the land ;
All France and England at a stand !
There's Merowis—mark ! strange work !
And there's the Czar, and there's the Turk ;
The Pope—an Indian merchant by,
Cut short the speech with this reply :
“ All at a stand ? You see great changes ?
“ Ah, Sir ! you never saw the Ganges.
“ There dwell the nations of Quidnunki's
“ (So Monomotapa calls monkies) :
“ On their bank, from bough to bough,
“ They meet and chat (as we may now).

* A coffee-house near St. James's,

“ Whispers go round, they grin, they shrug,
“ They bow, they snarl, they scratch, they hug ;
“ And, just as chance or whim provoke them,
“ They either bite their friends, or stroke them.
“ There have I seen some active prig,
“ To show his parts, bestride a twig :
“ Lord ! how the chattering tribe admire,
“ Not that he's wiser, but he's higher :
“ All long to try the venturous thing
“ (For power is but to have one's swing) ;
“ From side to side he springs, he spurns,
“ And bangs his foes and friends by turns.
“ Thus, as in giddy freaks he bounces,
“ Crack goes the twig, and in he flounces !
“ Down the swift stream the wretch is borne ;
“ Never, ah never, to return !
“ Zounds ! what a fall had our dear brother ;
“ Morbleu ! cries one ; and Damme ! t' other,
“ The nations give a general screech ;
“ None cocks his tail, none claws his breech ;
“ Each trembles for the public weal,
“ And for a while forgets to steal.
“ A while, all eyes, intent and steady,
“ Pursue him, whirling down the eddy.
“ But, out of mind when out of view,
“ Some other mounts the twig anew ;
“ And business, on each monkey-shore,
“ Runs the same track it went before.”

FABLES. IN TWO PARTS.

“ SHALL not my fables censure vice,
“ Because a knave is over-nice ?—
“ If I lash vice in general fiction,
“ Is't I apply, or self-conviction ?
“ Brutes are my theme. Am I to blame,
“ If men in morals are the same ?

“ I no man call or ape or ass ;
“ 'Tis his own conscience holds the glass.
“ Thus void of all offence I write :
“ Who claims the fable, knows his right.”

Prologue to the Shepherd's Week,

INTRODUCTION TO THE FABLES.

PART I.

The Shepherd and the Philosopher.

REMOTE from cities liv'd a swain,
Unvex'd with all the cares of gain ;
His head was silver'd o'er with age,
And long experience made him sage ;
In summer's heat, and winter's cold,
He fed his flock, and penn'd the fold ;
His hours in cheerful labour flew,
Nor envy nor ambition knew ;
His wisdom and his honest fame
Through all the country rais'd his name.

A deep philosopher (whose rules
Of moral life were drawn from schools)
The shepherd's homely cottage sought,
And thus explor'd his reach of thought.
Whence is thy learning ? hath thy toil
O'er books consum'd the midnight oil ?
Hast thou old Greece and Rome survey'd,
And the vast sense of Plato weigh'd ?
Hath Socrates thy soul refin'd,
And hast thou fathom'd Tully's mind ?
Or, like the wise Ulysses, thrown,
By various fates, on realms unknown,

Hast thou through many cities stray'd,
Their customs, laws, and manners, weigh'd?

The shepherd modestly reply'd,
I ne'er the paths of learning try'd;
Nor have I roam'd in foreign parts,
To read mankind, their laws and arts;
For man is practis'd in disguise,
He cheats the most discerning eyes:
Who by that search shall wiser grow,
When we ourselves can never know?
The little knowledge I have gain'd,
Was all from simple nature drain'd;
Hence my life's maxims took their rise,
Hence grew my settled hate to vice.

The daily labours of the bee
Awake my soul to industry:
Who can observe the careful ant,
And not provide for future want?
My dog (the truest of his kind)
With gratitude inflames my mind:
I mark his true, his faithful way,
And in my service copy Tray.
In constancy and nuptial love,
I learn my duty from the dove.

The hen, who from the chilly air,
With pious wing, protects her care,
And every fowl that flies at large,
Instructs me in a parent's charge.

From nature too I took my rule,
To shun contempt and ridicule.
I never, with important air,
In conversation overbear.

Can grave and formal pass for wise,
When men the solemn owl despise?
My tongue within my lips I rein;
For who talks much must talk in vain.
We from the wordy torrent fly:
Who listens to the chattering pye?
Nor would I, with felonious flight,
By stealth invade my neighbour's right.
Rapacious animals we hate:

Kites, hawks, and wolves, deserve their fate.
Do not we just abhorrence find
Against the toad and serpent-kind?
But envy, calumny, and spite,
Bear stronger venom in their bite.
Thus every object of creation
Can furnish hints to contemplation;
And, from the most minute and mean,
A virtuous mind can morals glean.

Thy fame is just, the sage replies;
Thy virtue proves thee truly wise.
Pride often guides the author's pen;
Books as affected are as men:
But he who studies nature's laws,
From certain truth his maxims draws;
And those, without our schools, suffice,
To make men moral, good, and wise.

TO HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS,
WILLIAM DUKE OF CUMBERLAND.

F A B L E I.

The Lion, the Tiger, and the Traveller.

ACCEPT, young prince! the moral lay,
And in these Tales mankind survey;

With early virtues plant your breast,
The specious arts of vice detest.

Princes, like beauties from their youth
Are strangers to the voice of truth.
Learn to condemn all praise betimes,
For flattery's the nurse of crimes:
Friendship by sweet reproof is shown
(A virtue never near a throne):
In courts such freedom must offend;
There none presumes to be a friend.
To those of your exalted station,
Each courtier is a dedication.

Must I, too flatter like the rest,
And turn my morals to a jest?
The muse disdains to steal from those
Who thrive in courts by fulsome prose.

But shall I hide your real praise,
Or tell you what a nation says?
They in your infant bosom trace
The virtues of your royal race;
In the fair dawning of your mind,
Discern you generous, mild, and kind:
They see you grieve to hear distress,
And pant already to redress.

Go on, the height of good attain,
Nor let a nation hope in vain:
For hence we justly may presage
The virtues of a riper age
True courage shall your bosom fire,
And future actions own your fire.
Cowards are cruel; but the brave
Love mercy, and delight to save.

A tiger, roaming for his prey,
Sprung on a traveller in the way;
The prostrate game a lion spies,
And on the greedy tyrant flies:
With mingled roar resounds the wood,
Their teeth, their claws, distil with blood;
Till, vanquish'd by the lion's strength,
The spotted foe extends his length,
The man besought the shaggy lord,
And on his knees for life implor'd.
His life the generous hero gave,
Together walking to his cave,
The lion thus bespoke his guest:

"What hardy beast shall dare contest
"My matchless strength? You saw the fight,
"And must attest my power and right.
"Forc'd to forego their native home,
"My starving slaves at distance roam.
"Within these woods I reign alone;
"The boundless forest is my own.
"Bears, wolves, and all the savage brood,
"Have dy'd the regal den with blood.
"These carcases on either hand,
"Those bones that whiten all the land,
"My former deeds and triumphs tell,
"Beneath these jaws what numbers fell."
"True," says the man, "the strength I saw
"Might well the brutal nation awe;
"But shall a monarch, brave, like you,
"Place glory in so false a view?
"Robbers invade their neighbour's right.
"Be lov'd; let justice bound your might.
"Mean are ambitious heroes' boasts
"Of wasted lands and slaughter'd hosts.

" Pirates their power by murders gain;
 " Wise kings by love and mercy reign.
 " To me your clemency hath shown
 " The virtue worthy of a throne.
 " Heaven gives y^e power above the rest,
 " Like heaven, to succour the distressed."
 " The case is plain," the monarch said;
 " False glory hath my youth misled;
 " For beasts of prey, a servile train,
 " Have been the flatterers of my reign.
 " You reason well. Yet tell me, friend,
 " Did ever you in courts attend?
 " For all my fawning rogues agree,
 " That human heroes rule like me."

FABLE II.

The Spaniel and the Camaleon.

A SPANIEL, bred with all the care
 That waits upon a favourite heir,
 Ne'er felt correction's rigid hand;
 Indulg'd to disobey command,
 In pamper'd ease his hours were spent;
 He never knew what learning meant.
 Such forward airs, so pert, so smart,
 Were sure to win his lady's heart;
 Each little mischief gain'd him praise;
 How pretty were his fawning ways!
 The wind was south, the morning fair,
 He ventures forth to take the air:
 He ranges all the meadow round;
 And rolls upon the softest ground;
 When near him a camaleon seen,
 Was scarce distinguish'd from the green.
 " Dear emblem of the flattering host,
 " What, live with clowns! a genius lost!
 " To cities and the court repair;
 " A fortune cannot fail thee there:
 " Preferments shall thy talents crown;
 " Believe, me, friend; I know the town."
 " Sir," says the sycophant, " like you,
 " Of old, politer life I knew:
 " Like you, a courtier born and bred,
 " Kings lean'd their ear to what I said.
 " My whisper always met success;
 " The ladies prais'd me for address.
 " I knew to hit each courtier's passion,
 " And flatter'd every vice in fashion.
 " But Jove, who hates the liar's ways,
 " At once cut short my prosperous days,
 " And, sentenc'd to retain my nature,
 " Transform'd me to this crawling creature.
 " Doom'd to a life obscure and mean,
 " I wander in the sylvan scene:
 " For Jove the heart alone regards;
 " He punishes what man rewards.
 " How different is thy case and mine!
 " With men at least you sup and dine;
 " While I, condemn'd to thinnest fare,
 " Like those I flatter'd, feed on air."

FABLE III.

The Mother, the Nurse, and the Fairy.

GIVE me a son. The blessing sent,
 Were ever parents more content?

How partial are their doating eyes!
 No child is half so fair and wise.
 Wak'd to the morning's pleasing care,
 The mother rose, and sought her heir.
 She saw the nurse like one possest,
 With wringing hands and sobbing breast,
 " Sure some disaster has befall!
 " Speak, nurse; I hope the boy is well."
 " Dear madam, think not me to blame;
 Invisibly the fairy came:
 Your precious babe is hence convey'd,
 And in the place a changeling laid.
 Where are the father's mouth and nose?
 The mother's eyes, as black as flies?
 See, here, a shocking awkward creature,
 That speaks a fool in every feature!"
 " The woman's blind," the mother cries,
 " I see wit sparkle in his eyes."
 " Lord! madam, what a squinting leer!
 No doubt the fairy hath been here."
 Just as she spoke, a pigmy sprite
 Pops through the key-hole swift as light;
 Perch'd on the cradle's top he stands,
 And thus her folly reprimands.
 " Whence sprung this vain conceited lie,
 That we the world with fools supply?
 What! give our sprightly race away
 For the dull helpless sons of clay!
 Besides, by partial fondness shown
 Like you, we doat upon our own.
 Where yet was ever found a mother
 Who'd give her booby for another?
 And, should we change with human breed,
 Well might we pass for fools indeed."

FABLE IV.

The Eagle and the Assembly of Animals.

As Jupiter's all-seeing eye
 Survey'd the worlds beneath the sky,
 From this small speck of earth were sent
 Murmurs and sounds of discontent;
 For every thing alive complain'd,
 That he the hardest life sustain'd.
 Jove calls his eagle. At the word,
 Before him stands the royal bird.
 The bird, obedient, from heaven's height,
 Downward directs his rapid flight;
 Then cited every living thing,
 To hear the mandates of his king.
 " Ungrateful creatures! whence arise
 These murmurs which offend the skies?
 Why this disorder? say the cause;
 For just are Jove's eternal laws.
 Let each his discontent reveal;
 To yon' four dog I first appeal."
 " Hard is my lot, the hound replies;
 On what fleet nerves the greyhound flies!
 While I, with weary step and flow,
 O'er plains, and vales, and mountains, go,
 The morning sees my chase begun,
 Nor ends it till the setting sun."
 " When (says the greyhound) I pursue,
 My game is lost, or caught in view;
 Beyond my sight the prey's secure;
 The hound is slow, but always sure;

And, had I his sagacious scent,
 Jove ne'er had heard my discontent."
 The lion crav'd the fox's art;
 The fox the lion's force and heart:
 The cock implor'd the pigeon's flight,
 Whose wings were rapid, strong, and light;
 The pigeon strength of wing despis'd,
 And the cock's matchless valour priz'd.
 The fishes wish'd to graze the plain;
 The beasts, to skim beneath the main.
 Thus, envious of another's state,
 Each blam'd the partial hand of fate.
 The bird of heaven then cry'd aloud:
 "Jove bids disperse the murmuring crowd;
 The god rejects your idle prayers.
 Would ye, rebellious mutineers!
 Entirely change your name and nature,
 And be the very envy'd creature?
 What! silent all, and none consent?
 Be happy, then, and learn content;
 Nor imitate the restless mind,
 And proud ambition, of mankind."

F A B L E V.

The Wild Bear and the Ram.

AGAINST an elm a sheep was ty'd,
 The butcher's knife in blood was dy'd;
 The patient flock, in silent fright,
 From far beheld the horrid sight.
 A savage boar, who near them stood,
 Thus mock'd to scorn the fleecy brood.
 "All cowards should be serv'd like you,
 See, see your murderer is in view:
 With purple hands, and reeking knife,
 He strips the skin yet warm with life.
 Your quarter'd fires, your bleeding dams,
 The dying bleat of harmless lambs,
 Call for revenge. O stupid race!
 The heart that wants revenge is base."
 "I grant, an ancient ram replies,
 We bear no terror in our eyes;
 Yet think us not of soul so tame,
 Which no repeated wrongs inflame;
 Insensible of every ill,
 Because we want thy tusks to kill.
 Know, those, who violence pursue,
 Give to themselves the vengeance due;
 For in these massacres they find
 The two chief plagues that waste mankind,
 Our skin supplies the wrangling bar,
 It wakes their slumbering sons to war;
 And well revenge may rest contented,
 Since drums and parchment were invented."

F A B L E VI.

The Miser and Plutus.

THE wind was high, the window shakes,
 With sudden start the miser wakes;
 Along the silent room he stalks,
 Looks back, and trembles as he walks.
 Each lock and every bolt he tries,
 In every creek and corner pries;

Then opes the chest with treasure stor'd,
 And stands in rapture o'er his hoard.
 But now, with sudden qualms possess'd,
 He wrings his hands, he beats his breast;
 By conscience stung, he wildly stares,
 And thus his guilty soul declares:
 "Had the deep earth her stores confin'd,
 This heart had known sweet peace of mind.
 But virtue's sold. Good gods! what price
 Can recompense the pangs of vice!
 O bane of good! seducing cheat!
 Can man, weak man, thy power defeat?
 Gold banish'd honour from the mind,
 And only left the name behind;
 Gold sow'd the world with every ill;
 Gold taught the murderer's sword to kill:
 'Twas gold instructed coward-hearts
 In treachery's more pernicious arts.
 Who can recount the mischiefs o'er?
 Virtue resides on earth no more!"
 He spoke, and sigh'd. In angry mood
 Plutus, his god, before him stood.
 The miser, trembling, lock'd his chest:
 The vision frown'd, and thus address'd:
 "Whence is this vile ungrateful rant,
 Each sordid rascal's daily cant?
 Did I, base wretch! corrupt mankind?
 The fault's in thy rapacious mind.
 Because my blessings are abus'd,
 Must I be censur'd, curs'd, accus'd?
 Ev'n virtue's self by knaves is made
 A cloak to carry on the trade;
 And power (when lodg'd in their possession)
 Grows tyranny, and rank oppression.
 Thus, when the villain crams his chest,
 Gold is the canker of the breast;
 'Tis avarice, insolence, and pride,
 And every shocking vice beside:
 But, when to virtuous hands 'tis given,
 It blesses, like the dews of heaven:
 Like heaven, it hears the orphan's cries,
 And wipes the tears from widows eyes.
 Their crimes on gold shall misers lay,
 Who pawn'd their sordid souls for pay?
 Let bravos, then, when blood is spilt,
 Upbraid the passive soul with guilt."

F A B L E VII.

The Lion, the Fox, and the Geese.

A LION, tir'd with state-affairs,
 Quite sick of pomp, and worn with cares,
 Resolv'd (remote from noise and strife)
 In peace to pass his latter life.
 It was proclaim'd; the day was set;
 Behold the general council met.
 The fox was viceroy nam'd. The crowd
 To the new regent humbly bow'd.
 Wolves, bears, and mighty tigers bend,
 And strive who most shall condescend.
 He straight assumes a solemn grace,
 Collects his wisdom in his face.
 The crowd admire his wit, his sense;
 Each word hath weight and consequence,
 The flatterer all his art displays:
 He who hath power is sure of praise.

A fox stept forth before the rest,
And thus the servile throng address'd :

"How vast his talents, born to rule,
And train'd in virtue's honest school !
What clemency his temper sways !
How uncorrupt are all his ways !
Beneath his conduct and command,
Rapine shall cease to waste the land.
His brain hath stratagem and art ;
Prudence and mercy rule his heart.
What blessings must attend the nation
Under this good administration."

He said. A goose who distant stood,
Harangu'd apart the cackling brood :

"Whene'er I hear a knave commend,
He bids me shun his worthy friend.
What praise ! what mighty commendation !
But 'twas a fox who spoke th' oration.
Foes this government may prize,
As gentle, plentiful, and wise ;
If they enjoy the sweets, 'tis plain
We geese must feel a tyrant reign.
What havock now shall thin our race,
When every petty clerk in place,
To prove his taste, and seem polite,
Will feed on geese both noon and night !"

FABLE VIII.

The Lady and the Wasp.

WHAT whispers must the beauty bear !
What hourly nonsense haunts her ear !
Where'er her eyes dispense their charms,
Impertinence around her swarms.
Did not the tender nonsense strike,
Contempt and scorn might look dislike ;
Forbidding airs might thin the place,
The slightest flap a fly can chase :
But who can drive the numerous breed ?
Chase one, another will succeed.
Who knows a fool, must know his brother ;
One sop will recommend another :
And with this plague she's rightly curst.
Because she listen'd to the first.

As Doris, at her toilette's duty,
Sat meditating on her beauty,
She now was pensive, now was gay,
And lull'd the sultry hours away.

As thus in indolence she lies,
A giddy wasp around her flies.
He now advances, now retires,
Now to her neck and cheek aspires.
Her fan in vain defends her charms ;
Swift he returns, again alarms ;
For by repulse he bolder grew,
Perch'd on her lip, and sipt the dew.

She frowns ; she frets. "Good gods ! she cries,
Protect me from these teasing flies !
Of all the plagues that heaven hath sent,
A wasp is most impertinent."

The hovering insect thus complain'd :
"Am I then slighted, scorn'd, disdain'd ?
Can such offence your anger wake ?
'Twas beauty caus'd the bold mistake.
Those cherry lips that breathe perfume,
That cheek so ripe with youthful bloom,

Made me with strong desire pursue
The fairest peach that ever grew."

"Strike him not, Jenny, Doris cries,
Nor murder wasps like vulgar flies !
For though he's free (to do him right),
The creature's civil and polite."

In ecstasies away he posts ;
Where'er he came, the favour boasts ;
Braggs how her sweetest tea he sips,
And shows the sugar on his lips.

The hint alarm'd the forward crew ;
Sure of success away they flew :
They share the dainties of the day,
Round her with airy music play :
And now they flutter, now they rest,
Now soar again, and skim her breast.
Nor were they banish'd, till she found
That wasps have stings, and felt the wound.

FABLE IX.

The Bull and the Mastiff.

SEEK you to train your favourite boy ?
Each caution, every care employ ;
And, ere you venture to confide,
Let his preceptor's heart be try'd :
Weigh well his manners, life, and scope ;
On these depends thy future hope,
As on a time, in peaceful reign,
A bull enjoy'd the flowery plain,
A mastiff pass'd ; inflam'd with ire,
His eye-balls shot indignant fire.
He foam'd, he rag'd with thirst of blood.

Spurning the ground, the monarch stood,
And roar'd aloud : "Suspend the fight ;
In a whole skin go sleep to-night :
Or tell me, ere the battle rage,
What wrongs provoke thee to engage ?
Is it ambition fires thy breast,
Or avarice, that ne'er can rest ?
From these alone unjustly springs
The world-destroying wrath of kings."

The surly mastiff thus returns :
"Within my bosom glory burns.
Like heroes of eternal name,
Whom poets sing, I fight for fame.
The butcher's spirit-stirring mind
To daily war my youth inclin'd ;
He train'd me to heroic deed,
Taught me to conquer, or to bleed."

"Curs'd dog, the bull reply'd, no more
I wonder at thy thirst of gore ;
For thou (beneath a butcher train'd,
Whose hands with cruelty are stain'd,
His daily murders in thy view)
Must, like thy tutor, blood pursue.
Take, then, thy fate." With goring wound
At once he lifts him from the ground :
Aloft the sprawling hero flies,
Mangled he falls, he howls, and dies.

FABLE X.

The Elephant and the Bookseller.

THE man who with undaunted toils
Sails unknown seas to unknown soils,

With various wonders feasts his sight :
 What stranger wonders does he write !
 We read, and in description view
 Creatures which Adam never knew ;
 For, when we risk no contradiction,
 It prompts the tongue to deal in fiction.
 Those things that startle me or you
 I grant are strange ; yet may be true.
 Who doubts that elephants are found
 For science and for sense renown'd ?
 Borri records their strength of parts,
 Extent of thought, and skill in arts ;
 How they perform the law's decrees,
 And save the state the hangman's fees ;
 And how by travel understand
 The language of another land.
 Let those, who question this report,
 To Pliny's ancient page resort.
 How learn'd was that sagacious breed !
 Who now (like them) the Greek can read ?

As one of these, in days of yore,
 Rummag'd a shop of learning o'er,
 Not like our modern dealers, minding
 Only the margin's breadth and binding,
 A book his curious eye detains,
 Where, with exactest care and pains,
 Were every beast and bird pourtray'd,
 That e'er the search of man survey'd ;
 Their natures and their powers were writ
 With all the pride of human wit :
 The page he with attention spread,
 And thus remark'd on what he read :

" Man with strong reason is endow'd ;
 A beast scarce instinct is allow'd :
 But, let this author's worth be try'd,
 'Tis plain that neither was his guide.
 Can he discern the different natures,
 And weigh the power of other creatures,
 Who by the partial work hath shown
 He knows so little of his own ?
 How falsely is the spaniel drawn !
 Did man from him first learn to fawn ?
 A dog proficient in the trade !
 He the chief flatterer nature made !
 Go, man ! the ways of courts discern,
 You'll find a spaniel still might learn.
 How can the fox's theft and plunder
 Provoke his censure or his wonder ?
 From courtiers' tricks and lawyers' arts,
 The fox might well improve his parts.
 The lion, wolf, and tiger's brood,
 He curses, for their thirst of blood.
 But is not man to man a prey ?
 Beasts kill for hunger, men for pay."

The bookseller, who heard him speak,
 And saw him turn a page of Greek,
 Thought, what a genius have I found !
 Then thus address'd with bow profound :

" Learn'd Sir, if you'd employ your pen
 Against the senseless sons of men,
 Or write the history of Siam ;
 No man is better pay than I am.
 Or, since you're learn'd in Greek, let's see Something against the Trinity."

When wrinkling with a sneer his trunk,
 " Friend, quoth the elephant, you're drunk :

E'en keep your money, and be wise ;
 Leave man on man to criticise :
 For that you ne'er can want a pen
 Among the senseless sons of men.
 They unprovok'd will court the fray ;
 Envy's a sharper spur than pay.
 No author ever spar'd a brother ;
 Wits are game cocks to one another."

F A B L E XI.

The Peacock, the Turkey, and the Goose.

IN beauty faults conspicuous grow ;
 The smallest speck is seen on snow.
 As near a barn, by hunger led,
 A peacock with the poultry fed,
 All view'd him with an envious eye,
 And mock'd his gaudy pageantry.
 He, conscious of superior merit,
 Contemns their base reviling spirit ;
 His state and dignity assumes,
 And to the sun displays his plumes,
 Which, like the heavens' o'er-arching skies,
 Are spangled with a thousand eyes.
 The circling rays, and varied light,
 At once confound their dazzled sight ;
 On every tongue detraction burns,
 And malice prompts their spleen by turns.

" Mark with what insolence and pride
 The creature takes his haughty stride,
 The turkey cries. Can spleen contain ?
 Sure never bird was half so vain !
 But, were intrinsic merit seen,
 We turkeys have the whiter skin !"

From tongue to tongue they caught abuse,
 And next was heard the hissing goose :

" What hideous legs ! what filthy claws ;
 I scorn to censure little flaws.

Then what a horrid squalling throat !
 Ev'n owls are frighted at the note."

" True. Those are faults, the peacock cries ;
 My scream, my thanks, you may despise ;
 But such blind critics rail in vain.
 What ! overlook my radiant train !
 Know, did my legs (your scorn and sport)
 The turkey or the goose support,
 And did ye scream with harsher sound,
 Those faults in you had ne'er been found :
 To all apparent beauties blind,
 Each blemish strikes an envious mind.

Thus in assemblies have I seen
 A nymph of brightest charms and mien,
 Wake envy in each ugly face,
 And buzzing scandal fills the place.

F A B L E XII.

Cupid, Hymen, and Plutus.

As Cupid in Cythera's grove
 Employ'd the lesser powers of love.
 Some shape the bow, or fit the string,
 Some give the taper shaft its wing,
 Or turn the polish'd quiver's mould,
 Or head the darts with temper'd gold.

Amid their toil and various care,
 Thus Hymen, with assenting air,

Address'd the god: "Thou purblind chit,
Of aukward and ill-judging wit.
If matches are not better made,
At once I must forswear my trade.
You send me such ill-coupled folks,
That 'tis a shame to sell them yokes.
They squabble for a pin, a feather,
And wonder how they came together.
The husband's fullen, dogged, shy,
The wife grows flippant in reply:
He loves command and due restriction;
And she as well likes contradiction:
She never slavishly submits;
She'll have her will, or have her fits.
He this way tugs, she th' other draws;
The man grows jealous, and with cause.
Nothing can save him but divorce;
And here the wife complains of course."

"When, says the boy, had I to do
With either your affairs or you?
I never idly spend my darts;
You trade in mercenary hearts.
For settlements the lawyer's fee'd;
Is my hand witness to the deed?
If they like cat and dog agree,
Go rail at Plutus, not at me."

Plutus appear'd, and said, "Tis true,
In marriage, gold is all their view;
They seek not beauty, wit, or sense,
And love is seldom the pretence.
All offer incense at my shrine,
And I alone the bargain sign.
How can Belinda blame her fate
She only ask'd a great estate.
Doris was rich enough, 'tis true;
Her lord must give her title too:
And every man, or rich or poor,
A fortune asks, and asks no more."

Avarice, whatever shape it bears,
Must still be coupled with its cares.

FABLE XIII.

The tame Stag.

As a young stag the thicket past,
The branches held his antlers fast.
A clown who saw the captive hung,
Across the horns his halter flung.

Now safely hamper'd in the cord,
He bore the present to his lord.
His lord was pleas'd; as was the clown,
When he was tipp'd with half-a-crown.
The stag was brought before his wife.
The tender lady begg'd his life.
How sleek's the skin! how speck'd like ermine!
Sure never creature was so charming!

At first within the yard confin'd,
He flies and hides from all mankind;
Now bolder grown, with fix'd amaze,
And distant awe, presumes to gaze;
Munches the linen on the lines,
And on a hood or apron dines:
He steals my little master's bread,
Follows the servants to be fed;

Nearer and nearer now he stands,
To feel the praise of patting hands;
Examines every fist for meat,
And, though repuls'd, disdains retreat;
Attacks again with level'd horns,
And man, that was his terror, scorns.
Such is the country maiden's fright,
When first a redcoat is in sight;
Behind the door she hides her face,
Next time at distance eyes the lace:
She now can all his terrors stand,
Nor from his squeeze withdraws her hand.
She plays familiar in his arms,
And every soldier hath his charms.
From tent to tent she spreads her flame;
For custom conquers fear and shame.

FABLE XIV.

The Monkey who had seen the World.

A MONKEY, to reform the times,
Resolv'd to visit foreign climes;
For men in distant regions roam,
To bring politer manners home.
So forth he fares, all toil defies:
Misfortune serves to make us wise.

At length the treacherous snare was laid;
Poor Pug was caught; to town convey'd;
There sold. (How envy'd was his doom,
Made captive in a lady's room!)
Proud, as a lover, of his chains,
He day by day her favour gains.
Whene'er the duty of the day
The toilette calls, with mimic play
He twirls her knots, he cracks her fan,
Like any other gentleman.
In visits too, his parts and wit,
When jests grew dull, were sure to hit.
Proud with applause he thought his mind
In every courtly art refin'd;
Like Orpheus, burnt with public zeal,
To civilize the monkey-weal;
So watch'd occasion, broke his chain,
And sought his native woods again.

The hairy sylvans round him press,
Astonish'd at his strut and dress.
Some praise his sleeve, and others glote
Upon his lich embroider'd coat,
His dapper perriwig commending,
With the black tail behind depending;
His powder'd back, above, below,
Like hoary frosts, or fleecy snow;
But all, with envy and desire,
His fluttering shoulder-knot admire.

Hear and improve, he pertly cries;
I come to make a nation wise.
Weigh your own worth; support your place,
The next in rank to human race.
In cities long I pass'd my days,
Convers'd with men, and learn'd their ways.
Their dress, their courtly manners see;
Reform your state, and copy me.
Seek ye to thrive? In flattery deal;
Your scorn, your hate, with that conceal.

Seem only to regard your friends,
But use them for your private ends.
Stint not to truth the flow of wit;
Be prompt to lie whene'er 'tis fit.
Pend all your force to spatter merit;
Scandal is conversation's spirit,
Boldly to every thing pretend,
And men your talents shall commend.
I knew the great. Observe me right;
So shall you grow, like man, polite.

He spoke, and bow'd. With muttering jaws
The wondering circle grinn'd applause.

Now, warm'd with malice, envy, spite,
Their most obliging friends they bite;
And, fond to copy human ways,
Practise new mischiefs all their days.

Thus the dull lad, too tall for school,
With travel finishes the fool;
Studious of every coxcomb's airs,
He drinks, games, dresses, whores, and swears;
O'erlooks with scorn all virtuous arts,
For vice is fitted to his parts.

FABLE XV.

The Philosopher and the Pheasants.

THE sage, awak'd at early day,
Through the deep forest took his way;
Drawn by the music of the groves,
Along the winding gloom he roves:
From tree to tree the warbling throats
Prolong the sweet alternate notes:
But, where he past, he terror threw,
The song broke short, the warblers flew;
The thrushes chatter'd with affright,
And nightingales abhor'd his sight:
All animals before him ran,
To shun the hateful sight of man.

Whence is this dread of every creature?
Fly they our figure, or our nature!

As thus he walk'd in musing thought,
His ear imperfect accents caught;
With cautious step he nearer drew,
By the thick shade conceal'd from view.
High on the branch a pheasant stood,
Around her all her listening brood;
Proud of the blessings of her nest,
She thus a mother's care express'd.

"No dangers here shall circumvent,
Within the woods enjoy content.
Sooner the hawk or vulture trust
Than man, of animals the worst.
In him ingratitude you find,
A vice peculiar to the kind.
The sheep whose annual fleece is dy'd
To guard his health, and serve his pride,
Forc'd from his fold and native plain,
Is in the cruel shambles slain.
The swarms who with industrious skill,
His hives with wax and honey fill,
In vain whole summer-days employ'd,
Their stores are sold, the race destroy'd.
What tribute from the goose is paid!
Does not her wing all science aid?"

Does it not lovers' hearts explain,
And drudge to raise the merchant's gain?
What now rewards this general use?
He takes the quills, and eats the goose.
Man then avoid, detest his ways,
So safety shall prolong your days.
When services are thus acquitted,
Be sure we pheasants must be spitted."

FABLE XIV.

The Pin and the Needle.

A PIN who long had serv'd a beauty,
Proficient in the toilette's duty,
Had form'd her sleeve, confin'd her hair,
Or given her knot a smarter air,
Now nearest to her heart was plac'd,
Now in her mantua's tail disgrac'd:
But could she partial fortune blame,
Who saw her lovers serv'd the same?

At length from all her honours cast,
Through various turns of life she past;
Now glitter'd on a taylor's arm,
Now kept a beggar's infant warm;
Now, rang'd within a miser's coat,
Contributes to his yearly groat;
Now, rais'd again from low approach,
She visits in the doctor's coach:
Here, there, by various fortune tost,
At last in Gresham hall was lost.
Charm'd with the wonders of the show,
On every side, above, below,
She now of this or that inquires,
What least was understood admires.
'Tis plain, each thing so struck her mind,
Her head's of virtuoso kind.

"And pray what's this, and this, dear Sir?"

"A needle," says th' interpreter.
She knew the name; and thus the fool
Address'd her as a tailor's tool.

"A needle with that filthy stone,
Quite idle, all with rust o'ergrown;
You better might employ your parts,
And aid the sempstress in her arts;
But tell me how the friendship grew
Between that paltry flint and you."

"Friend, says the needle, cease to blame;
I follow real worth and fame.
Know'st thou the loadstone's power and art,
That virtue virtues can impart?
Of all his talents I partake:
Who then can such a friend forsake?
'Tis I direct the pilot's hand
To shun the rocks and treacherous sand:
By me the distant world is known,
And either India is our own.
Had I with milliners been bred,
What had I been? the guide of thread,
And drudg'd as vulgar needles do,
Of no more consequence than you."

FABLE XVII.

The Shepherd's Dog and the Wolf.

A WOLF, with hunger fierce and bold,
Ravag'd the plains, and thinn'd the fold;

Deep in the wood secure he lay,
The thefts of night regal'd the day.
In vain the shepherd's wakeful care
Had spread the toils, and watch'd the snare;
In vain the dog pursued his pace,
The fleet robber mock'd the chase.

As Lightfoot rang'd the forest round,
By chance his foe's retreat he found.

Let us a while the war suspend,
And reason as from friend to friend.

"A truce?" replies the wolf. 'Tis done.
The dog the parley thus begun.

"How can that strong intrepid mind
Attack a weak defenceless kind?

Those jaws should prey on nobler food,
And drink the boar and lion's blood.

Great souls with generous pity melt,
Which coward tyrants never felt.

How harmless is our fleecy care!

Be brave, and let thy mercy spare."

"Friend, says the wolf, the matter weigh;
Nature design'd us beasts of prey;

As such, when hunger finds a treat,
'Tis necessary wolves should eat.

If, mindful of the bleating weal,
Thy bosom burn with real zeal,

Hence, and thy tyrant lord beseech;

To him repeat the moving speech:

A wolf eats sheep but now and then,

Ten thousands are devour'd by men.

An open foe may prove a curse,

But a pretended friend is worse."

F A B L E XVIII.

The Painter who pleased nobody and every body.

LEST men suspect your tale untrue,
Keep probability in view.

The traveller leaping o'er those bounds,
The credit of his book confounds.

Who with his tongue hath armies routed,
Makes even his real courage doubted.

But flattery never seems absurd;

The flatter'd always take your word:

Impossibilities seem just;

They take the strongest praise on trust.

Hyperboles, though ne'er so great,

Will still come short of self-conceit.

So very like a painter drew,

That every eye the picture knew,

He hit complexion, feature, air,

So just, the life itself was there.

No flattery with his colours laid,

To bloom restor'd the faded maid;

He gave each muscle all its strength;

The mouth, the chin, the nose's length;

His honest pencil touch'd with truth,

And mark'd the date of age and youth.

He lost his friends, his practice fail'd;

Truth should not always be reveal'd:

In dusty piles his pictures lay,

For no one sent the second pay.

Two bustos, fraught with every grace,

A Venus' and Apollo's face,

He plac'd in view; resolv'd to please,
Whoever sat he drew from these,
From these corrected every feature,
And spirited each awkward creature.

All things were set; the hour was come,
His pallet ready o'er his thumb.

My lord appear'd; and seated right,
In proper attitude and light,

The painter look'd, he sketch'd the piece,
Then dipt his pencil, talk'd of Greece,

Of Titian's tints, of Guido's air;

Those eyes, my lord, the spirit there

Might well a Raphael's hand require,

To give them all the native fire;

The features, fraught with sense and wit,

You'll grant, are very hard to hit;

But yet with patience you shall view

As much as paint and art can do."

Observe the work. My Lord replied,

"Till now I thought my mouth was wide;

Besides, my nose is somewhat long:

Dear Sir, for me, 'tis far too young."

"Oh! pardon me, the artist cry'd;

In this we painters must decide.

The piece ev'n common eyes must strike,

I warrant it extremely like."

My Lord examin'd it anew;

No looking-glass seem'd half so true.

A lady came with borrow'd grace

He from his Venus form'd her face.

Her lover prais'd the painter's art;

So like the picture in his heart!

To every age some charm he lent;

Ev'n beauties were almost content.

Through all the town his art they prais'd;

His custom grew, his price was rais'd.

Had he the real likeness shown,

Would any man the picture own?

But, when thus happily he wrought,

Each found the likeness in his thought.

F A B L E XIX.

The Lion and the Cub.

How fond are men of rule and place,
Who court it from the mean and base!

These cannot bear an equal nigh,

But from superior merit fly.

They love the cellar's vulgar joke,

And lose their hours in ale and smoke.

There o'er some petty club preside;

So poor, so paltry, is their pride!

Nay, ev'n with fools whole nights will sit,

In hopes to be supreme in wit.

If these can read, to these I write,

To set their worth in truest light.

A lion cub, of sordid mind,

Avoided all the lion kind;

Fond of applause he sought the feasts

Of vulgar and ignoble beasts;

With asses all his time he spent,

Their clubs perpetual president.

He caught their manners, looks, and airs;

An ass in every thing but ears!

If e'er his Highness meant a joke,
They grinn'd applause before he spoke;
But at each word what shouts of praise!
Good gods! how natural he brays!

Elate with flattery and conceit,
He seeks his royal fire's retreat;
Forward and fond to show his parts,
His Highness brays; the lion starts.

"Puppy! that curs'd vociferation
Betrays thy life and conversation:
Coxcombs, an ever-noisy race,
Are trumpets of their own disgrace."

"Why so severe? the cub replies;
Our senate always held me wise."

"How weak is pride: returns the fire:
All fools are vain when fools admire!
But know, what stupid asses prize,
Lions and noble beasts despise."

F A B L E XX.

The Old Hen and the Cock.

RESTRAIN your child; you'll soon believe
The text which says we sprung from Eve.

As an old hen led forth her train,
And seem'd to peck to show the grain,
She rak'd the chaff, she scratch'd the ground,
And glean'd the spacious yard around.

A giddy chick, to try her wings,
On the well's narrow margin springs,
And prone she drops. The mother's breast
All day with sorrow was possess'd.

A cock she met; her son she knew;
And in her heart affection grew.

"My son, says she, I grant your years
Have reach'd beyond a mother's cares.
I see you vigorous, strong, and bold;
I hear with joy your triumphs told.

'Tis not from cocks thy fate I dread;
But let thy ever-wary tread

Avoid yon well; that fatal place
Is sure perdition to our race.

Print this my counsel on thy breast:
To the just gods I leave the rest."

He thank'd her care; yet day by day
His bosom burn'd to disobey,

And every time the well he saw,
Scorn'd in his heart the foolish law:

Near and more near each day he drew,
And long'd to try the dangerous view.

"Why was this idle charge? he cries;
Let courage female fears despise.

Or did she doubt my heart was brave,
And therefore this injunction gave:

Or does her harvest store the place
A treasure for her younger race?

And would she thus my search prevent?
I stand resolv'd, and dare th' event."

Thus said, he mounts the margin's round,
And pries into the depth profound.

He stretch'd his neck; and from below

With stretching neck advanc'd a foe:

With wrath his ruffled plumes he rears,
The foe with ruffled plumes appears.

Threat answer'd threat; his fury grew;
Headlong to meet the war he flew;
But, when the watery death he found,
He thus lamented as he drown'd:

"I ne'er had been in this condition,
But for my mother's prohibition."

F A B L E XXI.

The Rat-catcher and Cats.

THE rats by night such mischief did,
Betty was every morning chid:
They undermin'd whole sides of bacon,
Her cheese was sapp'd, her tarts were taken;
Her pasties, fenc'd with thickest paste,
Were all demolish'd and laid waste:
She curs'd the Cat, for want of duty,
Who left her foes a constant booty.

An engineer, of noted skill,
Engag'd to stop the growing ill.

From room to room he now surveys
Their haunts, their works, their secret ways;
Finds where they 'scape an ambushade,
And whence the nightly sally's made.

An envious Cat from place to place,
Unseen, attends his silent pace:

She saw that, if his trade went on,
The purring race must be undone;

So secretly removes his baits,
And every stratagem defeats.

Again he sets the poison'd toils;
And Pufs again the labour foils.

"What foe (to frustrate my designs)
My schemes thus nightly countermines?

Incens'd, he cries, this very hour
The wretch shall bleed beneath my power."

So said, a ponderous trap he brought,
And in the fact poor Pufs was caught.

"Smuggler, says he, thou shalt be made
A victim to our loss of trade."

The captive Cat, with piteous mews,
For pardon, life, and freedom sues.

"A sister of the science spare;

One interest is our common care."

"What insolence! the Man reply'd;
Shall Cats with us the game divide?

Were all your interloping band
Extinguish'd, or expell'd the land.

We Rat-catchers might raise our fees,
Sole guardians of a nation's cheese!"

A Cat, who saw the lifted knife,
Thus spoke, and sav'd her sister's life.

"In every age and clime we see,
Two of a trade can ne'er agree.

Each hates his neighbour for encroaching;
'Squire stigmatizes 'squire for poaching;

Beauties with beauties are in arms,
And scandal pelts each others charms;

Kings, too, their neighbour kings dethrone,
In hope to make the world their own:

But let us limit our desires,

Not war like beauties, kings, and 'squires;
For though we both one prey pursue,

There's game enough for us and you."

FABLE XXII.

The Goat without a Beard.

'Tis certain that the modish passions
Descend among the crowd like fashions.
Excuse me, then, if pride, conceit,
(The manners of the fair and great)
I give to monkeys, asses, dogs,
Fleas, owls, goats, butterflies, and hogs,
I say that these are proud: what then?
I never said they equal men.

A Goat (as vain as goat can be)
Affected singularity:
Whene'er a thymy bank he found,
He roll'd upon the fragrant ground,
And then with fond attention stood,
Fix'd o'er his image in the flood.
"I hate my frowzy beard, he cries,
My youth is lost in this disguise.
Did not the females know my vigour,
Well might they loathe this reverend figure."

Resolv'd to smooth his shaggy face,
He sought the barber of the place.
A flippant monkey, spruce and smart,
Hard by, profess'd the dapper art:
His pole with pewter-basons hung,
Black rotten teeth in order strung,
Rang'd cups, that in the window stood,
Lin'd with red rags to look like blood;
Did well his threefold trade explain,
Who shav'd, drew teeth, and breath'd a vein.

The Goat he welcomes with an air,
And seats him in his wooden chair:
Mouth, nose, and cheek, the lather hides;
Light, smooth, and swift, the razor glides.

"I hope your custom, Sir, says Pug,
Sure never face was half so snug!"

The Goat, impatient for applause,
Swift to the neighbouring hill withdraws.
The shaggy people grinn'd and star'd.
"Heigh-day! what's here? without a beard!
Say, Brother, whence the dire disgrace?
What envious hand hath robb'd your face?"
When thus the fop, with smiles of scorn,
"Are beards by civil nations worn?
Ev'n Muscovites have mow'd their chins.
Shall we, like formal Capuchins,
Stubborn in pride, retain the mode,
And bear about the hairy load?
Whene'er we through the village stray,
Are we not mock'd along the way,
Insulted with loud shouts of scorn,
By boys our beards disgrace'd and torn?"

"Were you no more with goats to dwell,
Brother, I grant you reason well," Replies a bearded chief. "Beside,
If boys can mortify thy pride,
How wilt thou stand the ridicule
Of our whole flock? Affected fool!"

Coxcombs, distinguish'd from the rest,
To all but coxcombs are a jest.

FABLE XXIII.

The Old Woman and her Cats.

Who friendship with a knave hath made,
Ravag'd a partner in the trade.

The matron, who conducts abroad
A willing nymph, is thought a bawd;
And, if a modest girl is seen
With one who cures a lover's spleen,
We guess her not extremely nice,
And only wish to know her price.
'Tis thus that on the choice of friends
Our good or evil name depends.

A wrinkled hag, of wicked fame,
Beside a little smoky flame
Sat hovering, pinch'd with age and frost;
Her shrivell'd hands, with veins emboss'd,
Upon her knees her weight sustains,
While palsy shook her crazy brains:
She mumbles forth her backward prayers,
An untam'd scold of fourscore years.
About her swarm'd a numerous brood
Of cats, who, lank with hunger, mew'd,
Teaz'd with their cries, her choler grew,
And thus she sputter'd. "Hence, ye crew!
Fool that I was, to entertain
Such imps, such fiends, a hellish train!
Had ye been never hous'd and nurs'd,
I for a witch had ne'er been curs'd.
To you I owe that crowds of boys
Worry me with eternal noise;
Straws laid across my pace retard,
The horse shoe's nail'd (each threshold's guard);
The stunted broom the wenches hide,
For fear that I should up and ride;
They stick with pins my bleeding seat,
And bid me show my secret teat."

"To hear you prate, would vex a saint;
Who hath most reason of complaint?"
Replies a Cat. "Let's come to proof.
Had we ne'er starv'd beneath your roof,
We had, like others of our race,
In credit liv'd as beasts of chase.
'Tis infamy to serve a hag;
Cats are thought imps, her broom a nag;
And boys against our lives combine,
Because 'tis said your cats have nine."

FABLE XXIV.

The Butterfly and the Snail.

ALL upstarts, insolent in place,
Remind us of their vulgar race.
As in the sunshine of the morn
A butterfly (but newly born)
Sat proudly perking on a rose,
With pert conceit his bosom glows;
His wings (all glorious to behold)
Bedropt with azure, jet, and gold,
Wide he displays; the spangled dew
Reflects his eyes and various hue.

His now-forgotten friend, a snail,
Beneath his house, with slimy trail,
Crawls o'er the grass; whom when he spies,
In wrath he to the gardner cries:

"What means yon peasant's daily toil,
From choking weeds to rid the soil?
Why wake you to the morning's care?
Why with new arts correct the year?
Why grows the peach with crimson hue?
And why the plum's inviting blue?"

Were they to feast his taste design'd,
That vermin of voracious kind!
Crush then the slow, the pilfering race,
So purge thy garden from disgrace."

"What arrogance! the snail reply'd;
How insolent is upstart pride!
Hadst thou not thus, with insult vain,
Provok'd my patience to complain,
I had conceal'd thy meaner birth,
Nor trac'd thee to the scum of earth:
For scarce nine suns have wak'd the hours,
To swell the fruit, and paint the flowers,
Since I thy humbler life survey'd,
In base, in sordid guise array'd;
A hideous insect, vile, unclean,
You dragg'd a slow and noisome train;
And from your spider bowels drew
Foul film, and spun the dirty clue.
I own my humble life, good friend;
Snail was I born, and snail shall end.
And what's a butterfly? at best
He's but a caterpillar drest;
And all thy race (a numerous seed)
Shall prove of caterpillar breed."

F A B L E XXV.

The Scold and the Parrot.

THE husband thus reprov'd his wife:
"Who deals in slander, lives in strife.
Art thou the herald of disgrace,
Denouncing war to all thy race;
Can nothing quell thy thunder's rage,
Which spares nor friend, nor sex, nor age?
That vixen tongue of your's, my dear,
Alarms our neighbours far and near.
Good gods! 'tis like a rolling river,
That murmuring flows, and flows for ever!
Ne'er tir'd, perpetual discord sowing:
Like fame, it gathers strength by going."

"Heigh-day!" the flippant tongue replies,
"How solemn is the fool! how wise!
Is nature's choicest gift debarr'd?
Nay, frown not; for I will be heard.
Women of late are finely ridden,
A parrot's privilege forbidden!
You praise his talk, his squalling song;
But wives are always in the wrong."

Now reputations flew in pieces
Of mothers, daughters, aunts, and nieces:
She ran the parrot's language o'er,
Bawd, hussy, drunkard, flattern, whore;
On all the sex she vents her fury,
Tries and condemns without a jury.

At once the torrent of her words
Alarm'd cat, monkey, dogs, and birds:
All join their forces to confound her,
Puss spits, the monkey chatters round her;
The yelping cur her heels assaults;
The magpie blabs out all her faults;
Poll, in the uproar, from his cage,
With this rebuke outscram'd her rage.

"A parrot is for talking priz'd,
But prattling women are despis'd.

VOL. VIII.

She who attacks another's honour,
Draws every living thing upon her.
Think, madam, when you stretch your lungs,
That all your neighbours too have tongues:
One slander must ten thousand get:
The world with interest pays the debt."

F A B L E XXVI.

The Cur and the Mastiff.

A SNEAKING cur, the master's spy,
Rewarded for his daily lie,
With secret jealousies and fears
Set all together by the ears.
Poor puss to-day was in disgrace,
Another cat supply'd her place;
The hound was beat, the mastiff chid,
The monkey was the room forbid;
Each to his dearest friend grew shy,
And none could tell the reason why.

A plan to rob the house was laid:
The thief with love seduc'd the maid,
Cajol'd the cur, and stroak'd his head,
And bought his secrecy with bread;
He next the mastiff's honour try'd,
Whose honest jaws the bribe defy'd;
He stretch'd his hand to proffer more:
The surly dog his fingers tore.

Swift ran the cur; with indignation
The master took his information.
"Hang him, the villain's curs'd," he cries;
And round his neck the halter ties.

The dog his humble suit preferr'd,
And beg'd in justice to be heard.
The master sate. On either hand
The cited dogs confronting stand;
The cur the bloody tale relates,
And, like a lawyer, aggravates.

"Judge not unheard (the mastiff cry'd),
But weigh the cause of either side.
Think not that treachery can be just;
Take not informers' words on trust;
They ope their hand to every pay,
And you and me by turns betray."

He spoke; and all the truth appear'd:
The cur was hang'd, the mastiff clear'd.

F A B L E XXVII.

The Sick Man and the Angel.

"Is there no hope?" the sick man said.
The silent doctor shook his head,
And took his leave with signs of sorrow,
Despairing of his fee to-morrow.

When thus the man, with gasping breath;
"I feel the chilling wound of death.
Since I must bid the world adieu,
Let me my former life review.
I grant my bargains well were made,
But all men over-reach in trade;
'Tis self-defence in each profession:
Sure self-defence is no transgression.
The little portion in my hands,
By good security on lands

Is well increas'd. If, unawares,
My justice to myself and heirs
Hath let my debtor rot in jail,
For want of good sufficient bail;
If I, by writ, or bond, or deed,
Reduc'd a family to need;
My will hath made the world amends;
My hope on charity depends.
When I am number'd with the dead,
And all my pious gifts are read,
By heaven and earth 'twill then be known
My charities were amply shown."

An angel came. "Ah, friend! (he cry'd).
No more in flattering hope confide.
Can thy good deeds in former times
Outweigh the balance of thy crimes?
What widow or what orphan prays
To crown thy life with length of days?
A pious action's in thy power,
Embrace with joy the happy hour.
Now, while you draw the vital air,
Prove your intention is sincere:
This instant give a hundred pound:
Your neighbours want, and you abound."

"But why such haste, the sick man whines;
Who knows as yet what Heaven designs?
Perhaps I may recover still,
That sum and more are in my will."

"Fool, says the vision, now 'tis plain
Your life, your soul, your Heaven, was gain.
From every side, with all your might,
You scrap'd, and scrap'd beyond your right;
And after death would fain atone,
By giving what is not your own."

"While there is life, there's hope, he cry'd;
Then why such haste?" so groan'd and dy'd.

FABLE XXVII.

The Persian, the Sun, and the Cloud.

Is there a bard whom genius fires,
Whose every thought the god inspires?
When envy reads the nervous lines,
She frets, she rails, she raves, she pines;
Her hissing snakes with venom swell;
She calls her venal train from hell:
The servile fiends her nod obey,
And all Curll's authors are in pay.
Fame calls up calumny and spite:
Thus shadow owes its birth to light.

As, prostrate to the god of day,
With heart devout, a Persian lay,
His invocation thus begun:

"Parent of light! all-seeing sun!
Prolific beam, whose rays dispense
The various gifts of Providence,
Accept our praise, our daily prayer;
Smile on our fields, and bless the year."

A cloud, who mock'd his grateful tongue,
The day with sudden darkness hung;
With pride and envy swell'd, aloud
A voice thus thunder'd from the cloud.

"Weak is this gaudy god of thine,
Whom I at will forbid to shine.
Shall I nor vows nor incense know?
Where praise is due, the praise bestow."

With fervent zeal the Persian mov'd,
Thus the proud calumny reprov'd:
"It was that god who claims my prayer
Who gave thee birth, and rais'd thee there;
When o'er his beams the veil is thrown,
Thy substance is but plainer shown:
A passing gale; a puff of wind,
Dispels thy thickest troops combin'd."

The gale arose; the vapour tost
(The sport of winds) in air was lost;
The glorious orb the day refines.
Thus envy breaks, thus merit shines.

FABLE XXIX.

The Fox at the point of Death.

A fox, in life's extreme decay,
Weak, sick, and faint, expiring lay:
All appetite had left his maw,
And age disarm'd his mumbling jaw.
His numerous race around him stand,
To learn their dying fire's command:
He rais'd his head with whining moan,
And thus was heard the feeble tone:

"Ah! Sons! from evil ways depart;
My crimes lie heavy on my heart.
See, see, the murder'd geese appear!
Why are those bleeding turkeys there;
Why all around this cackling train,
Who haunt my ears for chicken slain?"

The hungry foxes round them star'd,
And for the promis'd feast prepar'd.

"Where, Sir, is all this dainty cheer?
Nor turkey, goose, nor hen, is here.
These are the phantoms of your brain;
And your sons lick their lips in vain."

"O gluttons! says the drooping fire,
Restrain inordinate desire.

Your liquorish taste you shall deplore,
When peace of conscience is no more.
Does not the hound betray our pace,
And gins and guns destroy our race?
Thieves dread the searching eye of power!
And never feel the quiet hour
Old age (which few of us shall know)
Now puts a period to my woe.
Would you true happiness attain,
Let honesty your passions rein;
So live in credit and esteem,
And the good name you lost redeem."

"The counsel's good, a fox replies,
Could we perform what you advise.
Think what our ancestors have done;
A line of thieves from son to son.
To us descends the long disgrace,
And infamy hath mark'd our race.
Though we, like harmless sheep, should feed,
Honest in thought, in word, and deed,
Whatever hen-roost is decreas'd,
We shall be thought to share the feast.
The change shall never be believ'd.
A lost good name is ne'er retriev'd."

"Nay, then, replies the feeble fox,
(But, hark! I hear a hen that clucks)
Go; but be moderate in your food;
A chicken, too, might do me good."

FABLE XXX.

The setting Dog and the Partridge.

THE ranging dog the stubble tries,
And searches every breeze that flies;
The scent grows warm: with cautious fear
He creeps, and points the covey near;
The men in silence, far behind,
Conscious of game, the net unbind.

A partridge, with experience wise,
The fraudulent preparation spies;
She mocks their toils, alarms her brood,
The covey springs and seeks the wood;
But ere, her certain wings she tries:
Thus, to the creeping spaniel cries:

"Thou fawning slave to man's deceit,
Thou pimp of luxury, sneaking cheat,
Of thy whole species thou disgrace;
Dogs should disown thee of their race!
For, if I judge their native parts,
They're born with honest open hearts;
And, ere they serv'd man's wicked ends,
Were generous foes, or real friends."

When thus the dog, with scornful smile:
"Secure of wing, thou dar'st revile.
Clowns are to polish'd manners blind;
How ignorant is the rustic mind!
My worth sagacious courtiers see,
And to pre-eminence rise, like me.
The thriving pimp who beauty sets,
How oft enhanc'd a nation's debts:
Friend sets his friend, without regard,
And ministers his skill reward.
Thus train'd by man, I learn'd his ways;
And growing favour feasts my days."

"I might have guess'd, the partridge said,
The place where you were train'd and fed;
Servants are apt, and in a trice
Ape to a hair their master's vice.
You came from court, you say. Adieu!"
She said, and to the covey flew.

FABLE XXXI.

The universal Apparition.

A RAKE, by every passion rul'd,
With every vice his youth had cool'd;
Disease his tainted blood assails;
His spirits droop, his vigour fails:
With secret ills at home he pines,
And, like infirm old age, declines.

As, twing'd with pain, he pensive sits,
And raves, and prays, and swears, by fits,
A ghastly phantom, lean and wan,
Before him rose, and thus began:

"My name, perhaps, hath reach'd your ear;
Attend, and be advis'd by Care.
Nor love, nor honour, wealth, nor power,
Can give the heart a cheerful hour,
When health is lost. Be timely wise:
With health all taste of pleasure flies."

Thus said, the phantom disappears.
The wary counsel wak'd his fears.

He now from all excess abstains,
With physic purifies his veins;
And, to procure a sober life,
Resolves to venture on a wife.

But now again the sprite ascends,
Where'er he walks, his ear attends,
Insinuates that beauty's frail,
That perseverance must prevail;
With jealousies his brain inflames,
And whispers all her lovers' names.
In other hours she represents
His household charge, his annual rents,
Increasing debts, perplexing duns,
And nothing for his younger sons.

Straight all his thought to gain he turns,
And with the thirst of lucre burns.
But, when possess'd of fortune's store,
The spectre haunts him more and more;
Sets want and misery in view,
Bold thieves and all the murdering crew;
Alarms him with eternal frights,
Infest his dream, or wakes his nights.
How shall he chase this hideous guest?
Power may perhaps protect his rest.
To power he rose. Again the sprite
Besets him morning, noon, and night;
Talks of ambition's tottering seat,
How envy persecutes the great,
Of rival hate, of treacherous friends,
And what disgrace his fall attends.

The court he quits, to fly from Care,
And seeks the peace of rural air:
His groves, his fields, amus'd his hours;
He prun'd his trees, he rais'd his flowers.
But care again his steps pursues,
Warns him of blasts, of blighting dews,
Of plundering insects, snails, and rains,
And droughts that starv'd the labour'd plains.
Abroad, at home, the spectre's there;
In vain we seek to fly from Care.

At length he thus the ghost address:
"Since thou must be my constant guest,
Be kind, and follow me no more;
For Care, by right, should go before."

FABLE XXXII.

The two Owls and the Sparrow.

Two formal owls together sat,
Conferring thus in solemn chat:
"How is the modern taste decay'd!
Where's the respect to wisdom paid?
Our worth the Grecian sages knew;
They gave our fires the honour due;
They weigh'd the dignity of fowls,
And pry'd into the depth of owls.
Athens, the seat of learned fame,
With general voice rever'd our name,
On merit title was conferr'd,
And all ador'd th' Athenian bird."

"Brother, you reason well, replies
The solemn mate with half-shut eyes.
Right. Athens was the seat of learning,
And truly wisdom is discerning.
Besides, on Pallas' helm we sit,
The type and ornament of wit;

But now, alas! we're quite neglected,
And a pert sparrow's more respected."

A sparrow, who was lodg'd beside,
O'erhears them sooth each other's pride;
And thus he nimbly vents his heat:

"Who meets a fool must find conceit.
I grant you were at Athens grac'd;
And on Minerva's helm were plac'd;
But every bird that wings the sky,
Except an owl, can tell you why:
From hence they taught their schools to know
How false we judge by outward show;
That we should never look esteem,
Since fools as wise as you might seem.
Would ye contempt and scorn avoid,
Let your vain-glory be destroy'd;
Humble your arrogance of thought,
Pursue the ways by nature taught:
So shall you find delicious fare,
And grateful farmers praise your care;
So shall sleek mice your chase reward,
And no keen cat find more regard."

FABLE XXXIII.

The Courtier and Proteus.

WHENEVER a courtier's out of place,
The country shelters his disgrace;
Where, doom'd to exercise and health,
His house and gardens own his wealth.
He builds new schemes, in hope to gain
The plunder of another reign;
Like Philip's son, would fain be doing,
And sighs for other realms to ruin.

As one of these (without his wand)
Pensive along the winding strand
Employ'd the solitary hour,
In projects to regain his power,
The waves in spreading circles ran,
Proteus arose, and thus began:

"Came you from court? for in your mien
A self-important air is seen."

He frankly own'd his friends had trick'd him,
And how he fell his party's victim.

"Know, says the god, by matchless skill
I change to every shape at will;
But yet, I'm told, at court you see
Those who presume to rival me."

Thus said: a snake, with hideous trail,
Proteus extends his scaly mail.

"Know, says the man, though proud in place,
All courtiers are of reptile race.
Like you, they take that dreadful form,
Bask in the sun, and fly the storm;
With malice hiss, with envy glote,
And for convenience change their coat;
With new-got lustre rear their head,
Though on a dunghill born and bred."

Sudden the god a lion stands;
He shakes his mane, he spurns the sands.
Now a fierce lynx, with fiery glare;
A wolf, an ass, a fox, a bear.

"Had I ne'er liv'd at court, he cries,
Such transformations might surprise;

But there, in quest of daily game,
Each able courtier acts the same;
Wolves, lions, lynxes, while in place,
Their friends and fellows are their chase.
They play the bear's and fox's part,
Now rob by force, now steal with art.
They sometimes in the senate bray,
Or, chang'd again to beasts of prey,
Down from the lion to the ape,
Practise the frauds of every shape."
So said: upon the god he flies,
In cords the struggling captive ties.

"Now, Proteus! now (to truth compell'd)
Speak, and confess thy art excell'd.
Use strength, surprise, or what you will,
The courtier finds evasions still;
Not to be bound by any ties,
And never forc'd to leave his lies."

FABLE XXXIV.

The Mastiff.

THOSE who in quarrels interpose,
Must often wipe a bloody nose.
A mastiff, of true English blood,
Lov'd fighting better than his food.
When dogs were snarling for a bone,
He long'd to make the war his own,
And often found (when two contend)
To interpose obtain'd his end.
He glory'd in his limping pace;
The scars of honour seam'd his face;
In every limb a gash appears,
And frequent fights retrench'd his ears.

As on a time he heard from far
Two dogs engag'd in noisy war,
Away he scours, and lays about him,
Resolv'd no fray should be without him.
Forth from his yard a tanner flies,
And to the bold intruder cries:

"A cudgel shall correct your manners:
Whence sprung this cursed hate to tanners?
While on my dog you vent your spite,
Sirrah! 'tis me you dare not bite."

To see the battle thus perplex'd,
With equal rage a butcher, vex'd,
Hoarse-screaming from the circled crowd,
To the curs'd mastiff cries aloud:

Both Hockleyhole and Marybone
The combats of my dog have known:
He ne'er, like bullies, coward-hearted,
Attacks in public, to be parted.
Think not, rash fool, to share his fame;
Be his the honour, or the shame."

Thus said, they swore, and rav'd like thunder,
Then dragg'd their fasten'd dogs asunder;
While clubs and kicks from every side
Rebounding from the mastiff's hide.

All reeking now with sweat and blood,
A while the parted warriors stood;
Then pour'd upon the meddling foe,
Who, worried howl'd and sprawl'd below,
He rose; and limping from the fray,
By both sides mangled, sneak'd away.

FABLE XXXV.

The Barley-mow and the Dunghill.

How many saucy airs we meet
 From Temple-bar to Aldgate-street!
 Proud rogues, who shared the South-sea prey,
 And sprung like mushrooms in a day!
 They think it mean to condescend
 To know a brother or a friend;
 They blush to hear their mother's name,
 And by their pride expose their shame.

As cross his yard, at early day,
 A careful farmer took his way,
 He stopp'd; and, leaning on his fork,
 Observ'd the flail's incessant work.
 In thought he measur'd all his store,
 His geese, his hogs, he number'd o'er;
 In fancy weigh'd the fleeces shorn,
 And multiply'd the next year's corn.

A barley-mow, which stood beside,
 Thus to its musing master cry'd:

"Say, good Sir, is it fit or right
 To treat me with neglect and slight?
 Me, who contribute to your cheer,
 And raise your mirth with ale and beer?
 Why thus insulted, thus disgrac'd,
 And that vile dunghill near me plac'd?
 Are those poor sweepings of a groom,
 That filthy sight, that nauseous fume,
 Meet objects here? Command it hence;
 A thing so mean must give offence."

The humble dunghill thus reply'd:
 "Thy master hears, and mocks thy pride:
 Insult not thus the meek and low;
 In me thy benefactor know;
 My warm assistance gave thee birth,
 Or thou hadst perish'd low in earth;
 But up-starts, to support their station,
 Cancel at once all obligation."

FABLE XXXVI.

Pythagoras and the Countryman.

PYTHAGORAS rose at early dawn,
 By soaring meditation drawn;
 To breathe the fragrance of the day,
 Through flowery fields he took his way,
 In musing contemplation warm,
 His steps mislead him to a farm,
 Where on a ladder's topmost round
 A peasant stood; the hammer's sound
 Shook the weak barn. "Say, friend, what care
 Calls for thy honest labour there?"

The clown, with surly voice replies,
 "Vengeance aloud for justice cries.
 This kite, by daily rapine fed,
 My hens' annoy, my turkeys' dread,
 At length his forfeit life hath paid;
 See on the wall his wings display'd:
 Here nail'd, a terror to his kind,
 My fowls shall future safety find;
 My yard the thriving poultry feed,
 And my barns' refuse fat the breed."

"Friend, says the sage, the doom is wise;
 For public good the murderer dies:
 But, if these tyrants of the air
 Demand a sentence so severe,
 Think how the glutton, man, devours;
 What bloody feasts regale his hours!
 O impudence of power and might,
 Thus to condemn a hawk or kite.
 When thou, perhaps, carnivorous sinner,
 Hadst pullets yesterday for dinner."

"Hold, cry'd the clown, with passion heated,
 Shall kites and men alike be treated?
 When Heaven the world with creatures stor'd,
 Man was ordain'd their sovereign lord."

"Thus tyrants boast, the sage reply'd,
 Whose murders spring from power and pride.
 Own then this manlike kite is slain,
 Thy greater luxury to sustain;
 For "Petty rogues submit to fate,
 "That great ones may enjoy their state *!"

FABLE XXXVII.

The Farmer's Wife and the Raven.

Why are those tears? why droops your head?
 Is then your other husband dead?
 Or does a worse disgrace betide?
 Hath no one since his death apply'd;

Alas! you know the cause too well;
 The salt is spilt, to me it fell;
 Then, to contribute to my loss,
 My knife and fork were laid across;
 On Friday too! the day I dread!
 Would I were safe at home in bed!
 Last night (I vow to Heaven 'tis true)
 Bounce from the fire a coffin flew.
 Next post some fatal news shall tell:
 God send my Cornish friends be well!

Unhappy widow, cease thy tears,
 Nor feel affliction in thy fears;
 Let not thy stomach be suspended;
 Eat now, and weep when dinner's ended;
 And, when the butler clears the table,
 For thy desert I'll read my fable.

Betwixt her swagging panniers' load
 A farmer's wife to market rode,
 And, jogging on, with thoughtful care,
 Summ'd up the profits of her ware;
 When starting from her silver dream,
 Thus far and wide was heard her scream.

"That raven on yon left hand oak
 (Curse on his ill-betiding croak!)
 Bodes me no good." No more she said,
 When poor blind Ball, with stumbling tread,
 Fell prone; o'erturn'd the pannier lay,
 And her mash'd eggs bestrow'd the way.

She, sprawling in the yellow road,
 Rail'd, swore, and curs'd. "Thou croaking toad,
 A murrain take thy whorson throat!
 I knew mi-fortune in the note."

"Dame, quoth the raven, spare your oaths.
 Unclench your fist, and wipe your cloaths,

* Gartb's Dispensary.

But why on me those curses thrown?
Goody, the fault was all your own;
For, had you laid this brittle ware
On Dun, the old sure-footed mare,
Though all the ravens of the Hundred
With croaking had your tongue out-thundered,
Sure-footed Dun had kept her legs,
And you, good woman, sav'd your eggs."

FABLE XXXVIII

The Turkey and the Ant.

In other men we faults can spy,
And blame the mote that dims their eye,
Each little speck and blemish find;
To our own stronger errors blind.

A turkey, tir'd of common food,
Forsook the barn, and sought the wood;
Behind her ran an infant train,
Collecting here and there a grain.
"Draw near, my birds! the mother cries,
This hill delicious fare supplies;
Behold the busy negro race,
See millions blacken all the place!
Fear not; like me, with freedom eat;
An ant is most delightful meat.
How blest'd, how envy'd, were our life,
Could we but 'scape the poulterer's knife!
But man, curs'd man, on turkeys preys,
And Christmas shortens all our days.
Sometimes with oysters we combine,
Sometimes assist the savoury chine;
From the low peasant to the lord,
The turkey smokes on every board,
Sure men for gluttony are curs'd,
Of the seven deadly sins the worst."

An ant, who climb'd beyond his reach,
Thus answer'd from the neighbouring beech:
"Ere you remark another's sin,
Bid thy own conscience look within;
Control thy more voracious bill,
Nor for a breakfast nations kill."

FABLE XXXIX.

The Father and Jupiter.

THE man to Jove his suit preferr'd;
He begg'd a wife: his prayer was heard.
Jove wonder'd at his bold addressing;
For how precarious is the blessing!

A wife he takes: and now for heirs
Again he worries Heaven with prayers.
Jove nods assent; two hopeful boys
And a fine girl reward his joys.

Now more solicitous he grew,
And set their future lives in view;
He saw that all respect and duty
Were paid to wealth, to power, and beauty.

"Once more, he cries, accept my prayer;
Make my lov'd progeny thy care:
Let my first hope, my favourite boy,
All fortune's richest gifts enjoy.
My next with strong ambition fire;
May favour teach him to aspire,

Till he the step of power ascend,
And courtiers to their idol bend!
With every grace, with every charm,
My daughter's perfect features arm.
If Heaven approve, a father's blest'd."
Jove smiles, and grants his full request.

The first, a miser at the heart,
Studious of every griping art,
Heaps hoards on hoards with anxious pain,
And all his life devotes to gain.
He feels no joy, his cares increase,
He neither wakes nor sleeps in peace;
In fancy'd want (a wretch complete)
He starves, and yet he dares not eat.
The next to sudden honours grew;
The thriving art of courts he knew;
He reach'd the height of power and place,
Then fell the victim of disgrace.

Beauty with early bloom supplies
His daughter's cheeks, and points her eyes,
The vain coquette each suit disdains,
And glories in her lovers' pains.
With age she fades, each lover flies;
Contemn'd, forlorn, she pines, and dies.

When Jove the father's grief survey'd,
And heard him Heaven and Fate upbraid,
Thus spoke the god: "By outward show
Men judge of happiness and woe.
Shall ignorance of good and ill
Dare to direct th' eternal will?
Seek virtue; and, of that possess,
To Providence resign the rest."

FABLE XL.

The two Monks.

THE learned, full of inward pride,
The fops of outward show deride;
The fop, with learning at defiance,
Scoffs at the pedant and the science:
The Don, a formal solemn strutter,
Despises Monsieur's airs and flutter;
While Monsieur mocks the formal fool,
Who looks, and speaks, and walks, by rule.
Britain, a medley of the twain,
As pert as France, as grave as Spain,
In fancy wiser than the rest,
Laughs at them both, of both the jest.
Is not the poet's chiming close
Censur'd by all the sons of prose?
While bards of quick imagination
Despise the sleepy prose narration.
Men laugh at apes: they men contemn;
For what are we but apes to them?

Two monkeys went to Southwark fair;
No critics had a sourer air;
They forc'd their way through draggled folks,
Who gap'd to catch Jack Pudding's jokes;
Then took their tickets for the show,
And got by chance the foremost row.
To see their grave observing face,
Provok'd a laugh through all the place.

"Brother, says Pug, and turn'd his head,
The rabble's monstrously ill-bred."

Now through the booth loud hisses ran,
Nor ended till the show began.

The tumbler whirls the flip-flap round,
With somersets he shakes the ground;
The cord beneath the dancer springs;
Aloft in air the vaulter swings;
Distorted now, now prone depends,
Now through his twisted arm ascends;
The crowd, in wonder and delight,
With clapping hands applaud the sight.

With smiles, quoth pug, "If pranks like these
The giant apes of reason please,
How would they wonder at our arts!
They must adore us for our parts.
High on the twig I've seen you cling,
Play, twist, and turn in airy ring;
How can those clumsy things, like me,
Fly with a bound from tree to tree?
But yet, by this applause, we find
These emulators of our kind
Discern our worth, our parts regard,
Who our mean mimics thus reward."

"Brother, the grinning mate replies,
In this I grant that man is wise:
While good example they pursue,
We must allow some praise is due;
But, when they strain beyond their guide,
I laugh to scorn the mimic pride;
For how fantastic is the sight,
To meet men always bolt upright,
Because we sometimes walk on two!
I hate the imitating crew."

F A B L E XLI.

The Owl and the Farmer.

AN owl of grave deport and mien,
Who (like the Turk) was seldom seen,
Within a barn had chose his station,
As fit for prey and contemplation:
Upon a beam aloft he sits,
And nods, and seems to think by fits.
So have I seen a man of news
Or post-boy or gazette peruse,
Smoke, nod, and talk with voice profound,
And fix the fate of Europe round.
Sheaves pil'd on sheaves hid all the floor:
At dawn of morn to view his store
The Farmer came. The hooting guest
His self-importance thus exprest:

"Reason in man is mere pretence:
How weak, how shallow, is his sense!
To tread with scorn the bird of night,
Declares his folly or his spite.
Then, too, how partial is his praise!
The lark's, the linnet's, chirping lays
To his ill-judging ears are fine;
And nightingales are all divine:
But the more knowing feather'd race
See wisdom stamp'd upon my face.
Whene'er to visit light I deign,
What flocks of fowl compose my train!
Like slaves, they crowd my flight behind,
And own me of superior kind."

The Farmer laugh'd, and thus reply'd:
"Thou dull important lump of pride,
Dar'st thou with that harsh grating tongue
Depreciate birds of warbling song?"

Indulge thy spleen: know men and fowl
Regard thee, as thou art, an owl.
Besides, proud blockhead! be not vain
Of what thou call'st thy slaves and train:
Few follow wisdom or her rules;
Fools in derision follow fools."

F A B L E XLII.

The Jugglers.

A JUGGLER long through all the town
Had rais'd his fortune and renown;
You'd think (so far his art transcends)
The devil at his fingers ends.

Vice heard his fame, she read his bill;
Convinc'd of his inferior skill,
She sought his booth, and frown the crowd
Defy'd the man of art aloud.

"Is this then he so fam'd for sleight?
Can this slow bungler cheat your sight?
Dares he with me dispute the prize?
I leave it to impartial eyes."

Provok'd, the Juggler cry'd, "'Tis done;
In science I submit to none."

Thus said, the cups and balls he play'd;
By turns this here, that there, convey'd.
The cards, obedient to his words,
Are by a fillip turn'd to birds.

His little boxes change the grain:
Trick after trick deludes the train.

He shakes his bag, he shows all fair;
His fingers spread, and nothing there;

Then bids it rain, with showers of gold;
And now his ivory eggs are told;

But, when from thence the hen he draws,
Amaz'd spectators hum applause.

Vice now stept forth, and took the place,
With all the forms of his grimace.

"This magic looking-glass, she cries,
(There, hand it round) will charm your eyes."
Each eager eye the sight desir'd,
And every man himself admir'd.

Next, to a senator addressing,
"See this bank-note; observe the blessing,
Breathe on the bill. Heigh, pass! 'Tis gone."
Upon his lips a padlock shone.
A second puff the magic broke;
The padlock vanish'd, and he spoke.

Twelve bottles rang'd upon the board
All full, with heady liquor stor'd,
By clean conveyance disappear,
And now two bloody swords are there.

A purse she to a thief expos'd;
At once his ready fingers clos'd.
He opes his fist, the treasure's fled;
He sees a halter in its stead.

She bids ambition hold a wand;
He grasps a hatchet in his hand.

A box of charity she shows,
"Blow here;" and a church-warden blows.
'Tis vanish'd with conveyance neat,
And on the table smokes a treat.

She shakes the dice, the board she knocks,
And from all pockets fills her box.

She next a meagre rake address,
"This picture see; her shape, her breast!"

What youth, and what inviting eyes!
Hold her, and have her." With surprise,
His hand expos'd a box of pills,
And a loud laugh proclaim'd his ills.

A counter, in a miser's hand,
Grew twenty guineas at command.
She bids his heir the sum retain,
And 'tis a counter now again.

A guinea with her touch you see
Take every shape but charity;
And not one thing you saw, or drew,
But chang'd from what was first in view.

The Juggler now, in grief of heart,
With this submission own'd her art.

"Can I such matchless sleight withstand!
How practice hath improv'd your hand!
But now and then I cheat the throng;
You every day, and all day long."

FABLE XLIII.

The Council of Horses.

UPON a time a neighing ffeed,
Who graz'd among a numerous breed,
With mutiny had fir'd the train,
And spread dissension through the plain.
On matters that concern'd the state,
The council met in grand debate.
A colt, whose eye-balls flam'd with ire,
Elate with strength and youthful fire,
In haste stept forth before the rest,
And thus the listening throng address'd.

"Good gods! how abject is our race,
Condemn'd to slavery and disgrace!
Shall we our servitude retain,
Because our fires have borne the chain?
Consider, friends! your strength and might;
'Tis conquest to assert your right.
How cumbrous is the gilded coach!
The pride of man is our reproach.
Were we design'd for daily toil,
To drag the ploughshare through the soil,
To sweat in harness through the road,
To groan beneath the carrier's load?
How feeble are the two-legg'd kind!
What force is in our nerves combin'd!
Shall then our nobler jaws submit
To foam and champ the galling bit?
Shall haughty man my back bestride?
Shall the sharp spur provoke my side?
Forbid it, heavens! reject the rein;
Your shame, your infamy, disdain.
Let him the lion first controul,
And still the tiger's famish'd growl.
Let us, like them, our freedom claim,
And make him tremble at our name."

A general nod approv'd the cause,
And all the circle neigh'd applause.
When, lo! with grave and solemn pace,
A steed advanc'd before the race,
With age and long experience wise;
Around he cast his thoughtful eyes,
And, to the murmurs of the train,
Thus spoke the Nestor of the plain.

"When I had health and strength, like you,
The toils of servitude I knew;

Now grateful man rewards my pains,
And gives me all these wide domains.
At will I crop the year's increase;
My latter life is rest and peace.
I grant, to man we lend our pains,
And aid him to correct the plains;
But doth not he divide the care,
Through all the labours of the year?
How many thousand structures rise,
To fence us from inclement skies!
For us he bears the sultry day,
And stores up all our winter's hay.
He sows, he reaps the harvest's gain;
We share the toil, and share the grain.
Since every creature was decreed
To aid each other's mutual need,
Appease your discontented mind,
And act the part by heaven assign'd."
The tumult ceas'd. The colt submitted,
And, like his ancestors, was bitted.

FABLE XLIV.

The Hound and the Huntsman.

IMPERTINENCE at first is borne
With heedless light, or smiles of scorn;
Teaz'd into wrath, what patience bears
The noisy fool who perseveres?

The morning wakes, the huntsman sounds,
At once rush forth the joyful hounds;
They seek the wood with eager pace,
Through bush, through brier, explore the chase;
Now scatter'd wide they try the plain,
And snuff the dewy turf in vain.
What care, what industry, what pains!
What universal silence reigns!

Ringwood, a dog of little fame,
Young, pert, and ignorant of game,
At once displays his bubbling throat;
The pack, regardless of the note,
Pursue the scent; with louder strain
He still persists to vex the train.

The huntsman to the clamour flies,
The smacking lash he smartly plies.
His ribs all welk'd, with howling tone
The puppy thus express'd his moan:

"I know the music of my tongue
Long since the pack with envy stung.
What will not spite? These bitter smarts
I owe to my superior parts."

"When puppies prate, the huntsman cry'd,
They show both ignorance and pride:
Fools may our scorn, not envy, raise;
For envy is a kind of praise.
Had not thy forward noisy tongue
Proclaim'd thee always in the wrong,
Thou might'st have mingled with the rest,
And ne'er thy foolish nose confest;
But fools, to talking ever prone,
Are sure to make their follies known."

FABLE XLV.

The Poet and the Rose.

I HATE the man who builds his name
On ruins of another's fame.

Thus prudes, by characters o'erthrown,
Imagine that they raise their own.
Thus scribblers, covetous of praise,
Think slander can transplant the bays.
Beauties and bards have equal pride,
With both all rivals are decry'd.
Who praises Lesbia's eyes and feature,
Must call her sister awkward creature;
For the kind flattery's sure to charm,
When we some other nymph disarm.

As in the cool of early day
A poet sought the sweets of May,
The garden's fragrant breath ascends,
And every stalk with odour bends;
A rose he pluck'd, he gaz'd, admir'd,
Thus singing, as the muse inspir'd:
"Go, rose, my Chloe's bosom grace;
"How happy shall I prove,
"Might I supply that envy'd place
"With never-fading love!
"There, phoenix-like, beneath her eye,
"Involv'd in fragrance, burn and die.
"Know, hapless flower! that thou shalt find
"More fragrant roses there;
"I see thy withering head reclin'd
"With envy and despair!
"One common fate we both must prove;
"You die with envy, I with love."
"Spare your comparisons, reply'd
An angry rose, who grew beside.
Of all mankind you should not flout us;
What can a poet do without us?
In every love-song roses bloom;
We lend you colour and perfume:
Does it to Chloe's charms conduce,
To sound her praise on our abuse?
Must we, to flatter her, be made
To wither, envy, pine, and fade?

F A B L E XLVI.

The Cur, the Horse, and the Shepherd's Dog.

THE lad of all-sufficient merit
With modesty ne'er damps his spirit;
Presuming on his own deserts,
On all alike his tongue exerts;
His noisy jokes at random throws,
And pertly spatters friend and foes.
In wit and war the bully race
Contribute to their own disgrace:
Too late the forward youth shall find
That jokes are sometimes paid in kind;
Or, if they canker in the breast,
He makes a foe who makes a jest.

A village cur, of snappish race,
The pertest puppy of the place,
Imagin'd that his treble throat
Was blest with music's sweetest note;
In the mid road he basking lay,
The yelping nuisance of the way;
For not a creature pass'd along,
But had a sample of his song.
Soon as the trotting steed he hears,
He starts, he cocks his dapper ears;
Away he scowrs, assaults his hoof;
Now near him snarls, now barks aloof;

With shrill impertinence attends,
Nor leaves him till the village ends.
It chanc'd, upon his evil day,
A pad came pacing down the way;
The cur, with never-ceasing tongue,
Upon the passing traveller sprung.
The horse, from scorn provok'd to ire,
Flung backward; rolling in the mire,
The puppy howl'd, and bleeding lay;
The pad in peace pursu'd his way.

A shepherd's dog, who saw the deed,
Detesting the vexations breed,
Bespoke him thus: "When coxcombs prate,
They kindle wrath, contempt, or hate;
Thy teasing tongue had judgment ty'd,
Thou hadst not like a puppy dy'd."

F A B L E XLVII.

The Court of Death.

DEATH, on a solemn night of state,
In all his pomp of terror fate:
Th' attendants of his gloomy reign,
Diseases dire, a ghastly train!
Crowd the vast court. With hollow tone,
A voice thus thunder'd from the throne:
"This night our minister we name,
Let every servant speak his claim;
Merit shall bear this ebony wand."
All, at the word, stretch'd forth their hand.

Fever, with burning heat possess'd,
Advanc'd, and for the wand address'd.

"I to the weekly bills appeal,
Let those express my fervent zeal;
On every slight occasion near,
With violence I persevere."

Next Gout appears with limping pace,
Pleads how he shifts from place to place;
From head to foot how swift he flies,
And every joint and sinew plies;
Still working when he seems suppress'd,
A most tenacious stubborn guest.

A haggard spectre from the crew
Crawls forth, and thus asserts his due:
"'Tis I who taint the sweetest joy,
And in the shape of love destroy;
My shanks, sunk eyes, and noseless face,
Prove my pretension to the place."

Stone urg'd his over-growing force;
And, next, Consumption's meagre corse,
With feeble voice that scarce was heard,
Broke with short coughs, his suit preferr'd:
"Let none object my lingering way,
I gain, like Fabius, by delay;
Fatigue and weaken every foe
By long attack, secure, though slow."

Plague represents his rapid power,
Who thinn'd a nation in an hour.

All spoke their claim, and hop'd the wand.
Now expectation hush'd the band;
When thus the monarch from the throne:

"Merit was ever modest known.
What, no physician speak his right!
None here! but sees their toils requite.
Let then Intemperance take the wand,
Who fills with gold their zealous hand."

You, Fever, Gout, and all the rest,
 (Whom wary men, as foes, detest)
 Forego your claim; no more pretend;
 Intemperance is esteem'd a friend;
 He shares their mirth, their social joys,
 And as a courted guest destroys.
 The charge on him must justly fall,
 Who finds employment for you all."

FABLE XLVIII.

The Gardener and the Hog.

A GARDENER, of peculiar taste,
 On a young hog his favour plac'd,
 Who fed not with the common herd;
 His tray was to the hall preferr'd.
 He wallow'd underneath the board,
 Or in his master's chamber snor'd,
 Who fondly stroak'd him every day,
 And taught him all the puppy's play.
 Where'er he went, the grunting friend
 Ne'er fail'd his pleasure to attend.

As on a time the loving pair
 Walk'd forth to tend the garden's care,
 The master thus address'd the swine:

"My house, my garden, all is thine,
 On turnips feast whene'er you please,
 And riot in my beans and pease;
 If the potatoe's taste delights,
 Or the red carrot's sweet invites,
 Indulge thy morn and evening hours;
 But let due care regard my flowers:
 My tulips are my garden's pride:
 What vast expence those beds supply'd!"

The hog by chance one morning roam'd,
 Where with new ale the vessels foam'd;
 He munches now the steaming grains,
 Now with full swill the liquor drains.
 Intoxicating fumes arise;

He reels, he rolls his winking eyes;
 Then staggering through the garden scours,
 And treads down painted ranks of flowers.
 With delving snout he turns the soil,
 And cools his palate with the spoil.

The master came, the ruin spy'd;
 "Villain! suspend thy rage (he cry'd.)
 Hast thou, thou most ungrateful sot,
 My charge, my only charge, forgot?
 What, all my flowers?" No more he said,
 But gaz'd, and sigh'd, and hung his head.

The hog with fluttering speech returns:
 "Explain, Sir, why your anger burns.
 See there, untouch'd, your tulips strown,
 For I devour'd the roots alone."

At this the gardener's passion grows;
 From oaths and threats he fell to blows.
 The stubborn brute the blows sustains,
 Assaults his leg, and tears the veins.

"Ah, foolish swain! too late you find
 That styes were for such friends design'd!"

Homeward he limps with painful pace,
 Reflecting thus on past disgrace:

"Who cherishes a brutal mate,
 Shall mourn the folly soon or late."

FABLE XLIX.

The Man and the Flea.

WHETHER on earth, in air, or main,
 Sure every thing alive is vain!

Does not the hawk all fowls survey,
 As destin'd only for his prey?
 And do not tyrants, prouder things,
 Think men were born for slaves to kings?

When the crab views the pearly strands,
 Or Tagus, bright with golden sands,
 Or crawls beside the coral grove,
 And hears the ocean roll above,
 "Nature is too profuse (says he),
 Who gave all these to pleasure me!"

When bordering pinks and roses bloom,
 And every garden breathes perfume;
 When peaches glow with sunny dyes,
 Like Laura's cheek when blushes rise;
 When with huge figs the branches bend,
 When clusters from the vine depend;
 The snail looks round on flower and tree,
 And cries, "all these were made for me!"

"What dignity's in human nature!"
 Says man, the most conceited creature,
 As from a cliff he cast his eye,
 And view'd the sea and arched sky.
 The sun was sunk beneath the main;
 The moon and all the starry train
 Hung the vast vault of heaven. The man
 His contemplation thus began:

"When I behold this glorious show,
 And the wide watery world below,
 The scaly people of the main,
 The beasts that range the wood or plain,
 The wing'd inhabitants of air,
 The day, the night, the various year;
 And know all these by heaven design'd
 As gifts to pleasure human-kind;
 I cannot raise my worth too high;
 Of what vast consequence am I!"

"Not of th' importance you suppose,"
 Replies a flea upon his nose.
 Be humble, learn thyself to scan;
 Know, pride was never made for man.
 'Tis vanity that swells thy mind.
 What, heaven and earth for thee design'd!
 For thee, made only for our need,
 That more important fleas might feed."

FABLE L.

The Hare and Many Friends.

FRIENDSHIP, like love, is but a name,
 Unless to one you flint the flame.

The child, whom many fathers share,
 Hath seldom known a father's care.
 'Tis thus in friendships; who depend
 On many, rarely find a friend.

A hare who, in a civil way,
 Comply'd with every thing, like Gay,
 Was known by all the bestial train
 Who haunt the wood, or graze the plain;
 Her care was never to offend;
 And every creature was her friend.

As forth she went at early dawn,
To taste the dew-besprinkled lawn,
Behind she hears the hunter's cries,
And from the deep-mouth'd thunder flies.
She starts, she stops, she pants for breath;
She hears the near advance of death;
She doubles to mislead the hound,
And measures back her mazy round;
Till, fainting in the public way,
Half dead with fear she gasping lay.

What transport in her bosom grew,
When first the horse appear'd in view!

"Let me, says she, your back ascend,
And owe my safety to a friend.
You know my feet betray my flight;
To friendship every burden's light."

The horse reply'd, "Poor honest puss,
It grieves my heart to see thee thus:
Be comforted, relief is near,
Far all your friends are in the rear."

She next the stately bull implor'd;
And thus reply'd the mighty lord:

"Since every beast alive can tell
That I sincerely wish you well,
I may, without offence, pretend
To take the freedom of a friend.
Love calls me hence; a favourite cow
Expects me near yon barley-mow;
And, when a lady's in the case,
You know, all other things give place.
To leave you thus might seem unkind;
But see, the goat is just behind."

The goat remark'd "her pulse was high,
Her languid head, her heavy eye:
My back, says he, may do you harm;
The sheep's at hand, and wool is warm."

The sheep was feeble, and complain'd
"His sides a load of wool sustain'd;
Said, he was slow, confess'd his fears;
For hounds eat sheep as well as hares."

She now the trotting calf address'd,
To save from death a friend distress'd,

"Shall I, says he, of tender age,
In this important care engage?
Older and abler pass'd you by;
How strong are those! how weak am I!
Should I presume to bear you hence,
Those friends of mine may take offence.
Excuse me, then; you know my heart;
But dearest friends, alas! must part.
How shall we all lament! Adieu;
For see the hounds are just in view."

PART II.

Advertisement.

These Fables were finished by Mr. Gay, and intended for the press a short time before his death; when they were left, with his other papers, to the care of his noble friend and patron the Duke of Queensberry. His Grace has accordingly permitted them to the press; and they are here printed from the originals in the author's own hand-writing. We hope they will please equally with his former Fables, though mostly on subjects of a graver and more political turn. They will certainly show him to have been (what he esteemed the best character) a man of a truly honest heart, and a sincere lover of his country.

FABLE I.

The Dog and the Fox.—To a Lawyer.

I know you lawyers can, with ease,
Twist words and meanings as you please;
That language, by your skill made pliant,
Will bend to favour every client;
That 'tis the fee directs the sense,
To make out either side's pretence.
When you peruse the clearest case,
You see it with a double face:
For scepticism's your profession;
You hold there's doubt in all expression.

Hence is the bar with fees supply'd;
Hence eloquence takes either side.
Your hand would have but paltry gleanings,
Could every man express his meaning.
Who dares presume to pen a deed,
Unless you previously are fee'd?
'Tis drawn; and, to augment the cost,
In dull prolixity engross.

And now we're well secur'd by law,
Till the next brother find a flaw.

Read o'er a will. Was't ever known
But you could make the will your own?
For, when you read, 'tis with intent
To find out meanings never meant.
Since things are thus, se defendendo,
I bar fallacious innuendo.

Sagacious Porta's skill could trace
Some beast or bird in every face.
The head, the eye, the nose's shape,
Prov'd this an owl, and that an ape.
When, in the sketches thus design'd,
Resemblance brings some friend to mind,
You show the piece, and give the hint,
And find each feature in the print;
So monstrous-like the portrait's found,
All know it, and the laugh goes round,
Like him I draw from general nature;
Is't I or you then fix the satire?

So, Sir, I beg you, spare your pains
In making comments on my strains.
All private slander I detest,
I judge not of my neighbour's breast:
Party and prejudice I hate,
And write no libels on the state.

Shall not my fable censure vice,
Because a knave is over-nice?
And, lest the guilty hear and dread,
Shall not the decalogue be read?
If I lash vice in general fiction,
Is't I apply, or self-conviction?
Brutes are my theme. Am I to blame,
If men and morals are the same?
I no man call or ape or ass;
'Tis his own conscience holds the glass.

Thus void of all offence I write :

Who claims the fable, knows his right.

A shepherd's dog unskill'd in sports,
Pick'd up acquaintance of all sorts;
Among the rest a fox he knew;
By frequent chat their friendship grew.

Says Reynard, " 'Tis a cruel case,
That man should stigmatize our race.
No doubt, among us rogues you find,
As among dogs and human kind;
And yet (unknown to me and you)
'There may be honest men and true.
Thus slander tries whate'er it can
To put us on the foot with man.

Let my own actions recommend;
No prejudice can blind a friend:
You know me free from all disguise;
My honour as my life I prize."

By talk like this, from all mistrust
The dog was cur'd, and thought him just.

As on a time the fox held forth
On conscience, honesty, and worth,
Sudden he stopp'd; he cock'd his ear;
Low dropt his bushy tail with fear.

" Bless us! the hunters are abroad:
What's all that clatter on the road?"

" Hold, says the dog, we're safe from harm,
'Twas nothing but a false alarm.

At yonder town 'tis market-day;
Some farmer's wife is on the way;
'Tis so (I know her pyebald mare),
Dame Dobbins with her poultry-ware."

Reynard grew huff. Says he, " This sneer
From you I little thought to hear:
Your meaning in your looks I see.
Pray, what's Dame Dobbins, friend, to me?
Did I e'er make her poultry thinner!
Prove that I owe the dame a dinner."

" Friend, quoth the cur, I meant no harm;
Then why so captious? why so warm?
My words in common acceptation,
Could never give this provocation.
No lamb (for aught I ever knew)
May be more innocent than you."

At this, gall'd Reynard winc'd, and swore
Such language ne'er was given before.

" What's lamb to me? this saucy hint
Shows me, base knave, which way you squint.
If th' other night your master lost
Three lambs, am I to pay the cost?
Your vile reflections would imply
That I'm the thief. You dog, you lie."

" Thou knave, thou fool! (the dog reply'd)
The name is just, take either side;
Thy guilt these applications speak:
Sirrah, 'tis conscience makes you squeak."

So saying, on the fox he flies:
The self-convicted felon dies.

FABLE II.

The Vulture, the Sparrow, and other Birds.

TO A FRIEND IN THE COUNTRY.

ERE I begin, I must premise,
Our ministers are good and wise;

So, though malicious tongues apply.

Pray what care they, or what care I?

If I am free with courts, be't known,
I ne'er presume to mean our own.
If general morals seem to joke
On ministers, and such-like folk,
A captious fool may take offence;
What then? He knows his own pretence,
I meddle with no state-affairs,
But spare my jest to save my ears.
Our present schemes are too profound,
For Machiavel himself to sound:
To censure them I 'ave no pretension;
I own they're past my comprehension.

You say your brother wants a place,
('Tis many a younger brother's case)
And that he very soon intends
To ply the court, and teaze his friends.
If there his merits chance to find
A patriot of an open mind,
Whose constant actions prove him just
To both a king's and people's trust,
May he, with gratitude, attend,
And owe his rise to such a friend!

You praise his parts, for business fit,
His learning, probity, and wit;
But those alone will never do,
Unless his patron have them too.

I 'ave heard of times (pray God defend us!)
We're not so good but he can mend us)
When wicked ministers have trod
On kings and people, law and God;
With arrogance they girt the throne,
And knew no interest but their own.
Then virtue, from preferment barr'd
Gets nothing but its own reward.

A gang of petty knaves attend 'em,
With proper parts to recommend 'em.
Then, if his patron burn with lust,
The first in favour's pimp the first.
His doors are never clos'd to spies,
Who cheer his heart with double lies;
They flatter him, his foes defame,
So lull the pangs of guilt and shame.
If schemes of lucre haunt his brain,
Projectors swell his greedy train;
Vile brokers ply his private ear
With jobs of plunder for the year;
All consciences must bend and ply?
You must vote on, and know not why:
Through thick and thin you must go on;
One scruple, and your place is gone.

Since plagues like these have curs'd a land,
And favourites cannot always stand,
Good courtiers should for change be ready,
And not have principles too steady;
For, should a knave engross the power,
(God shield the realm from that sad hour!)
He must have rogues or slavish fools;
For what's a knave without his tools?

Wherever those a people drain,
And strut with infamy and gain,
I envy not their guilt and state,
And scorn to share the public hate.
Let their own servile creatures rise,
By screening fraud, and venting lies;

Give me, kind Heaven, a private station *,
A mind serene for contemplation :
Title and profit I resign ;
The post of honour shall be mine.
My fable read, their merits view,
Then herd who will with such a crew.

In days of yore (my cautious rhymes Always except the present times)
A greedy vulture, skill'd in game,
Inur'd to guilt, unaw'd by shame,
Approach'd the throne in evil hour,
And step by step intrudes to power :
When at the royal eagle's ear,
He longs to ease the monarch's care.

The monarch grants. With pride elate,
Behold him minister of state !
Around him throng the feather'd rout ;
Friends must be serv'd, and some must out :
Each thinks his own the best pretension ;
This asks a place, and that a pension ;

The nightingale was set aside,
A forward daw his room supply'd.

" This bird (says he) for business fit,
Hath both sagacity and wit :
With all his turns, and shifts, and tricks,
He's docile, and at nothing sticks :
Then with his neighbours one so free
At all times will connive at me."

The hawk had due distinction shown,
For parts and talents like his own.
Thousands of hireling cocks attend him,
As blustering bullies to defend him.

At once the ravens were discarded,
And magpies with their posts rewarded.

Those fowls of omen I detest,
That pry into another's nest.
State-lies must lose all good intent,
For they foresee and croak th' event.
My friends ne'er think, but talk by rote,
Speak what they're taught, and so to vote.

" When rogues like these (a sparrow cries)
To honours and employments rise
I court no favour, ask no place ;
From such preferment is disgrace.
Within my thatch'd retreat I find
(What these ne'er feel) true peace of mind."

F A B L E III.

The Baboon and the Poultry.

TO A LEVEE-HUNTER.

WE frequently misplace esteem,
By judging men by what they seem.
To birth, wealth, power, we should allow
Precedence, and our lowest bow :
In that is due distinction shown ;
Esteem is virtue's right alone.

With partial eye we're apt to see
The man of noble pedigree :
We're prepossess'd my lord inherits,
In some degree his grandfire's merits ;

* — " When impious men bear sway,
" The post of honour is a private station."

ADDISON.

For those we find upon record,
But find him nothing but my lord.

When we, with superficial view,
Gaze on the rich, we're dazzled too.
We know that wealth, well understood,
Hath frequent power of doing good ;
Then fancy that the thing is done,
As if the power and will were one.
Thus oft the cheated crowd adore
The thriving knaves that keep them poor.

The cringing train of power survey ;
What creatures are so poor as they !
With what obsequiousness they bend !
To what vile actions condescend !
Their rise is on their meanness built,
And flattery is their smallest guilt.
What homage, reverence, adoration,
In every age, in every nation,
Have sycophants to power address'd !
No matter who the power possess'd.
Let ministers be what they will,
You find their levees always fill :
Ev'n those who have perplex'd a state,
Whose actions claim contempt and hate,
Had wretches to applaud their schemes,
Though more absurd than madmen's dreams.
When barbarous Moloch was invok'd,
The blood of infants only smok'd !
But here (unless all history lies)
Whole realms have been a sacrifice.

Look through all courts : 'tis power we find
The general idol of mankind ;
There worshipp'd under every shape,
Alike the lion, fox, and ape,
Are follow'd by time-serving slaves ;
Rich prostitutes and needy knaves.

Who then shall glory in his post ?
How frail his pride, how vain his boast !
The followers of his prosperous hour
Are as unstable as his power.
Power, by the breath of Flattery nurs'd,
The more it swells is nearer burst ;
The bubble breaks, the gewgaw ends,
And in a dirty tear descends.

Once on a time an ancient maid,
By wishes and by time decay'd,
To cure the pangs of restless thought,
In birds and beasts amusement sought :
Dogs, parrots, apes, her hours employ'd ;
With these alone she talk'd and toy'd.

A huge baboon her fancy took (Almost a man in size and look)
He finger'd every thing he found,
And mimick'd all the servants round ;
Then, too, his parts and ready wit
Show'd him for every business fit.
With all these talents 'twas but just
That pug should hold a place of trust ;
So to her favourite was assign'd
The charge of all her feather'd kind.
'Twas his to tend them eve and morn,
And portion out their daily corn.

Behold him now, with haughty stride,
Assume a ministerial pride.
The morning rose. In hope of picking,
Swans, turkeys, peacocks, ducks, and chicken,

Fowls of all ranks surround his hut,
To worship his important strut.
The minister appears. The crowd,
Now here, now there, obsequious bow'd.
This prais'd his parts, and that his face,
Th' other his dignity in place.
From bill to bill the flattery ran:
He hears and bears it like a man;
For, when we flatter self-conceit,
We but his sentiments repeat.

If we're too scrupulously just,
What profit's in a place of trust;
The common practice of the great
Is to secure a snug retreat.

So Pug began to turn his brain

(Like other folks in place) on gain.

An apple-woman's stall was near,
Well stock'd with fruits through all the year:
Here every day he cramm'd his guts,
Hence were his hordes of pears and nuts;
For 'twas agreed (in way of trade)
His payments should in corn be made.

The stock of grain was quickly spent,
And no account which way it went.
Then, too, the poultry's starv'd condition
Caus'd speculations of suspicion.

The facts were prov'd beyond dispute;
Pug must refund his hordes of fruit;
And, though then minister in chief,
Was branded as a public thief.
Disgrac'd, despis'd, confin'd to chains,
He nothing but his pride retains.

A goose pass'd by; he knew the face,
Seen every levee while in place.

"What, no respect! no reverence shown!
How saucy are these creatures grown!
Not two days since (says he) you bow'd
The lowest of my fawning crowd."

"Proud fool! (replies the goose) 'tis true
Thy corn a fluttering levee drew;
For that I join'd the hungry train,
And sold thee flattery for thy grain.
But then, as now, conceited ape,
We saw thee in thy proper shape."

FABLE IV.

The Ant in Office.—To a Friend.

You tell me that you apprehend
My verse may touchy folks offend.
In prudence, too, you think my rhymes
Should never squint at courtiers crimes;
For though nor this nor that is meant,
Can we another's thoughts prevent?

You ask me if I ever knew
Court chaplains thus the lawn pursue?
I meddle not with gown or lawn;
Poets, I grant, to rise must fawn;
They know great ears are over-nice,
And never shock their patron's vice.
But I this hackney-path despise;
'Tis my ambition not to rise.
If I must prostitute the muse,
The base conditions I refuse.

I neither flatter nor defame,
Yet own I would bring guilt to shame.

If I corruption's hand expose,
I make corrupted men my foes;
What then? I hate the paltry tribe:
Be virtue mine; be theirs the bribe.
I no man's property invade;
Corruption's yet no lawful trade.
Nor would it mighty ills produce,
Could I shame bribery out of use.
I know 'twould cramp most politicians
Were they ty'd down to these conditions.
'Twould stint their power, their riches bound,
And make their parts seem less profound.
Were they deny'd their proper tools,
How could they lead their knaves and fools?
Were this the case, let's take a view
What dreadful mischiefs would ensue.
Though it might aggrandize the state,
Could private luxury dine on plate?
Kings might indeed their friends reward,
But ministers find less regard.
Informers, sycophants, and spies,
Would not augment the year's supplies.
Perhaps, too, take away this prop,
An annual job or two might drop.
Besides, if pensions were deny'd,
Could avarice support its pride?
It might ev'n ministers confound,
And yet the state be safe and sound.

I care not though 'tis understood;
I only mean my country's good:
And (let who will my freedom blame)
I wish all courtiers did the same.
Nay, though some folks the less might get,
I wish the nation out of debt.
I put no private man's ambition
With public good in competition:
Rather than have our laws defac'd,
I'd vote a minister disgrac'd.

I strike at vice, be't where it will;
And what if great folks take it ill?
I hope corruption, bribery, pension,
One may with detestation mention;
Think you the law (let who will take it)
Can scandalum magnatum make it?
I vent no slander, owe no grudge,
Nor of another's conscience judge:
At him or him I take no aim,
Yet dare against all vice declaim.
Shall I not censure breach of trust,
Because knaves know themselves unjust?
That steward, whose account is clear,
Demands his honour may appear:
His actions never shun the light;
He is, and would be prov'd, upright.

But then you think my Fable bears
Allusion, too, to state affairs.

I grant it does: and who's so great,
That has the privilege to cheat?
If then in any future reign
(For ministers may thirst for gain)
Corrupted hands defraud the nation,
I bar no reader's application.

An ant there was, whose forward prate
Controul'd all matters in debate;
Whether he knew the thing or no,
His tongue eternally would go;

For he had impudence at will,
And boasted universal skill.
Ambition was his point in view:
Thus by degrees to power he grew.
Behold him now his drift attain:

He's made chief treasurer of the grain.

But as their ancient laws are just,
And punish breach of public trust,
'Tis order'd (lest wrong application
Should starve that wise industrious nation)

That all accounts be stated clear,
Their stock, and what defray'd the year;

That auditors shall these inspect,
And public rapine thus be check'd.

For this the solemn day was set;
The auditors in council met.

The granary-keeper must explain,
And balance his account of grain.

He brought (since he could not refuse them)
Some scraps of paper to amuse them.

An honest Pismire, warm with zeal,
In justice to the public weal,
Thus spoke: "The nation's hoard is low;
From whence does this profusion flow?
I know our annual funds amount;

Why such expence? and where's th' account?"

With wonted arrogance and pride,
The ant in office thus reply'd.

"Consider, Sirs, were secrets told,
How could the best schem'd projects hold?
Should we state mysteries disclose,
'Twould lay us open to our foes.
My duty and my well-known zeal
Bid me our present schemes conceal:
But, on my honour, all th' expence
(Though vast) was for the swarm's defence."

They pass'd th' account as fair and just,
And voted him implicit trust.

Next year again, the granary drain'd,
He thus his innocence maintain'd.

"Think how our present matters stand,
What dangers threat from every hand;
What hosts of turkeys stroll for food,
No farmer's wife but hath her brood.
Consider, when invasion's near,
Intelligence must cost us dear;
And, in this ticklish situation,
A secret told betrays the nation:
But, on my honour, all th' expence
(Though vast) was for the swarm's defence."

Again, without examination,
They thank'd his sage administration.

The year revolves. Their treasure, spent,
Again in secret service went.
His honour, too, again was pledg'd,
To satisfy the charge alleg'd.

When thus, with panic shame possess'd,
An auditor his friends address'd.

"What are we? ministerial tools!
We little knaves are greater fools.

At last this secret is explor'd,
'Tis our corruption thins the hoard.

For every grain we touch'd, at least
A thousand his own heaps increas'd.

Then for his kin and favourite spies,
A hundred hardly could suffice.

Thus, for a paltry sneaking bribe,
We cheat ourselves and all the tribe;
For all the magazine contains Grows from our annual toil and pains."

They vote th' account shall be inspected;
The cunning plunderer is detected;
The fraud is sentenc'd; and his hoard,
As due, to public use restor'd.

FABLE V.

The Bear in a Boat.—To a Coxcomb.

THAT man must daily wiser grow,
Whose search is bent himself to know;

Impartially he weighs his scope,
And on firm reason founds his hope;

He tries his strength before the race,
And never seeks his own disgrace;

He knows the compass, sail, and oar,
Or never launches from the shore;

Before he builds, computes the cost,
And in no proud pursuit is lost:

He learns the bounds of human sense,
And safely walks within the fence.

Thus, conscious of his own defect,
Are pride and self-importance check'd.

If then, self-knowledge to pursue,
Direct our life in every view,

Of all the fools that pride can boast,
A coxcomb claims distinction most.

Coxcombs are of all ranks and kind;
They're not to sex or age confin'd,

Or rich, or poor, or great, or small,
And vanity besots them all.

By ignorance is pride increas'd:

Those most assume, who know the least;
Their own false balance gives them weight,
But every other finds them light.

Not that all coxcombs' follies strike,
And draw our ridicule alike;

To different merits each pretends:

This in love vanity transcends;
That, smitten with his face and shape,

By dress distinguishes the ape;

Th' other with learning crams his shelf,
Knows books, and all things but himself.

All these are fools of low condition,
Compar'd with coxcombs of ambition:

For those, puff'd up with flattery, dare
Assume a nation's various care.

They ne'er the grossest praise mistrust,
Their sycophants seem hardly just;

For these, in part alone, attest

The flattery their own thoughts suggest.

In this wide sphere a coxcomb's shown
In other realms besides his own:

The self-deem'd Machiavel at large

By turns controuls in every charge.

Does commerce suffer in her rights?

'Tis he directs the naval flights.

What sailor dares dispute his skill?

He'll be an admiral when he will.

Now, meddling in the soldier's trade,

Troops must be hir'd, and levies made.

He gives ambassadors their cue,

His cobbled treaties to renew;

And annual taxes must suffice
The current blunders to disguise.
When his crude schemes in air are lost,
And millions scarce defray the cost,
His arrogance (nought undismay'd)
Trusting in self-sufficient aid,
On other rocks misguides the realm,
And thinks a pilot at the helm.
He ne'er suspects his want of skill,
But blunders on from ill to ill;
And, when he fails of all intent,
Blames only unforeseen event.
Left you mistake the application,
The fable calls me to relation.

A bear of shag and manners rough,
At climbing trees expert enough;
For dext'rously, and safe from harm,
Year after year he robb'd the swarm.
Thus thriving on industrious toil,
He glory'd in his pilfer'd spoil.

This trick so swell'd him with conceit,
He thought no enterprize too great.
Alike in sciences and arts,
He boasted universal parts:
Pragmatic, busy, bustling, bold,
His arrogance was uncontroul'd:
And thus he made his party good,
And grew dictator of the wood.

The beasts, with admiration, stare,
And think him a prodigious bear.
Were any common booty got,
'Twas his each portion to allot:
For why? he found there might be picking,
Ev'n in the carving of a chicken.
Intruding thus, he by degrees
Claim'd, too, the butcher's larger fees.
And now his over-weening pride
In every province will preside.
No task too difficult was found:
His blundering nose misleads the hound.
In stratagem and subtle arts
He over-rules the fox's parts.

It chanc'd as, on a certain day,
Along the bank he took his way,
A boat, with rudder, sail, and oar,
At anchor floated near the shore.
He stopt, and, turning to his train,
Thus pertly vents his vaunting strain.

"What blundering puppies are mankind,
In every science always blind:
I mock the pedantry of schools:
What are their compasses and rules?
From me that helm shall conduct learn,
And man his ignorance discern."

So saying, with audacious pride,
He gains the boat, and climbs the side.
The beasts, astonish'd, line the strand:
The anchor's weigh'd, he drives from land:
The slack sail shifts from side to side;
The boat untrimm'd admits the tide.
Borne down, adrift, at random tost,
His oar breaks short, the rudder's lost.
The bear, presuming in his skill,
Is here and there officious still;
Till, striking on the dangerous sands,
Aground the shatter'd vessel stands.

To see the bungler thus distress,
The very fishes sneer and jest:
Ev'n gudgeons join in ridicule,
To mortify the meddling fool.
The clamorous watermen appear;
Threats, curses, oaths, insult his ear:
Seiz'd, thrash'd, and chain'd, he's dragg'd to land;
Derision shouts along the strand.

FABLE VI.

The Squire and his Cur.—To a country Gentleman.

THE man of pure and simple heart
Through life disdains a double part:
He never needs the screen of lies,
His inward bosom to disguise.
In vain malicious tongues assail;
Let envy snarl, let slander rail,
From virtue's shield (secure from wound)
Their blunted venom'd shafts rebound.
So shines his light before mankind,
His actions prove his honest mind.
If in his country's cause he rise,
Debating senates to advise,
Unbrib'd, unaw'd, he dares impart
The honest dictates of his heart.
No ministerial frown he fears,
But in his virtue perseveres.

But would you play the politician,
Whose heart's averse to intuition,
Your lips at all times, nay, your reason,
Must be controul'd by place and season.
What statesman could his power support,
Were lying tongues forbid the court?
Did princely ears to truth attend,
What minister could gain his end?
How could he raise his tools to place,
And how his honest foes disgrace?

That politician tops his part,
Who readily can lie with art:
The man's proficient in his trade;
His power is strong, his fortune's made.
By that the interest of the throne
Is made subservient to his own:
By that, have kings of old, deluded,
All their own friends for his excluded:
By that, his selfish schemes pursuing,
He thrives upon the public ruin.

Antiochus*, with hardy pace,
Provok'd the dangers of the chase;
And, lost from all his menial train,
Travers'd the wood and pathless plain.
A cottage lodg'd the royal guest;
The Parthian clown brought forth his best.
The king unknown his feast enjoy'd,
And various chat the hours employ'd.
From wine what sudden friendship springs!
Frankly they talk'd of courts and kings.

"We country-folks (the clown replies)
Could ope our gracious monarch's eyes.
The king, (as all our neighbours say)
Might he (God bless him!) have his way,
Is found at heart, and means our good,
And he would do it if he could.

If truth in courts were not forbid,
Nor kings nor subjects would be rid.
Were he in power, we need not doubt him;
But, that transferr'd to those about him,
On them he throws the regal cares;
And what mind they? Their own affairs.
If such rapacious hands he trust,
The best of men may seem unjust.
From kings to cobblers 'tis the same;
Bad servants wound their master's fame.
In this our neighbours all agree:
Would the king knew as much as we?"
Here he stopt short. Repose they sought,
The peasant slept, the monarch thought.

The courtiers learn'd at early dawn,
Where their lost sovereign was withdrawn.
The guards' approach our host alarms;
With gaudy coats the cottage swarms.
The crown and purple robes they bring,
And prostrate fall before the king,
The clown was call'd; the royal guest
By due reward his thanks express.
The king then, turning to the crowd,
Who fawningly before him bow'd,
Thus spoke. "Since, bent on private gain,
Your counsels first misled my reign,
Taught and inform'd by you alone,
No truth the royal ear hath known,
Till here conversing: hence, ye crew;
For now I know myself and you."

Whene'er the royal ear's engross,
State-lies but little genius cost.
The favourite then securely robs,
And gleans a nation by his jobs.
Franker and bolder grown in ill,
He daily poisons darts instil;
And, as his present views suggest,
Inflames and soothes the royal breast.
Thus wicked ministers oppress,
When oft the monarch means redress.

Would kings their private subjects hear,
A minister must talk with fear;
If honesty oppos'd his views,
He dar'd not innocence accuse;
'T would keep him in such narrow bound,
He could not right and wrong confound.
Happy were kings, could they disclose
Their real friends and real foes!
Were both themselves and subjects known,
A monarch's will might be his own.
Had he the use of ears and eyes,
Knaves would no more be counted wise.
But then a minister might lose
(Hard case!) his own ambitious views.
When such as these have vex'd a state,
Pursued by universal hate,
Their false support at once hath fail'd,
And persevering truth prevail'd.
Expos'd, their train of fraud is seen;
Truth will at last remove the screen.

A country squire, by whim directed,
The true staunch dogs of chase neglected.
Beneath his board no hound was fed:
His hand ne'er stroak'd the spaniel's head.
A snappish cur, alone carest,
By lies had banish'd all the rest.

VOL. VIII.

Yap had his ear; and defamation
Gave him full scope of conversation.
His sycophants must be preferr'd;
Room must be made for all his herd:
Wherefore, to bring his schemes about,
Old faithful servants all must out.

The cur on every creature flew
(As other great men's puppies do)
Unless due court to him were shown,
And both their face and business known:
No honest tongue an audience found;
He worried all the tenants round;
For why? he liv'd in constant fear,
Lest truth by chance should interfere.
If any stranger dar'd intrude,
The noisy cur his heels pursued.
Now fierce with rage, now struck with dread,
At once he snarl'd, bit, and fled.
Aloof he bays, with bristling hair,
And thus in secret growls his fear:
"Who knows but truth, in this disguise,
May frustrate my best-guarded lies?
Should she (thus mask'd) admittance find,
That very hour my ruin's sign'd."

Now, in his howl's continued sound,
Their words were lost, the voice was drown'd:
Ever in awe of honest tongues,
Thus every day he strain'd his lungs.

It happen'd, in ill-omen'd hour,
That Yap, unmindful of his power,
Forsook his post, to love inclin'd;
A favourite bitch was in the wind.
By her seduc'd in amorous play,
They frisk'd the joyous hours away.
Thus by untimely love pursuing,
Like Antony he sought his ruin.

For now the squire, unvex'd with noise,
An honest neighbour's chat enjoys.
"Be free, (says he,) your mind impart;
I love a friendly open heart.

Methinks my tenants shun my gate;
Why such a stranger grown of late?
Pray tell me what offence they find:
'Tis plain they're not so well inclin'd."

"Turn off your cur (the farmer cries)
Who feeds your ear with daily lies.
His snarling insolence offends;
'Tis he that keeps you from your friends.
Were but that saucy puppy checkt,
You'd find again the same respect.
Hear only him, he'll swear it too,
That all our hatred is to you.
But learn from us your true estate;
'Tis that curs'd cur alone we hate."

The squire heard truth. Now Yap rush'd in;
The wide hall echoes with his din;
Yet truth prevail'd; and, with disgrace,
The dog was cudgel'd out of place.

FABLE VII.

The Countryman and Jupiter.

TO MYSELF.

HAVE you a friend (look round and spy)
So fond, so prepossess'd as I?

A 2

Your faults, so obvious to mankind,
My partial eyes could never find.
When by the breath of fortune blown,
Your airy castles were o'erthrown,
Have I been ever prone to blame,
Or mortify'd your hours with shame?
Was I e'er known to damp your spirit,
Or twit you with the want of merit?

'Tis not so strange that fortune's frown
Still perseveres to keep you down.
Look round, and see what others do.
Would you be rich and honest too?
Have you (like those she rais'd to place)
Been opportunely mean and base?
Have you (as times requir'd) resign'd
Truth, honour, virtue, peace of mind?
If these are scruples, give her o'er;
Write, practise morals, and be poor.

The gifts of fortune truly rate,
Then tell me what would mend your state.
If happiness on wealth were built,
Rich rogues might comfort find in guilt.
As grows the miser's hoarded store,
His fears, his wants, increase the more.

Think, Gay, (what ne'er may be the case)
Should fortune take you into grace,
Would that your happiness augment?
What can she give beyond content?

Suppose yourself a wealthy heir,
With a vast annual income clear!
In all the affluence you possess,
You might not feel one care the less.
Might you not then (like others) find
With change of fortune change of mind;
Perhaps, profuse beyond all rule,
You might start out a glaring fool;
Your luxury might break all bounds:
Plate, table, horses, stewards, hounds,
Might swell your debts: then, lust of play
No regal income can defray.
Sunk is all credit, writs assail,
And doom your future life to jail.

Or, were you dignify'd with power,
Would that avert one pensive hour?
You might give avarice its swing,
Defraud a nation, blind a king:
Then, from the hirelings in your cause
Though daily fed with false applause,
Could it a real joy impart?
Great guilt knew never joy at heart.

Is happiness your point in view?
(I mean th' intrinsic and the true)
She nor in camps or courts resides,
Nor in the humble cottage hides;
Yet found alike in every sphere;
Who finds content, will find her there.

O'erspent with toil, beneath the shade,
A peasant rested on his spade.

"Good gods! (he cries,) 'tis hard to bear
This load of life from year to year!
Soon as the morning streaks the skies,
Industrious labour bids me rise:
With sweat I earn my homely fare,
And every day renews my care."

Jove heard the discontented strain,
And thus rebuk'd the murmuring swain.

"Speak out your wants, then, honest friend:
Unjust complaints the gods offend,
If you repine at partial fate,
Instruct me what could mend your state.
Mankind in every station see.
What wish you? tell me what you'd be."

So said, upborne upon a cloud,
The clown survey'd the anxious crowd.

"Yon' face of care, (says Jove,) behold,
His bulky bags are fill'd with gold.
See with what joy he counts it o'er!
That sum to-day hath swell'd his store."

"Were I that man, (the peasant cry'd)
What blessing could I ask beside?"

"Hold, (says the god;) first learn to know
True happiness from outward show.
This optic glass of intuition—
Here, take it, view his true condition."

He look'd, and saw the miser's breast
A troubled ocean, ne'er at rest;
Want ever stares him in the face,
And fear anticipates disgrace:
With conscious guilt he saw him start;
Extortion gnaws his throbbing heart;
And never, or in thought or dream,
His breast admits one happy gleam.

"May Jove, (he cries,) reject my prayer,
And guard my life from guilt and care!
My soul abhors that wretch's fate.
O keep me in my humble state!

But see, amidst a gawdy crowd,
Yon' minister so gay and proud;
On him what happiness attends,
Who thus rewards his grateful friends!"

"First take the glass, (the god replies;)
Man views the world with partial eyes."

"Good gods! (exclaims the startled wight,)
Defend me from this hideous sight!
Corruption with corrosive smart
Lies cankering on his guilty heart:
I see him with polluted hand
Spread the contagion o'er the land.
Now avarice with insatiate jaws,
Now rapine with her harpy claws,
His bosom tears. His conscious breast
Groans with a load of crimes oppress'd.
See him, mad and drunk with power,
Stand tottering on ambition's tower.
Sometimes, in speeches vain and proud,
His boasts insult the nether crowd;
Now, seiz'd with giddiness and fear,
He trembles lest his fall is near."

"Was ever wretch like this! (he cries;)
Such misery in such disguise!
The change, O Jove, I disavow;
Still be my lot the spade and plough."

He next, confirm'd by speculation,
Rejects the lawyer's occupation;
For he the statesman seem'd in part,
And bore similitude of heart.
Nor did the soldier's trade inflame
His hopes with thirst of spoil and fame.
The miseries of war he mourn'd;
Whole nations into deserts turn'd.

"By these have laws and rights been brav'd;
By these was free-born man enslav'd;

When battles and invasion cease,
Why swarm they in the lands of peace?
Such change (says he) may I decline;
The scythe and civil arms be mine!"

Thus, weighing life in each condition,
The clown withdrew his rash petition.

When thus the god; "How mortals err!
If you true happiness prefer,
'Tis to no rank of life confin'd,
But dwells in every honest mind.
Be justice, then, your sole pursuit:
Plant virtue, and content's the fruit."

So Jove, to gratify the clown,
Where first he found him, set him down.

F A B L E VIII.

The Man, the Cat, the Dog, and the Fly.

TO MY NATIVE COUNTRY.

HAIL, happy land! whose fertile grounds
The liquid fence of Neptune bounds;
By bounteous nature set apart,
The seat of industry and art!
O Britain! chosen port of trade,
May luxury ne'er thy sons invade!
May never minister (intent
His private treasures to augment)
Corrupt thy state! If jealous foes
Thy rights of commerce dare oppose,
Shall not thy fleets their rapine awe?
Who is't prescribes the ocean law?

Whenever neighbouring states contend;
'Tis thine to be the general friend.
What is't who rules in other lands?
On trade alone thy glory stands;
That benefit is unconfin'd,
Diffusing good among mankind:
That first gave lustre to thy reigns,
And scatter'd plenty o'er thy plains:
'Tis that alone thy wealth supplies,
And draws all Europe's envious eyes.
Be commerce, then, thy sole design;
Keep that, and all the world is thine.

When naval traffic ploughs the main,
Who shares not in the merchant's gain?
'Tis that supports the regal state,
And makes the farmer's heart elate:
The numerous flocks that clothe the land
Can scarce supply the loom's demand;
Prolific culture glads the fields,
And the bare heath a harvest yields.

Nature expects mankind should share
The duties of the public care.
Who's born for sloth? * To some we find
The ploughshare's annual toil assign'd:
Some at the sounding anvil glow;
Some the swift-sliding shuttle throw;
Some, studious of the wind and tide,
From pole to pole our commerce guide:
Some (taught by industry) impart
With hands and feet the works of art;
While some, of genius more refin'd,
With head and tongue assist mankind.

* Barren.

Each, aiming at one common end,
Proves to the whole a needful friend.
Thus, born each other's useful aid,
By turns are obligations paid.

The monarch, when his table's spread,
Is to the clown oblig'd for bread;
And, when in all his glory drest,
Owes to the loom his royal vest.
Do not the mason's toil and care
Protect him from th' inclement air?
Does not the cutler's art supply
The ornament that guards his thigh?
All these, in duty to the throne,
Their common obligations own.
'Tis he (his own and people's cause)
Protects their properties and laws.
Thus they their honest toil employ,
And with content the fruits enjoy.
In every rank, or great or small,
'Tis industry supports us all.

The animals, by want oppress'd,
To man their services address'd:
While each pursu'd their selfish good,
They hunger'd for precarious food:
Their hours with anxious cares were vex'd;
One day they fed, and starv'd the next:
They saw that plenty, sure and rise,
Was found alone in social life;
That mutual industry profess'd,
The various wants of man redress'd.

The cat, half famish'd, lean and weak,
Demands the privilege to speak.

"Well, puss, (says man) and what can you
To benefit the public do?"

The cat replies, "These teeth, these claws,
With vigilance shall serve the cause,
The mouse destroy'd by my pursuit,
No longer shall your feasts pollute;
Nor rats, from nightly ambushade,
With wasteful teeth your stores invade."

"I grant, says man, to general use
Your parts and talents may conduce;
For rats and mice purloin our grain,
And threshers whirl the flail in vain:
Thus shall the cat, a foe to spoil,
Protect the farmer's honest toil."

Then turning to the dog, he cry'd,
"Well, sir, be next your merits try'd."

"Sir, (says the dog,) by self-applause
We seem to own a friendless cause.
Ask those who know me, if distrust
E'er found me treacherous or unjust?
Did I e'er faith or friendship break?
Ask all those creatures; let them speak.

My vigilance and trusty zeal
Perhaps might serve the public weal.
Might not your flocks in safety feed,
Were I to guard the fleecy breed?
Did I the nightly watches keep,
Could thieves invade you while you sleep?

The man replies, "'Tis just and right;
Rewards such service should requite.
So rare, in property, we find
Trust uncorrupt among mankind,
That, taken in a public view,
The first distinction is your due.

A = ij

Such merits all reward transcend :

Be then my comrade and my friend."

Addressing now the fly : " From you
What public service can accrue ?"

" From me ! (the fluttering insect said)

I thought you knew me better bred.

Sir, I'm a gentleman. Is't fit

That I to industry submit ?

Let mean mechanics, to be fed,

By business earn ignoble bread ;

Lost in excess of daily joys,

No thought, no care, my life annoys.

At noon (the lady's matin hour)

I sip the tea's delicious flower.

On cates luxuriously I dine,

And drink the fragrance of the vine.

Studious of elegance and ease,

Myself alone I seek to please."

The man his pert conceit derides,

And thus the useless coxcomb chides :

" Hence, from that peach, that downy seat ;

No idle fool deserves to eat.

Could you have sapp'd the blushing rind,

And on that pulp ambrosial din'd ;

Had not some hand, with skill and toil,

To raise the tree, prepar'd the soil ?

Consider, sot, what would ensue,

Were all such worthless things as you.

You'd soon be forc'd (by hunger stung)

To make your dirty meals on dung,

On which such despicable need,

Unpitied, is reduc'd to feed.

Besides, vain selfish insect, learn,

(If you can right and wrong discern)

That he who, with industrious zeal,

Contributes to the public weal,

By adding to the common good,

His own hath rightly understood."

So saying, with a sudden blow

He laid the noxious vagrant low.

Crush'd in his luxury and pride,

The spunger on the public dy'd.

FABLE IX.

The Jackall, Leopard, and other Beasts.

TO A MODERN POLITICIAN.

I GRANT corruption sways mankind ;

That interest, too, perverts the mind ;

That bribes have blinded common sense,

Foild reason, truth, and eloquence :

I grant you, too, our present crimes

Can equal those of former times.

Against plain facts shall I engage,

To vindicate our righteous age ?

I know that in a modern fist

Bribes in full energy subsist.

Since, then, these arguments prevail,

And itching palms are still so frail,

Hence politicians, you suggest,

Should drive the nail that goes the best ;

That it shows parts and penetration,

To ply men with the right temptation.

To this I humbly must dissent,

Premising no reflection's meant.

Does justice or the client's sense

Teach lawyers either side's defence ?

The fee gives eloquence and spirit ;

That only is the client's merit.

Does art, wit, wisdom, or address,

Obtain the prostitute's cares ?

The guinea (as in other trades)

From every hand alike persuades.

Man, scripture says, is prone to evil ;

But does that vindicate the devil ?

Besides, the more mankind are prone,

The less the devil's parts are shown.

Corruption's not of modern date ;

It hath been try'd in every state ;

Great knaves of old their power have fenc'd ;

By places, pensions, bribes dispens'd ;

By these they glory'd in success,

And impudently dar'd oppress ;

By these despotically they sway'd,

And slaves extoll'd the hand that pay'd ;

Nor parts nor genius were employ'd,

By these alone were realms destroy'd.

Now see these wretches in disgrace,

Stript of their treasures, power, and place ;

View them abandon'd and forlorn,

Expos'd to such reproach and scorn.

What now is all your pride, your boast ?

Where are your slaves, your flattering host ?

What tongues now feed you with applause ?

Where are the champions of your cause ?

Now ev'n that very fawning train,

Which shar'd the gleanings of your gain,

Press foremost who shall first accuse

Your selfish jobs, your paltry views,

Your narrow schemes, your breach of trust,

And want of talents to be just.

What fools were these amidst their power ?

How thoughtless of their adverse hour !

What friends were made ? A hireling herd,

For temporary votes prefer'd.

Was it these sycophants to get,

Your bounty swell'd a nation's debt ?

You're bit : for these, like Swifts, attend ;

No longer pay, no longer friend.

The lion is (beyond dispute)

Allow'd the most majestic brute ;

His valour and his generous mind

Prove him superior of his kind :

Yet to jackalls (as 'tis averr'd)

Some lions have their power transferr'd ;

As if the parts of pimps and spies

To govern forests could suffice.

Once, studious of his private good,

A proud jackall oppress'd the wood ;

To cram his own insatiate jaws,

Invaded property and laws.

The forest groans with discontent,

Fresh wrongs the general hate foment.

The spreading murmurs reach'd his ear ;

His secret hours were vex'd with fear.

Night after night he weighs the case,

And feels the terrors of disgrace.

" By friends (says he) I'll guard my seat,

By those malicious tongues defeat ;

I'll strengthen power by new allies,

And all my clamorous foes despise."

To make the generous beasts his friends,
He cringes, fawns, and condescends;
But those repuls'd his abject court,
And scorn'd oppression to support,
Friends must be had. He can't subsist.
Bribes shall new profelytes enlist:
But these nought weigh'd in honest paws;
For bribes confess a wicked cause;
Yet think not every paw withstands
What hath prevail'd in human hands.

A tempting turnip's silver skin
Drew a base hog through thick and thin:
Bought with a stag's delicious haunch,
The mercenary wolf was staunch:
The convert fox grew warm and hearty,
A pullet gain'd him to the party:
The golden-pippin in his fist,
A chattering monkey join'd the list.

But soon expos'd to public hate,
The favourite's fall redress the state.
The leopard, vindicating right,
Had brought his secret frauds to light.
As rats, before the mansion falls,
Desert late hospitable walls,
In shoals the servile creatures run,
To bow before the rising sun.

The hog with warmth express'd his zeal,
And was for hanging those that steal;
But hop'd though low, the public hoard
Might half a turnip still afford.
Since saving measures were profess'd,
A lamb's head was the wolf's request.
The fox submitted, if to touch
A gosling would be deem'd too much.
The monkey thought his grin and chatter
Might ask a nut, or some such matter.

"Ye hirelings! hence! (the leopard cries)
Your venal conscience I despise.
He, who the public good intends,
By bribes needs never purchase friends.
Who acts this just, this honest part,
Is propt by every honest heart.
Corruption now too late has show'd,
That bribes are always ill-bestow'd;
By you your bubbled master's taught,
Time-serving tools, not friends, are bought."

F A B L E X.

The degenerate Bees.

TO THE REV. DR. SWIFT, DEAN OF ST. PATRICK'S.

THOUGH courts the practise disallow,
A friend at all times I'll avow.
In politics I know 'tis wrong;
A friendship may be kept too long;
And what they call the prudent part,
Is to wear interest next the heart.
As the times take a different face,
Old friendships should to new give place.

I know, too, you have many foes,
That owning you is sharing those;
That every knave in every station,
Of high and low denomination.
For what you speak, and what you write,
Dread you at once, and bear you spite.

Such freedoms in your works are shown,
They can't enjoy what's not their own.
All dunces, too, in church and state,
In frothy nonsense show their hate;
With all the petty scribbling crew
(And those pert sots are not a few),
'Gainst you and Pope their envy spurt,
The booksellers alone are hurt.

Good Gods! by what a powerful race
(For blockheads may have power and place)
Are scandals rais'd, and libels writ!
To prove your honesty and wit!
Think with yourself: those worthy men,
You know, have suffered by your pen.
From them you've nothing but your due,
From hence, 'tis plain, your friends are few,
Except myself, I know of none,
Besides the wife and good alone.
To set the case in fairer light,
My fable shall the rest recite,
Which (though unlike our present state)
I for the moral's sake relate.

A bee of cunning, not of parts,
Luxurious, negligent of arts,
Rapacious arrogant, and vain,
Greedy of power, but more of gain,
Corruption sow'd throughout the hive:
By petty rogues the great ones thrive.

As power and wealth his views supply'd,
'Twas seen in overbearing pride.
With him loud impudence had merit;
The bee of conscience wanted spirit;
And those who follow'd honour's rules
Were laugh'd to scorn for squeamish fools.
Wealth claim'd distinction, favour, grace,
And poverty alone was base.
He treated industry with slight,
Unless he found his profit by't.
Rights, laws, and liberties, give way,
To bring his selfish schemes in play.
The swarm forgot the common toil,
To share the gleanings of his spoil.

While vulgar souls, of narrow parts,
Waste life in low mechanic arts,
Let us (says he) to genius born,
The drudgery of our fathers scorn.
The wasp and drone, you must agree,
Live with more elegance than we.
Like gentlemen they sport and play;
No business interrupts the day:
Their hours to luxury they give,
And nobly on their neighbours live.
A stubborn bee, among the swarm,
With honest indignation warm,
Thus from his cell with zeal reply'd:

"I flight thy frowns, and hate thy pride,
The laws our native rights protect;
Offending thee, I those respect;
Shall luxury corrupt the hive,
And none against the torrent strive?
Exert the honour of your race;
He builds his rise on your disgrace.
'Tis industry our state maintains;
'Twas honest toil and honest gains
That rais'd our fires to power and fame.
Be virtuous; save yourselves from shame.

Know that, in selfish ends pursuing,
You scramble for the public ruin."

He spoke; and, from his cell dismiss'd,
Was insolently scoff'd and hiss'd.
With him a friend or two resign'd,
Disdaining the degenerate kind.

"These drones (says he), these insects vile,
(I treat them in their proper style)
May for a time oppress the state;
They own our virtue by their hate;
By that our merits they reveal,
And recommend our public zeal;
Disgrac'd by this corrupted crew,
We're honour'd by the virtuous few.

FABLE XI.

The Pack-horse and the Carrier.

TO A YOUNG NOBLEMAN.

BEGIN, my Lord, in early youth,
To suffer, nay, encourage truth;
And blame me not for disrespect,
If I the flatterer's style reject;
With that, by menial tongues supply'd,
You're daily cocker'd up in pride.

The tree's distinguish'd by the fruit.
Be virtue, then, your first pursuit;
Set your great ancestors in view,
Like them deserve the title too;
Like them ignoble actions scorn;
Let virtue prove you greatly born.

Though with less plate their sideboard shone,
Their conscience always was their own;
They ne'er at levees meanly fawn'd,
Nor was their honour yearly pawn'd;
Their hands, by no corruption stain'd,
The ministerial bribe disdain'd;
They serv'd the crown with loyal zeal,
Yet, jealous of the public wael,
They stood the bulwark of our laws,
And wore at heart their country's cause;
By neither place or pension bought,
They spoke and voted as they thought.
Thus did your sires adorn their seat;
And such alone are truly great.

If you the paths of learning slight,
You're but a dunce in stronger light.
In foremost rank the coward plac'd,
Is more conspicuously disgrac'd.
If you, to serve a paltry end,
To knavish jobs can condescend,
We pay you the contempt that's due;
In that you have precedence too.
Whence had you this illustrious name?
From virtue and unblemish'd fame.
By birth the name alone descends;
Your honour on yourself depends:
Think not your coronet can hide
Assuming ignorance and pride.
Learning by study must be won;
'Twas ne'er entail'd from son to son.
Superior worth your rank requires;
For that mankind reveres your sires;
If you degenerate from your race,
Their merits heighten your disgrace.

A carrier, every night and morn,
Would see his horses eat their corn:
This funk the hostler's vails, 'tis true;
But then his horses had their due.
Were we so cautious in all cases,
Small gains would rise from greater places.

The manger now had all its measure;
He heard their grinding teeth with pleasure;
When all at once confusion rung;
They snorted, jostled, bit, and flung.
A pack-horse turn'd his head aside,
Foaming, his eye-balls swell'd with pride.

Good gods! (says he) how hard's my lot!
Is then my high descent forgot?
Reduc'd to drudgery and disgrace
(A life unworthy of my race),
Must I, too, hear the vile attacks
Of ragged scrubs and vulgar hacks?
See scurvy Roan, that brute ill-bred,
Dares from the manger thrust my head!
Shall I, who boast of noble line,
On offals of these creatures dine?
Kick'd by old Ball! so mean a foe?
My honour suffers by the blow.
Newmarket speaks my grandfire's fame;
All jockeys still revere his name:
There, yearly, are his triumphs told,
There all his massy plates inroll'd.
Whene'er led forth upon the plain,
You saw him with a livery train;
Returning, too, with laurels crown'd,
You heard the drums and trumpets sound.
Let it then, Sir, be understood,
Respect's my due, for I have blood."

"Vain-glorious fool! (the carrier cry'd)
Respect was never paid to pride.
Know 'twas thy giddy wilful heart
Reduc'd thee to this slavish part,
Did not thy headstrong youth disdain
To learn the conduct of the rein?
Thus coxcombs, blind to real merit,
In vicious frolics fancy spirit.
What is't to me by whom begot,
Thou restive, pert, conceited sot?
Your sires, I reverence; 'tis their due;
But, worthless fool, what's that to you?
Ask all the carriers on the road,
They'll say, thy keeping's ill bestow'd;
Then vaunt no more thy noble race,
That neither mends thy strength or pace.
What profits me thy boast of blood?
An ass has more intrinsic good.
By outward show let's not be cheated;
An ass should like an ass be treated."

FABLE XII.

Pan and Fortune.

TO A YOUNG HEIR.

SOON as your father's death was known,
(As if th' estate had been their own)
The gamesters outwardly express'd
The decent joy within your breast.
So lavish in your praise they grew,
As spoke their certain hopes in you.

One counts your income of the year,
How much in ready money clear.

"No house (says he) is more complete;
The garden's elegant and great.
How fine the park around it lies!
The timber's of a noble size.
Then count his jewels and his plate.
Besides, 'tis no entail'd estate.
If cash run low, his lands in fee
Are, or for sale or mortgage free."

Thus they, before you threw the main,
Seem to anticipate their gain.

Would you, when thieves are known abroad,
Bring forth your treasures in the road?
Would not the fool abet the stealth,
Who rashly thus expos'd his wealth?
Yet this you do, whene'er you play
Among the gentlemen of prey.

Could fools to keep their own contrive,
On what, on whom could gamesters thrive?
Is it in charity you game,
To save your worthy gang from shame?
Unless you furnish'd daily bread,
Which way could idleness be fed?
Could these professors of deceit
Within the law no longer cheat,
They must run bolder risks for prey,
And strip the traveller on the way.
Thus in your annual rents they share,
And 'scape the noose from year to year.

Consider, ere you take the bet,
That sum might cross your tailor's debt.
When you the pilfering rattle shake,
Is not your honour, too, at stake?
Must you not by mean lies evade
To-morrow's duns from every trade;
By promises so often paid,
Is yet your tailor's bill defray'd?
Must you not pitifully fawn
To have your butcher's writ withdrawn?
This must be done. In debts of play,
Your honour suffers no delay;
And not this year's and next year's rent
The sons of rapine can content.

Look round, the wrecks of play behold,
Estates dismember'd, mortgag'd, sold!
Their owners now, to goals confin'd,
Show equal poverty of mind.
Some, who the spoil of knaves were made,
Too late attempt to learn their trade.
Some, for the folly of one hour,
Become the dirty tools of power;
And, with the mercenary list,
Upon court-charity subsist.

You'll find at last this maxim true,
Fools are the game which knaves pursue.

The forest (a whole century's shade)
Must be one wasteful ruin made:
No mercy's shown to age or kind;
The general massacre is sign'd.
The park, too, shares the dreadful fate,
For duns grow louder at the gate.
Stern clowns, obedient to the 'squire,
(What will not barbarous hands for hire?)
With brawny arms repeat the stroke;
Fall'n are the elm and reverend oak,

Through the long wood loud axes sound,
And echo groans with every wound.

To see the desolation spread,
Pan drops a tear, and hangs his head;
His bosom now with fury burns;
Beneath his hoof the dice he spurns.
Cards, too, in peevish passion torn,
The sport of whirling winds are borne.

"To snails inveterate hate I bear,
Who spoil the verdure of the year;
The caterpillar I detest,
The blooming spring's voracious pest;
The locust, too, whose ravenous band
Spreads sudden famine o'er the land.
But what are these? the dice's throw
At once hath laid a forest low.
The cards are dealt, the bett is made,
And the wide park hath lost its shade.
Thus is my kingdom's pride defac'd,
And all its ancient glories waste.
All this (he cries) is fortune's doing:
'Tis thus she meditates my ruin,
By fortune, that false, fickle jade,
More havock in one hour is made,
Than all the hungry insect race,
Combin'd, can in an age deface."

Fortune, by chance, who near him past,
O'erheard the vile aspersions cast.

"Why, Pan, (says she) what's all this rant?
'Tis every country-bubble's cant.
Am I the patroness of vice?
Is't I who cog or palm the dice?
Did I the shuffling art reveal,
To mark the cards, or range the deal?
In all th' employments men pursue,
I mind the least what gamesters do.
There may (if computation's just)
One now and then my conduct trust.
I blame the fool, for what can I,
When ninety-nine my power defy?
These trust alone their fingers' ends,
And not one stake on me depends,
Whene'er the gaming-board is set,
Two classes of mankind are met;
But, if we count the greedy race,
The knaves fill up the greater space.
'Tis a gross error held in schools,
That fortune always favours fools.
In play it never bears dispute;
That doctrine these fell'd oaks confute.
Then why to me such rancour show?
'Tis folly, Pan, that is thy foe.
By me his late estate he won,
But he by folly was undone."

F A B L E XIII.

Plutus, Cupid, and Time.

Of all the burdens man must bear,
Time seems most galling and severe;
Beneath this grievous load oppress'd,
We daily meet some friend distress'd.

"What can one do? I rose at nine;
'Tis full six hours before we dine;

A a iiii

Six hours! no earthly thing to do!
Would I had doz'd in bed till two!"

A pamphlet is before him spread,
And almost half a page is read;
Tir'd with the study of the day,
The fluttering sheets are toss'd away.
He opes his snuff-box, hums an air,
Then yawns, and stretches in his chair.

"Not twenty, by the minute-hand!
Good gods, says he, my watch must stand!
How muddling 'tis on books to pore!
I thought I'd read an hour or more.
The morning, of all hours, I hate.
One can't contrive to rise too late."

To make the minutes faster run,
Then, too, his tiresome self to shun,
To the next coffee-house he speeds,
Takes up the news, some scraps he reads.
Sauntering, from chair to chair he trails;
Now drinks his tea, now bites his nails.
He spies a partner of his woe;
By chat afflictions lighter grow;
Each other's grievances they share,
And thus their dreadful hours compare.

Says Tom, "Since all men must confess,
That time lies heavy, more or less,
Why should it be so hard to get,
Till two, a party at piquet?
Play might relieve the lagging morn:
By cards long wintry nights are borne.
Does not quadrille amuse the fair,
Night after night, throughout the year?
Vapours and spleen forgot, at play
They cheat uncounted hours away."

"My case, (says Will), then must be hard,
By want of skill from play debarr'd.
Courtiers kill time by various ways;
Dependence wears out half their days.
How happy these, whose time ne'er stands!
Attendance takes it off their hands.
Were it not for this cursed shower,
The park had will'd away an hour.
At court, without or place or view,
I daily lose an hour or two:
It fully answers my design,
When I have pick'd up friends to dine;
The tavern makes our burden light;
Wine puts our time and care to flight.
At six (hard case!) they call to pay.
Where can one go? I hate the play.
From six till ten! unless in sleep,
One cannot spend the hours so cheap.
The comedy's no sooner done,
But some assembly is begun;
Loitering from room to room I stray,
Converse, but nothing hear or say:
Quite tir'd, from fair to fair I roam.
So soon! I dread the thoughts of home.
From thence, to quicken slow-pac'd night,
Again my tavern-friends invite:
Here, too, our early mornings pass,
Till drowsy sleep retard the glass."

Thus they their wretched life bemoan,
And make each other's case their own.

Consider, friends, no hour rolls on
But something of your grief is gone.

Were you to schemes of business bred,
Did you the paths of learning tread,
Your hours, your days, would fly too fast;
You'd then regret the minute past.
Time's fugitive and light as wind:
'Tis indolence that clogs your mind:
That load from off your spirits shake,
You'll own, and grieve for—your mistake.
A while your thoughtless spleen suspend,
Then read, and, if you can, attend.

As Plutus, to divert his care,
Walk'd forth one morn to take the air,
Cupid o'ertook his strutting pace.
Each star'd upon the stranger's face,
Till recollection set them right,
For each knew th' other but by sight.
After some complimentary talk,
Time met them, bow'd, and join'd their walk.
Their chat on various subjects ran,
But most, what each had done for man.
Plutus assumes a haughty air,
Just like our purse-proud fellows here.

"Let kings, (says he), let cobblers tell,
Whose gifts among mankind excel.
Consider courts; what draws their train?
Think you 'tis loyalty or gain?
That statesman hath the strongest hold,
Whose tool of politics is gold;
By that, in former reigns, 'tis said,
The knave in power hath senates led;
By that alone he sway'd debates,
Enrich'd himself, and beggar'd states.
Forego your boast. You must conclude,
That's most esteem'd that's most pursued.
Think, too, in what a woeful plight
That wretch must live whose pocket's light.
Are not his hours by want deprest?
Penurious care corrodes his breast.
Without respect, or love, or friends,
His solitary day descends."

"You might, (says Cupid), doubt my parts,
My knowledge, too, in human hearts,
Should I the power of gold dispute,
Which great examples might confute.
I know, when nothing else prevails,
Persuasive money seldom fails;
That beauty, too, (like other wares)
Its price, as well as conscience, bears.
Then marriage (as of late profess)
Is but a money-job at best.
Consent, compliance, may be sold;
But love's beyond the price of gold.
Smugglers there are, who, by retail,
Expose what they call love to sale;
Such bargains are an arrant cheat:
You purchase flattery and deceit.
Those who true love have ever try'd
(The common cares of life supply'd)
No wants endure, no wishes make,
But every real joy partake.
All comfort on themselves depends;
They want nor power, nor wealth, nor friends.
Love, then, hath every bliss in store;
'Tis friendship, and 'tis something more.
Each other every wish they give:
Not to know love, is not to live."

"Or love, or money, (Time reply'd)
 Were men the question to decide,
 Would bear the prize: on both intent,
 My boon's neglected or mis-spent.
 'Tis I who measure vital space,
 And deal out years to human race.
 Though little priz'd, and seldom sought,
 Without me love and gold are nought.
 How does the miser time employ?
 Did I e'er see him life enjoy?
 By me forsook, the hoards he won
 Are scatter'd by his lavish son.
 By me all useful arts are gain'd:
 Wealth, learning, wisdom, is attain'd.
 Who then would think (since such my power)
 That e'er I knew an idle hour?
 So subtle and so swift I fly,
 Love's not more fugitive than I.
 Who hath not heard coquettes complain
 Of days, months, years, mis-spent in vain?
 For time misus'd they pine and waste,
 And love's sweet pleasures never taste.
 Those who direct their time aright,
 If love or wealth their hopes excite,
 In each pursuit fit hours employ'd,
 And both by time have been enjoy'd.
 How heedless then are mortals grown!
 How little is their interest known!
 In every view they ought to mind me,
 For, when once lost, they never find me."

He spoke. The gods no more contest,
 And his superior gift confess'd,
 That time (when truly understood)
 Is the most precious earthly good.

FABLE XIV.

The Owl, the Swan, the Cock, the Spider, the Afs, and the Farmer.—To a Mother.

CONVERSING with your sprightly boys,
 Your eyes have spoke the mother's joys.
 With what delight I've heard you quote
 Their sayings in imperfect note!

I grant, in body and in mind
 Nature appears profusely kind.
 Trust not to that. Act you your part;
 Imprint just morals on their heart;
 Impartially their talents scan;
 Just education forms the man.

Perhaps (their genius yet unknown)
 Each lot of life's already thrown;
 That this shall plead, the next shall fight,
 The last assert the church's right.
 I censure not the fond intent;
 But how precarious is th' event!
 By talents misapply'd and crost,
 Consider, all your sons are lost.

One day (the tale's by Martial penn'd)
 A father thus address'd his friend:
 "To train my boy, and call forth sense,
 You know I've stuck at no expence;
 I've try'd him in the several arts;
 (The lad, no doubt, hath latent parts)
 Yet, trying all, he nothing knows,
 But, crab-like, rather backward goes.

Teach me what yet remains undone;
 'Tis your advice shall fix my son."

"Sir, (says the friend), I've weigh'd the matter
 Excuse me, for I scorn to flatter:
 Make him (nor think his genius check'd)
 A herald or an architect."

Perhaps (as commonly 'tis known)
 He heard th' advice, and took his own.

The boy wants wit; he's sent to school,
 Where learning but improves the fool.
 The college next must give him parts,
 And cram him with the liberal arts.
 Whether he blunders at the bar,
 Or owes his infamy to war;
 Or if by licence or degree
 The sexton share the doctor's fee;
 Or from the pulpit by the hour
 He weekly floods of nonsense pour;
 We find (th' intent of nature foil'd)
 A tailor or a butcher spoil'd.

Thus ministers have royal boons
 Confer'd on blockheads and buffoons:
 In spite of nature, merit, wit,
 Their friends for every post were fit.

But now let every muse confess
 That merit finds its due success.
 Th' examples of our days regard;
 Where's virtue seen without reward?
 Distinguish'd and in place you find
 Desert and worth of every kind.
 Survey the reverend bench, and see
 Religion, learning, piety:
 The patron, ere he recommends,
 Sees his own image in his friend's.
 Is honesty disgrac'd and poor?
 What is't to us what was before?

We of all times corrupt have heard,
 When paltry minions were prefer'd;
 When all great offices, by dozens,
 Were fill'd by brothers, sons, and cousins.
 What matter ignorance and pride?
 The man was happily ally'd.
 Provided that his clerk was good,
 What though he nothing understood?
 In church and state the sorry race
 Grew more conspicuous fools in place.
 Such heads, as then a treaty made,
 Had bungled in the cobbler's trade.

Consider, patrons, that such elves
 Expose your folly with themselves.
 'Tis yours, as 'tis the parent's care,
 To fix each genius in its sphere.
 Your partial hand can wealth dispense,
 But never give a blockhead sense.

An owl of magisterial air,
 Of solemn voice, of brow austere,
 Assum'd the pride of human race,
 And bore his wisdom in his face;
 Not to depreciate learned eyes,
 I've seen a pedant look as wise.

Within a barn, from noise retir'd,
 He scorn'd the world, himself admir'd;
 And, like an ancient sage, conceal'd
 The follies public life reveal'd.

Philosophers of old, he read,
 Their country's youth to science bred,

Their manners form'd for every station,
And destin'd each his occupation.
When Xenophon, by numbers brav'd,
Retreated, and a people sav'd,
That laurel was not all his own ;
The plant by Socrates was sown.
To Aristotle's greater name
The Macedonian ow'd his fame.

Th' Athenian bird, with pride replete,
Their talents equall'd in conceit.
And, copying the Socratic rule,
Set up for master of a school.
Dogmatic jargon learnt by heart,
Trite sentences, hard terms of art,
To vulgar ears seem'd so profound,
They fancy'd learning in the sound.

The school had fame ; the crowded place
With pupils swarm'd of every race.
With these the swan's maternal care
Had sent her scarce-fledg'd cygent heir :
The hen (though fond and loath to part)
Here lodg'd the darling of her heart :
The spider, of mechanic kind,
Aspir'd to science more refin'd :
The ass learnt metaphors and tropes,
But most on music fix'd his hopes.

The pupils now, advanc'd in age,
Were call'd to tread life's busy stage ;
And to the master 'twas submitted,
That each might to his part be fitted.

" The swan, (says he), in arms shall shine ;
The soldier's glorious toil be thine.

The cock shall mighty wealth attain :
Go, seek it on the stormy main.

The court shall be the spider's sphere :
Power, fortune, shall reward him there.

In music's art, the ass's fame
Shall emulate Corelli's name."

Each took the part that he advis'd,
And all were equally despis'd.
A farmer, at his folly mov'd,
The dull preceptor thus reprov'd.

" Blockhead, (says he), by what you've done,
One would have thought them each your son ;
For parents, to their offspring blind,
Consult nor parts nor turn of mind,
But ev'n in infancy decree
What this, what th' other son shall be.
Had you with judgment weigh'd the case,
Their genius thus had fix'd their place :
The swan had learn'd the sailor's art ;
The cock had play'd the soldier's part ;
The spider in the weaver's trade
With credit had a fortune made ;
But for the foal, in every class,
The blockhead had appear'd an ass."

FABLE XV.

The Cook-maid, the Turn-spit, and the Owl.

TO A POOR MAN.

CONSIDER man in every sphere,
Then tell me, is your lot severe ?
'Tis murmur, discontent, distrust,
That makes you wretched. God is just.

I grant, the hungry must be fed,
That toil, too, earns thy daily bread.
What then ? Thy wants are seen and known ;
But every mortal feels his own.

We're born a restless, needy crew :
Show me the happier man than you.

Adam, though blest above his kind,
For want of social woman pin'd.
Eve's wants the subtle serpent saw,
Her fickle taste transgress'd the law :
Thus fell our fire ; and their disgrace
The curse entail'd on human race.

When Philip's son, by glory led,
Had o'er the globe his empire spread ;
When altars to his name were dress'd ;
That he was man, his tears confess'd.

The hopes of avarice are check'd :
The proud man always wants respect.
What various wants on power attend !
Ambition never gains its end.
Who hath not heard the rich complain
Of surfeits and corporeal pain ?
He, barr'd from every use of wealth,
Envies the ploughman's strength and health.

Another, in a beauteous wife
Finds all the miseries of life :
Domestic jars and jealous fear
Imbitter all his days with care.
This wants an heir ; the line is lost :
Why was that vain entail engross'd ?
Canst thou discern another's mind ?
What is't you envy ? Envy's blind.
Tell Envy, when she would annoy,
That thousands want what you enjoy.

" The dinner must be dish'd at once.
Where's this vexatious turnspit gone ?
Unless the skulking cur is caught,
The surloin's spoil, and I'm in fault."

Thus said, (for sure you'll think it fit
That I the cook-maid's oaths omit)
With all the fury of a cook,
Her cooler kitchen Nan forsook :
The broom-stick o'er her head she waves ;
She sweats, she stamps, she puffs, she raves ;
The sneaking cur before her flies ;
She whistles, calls ? fair speech she tries.
These nought avail. Her choler burns ;
The fist and cudgel threat by turns.
With hasty stride she presses near ;
He flinks aloof, and howls with fear.

" Was ever cur so curs'd ! (he cry'd)
What star did at my birth preside !
Am I for life by compact bound
To tread the wheel's eternal round ?
Inglorious task ! of all our race
No slave is half so mean and base.
Had fate a kinder lot assign'd,
And form'd me of the lap-dog kind,
I then, in higher life employ'd,
Had indolence and ease enjoy'd ;
And, like a gentleman, carest,
Had been the lady's favourite guest :
Or were I sprung from spaniel line,
Was his sagacious nostril mine,
By me, their never-erring guide,
From wood and plain their feasts supply'd,

Knights, 'squires, attendant on my pace,
Had shar'd the pleasures of the chase.
Endued with native strength and fire,
Why call'd I not the lion fire?
A lion! such mean views I scorn:
Why was I not of woman born?
Who dares with reason's power contend?
On man we brutal slaves depend:
To him all creatures tribute pay,
And luxury employs his day."

An ox by chance o'erheard his moan,
And thus rebuk'd the lazy drone.

"Dare you at partial fate repine?
How kind's your lot compar'd with mine!
Decreed to toil, the barbarous knife
Hath sever'd me from social life;
Urg'd by the stimulating goad,
I drag the cumb'rous waggon's load:
'Tis mine to tame the stubborn plain,
Break the stiff soil, and house the grain:
Yet I without a murmur bear
The various labours of the year.
But then, consider, that one day
(Perhaps the hour's not far away)
You, by the duties of your post,
Shall turn the spit when I'm the roast;
And for reward shall share the feast,
I mean, shall pick my bones at least."

"Till now, (th' astonish'd cur replies),
I look'd on all with envious eyes.
How false we judge by what appears!
All creatures feel their several cares.
If thus yon mighty beast complains;
Perhaps man knows superior pains,
Let envy then no more torment:
Think on the ox, and learn content."

Thus said, close following at her heel,
With cheerful heart he mounts the wheel.

F A B L E XVI.

The Raven, the Sexton, and the Earth-worm.

TO LAURA.

LAURA, methinks you're over-nice.
True; flattery is a shocking vice:
Yet sure, whene'er the praise is just,
One may commend without disgust.
Am I a privilege deny'd,
Indulg'd by every tongue beside?
How singular are all your ways!
A woman, and averse to praise!
If 'tis offence such truths to tell,
Why do your merits thus excel?

Since, then, I dare not speak my mind,
A truth conspicuous to mankind;
Though in full lustre every grace
Distinguish your celestial face;
Though beauties of inferior ray
(Like stars before the orb of day)
Turn pale and fade; I check my lays,
Admiring what I dare not praise.

If you the tribute due disdain,
The muse's mortifying strain
Shall, like a woman in mere spite,
Set beauty in a moral light.

Though such revenge might shock the ear
Of many a celebrated fair,

I mean that superficial race
Whose thoughts ne'er reach beyond their face;
What's that to you? I but displease
Such ever-girlish ears as these.
Virtue can brook the thoughts of age,
That lasts the same through every stage.
Though you by time must suffer more
Than ever woman lost before,
To age is such indifference shown,
As if your face were not your own.
Were you by Antoninus taught?
Or is it native strength of thought
That thus, without concern or fright,
You view yourself by reason's light?

Those eyes, of so divine a ray,
What are they? Mouldering, mortal clay.
Those features, cast in heavenly mould,
Shall, like my coarser earth, grow old;
Like common grass, the fairest flower
Must feel the hoary season's power.

How weak, how vain, is human pride!
Dares man upon himself confide?
The wretch, who glories in his gain,
Amasses heaps on heaps in vain.
Why lose we life in anxious cares,
To lay in hoards for future years?
Can those (when tortur'd by disease)
Cheer our sick heart, or purchase ease?
Can those prolong one gasp of breath,
Or calm the troubled hour of death?

What's beauty? Call ye that your own?
A flower that fades as soon as blown.
What's man in all his boast of sway?
Perhaps the tyrant of a day.

Alike the laws of life take place
Through every branch of human race.
The monarch of long regal line
Was rais'd from dust as frail as mine.
Can he pour health into his veins,
Or cool the fever's restless pains?

Can he (worn down in nature's course)
New-brace his feeble nerves with force?
Can he (how vain is mortal power!)
Stretch life beyond the destin'd hour?

Consider, man; weigh well thy frame;
The king, the beggar, is the same.
Dust form'd us all. Each breathes his day,
Then sinks into his native clay.

Beneath a venerable yew,
That in the lonely church-yard grew,
Two ravens sate. In solemn croak
Thus one his hungry friend bespoke.

"Methinks I scent some rich repast;
The favour strengthens with the blast;
Snuff then, the promis'd feast inhale:
I taste the carcase in the gale.

Near yonder trees, the farmer's steed,
From toil and every drudgery freed,
Hath groan'd his last. A dainty treat!
To birds of taste, delicious meat."

A sexton, busy at his trade,
To hear their chat suspends his spade.
Death struck him with no farther thought,
Than merely as the fees he brought.
"Was ever two such blundering fowls,
In brains and manners less than owls!"

Blockheads, (says he), learn more respect :
 Know ye on whom ye thus reflect ?
 In this same grave (who does me right,
 Must own the work is strong and tight)
 The 'squire, that yon fair hall posselt,
 To-night shall lay his bones at rest.
 Whence could the gross mistake proceed ?
 The 'squire was somewhat fat indeed.
 What then ? the meanest bird of prey
 Such want of sense could ne'er betray ;
 For sure some difference must be found
 (Suppose the smelling organ sound)
 In carcases (say what we can),
 Or where's the dignity of man ?"

With due respect to human race,
 The ravens undertook the case.
 In such similitude of scent,
 Man ne'er could think reflections meant.
 As epicures extol a treat,
 And seem their savoury words to eat,
 They prais'd dead horse, luxurious food !
 The venison of the prescient brood.

The sexton's indignation, mov'd,
 The mean comparison reprov'd ;
 Their undiscerning palate blam'd,
 Which two-legg'd carrion thus defam'd.

Reproachful speech from either side
 The want of argument supply'd :
 They rail, revile ; as often ends
 The contest of disputing friends.

" Hold, (says the fowl) ; since human pride
 With confutation ne'er comply'd,
 Let's state the case, and then refer
 The knotty point, for taste may err."

As thus he spoke, from out the mould
 An earth-worm, huge of size, unroll'd
 His monstrous length : they strait agree
 To choose him as their referee :
 So to th' experience of his jaws
 Each states the merits of the cause.

He paus'd ; and, with a solemn tone,
 Thus made his sage opinion known :

" On carcases of every kind
 This maw hath elegantly din'd ;
 Provok'd by luxury or need,
 On beast, or fowl, or man, I feed :
 Such small distinction 's in the favour,
 By turns I choose the fancy'd flavour :
 Yet I must own (that human beast !)
 A glutton is the rankest feast.

Man, cease this boast ; for human pride
 Hath various tracts to range beside.
 The prince who kept the world in awe,
 The judge whose dictate fix'd the law,
 The rich, the poor, the great, the small,
 Are levell'd ; death confounds them all.
 Then think not that we reptiles share
 Such eates, such elegance of fare ;
 The only true and real good
 Of man was never vermins food ;
 'Tis seated in th' immortal mind ;
 Virtue distinguishes mankind,
 And that (as yet ne'er harbour'd here)
 Mounts with the soul we know not where.
 So, Good-man, sexton, since the case
 Appears with such a dubious face,

To neither I the cause determine,
 For different tastes please different vermin."

AYE AND NO.

A FABLE *.

IN Fable all things hold discourse,
 Then words, no doubt, must talk of course,

Once on a time, near Cannon-row,
 Two hostile adverbs, Aye and No,
 Were hastening to the field of fight,
 And front to front stood opposite ;
 Before each general join'd the van,
 Aye, the more courteous knight, began.

" Stop, peevish Particle ! beware !
 I'm told you are not such a bear,
 But sometimes yield when offer'd fair.
 Suffer yon folks awhile to tattle ;
 'Tis we who must decide the battle.
 Whene'er we war on yonder stage,
 With various fate and equal rage,
 The nation trembles at each blow
 That No gives Aye, and Aye gives No ;
 Yet, in expensive long contention,
 We gain nor office, grant, or pension.

Why then should kinsfolks quarrel thus ?
 (For two of you make one of us.)
 To some wise statesman let us go,
 Where each his proper use may know :
 He may admit two such commanders,
 And make those wait who serv'd in Flanders.
 Let's quarter on a great man's tongue,
 A treasury lord, not Maister Young.
 Obsequious at his high command,
 Aye shall march forth to tax the land ;
 Impeachments No can best resist,
 And Aye support the Civil list :
 Aye, quick as Cæsar, wins the day,
 And No, like Fabius, by delay,
 Sometimes in mutual sly disguise,
 Let Aye's seem No's, and No's seem Aye's ;
 Aye's be in courts denials meant,
 And No's in bishops give consent."

Thus Aye propos'd—and, for reply,
 No, for the first time, answer'd Aye.
 They parted with a thousand kisses,
 And fight e'er since for pay, like Swisses.

DUKE UPON DUKE † :

AN EXCELLENT NEW BALLAD.—TO THE TUNE OF CHEVY-CHACE.

To lordlings proud I tune my lay,
 Who feast in bower or hall :
 Though dukes they be, to dukes I say,
 That pride will have a fall.
 Now that this same it is right sooth,
 Full plainly doth appear,

* Taken from the Miscellanies published by Swift and Pope.

† This humorous Ballad is ascribed to Gay on conjecture only. It is among the Miscellanies published by Swift and Pope ; is there marked as not the Deax's and has never been considered as Pope's.

From what befel John Duke of Guise*,
And Nic of Lancastere †.

When Richard Cœur-de-Lion reign'd,
(Which means a lion's heart)
Like him his barons rag'd and roar'd;
Each play'd a lion's part.

A word and blow was then enough:
Such honour did them prick,
If you but turn'd your cheek, a cuff;
And, if your a—se, a kick.

Look in their face, they tweak'd your nose,
At every turn fell to 't;
Come near, they trod upon your toes;
They fought from head to foot.

Of these the Duke of Lancastere
Stood paramount in pride:
He kick'd and cuff'd, and tweak'd and trod
His foes, and friends beside.

Firm on his front his beaver fate;
So broad, it hid his chin;
For why? he deem'd no man his mate,
And fear'd to tan his skin.

With Spanish wool he dy'd his cheek,
With essence oil'd his hair;
No vixen civet-cat so sweet,
Nor could so scratch and tear.

Right tall he made himself to show,
Though made full short by God:
And, when all other dukes did bow,
This duke did only nod.

Yet courteous, blithe, and debonnair,
To Guise's duke was he:
Was ever such a loving pair?
How could they disagree?

Oh, thus it was: he lov'd him dear,
And cast how to requite him;
And having no friend left but this,
He deem'd it meet to fight him.

Forthwith he drench'd his desperate quill,
And thus he did endite:

"This eve at whist ourself will play,
"Sir Duke! be here to-night."

"Ah no! ah no!" the guileless Guise
Demurely did reply;

"I cannot go, nor yet can stand,
"So fore the gout have I."

The duke in wrath call'd for his steeds,
And fiercely drove them on;

Lord! lord! how rattled then thy stones,
O kingly Kensington ‡!

All in a trice he rush'd on Guise,
Thrust out his lady dear;

He tweak'd his nose, trod on his toes,
And smote him on the ear.

* Sir John Guise.

But mark, how midst of victory
Fate plays her old dog trick!
Up leap'd Duke John, and knock'd him down,
And so down fell Duke Nic.

Alas, oh Nic! oh Nic, alas!
Right did thy gossip call thee:
As who should say, alas the day
When John of Guise shall maul thee!

For on thee did he clap his chair,
And on that chair did sit;
And look as if he meant therein
To do — what was not fit.

Up didst thou look, oh woful duke!
Thy mouth yet durst not ope,
Certes for fear of finding there
A t—d instead of trope.

"Lie there, thou caitiff vile!" quoth Guise,
"No sheet is here to save thee:
"The casement it is shut likewise;
"Beneath my feet I have thee.

"If thou hast aught to speak, speak out,"
Then Lancastere did cry,

"Know'st thou not me, nor yet thyself?
"Who thou, and who am I?

"Know'st thou not me, who (God be prais'd)
"Have brawl'd and quarrell'd more,

"Than all the line of Lancastere,
"That battled heretofore?

"In senates fam'd for many a speech,
"And (what some awe must give ye,

Though laid thus low beneath thy breach)
"Still of the council privy;

"Still of the duchy chancellor:
"Durante life I have it;

"And turn, as now thou dost on me,
"Mine a—e on them that gave it."

But now the servants they rush'd in,
And Duke Nic, up leap'd he;

"I will not cope against such odds,
"But, Guise! I'll fight with thee:

"To-morrow with thee will I fight
"Under the green-wood tree."

"No, not to-morrow, but to-night"
(Quoth Guise) "I'll fight with thee."

And now the sun declining low
Bestreak'd with blood the skies;

When, with his sword at saddle-bow,
Rode forth the valiant Guise.

Full gently pranc'd he o'er the lawn,
Oft roll'd his eyes around,

And from the stirrup stretch'd to find
Who was not to be found.

Long brandish'd he the blade in air,
Long look'd the field all o'er:

At length he spy'd the merry-men brown,
And eke the coach and four.

From out the boot bold Nicholas
Did wave his wand so white,

As pointing out the gloomy glade
Wherein he meant to fight.

All in that dreadful hour so calm
 Was Lancastere to see,
 As if he meant to take the air,
 Or only take a fee :
 And so he did—for to New Court
 His rolling wheels did run :
 Not that he shunn'd the doubtful strife ;
 But business must be done,
 Back in the dark, by Brampton-park,
 He turn'd up through the Gore !
 So slunk to Camden-house so high,
 All in his coach and four.
 Mean while Duke Guise did fret and fume,
 A sight it was to see,

Benumb'd beneath the evening dew
 Under the green-wood tree.
 Then, wet and weary, home he far'd,
 Sore muttering all the way,
 " The day I meet him, Nic shall rue
 " The cudgel of that day.
 " Mean time on every pissing post
 " Paste we this recreant's name,
 " So that each piffer-by shall read
 " And pifs against the same."
 Now God preserve our gracious king,
 And grant his nobles all
 May learn this lesson from Duke Nic.
 That pride will have a fall !

DIONE.

A PASTORAL TRAGEDY.

TIBUL. Eleg. v. Lib. I.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

MEN.

EVANDER under the name of LYCIDAS.
 CLEANTHES.
 SHEPHERDS.

WOMEN.

DIONE under the name of ALEXIS.
 PARTHENIA.
 LAURA.

Scene, Arcadia.

ACT I. SCENE I.

A Plain, at the Foot of a steep craggy Mountain.

DIONE. LAURA.

Laura.

WHY dost thou fly me? Stay, unhappy fair,
 Seek not these horrid caverns of despair;
 To trace thy steps, the midnight air I bore,
 Trod the brown desert, and unshelter'd moor :
 Three times the lark has sung his matin lay,
 And rose on dewy wing to meet the day,
 Since first I found thee, stretch'd in pensive mood,
 Where laurels border Ladon's silver flood.

Dione.

O let my soul with grateful thanks o'erflow !
 'Tis to thy hand my daily life I owe.
 Like the weak lamb, you rais'd me from the plain,
 Too faint to bear bleak winds and beating rain ;

Each day I share thy bowl and clean repast,
 Each night thy roof defends the chilly blast.
 But vain is all thy friendship, vain thy care ;
 Forget a wretch abandon'd to despair.

Laura.

Despair will fly thee, when thou shalt impart
 The fatal secret that torments thy heart ;
 Disclose thy sorrows to my faithful ear,
 Instruct these eyes to give thee tear for tear.
 Love, love's the cause ; our forests speak thy flame,
 The rocks have learnt to sigh Evander's name.
 If faltering shame thy bashful tongue restrain,
 If thou hast look'd, and blush'd, and sigh'd in vain ;
 Say, in what grove thy lovely shepherd strays,
 Tell me what mountains warble with his lays ;
 Thither I'll speed me, and with moving art
 Draw soft confessions from his melting heart,

Dione.

Thy generous care has touch'd my secret woe.
 Love bids these scalding tears incessant flow.

Ill fated love ! O say, ye sylvan maids,
 Who range wide forests and sequester'd shades,
 Say where Evander bled, point out the ground
 That yet is purple with the savage wound.
 Yonder he lies ; I hear the bird of prey ;
 High o'er those cliffs the raven wings his way ;
 Hark how he croaks ! he scents the murder near.
 O may no greedy beak his visage tear !
 Shield him, ye Cupids ; strip the Paphian grove,
 And strow unfading myrtle o'er my love !
 Down, heaving heart.

Laura.

— The mournful tale disclose.

Dione.

Let not my tears intrude on thy repose.
 Yet if thy friendship still the cause request ;
 I'll speak, though sorrow rend my labouring breast.
 Know then, fair shepherdess, no honest swain
 Taught me the duties of the peaceful plain ;
 Unus'd to sweet content, no flocks I keep,
 Nor browsing goats that overhang the steep.
 Born where Orchomenos' proud turrets shine,
 I trace my birth from long illustrious line,
 Why was I train'd amidst Arcadia's court ?
 Love ever revels in that gay resort.
 Whene'er Evander past, my smitten heart
 Heav'd frequent sighs, and felt unusual smart.
 Ah ! hadst thou seen with what sweet grace he mov'd

Yet why that wish ? for Laura then had lov'd.

Laura.

Distrust me not ; thy secret wrongs impart,

Dione.

Forgive the fallies of a breaking heart.
 Evander's sighs his mutual flame confess,
 The growing passion labour'd in his breast ;
 To me he came ; my heart with rapture sprung.
 To see the blushes, when his faltering tongue
 First said, I love. My eyes consent reveal,
 And plighted vows our faithful passion seal :
 Where's now the lovely youth ; he's lost, he's slain,
 And the pale corse lies breathless on the plain !

Laura.

Are thus the hopes of constant lovers paid ?
 If thus—ye powers, from love defend the maid.

Dione.

Now have twelve mornings warm'd the purple east,
 Since my dear hunter rous'd the tusk'd beast ;
 Swift flew the foaming monster through the wood,
 Swift as the wind, his eager steps pursued :
 'Twas then the savage turn'd ; then fell the youth,
 And his dear blood distain'd the barbarous tooth.

Laura.

Was there none near ? no ready succour found ?
 Nor healing herb to staunch the spouting wound ?

Dione.

In vain through pathless woods the hunters crost,
 And sought with anxious eye their master lost ;
 In vain their frequent hollows echo'd shrill,
 And his lov'd name was sent from hill to hill ;
 Evander hears you not. He's lost, he's slain,
 And the pale corse lies breathless on the plain.

Laura.

Has yet no clown (who, wandering from the way, Beats every bush to raise the lamb astray)
 Observ'd the fatal spot ?

5

Dione.

— O, if ye pass

Where purple murder dyes the wither'd grass,
 With pious finger gently close his eyes,
 And let his grave with decent verdure rise.

[Weeps.]

Laura.

Behold the turtle who has lost her mate ;
 Awhile with drooping wing she mourns his fate ;
 Sullen, awhile she seeks the darkest grove,
 And cooing meditates the murder'd dove ;
 But time the rueful image wears away,
 Again she's cheer'd, again she seeks the day.
 Spare then thy beauty, and no longer pine.

Dione.

Yet sure some turtle's love has equal'd mine,
 Who, when the hawk has snatch'd her mate away,
 Hath never known the glad return of day.

When my fond father saw my faded eye,
 And on my livid cheek the roses die ;
 When catching sighs my wasted bosom mov'd,
 My looks, my sighs, confirm'd him that I lov'd.
 He knew not that Evander was my flame,
 Evander dead ! my passion still the same !
 He came, he threaten'd ; with paternal sway,
 Cleanthes nam'd, and fix'd the nuptial day :
 O cruel kindness ! too severely prest !
 I scorn his honours, and his wealth detest.

Laura.

How vain is force ! Love ne'er can be compell'd.

Dione.

Though bound my duty, yet my heart rebell'd.
 One night, when sleep had hush'd all busy spies,
 And the pale moon had journey'd half the skies,
 Softly I rose and dress'd ; with silent tread,
 Unbarr'd the gates, and to these mountains fled.
 Here let me soothe the melancholy hours !
 Close me, ye woods, within your twilight bowers !
 Where my calm soul may settled sorrow know,
 And no Cleanthes interrupt my woe
 With importuning love—

[Melancholy Music is heard at a distance.]
 On yonder plain

Advances slow a melancholy train ;
 Black cypresses boughs their drooping heads adorn.

Laura.

Alas ! Menalcas to his grave is borne.
 Behold the victim of Parthenia's pride !
 He saw, he sigh'd, he lov'd, was scorn'd, and dy'd.

Dione.

Where dwells this beauteous tyrant of the plains ?
 Where may I see her ?

Laura.

— Ask the sighing swains.

They best can speak the conquests of her eyes ;
 Whoever sees her, loves ; who loves her, dies.

Dione.

Perhaps untimely fate her flame hath cross'd,
 And she, like me, hath her Evander lost.
 How my soul pities her !

Laura.

— If pity move

Your generous bosom, pity those who love.
 There late arriv'd among our sylvan race
 A stranger shepherd, who with lonely pace

Visits those mountain-pines at dawn of day,
Where oft Parthenia takes her early way
To rouse the chase; mad with his amorous pain,
He stops and raves; then sullen walks again,
Parthenia's name is borne by passing gales,
And talking hills repeat it to the dales.
Come, let us from this vale of sorrow go,
Nor let the mournful scene prolong thy woe.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.

Shepherds and Shepherdesses (crowned with garlands of cypress and yew) bearing the body of Menalcas.

1st Shepherd.

Here gently rest the corse—With faltering breath
Thus spake Menalcas on the verge of death.
"Belov'd Palemon, hear a dying friend;
"See, where yon hills with craggy brows ascend,
"Low in the valley where the mountain grows,
"There first I saw her, there began my woes.
"When I am cold, may there this clay be laid!
"There often strays the dear, the cruel maid;
"There as she walks, perhaps you'll hear her say,
"(While a kind gushing tear shall force its way)
"How could my stubborn heart relentless prove?
"Ah, poor Menalcas—all thy fault was love!"

2d Shepherd.

When pitying lion's o'er a carcase groan,
And hungry tigers bleeding kids bemoan;
When the lean wolf laments the mangled sheep;
Then shall Parthenia o'er Menalcas weep.

1st Shepherd.

When famish'd panthers seek their morning food,
And monsters roar along the desert wood;
When hissing vipers rustle through the brake,
Or in the path-way rears the speckled snake;
The wary swain th' approaching peril spies,
And through some distant road securely flies.
Fly then, ye swains, from beauty's furer wound.
Such was the fate our poor Menalcas found.

2d Shepherd.

What shepherd does not mourn Menalcas slain!
Kill'd by a barbarous woman's proud disdain!
Whoe'er attempts to bend her scornful mind,
Cries to the deserts, and pursues the wind.

1st Shepherd.

With every grace Menalcas was endow'd,
His merits dazzled all the sylvan crowd.
If you would know his pipe's melodious sound,
Ask all the echoes of these hills around,
For they have learnt his strains; who shall rehearse
The strength, the cadence of his tuneful verse?
Go, read those lofty poplars; there you'll find
Some tender sonnet grow on every rind.

2d Shepherd.

Yet what avails his skill? Parthenia flies.
Can merit hope success in woman's eyes?

1st Shepherd.

Why was Parthenia form'd of softest mould?
Why does her heart such savage nature hold?
O ye kind gods! or all her charms efface,
Or tame her heart—so spare the shepherd race.

* * This and the following scene are formed upon the novel of Marcella in Don Quixote.

2d Shepherd.

As fade the flowers which on the grave I cast;
So may Parthenia's transient beauty waste!

1st Shepherd.

What woman ever counts the fleeting years,
Or sees the wrinkle which her forehead wears?
Thinking her features never shall decay,
This swain she scorns, from that she turns away.
But know, as when the rose her bud unfolds,
Awhile each breast the short-liv'd fragrance holds;
When the dry stalk lets drop her shrivell'd pride,
The lovely ruin's ever thrown aside.
So shall Parthenia be.

2d Shepherd.

— See, she appears,

To boast her spoils, and triumph in our tears.

SCENE III.

Parthenia appears from the mountain.

PARTHENIA. SHEPHERDS.

1st Shepherd.

Why this way dost thou turn thy baneful eyes,
Pernicious basilisk? Lo! there he lies.
There lies the youth thy cursed beauty slew;
See, at thy presence, how he bleeds anew!
Look down, enjoy thy murder.

Parthenia.

— Spare my fame;

I come to clear a virgin's injur'd name.

If I'm a basilisk, the danger fly,
Shun the swift glances of my venom'd eye:
If I'm a murderer, why approach ye near,
And to the dagger lay your bosom bare?

1st Shepherd.

What heart is proof against that face divine?
Love is not in our power.

Parthenia.

— Is love in mine?

If e'er I trifled with a shepherd's pain,
Or with false hope his passion strove to gain;
Then might you justly curse my savage mind,
Then might you rank me with the serpent kind:
But I ne'er trifled with a shepherd's pain,
Nor with false hope his passion strove to gain:
'Tis to his rash pursuit he owes his fate;
I was not cruel; he was obstinate.

1st Shepherd.

Hear this, ye sighing shepherds, and despair.
Unhappy Lycidas, thy hour is near! [doom,
Since the same barbarous hand hath sign'd thy
We'll lay thee in our lov'd Menalcas' tomb,

Parthenia.

Why will intruding man my peace destroy?

Let me content and solitude enjoy;

Free was I born; my freedom to maintain,
Early I fought the unambitious plain.

Most women's weak resolves, like reeds, will ply,
Shake with each breath, and bend with every sigh;
Mine, like an oak, whose firm roots deep descend,
Nor breath of love can shake, nor sigh can bend.

If ye unhappy Lycidas would save;

Go seek him, lead him to Menalcas' grave;

Forbid his eyes with flowing grief to rain,

Like him Menalcas wept, but wept in vain.

Bid him his heart-consuming groans give o'er :
Tell him, I heard such piercing groans before,
And heard unmov'd. O Lycidas, be wise,
Prevent thy fate.—Lo ! there Menalcas lies.

1st Shepherd.

Now all the melancholy rites are paid,
And o'er his grave the weeping marble laid ;
Let's seek our charge ; the flocks, dispersing wide,
Whiten with moving fleece the mountain's side.
Trust not, ye swains, the lightning of her eye,
Lest ye, like him, should love, despair, and die.

[Exeunt Shepherds, &c. Parthenia remains in a melancholy posture, looking on the grave of Menalcas.]

SCENE IV.

LYCIDAS, PARTHENIA.

Lycidas.

When shall my steps have rest ? through all the wood,

And by the winding banks of Ladon's flood,
I sought my love. O say, ye skipping fawns
(Who range entangled shades and daisy'd lawns)
If ye have seen her ! say, ye warbling race
(Who measure on swift wing th' aerial space,
And view below hills, dales, and distant shores)
Where shall I find her whom my soul adores !

SCENE V.

LYCIDAS, PARTHENIA, DIONE, LAURA.

[Dione and Laura at a distance.]

Lycidas.

What do I see ? no. Fancy mocks my eyes,
And bids the dear deluding vision rise.
'Tis she. My springing heart her presence feels.
See, prostrate Lycidas before thee kneels.

[Kneeling to Parthenia.]

Why will Parthenia turn her face away ?

Parthenia.

Who calls Parthenia ? hah !

[She starts from her melancholy : and, seeing Lycidas, flies into the wood.]

Lycidas.

—Stay, virgin, stay.

O wing my feet, kind love. See, see, she bounds,
Fleet as the mountain roe, when prest by hounds.

[He pursues her, Dione faints in the arms of Laura.]

Laura.

What means this trembling ? All her colour flies,
And life is quite unstrung. Ah ! lift thy eyes,
And answer me ; speak, speak, 'tis Laura calls.
Speech has forsook her lips.—She faints, she falls.
Fan her, ye zephyrs, with your balmy breath,
And bring her quickly from the shades of death :
Blow, ye cool gales. See, see, the forest shakes
With coming winds ! she breathes, she moves, she wakes.

Dione.

Ah, false Evander !

Laura.

—Calm thy sobbing breast.

Say, what new sorrow has thy heart oppress ?

Dione.

Didst thou not hear his sighs and suppliant tone ?
Didst thou not hear the pining mountain groan ?

VOL. VIII.

Didst thou not see him bend his suppliant knee ?
Thus in my happy days he knelt to me,
And pour'd forth all his soul ! See how he strains,
And lessens to the sight o'er yonder plains,
To keep the fair in view ! Run, virgin run,
Hear not his vows ; I heard, and was undone !

Laura.

Let not imaginary terror fright ;
Some dark delusion swims before thy sight.
I saw Parthenia from the mountain's brow,
And Lycidas with prostrate duty bow ;
Swift, as the falcon's wing, I saw her fly,
And heard the cavern to his groans reply.
Why stream thy tears for sorrows not thy own ?

Dione.

Oh ! where are honour, faith, and justice flown ?
Perjur'd Evander !

Laura.

—Death has laid him low.

Touch not the mournful string that wakes thy woe.

Dione.

That amorous swain, whom Lycidas you name,
(Whose faithless bosom feels another flame)
Is my once kind Evander—yes—'twas he.
He lives—but lives, alas ! no more for me.

Laura.

Let not thy frantic words confess despair.

Dione.

What, know I not his voice, his mien, his air ?
Yes, I that treacherous voice with joy believ'd,
That voice, that mien, that air, my soul deceiv'd.

If my dear shepherd love the lawns, and glades,
With him I'll range the lawns, and seek the shades,
With him through solitary deserts rove.
But could he leave me for another love ?
O base ingratitude !

Laura.

—Suspend thy grief,

And let my friendly counsel bring relief
To thy desponding soul. Parthenia's ear
Is barr'd for ever to the lover's prayer ;
Evander courts disdain, he follows scorn,
And in the passing winds his vows are borne.
Soon will he find that all in vain he strove
To tame her bosom ; then his former love
Shall wake his soul ; then will he sighing blame
His heart inconstant, and his perjur'd flame :
Then shall he at Dione's feet implore,
Lament his broken faith, and change no more.

Dione.

Perhaps this cruel nymph well knows to feign
Forbidding speech, coy looks, and cold disdain,
To raise his passion. Such are female arts,
To hold in safer snares inconstant hearts !

Laura.

Parthenia's breast is steel'd with real scorn.

Dione.

And dost thou think Evander will return ?

Laura.

Forego thy sex, lay all thy robes aside,
Strip off these ornaments of female pride ;
The shepherd's vest must hide thy graceful air,
With the bold manly step a swain appear ;

B b

Then with Evander may'st thou rove unknown,
Then let thy tender elegance be shown;
Then the new fury of his heart controul,
And with Dione's sufferings touch his soul.

Dione.

Sweet as refreshing dews, or summer showers,
To the long parching thirst of drooping flowers;
Grateful as fanning gales to fainting swains.
And soft as trickling balm to bleeding pains;
Such are thy words. The sex shall be resign'd,
No more shall braided gold these tresses bind;
The shepherd's garb the woman shall disguise.
If he has lost all love, may friendship's ties
Unite me to his heart!

Laura.

— Go, prosperous maid,
May smiling love thy faithful wishes aid!
Be now Alexis call'd. With thee I'll rove,
And watch thy wanderer through the mazy grove:
Let me be honour'd with a sister's name;
For thee, I feel a more than sister's flame.

Dione.

Perhaps my shepherd has outstript her haste.
Think'st thou, when out of sight, she flew so fast?
One sudden glance might turn her savage mind;
May she like Daphne fly, nor look behind,
Maintain her scorn, his eager flame despise,
Nor view Evander with Dione's eyes!

ACT II. SCENE I.

LYCIDAS lying on the grave of MENALCAS.

Lycidas.

WHEN shall these scalding fountains cease to flow?
How long will life sustain this load of woe?
Why glows the morn? Roll back, thou source of light,
And feed my sorrows with eternal night.
Come, fable Death! give, give the welcome stroke;
The raven calls thee from yon blasted oak,
What pious care my ghastful lid shall close?
What decent hand my frozen limbs compose?
O happy shepherd, free from anxious pains,
Who now art wandering in the sighing plains
Of blest Elysium; where in myrtle groves
Enamour'd ghosts bemoan their former loves.
Open, thou silent grave; for lo! I come
To meet Menalcas in the fragrant gloom;
There shall my bosom burn with friendship's flame,
The same our passion, and our fate the same;
There, like two nightingales on neighbouring boughs,
Alternate strains shall mourn our frustrate vows.
But if cold death should close Parthenia's eye,
And should her beauteous form come gliding by;
Friendship would soon in jealous fear be lost,
And kindling hate pursue thy rival ghost.

SCENE II.

LYCIDAS, DIONE in a Shepherd's habit.

Lycidas.

Hah! who comes here? turn hence, be timely wise;
Trust not thy safety to Parthenia's eyes.

As from the bearing falcon flies the dove,
So, wing'd with fear, Parthenia flies from love.

Dione.

If in these vales the fatal beauty stray,
From the cold marble rise; let's haste away.
Why lie you panting, like the smitten deer?
Trust not the dangers which you bid me fear.

Lycidas.

Bid the lur'd lark, whom tangling nets surprise,
On soaring pinion rove the spacious skies;
Bid the cag'd linnet range the leafy grove;
Then bid my captive heart get loose from love.
The snares of death are o'er me. Hence! beware;
Lest you should see her, and like me despair.

Dione.

No. Let her come; and seek this vale's recess,
In all the beauteous negligence of dress;
Though Cupid send a shaft in every glance,
Though all the Graces in her step advance,
My heart can stand it all. Be firm, my breast;
Th' ensnaring oath, the broken vow detest:
That flame, which other charms have power to
move,

O give it not the sacred name of love!
'Tis perjury, fraud, and meditated lies.
Love's seated in the soul, and never dies.
What then avail her charms? My constant heart
Shall gaze secure, and mock a second dart.

Lycidas.

But you perhaps a happier fate have found,
And the same hand that gave, now heals the wound.
Or art thou left abandon'd and forlorn,
A wretch, like me, the sport of pride and scorn?

Dione.

O tell me, shepherd, hath thy faithless maid,
False to her vow, thy flatter'd hope betray'd?
Did her smooth speech engage thee to believe?
Did she protest and swear, and then deceive?
Such are the pangs I feel!

Lycidas.

— The haughty fair
Contemns my sufferings, and disdains to hear.
Let meaner beauties, learn'd in female snares,
Entice the swain with half-consenting airs;
Such vulgar arts ne'er aid her conquering eyes,
And yet, where'er she turns, a lover sighs.
Vain is the steady constancy you boast;
All other love at sight of her is lost.

Dione.

True constancy no time, no power, can move.
He that hath known to change, ne'er knew to love.
Though the dear author of my hapless flame
Pursue another; still my heart's the same.
Am I for ever left? (excuse these tears)
May your kind friendship soften all my cares!

Lycidas.

What comfort can a wretch, like me, bestow?

Dione.

He best can pity who hath felt the woe.

Lycidas.

Since different objects have our souls possess'd,
No rival fears our friendship shall molest.

Dione.

Come, let us leave the shade of these brown hills,
And drive our flocks beside the streaming rills.

Should the fair tyrant to these vales return,
How would thy breast with double fury burn!
Go hence, and seek thy peace.

SCENE III.

LYCIDAS, DIONE, LAURA.

Laura.

—Fly, fly this place;

Beware of love; the proudest of her race
This way approaches: from among the pines,
Where from the steep the winding path declines,
I saw the nymph descend.

Lycidas.

—She comes, she comes;

From her the passing zephyrs steal perfumes,
As from the violet's bank with odours sweet
Breathes every gale; spring blooms beneath her feet.

Yes, 'tis my fairest; here she's wont to rove.

Laura.

Say, by what signs I might have known thy love?

Lycidas.

My love is fairer than the snowy breast
Of the tall swan, whose proudly swelling chest
Divides the wave; her tresses, loose behind,
Play on her neck, and wanton in the wind;
The rising blushes, which her cheek o'erspread,
Are opening roses in the lily's bed.
Know'st thou Parthenia?

Laura.

—Wretched is the slave

Who serves such pride! Behold Menalcas' grave!
Yet if Alexis and this sighing swain
Wish to behold the tyrant of the plain,
Let us behind these myrtles twining arms
Retire unseen; from thence survey her charms.
Wild as the chaunting thrush upon the spray,
At man's approach, she swiftly flies away.
Like the young hare, I've seen the panting maid
Stop, listen, run; of every wind afraid.

Lycidas.

And wilt thou never from thy vows depart?
Shepherd, beware—now fortify thy heart.

[To Dione.

[Lycidas, Dione, and Laura, retires behind the boughs.

SCENE IV.

PARTHENIA, LYCIDAS, DIONE, LAURA.

Parthenia.

This melancholy scene demands a groan.
Hah! what inscription marks the weeping stone?
"O power of beauty! here Menalcas lies,
"Gaze not, ye shepherds, on Parthenia's eyes."
Why did Heaven form me with such polish'd care?
Why cast my features in a mould so fair?
If blooming beauty was a blessing meant,
Why are my sighing hours deny'd content?
The downy peach, that glows with sunny dyes,
Feeds the black snails, and lures voracious flies;
The juicy pear invites the feather'd kind,
And pecking finches scoop the golden rind;
But beauty suffers more pernicious wrongs,
Blasted by envy, and censorious tongues.

How happy lives the nymph whose comely face
And pleasing glances boast sufficient grace
To wound the swain she loves! No jealous fears
Shall vex her nuptial state with nightly tears;
Nor amorous youths, to push their soul pretence,
Infect her days with dull impertinence.
But why talk I of love? My guarded heart
Disowns his power, and turns aside the dart.
Hark! from his hollow tomb Menalcas cries,
"Gaze not, ye shepherds, on Parthenia's eyes."
Come, Lycidas, the mournful lay peruse,
Lest thou, like him, Parthenia's eyes accuse.

[She stands in a melancholy posture, looking on the tomb.

Lycidas.

Call'd she not Lycidas?—I come, my fair;
See generous pity melts into a tear,
And her heart softens. Now's the tender hour;
Assist me, Love! exert thy sovereign power
To tame the scornful maid.

Dione.

—Rash swain, be wise;

'Tis not from thee or him; from Love she flies.

Leave her, forget her. [They hold Lycidas.

Laura.

—Why this furious haste?

Lycidas.

Unhand me; loose me.

Dione.

—Sister, hold him fast.

To follow her, is, to prolong despair.

Shepherd, you must not go.

Lycidas.

—Bold youth, forbear.

Hear me, Parthenia.

Parthenia.

—From behind the shade

Methought a voice some listening spy betray'd.
Yes, I'm observ'd. [She runs out.

Lycidas.

—Stay, nymph; thy flight suspend.

She hears me not—when will my sorrows end?
As over-spent with toil, my heaving breast
Beats quick. 'Tis death alone can give me rest.

[He remains in a fixt melancholy.

SCENE V.

LYCIDAS, DIONE, LAURA.

Laura.

Recall thy scatter'd sense, bid reason wake,
Subdue thy passion.

Lycidas.

—Shall I never speak?

She's gone, she's gone—Kind shepherd, let me rest
My troubled head upon thy friendly breast.
The forest seems to move—O cursed state!
I doom'd to love, and she condemn'd to hate!
Tell me, Alexis, art thou still the same?
Did not her brighter eyes put out the flame
Of thy first love? did not thy fluttering heart,
Whene'er she rais'd her look, confess the dart?

Dione.

I own, the nymph is fairest of her race,
Yet I unmov'd can on this beauty gaze,
Mindful of former promise; all that's dear,
My thoughts, my dreams, my every wish is there.

Since then our hopes are lost ; let friendship's tie
Calm our distress, and flighted love supply ;
Let us together drive our fleecy store,
And of ungrateful woman think no more.

Lycidas.

'Tis death alone can raise her from my breast.

Laura.

Why shines thy love so far above the rest ?
Nature, 'tis true, in every outward grace,
Her nicest hand employ'd ; her lovely face
With beauteous feature stamp'd ; with rosy dyes Warm'd her fair cheek ; with lightning arm'd her
eyes :

But, if thou search the secrets of her mind,
Where shall thy cheated soul a virtue find ?
Sure hell with cruelty her breast supply'd :
How did she glory when Menalcas dy'd !
Pride in her bosom reigns ; she's false, she's vain ;
She first entices, then insults the swain.
Shall female cunning lead thy heart astray ?
Shepherd, be free ; and scorn for scorn repay.

Lycidas.

How woman talks of woman :

Dione.

—Hence depart ;

Let a long absence cure thy love-sick heart.
To some far grove retire, her sight disclaim,
Nor with her charms awake the dying flame.
Let not an hour thy happy flight suspend ;
But go not, Lycidas, without thy friend.
Together let us seek the cheerful plains,
And lead the dance among the sportive swains,
Devoid of care.

Laura.

—Or else the groves disdain,
Nor with the sylvan walk indulge thy pain.
Haste to the town ; there (I have oft been told)
The courtly nymph her tresses binds with gold,
To captivate the youths ; the youths appear
In fine array ; in ringlets waves their hair
Rich with ambrosial scents, the fair to move,
And all the business of the day is love.
There from the gaudy train select a dame,
Her willing glance shall catch an equal flame.

Lycidas.

Name not the court.—The thought my soul con-
founds,

And with Dione's wrongs my bosom wounds,
Heaven justly vindicates the faithful maid ;
And now are all my broken vows repaid.
Perhaps she now laments my fancy'd death
With tears unfeign'd ; and thinks my gasping breath

Sigh'd forth her name. O guilt, no more upbraid !
Yes. I fond innocence and truth betray'd. [Aside.]

DIONE and LAURA apart.

Dione.

Hark ! how reflection wakes his conscious heart.
From my pale lids the trickling sorrows start.
How shall my breast the swelling sighs confine !

Laura.

O smooth thy brow, conceal our just design :
Be yet awhile unknown. If grief arise,
And force a passage through thy gushing eyes,

Quickly retire, thy sorrows to compose ;
Or with a look serene disguise thy woes.

[Dione is going out. Laura walks at a distance]

Lycidas.

Canst thou, Alexis, leave me thus distressed ?
Where's now the boasted friendship of thy breast ?
Hast thou not oft survey'd the dappled deer
In social herds o'erspread the pastures fair ?
When opening hounds the warmer scent pursue,
And force the destin'd victim from the crew,
Oft he returns, and fain would join the band,
While all their horns the panting wretch withstand.
Such is thy friendship ; thus might I confide.

Dione.

Why wilt thou censure what thou ne'er hast try'd ?
Sooner shall swallows leave their callow brood,
Who with their plaintive chirpings cry for food ;
Sooner shall hens expose their infant care,
When the spread kite sails wheeling in the air ;
Than I forsake thee when by danger prest.
Wrong not by jealous fears a faithful breast.

Lycidas.

If thy fair-spoken tongue thy bosom shows,
There let the secrets of my soul repose.

Dione.

Far be suspicion ; in my truth confide.
O let my heart thy load of cares divide !

Lycidas.

Know then, Alexis, that in vain I strove
To break her chain, and free my soul from love :
On the lim'd twig thus finches beat their wings,
Still more entangled in their clammy strings,
The slow-pac'd days have witness'd my despair,
Upon my weary couch sits wakeful care ;
Down my flush'd cheek the flowing sorrows run,
As dews descend to weep the absent sun.
O lost Parthenia !

Dione.

—These wild thoughts suspend ;
And in thy kind commands instruct thy friend.

Lycidas.

Whene'er my faltering tongue would urge my
Deaf is her ear, and sullen she withdraws. [cause,
Go then, Alexis ; seek the scornful maid,
In tender eloquence my sufferings plead ;
Of flighted passion you the pangs have known ;
O judge my secret anguish by your own !

Dione.

Had I the skill inconstant hearts to move,
My longing soul had never lost my love.
My feeble tongue, in these soft arts untry'd,
Can ill support the thunder of her pride ;
When he shall bid me to thy bower repair,
How shall my trembling lips her threats declare ?
How shall I tell thee that she could behold,
With brow serene, thy corse all pale and cold
Beat on the dashing billow ? Should'st thou go
Where the tall hill o'erhangs the rocks below,
Near thee the tyrant could un pitying stand,
Nor call thee back, nor stretch a saving hand.
Wilt thou then still persist to tempt thy fate,
To feed her pride, and gratify her hate ?

Lycidas.

Know, unexperienc'd youth, that woman's mind
Oft shifts her passions, like th' inconstant wind ;

Sudden, she rages, like the troubled main,
Now sinks the storm, and all is calm again.
Watch the kind moment, then my wrongs impart,
And the soft tale shall glide into her heart.

Dione.

No. Let her wander in the lonely grove,
And never hear the tender voice of love.
Let her awhile, neglected by the swain,
Pass by, nor sighs molest the cheerful plain:
Thus shall the fury of her pride be laid;
Thus humble into love the haughty maid.

Lycidas.

Vain are attempts my passion to controul.
Is this the balm to cure my fainting soul?

Dione.

Deep then among the green-wood shades I'll rove,
And seek with weary'd pace thy wander'd love;
Prostrate I'll fall, and with incessant prayers
Hang on her knees, and bathe her feet with tears.
If sighs of pity can her ear incline,
(O Lycidas, my life is wrapt in thine)! [Aside.
I'll charge her from thy voice to hear the tale,
Thy voice more sweet than notes along the vale
Breath'd from the warbling pipe: the moving
strain

Shall stay her flight, and conquer her disdain.
Yet if she hear, should love the message speed,
Then dies all hope—then must Dione bleed. [Aside.

Lycidas.

Haste then, dear faithful swain. Beneath those yews,
Whose sable arms the brownest shade diffuse,
Where all around, to state the fervent sky,
The panting flocks in ferny thickets lie;
There with impatience shall I wait my friend,
O'er the wide prospect frequent glances send
To spy thy wish'd return. As thou shalt find
A tender welcome, may thy love be kind!

SCENE VI.

DIONE, LAURA.

Dione.

Methinks I'm now surrounded by despair,
And all my withering hopes are lost in air.
Thus the young linnet on the rocking bough
Hears through long woods autumnal tempest blow,
With hallow blasts the clashing branches bend;
And yellow showers of rustling leaves descend;
She sees the friendly shelter from her fly;
Nor dare her little pinions trust the sky;
But on the naked spray in wintery air,
All shivering, hopeless, mourns the dying year.
What have I promis'd? rash, unthinking maid!
By thy own tongue thy wishes are betray'd!

Laura.

Why walk'st thou thus disturb'd with frantic air?
Why roll thy eyes with madness and despair?

Dione.

How wilt thou bear to see her pride give way?
When thus the yielding nymph shall bid thee say,
"Let not the shepherd seek the silent grave,
"Say, that I bid him live—if hope can save!"

Laura.

Hath he discern'd thee through the swain's disguise,
And now alike thy love and friendship flies?

Dione.

Yes. Firm and faithful to the promise made,
I'll range each sunny hill, each lawn and glade.

Laura.

'Tis Laura speaks. O calm your troubled mind.

Dione.

Where shall my search this envy'd beauty find?
I'll go, my faithless shepherd's cause to plead,
And with my tears accuse the rival maid.
Yet should her soften'd heart to love incline!

Laura.

If those are all thy fears, Evander's thine.

Dione.

Why should we both in sorrow waste our days?
If love unfeign'd my constant bosom sways,
His happiness alone is all I prize,
And that is center'd in Parthenia's eyes.
Haste then, with earnest zeal her love implore,
To bless his hours—when thou shalt breathe no
more.

ACT III. SCENE I.

DIONE lying on the ground by the side of a Fountain.

Dione.

HERE let me rest; and in the liquid glass
View with impartial look my fading face.
Why are Parthenia's striking beauties priz'd?
And why Dione's weaker glance despis'd?
Nature in various moulds has beauty cast,
And form'd the feature for each different taste:
This sighs for golden locks and azure eyes;
That, for the gloss of sable tresses, dies.
Let all mankind these locks, these eyes detest,
So I were lovely in Evander's breast!
When o'er the garden's knot we cast our view,
While summer paints the ground with various hue;
Some praise the gaudy tulip's streaky red,
And some the silver lily's bending head;
Some the jonquil in shining yellow drest,
And some the fring'd carnation's varied vest;
Some love the sober violet's purple dyes,
Thus beauty fares in different lovers' eyes.
But bright Parthenia like the rose appears,
She in all eyes superior lustre bears.

SCENE II.

DIONE, LAURA.

Laura.

Why thus beneath the silver willow laid,
Weeps fair Dione in the pensive shade?
Hast thou yet found the over-arching bower,
Which guards Parthenia from the sultry hour?

Dione.

With weary step in paths unknown I stray'd,
And sought in vain the solitary maid.

Laura.

Seest thou the waving tops of yonder woods,
Whose aged arms imbrown the cooling floods?
The cooling floods o'er breaking pebbles flow,
And wash the soil from the big roots below;

B b iii

From the tall rock the dashing waters bound.
Hark, o'er the fields the rushing billows found!
There, lost in thought, and leaning on her crook,
Stood the sad nymph, nor rais'd her pensive look;
With settled eye the bubbling waves survey'd,
And watch the whirling eddies as they play'd.

Dione.

Thither to know my certain doom I speed,
For by this sentence life or death's decreed. [Exit.]

SCENE III.

LAURA, CLEANTHES.

Laura.

But see! some hasty stranger bends this way;
His broider'd vest reflects the sunny ray:
Now through the thinner boughs I mark his mien,
Now veil'd, in thicker shades he moves unseen.
Hither he turns; I hear a muttering sound;
Behind this reverend oak with ivy bound,
Quick I'll retire; with busy thought possess'd,
His tongue betrays the secrets of his breast.

[She hides herself.]

Cleanthes.

The skilful hunter with experienc'd care
Traces the doubles of the circling hare;
The subtle fox (who breathes the weary hound
O'er hills and plains) in distant brakes is found;
With ease we track swift hinds and skipping roes.
But who th' inconstant ways of woman knows?
They say, she wanders with the sylvan train,
And courts the native freedoms of the plain;
Shepherds explain their wish without offence,
Nor blush the nymphs—for love is innocence.
O lead me where the rural youth retreat,
Where the slope hills the warbling voice repeat.
Perhaps on daisy'd turf reclines the maid,
And near her side some rival clown is laid.
Yet, yet I love her.—O lost nymph return,
Let not thy fire with tears incessant mourn;
Return, lost nymph; bid sorrow cease to flow,
And let Dione glad the house of woe.

Laura.

Call'd he not lost Dione? hence I'll start,
Cross his slow steps, and sift his opening heart.

[Aside.]

Cleanthes.

Tell me, fair nymph, direct my wandering way?
Where, in close bowers, to shun the sultry ray,
Repose the swains; whose flocks with bleating fill
The bordering forest and the thymy hill.
But if thou frequent join those sylvan bands,
Thyself can answer what my soul demands.

Laura.

Seven years I trod these fields, these bowers, and glades,

And by the lessening and the lengthening shades
Have mark'd the hours; what time my flock to lead

To sunny mountains, or the watery mead:
Train'd in the labours of the sylvan crew,
Their sports, retreats, their cares and loves I knew.

Cleanthes.

Instruct me, then, if late among your race
A stranger nymph is found, of noble grace,

In rural arts unskill'd, no charge she tends;
Nor when the morn and evening dew descends
Milks the big-udder'd ewe. Her mien and dress
The polish'd manners of the court confess.

Laura.

Each day arrive the neighbouring nymphs and
swains,

To share the pastime of our jovial plains;
How can I there thy roving beauty trace,
Where not one nymph is bred of vulgar race!

Cleanthes.

If yet she breathes, what tortures must she find!
The curse of disobedience tears her mind.
If e'er your breast with filial duty burn'd,
If e'er you sorrow'd when a parent mourn'd;
Tell her, I charge you, with incessant groans
Her drooping fire his absent child bemoans.

Laura.

Unhappy man!

Cleanthes.

—With storms of passion tost,
When first he learn'd his vagrant child was lost,
On the cold floor his trembling limbs he flung,
And with thick blows his hollow bosom rung;
Then up he started, and with fix'd surprise,
Upon her picture threw his frantic eyes,
While thus he cry'd: In her my life was bound,
"Warm in each feature is her mother found!"
"Perhaps despair has been her fatal guide,
"And now she floats upon the weeping tide;
"Or on the willow hung, with head reclin'd,
"All pale and cold she wavers in the wind.
"Did I not force her hence by harsh commands?
"Did not her soul abhor the nuptial bands?"

Laura.

Teach not, ye fires, your daughters to rebel.
By counsel rein their wills, but ne'er compel.

Cleanthes.

Ye duteous daughters, trust these tender guides;
Nor think a parent's breast the tyrant hides.

Laura.

From either lid the scalding sorrows roll;
The moving tale runs thrilling to my soul.

Cleanthes.

Perhaps she wanders in the lonely woods,
Or on the sedgy borders of the floods;
Thou know'st each cottage, forest, hill, and vale,
And pebbled brook that winds along the dale.
Search each sequester'd dell to find the fair;
And just reward shall gratify thy care.

Laura.

O ye kind boughs, protect the virgin's flight,
And guard Dione from his prying sight! [Aside.]

Cleanthes.

Mean while, I'll seek the shepherd's cool abodes,
Point me, fair nymph, along these doubtful roads.

Laura.

Seest thou yon mountain rear his shaggy brow?
In the green valley graze the flocks below;
There every gale with warbling music floats,
Shade answers shade, and breathes alternate notes.

[Exit Cleanthes.]

He's gone; and to the distant vale is sent,
Nor shall his force Dione's love prevent.
But see, she comes again with hasty pace,
And conscious pleasure dimples on her face.

SCENE IV.

LAURA, DIONE.

Dione.

I found her laid beside the crystal brook,
Nor rais'd she from the stream her settled look,
Till near her side I stood; her head she rears,
Starts sudden, and her shrieks confess her fears.

Laura.

Did not thy words her thoughtful soul surprise,
And kindle sparkling anger in her eyes?

Dione.

Thus she reply'd, with rage and scorn possest:

"Will importuning love ne'er give me rest?

"Why am I thus in deserts wild pursu'd,

"Like guilty consciences when stain'd with blood?

"Sure boding ravens, from the blasted oak,

"Shall learn the name of Lycidas to croak,

"To sound it in my ears! As swains pass by,

"With look askance, they shake their heads and
"cry,

"Lo! this is she for whom the shepherd dy'd!

"Soon Lycidas, a victim to her pride, [glade,

"Shall seek the grave; and in the glimmering

"With look all pale, shall glide the restless shade

"Of the poor swain; while we with haggard eye

"And bristled hair the fleeting phantom fly."

Still let their curses innocence upbraid:

Heaven never will forsake the virtuous maid.

Laura.

Didst thou persist to touch her haughty breast?

Dione.

She still the more disdain'd, the more I prest.

Laura.

When you were gone, these walks a stranger cross'd,

He turn'd through every path, and wander'd lost;

To me he came; with courteous speech demands

Beneath what bowers repos'd the shepherd bands;

Then further asks me, if among that race

A shepherdess was found of courtly grace;

With proffer'd bribes my faithful tongue essays;

But for no bribe the faithful tongue betrays.

In me Dione's safe. Far hence he speeds,

Where other hills resound with other reeds.

Dione.

Should he come back; suspicion's jealous eyes

Might trace my feature through the swain's disguise.

Now every noise and whistling wind I dread,

And in each sound approaches human tread.

Laura.

He said, he left your house involv'd in cares,

Sighs swell'd each breast, each eye o'erflow'd with tears;

For his lost child thy pensive father mourns,

And, sunk in sorrow, to the dust returns.

Go back, obedient daughter; hence depart,

And still the sighs that tear his anxious heart.

Soon shall Evander, wearied with disdain,

Forego these fields, and seek the town again.

Dione.

Think, Laura, what thy hasty thoughts persuade.

If I return, to love a victim made,

My wrathful fire will force his harsh command,

And with Cleanthes join my trembling hand.

Laura.

Trust a fond father; raise him from despair.

Dione.

I fly not him; I fly a life of care.

On the high nuptials of the court look round;

Where shall, alas, one happy pair be found!

There marriage is for servile interest sought:

Is love for wealth, or power, or title bought?

'Tis hence domestic jars their peace destroy,

And loose adultery steals the shameful joy.

But search we wide o'er all the blissful plains,

Where love alone, devoid of interest, reigns.

What concord in each happy pair appears!

How fondness strengthens with the rolling years!

Superior power ne'er thwarts their soft delights,

Nor jealous accusations wake their nights.

Laura.

May all those blessings on Dione fall.

Dione.

Grant me Evander, and I share them all.

Shall a fond parent give perpetual strife,

And doom his child to be a wretch for life?

Though he bequeath'd me all these woods and
plains,

And all the flock: the russet down contains;

With all the golden harvests of the year,

Far as where yonder purple mountains rear;

Can these the broils of nuptial life prevent?

Can these, without Evander, give content?

But see, he comes.

Laura.

— I'll to the vales repair,

Where wanders by the stream my fleecy care.

May'st thou the rage of this new flame controul,

And wake Dione in his tender soul! [Exit Laura.

SCENE V.

DIONE, LYCIDAS.

Lycidas.

Say, my Alexis, can thy words impart

Kind rays of hope to clear a doubtful heart?

How didst thou first my pangs of love disclose?

Did her disdainful brow confirm my woes?

Or did soft pity in her bosom rise,

Heave on her breast, and languish in her eyes?

Dione.

How shall my tongue the faltering tale explain?

My heart drops blood to give the shepherd pain.

Lycidas.

Pronounce her utmost scorn; I come prepar'd

To meet my doom. Say, is my death declar'd?

Dione.

Why should thy fate depend on woman's will?

Forget this tyrant, and be happy still.

Lycidas.

Didst thou beseech her not to speed her flight,

Nor shun with wrathful glance my hated sight?

Will she consent my sighing plaint to hear,

Nor let my piercing cries be lost in air?

Dione.

Can mariners appease the tossing storm,

When foaming waves the yawning deep deform?

When o'er the sable cloud the thunder flies,

Say, who shall calm the terror of the skies?

B b iij

Who shall the lion's famish'd roar assuage?
And can we still proud woman's stronger rage?
Soon as my faithful tongue pronounc'd thy name,
Sudden her glances shot resentful flame:
Be dumb, she cries this whining love give o'er,
And vex me with the teasing theme no more.

Lycidas.

'Tis pride alone that keeps alive her scorn.
Can the mean swain, in humble cottage born,
Can poverty that haughty heart obtain,
Where avarice and strong ambition reign?
If poverty pass by in tatter'd coat,
Curs vex his heels, and stretch their barking throat;
If chance he mingle in the female crowd,
Pride tosses high her head, scorn laughs aloud;
Each nymph turns from him to her gay gallant,
And wonders at the impudence of want.
'Tis vanity that rules all womankind,
Love is the weakest passion of their mind.

Dione.

Though one is by those servile views possess'd,
O Lycidas, condemn not all the rest.

Lycidas.

Though I were bent beneath a load of years,
And seventy winters thin'd my hoary hairs;
Yet, if my olive branches dropt with oil,
And crooked snags were brighten'd in my soil,
If lowing herds my fattening meads possess'd,
And my white fleece the tawny mountain dress'd;
Then would she lure me with love-darting glance,
Then with fond mercenary smiles advance.
Though hell with every vice my soul had stain'd,
And froward anger in my bosom reign'd,
Though avarice my coffers cloth'd in rust,
And my joints trembled with enfeebled lust;
Yet, were my ancient name with titles great,
How would she languish for the gaudy bait!
If to her love all-tempting wealth pretend,
What virtuous woman can her heart defend?

Dione.

Conquests, thus meanly bought, men soon despise,
And justly slight the mercenary prize.

Lycidas.

I know these frailties in her breast reside,
Dire'd her glance, and every action guide.
Still let Alexis' faithful friendship aid,
Once more attempt to bend the stubborn maid.
Tell her, no base-born swain provokes her scorn,
No clown, beneath the sedgy cottage born;
Tell her, for her this sylvan dress I took,
For her my name and pomp of courts forsook;
My lofty roofs with golden sculpture shine,
And my high birth descends from ancient line.

Dione.

Love is a sacred voluntary fire,
Gold never bought that pure, that chaste desire.
Who thinks true love for lucre to possess,
Shall grasp false flattery and the feign'd caress;
Can we believe that mean, that servile wife,
Who vilely sells her dear-bought love for life,
Would not her virtue for an hour resign,
If in her sight the proffer'd treasure shine.

Lycidas.

Can reason (when by winds swift fires are borne O'er waving harvests of autumnal corn)

The driving fury of the flame reprove?
Who then shall reason with a heart in love?

Dione.

Yet let me speak; O may my words persuade
The noble youth to quit this sylvan maid!
Resign thy crook, no more to plains resort,
Look round on all the beauties of the court;
There shall thy merit find a worthy flame,
Some nymph of equal wealth and equal name.
Think, if these offers should thy wish obtain,
And should the rustic beauty stoop to gain;
Thy heart could ne'er prolong th' unequal fire,
The sudden blaze would in one year expire;
Then thy rash folly thou too late shalt chide,
To poverty and base-born blood ally'd;
Her vulgar tongue shall animate the strife,
And hourly discord vex thy future life.

Lycidas.

Such is the force thy faithful words impart,
That like the galling goad they pierce my heart.
You think fair virtue in my breast resides,
That honest truth my lips and actions guides.
Deluded shepherd, could you view my soul,
You'd see it with deceit and treachery foul;
I'm base, perfidious. Ere from court I came,
Love singled from the train a beauteous dame;
The tender maid my fervent vows believ'd,
My fervent vows the tender maid deceiv'd.
Why dost thou tremble? why thus heave thy sighs?

Why steal thy silent sorrows from thy eyes?

Dione.

Sure the soft lamb hides rage within his breast,
And cooing turtles are with hate possess'd;
When from so sweet a tongue flow fraud and lies,
And those meek looks a perjur'd heart disguise.
Ah! who shall now on faithless man depend?
The treacherous lover proves as false a friend.

Lycidas.

When with Dione's love my bosom glow'd,
Firm constancy and truth sincere I vow'd;
But since Parthenia's brighter charms were known,
My love, my constancy and truth are flown.

Dione.

Are not thy hours with conscious anguish stung?
Swift vengeance must o'ertake the perjur'd tongue,
The gods the cause of injur'd love assert,
And arm with stubborn pride Parthenia's heart.

Lycidas.

Go, try her; tempt her with my birth and state,
Stronger ambition will subdue her hate.

Dione.

O rather turn thy thoughts on that lost maid,
Whose hourly sighs thy faithless oath upbraid!
Think you behold her at the dead of night,
Plac'd by the glimmering taper's paly light,
With all your letters spread before her view,
While trickling tears the tender lines bedew;
Sobbing she reads the perjuries o'er and o'er,
And her long nights know peaceful sleep no more.

Lycidas.

Let me forget her.

Dione.

O false youth, relent;
Think should Parthenia to thy hopes consent;

When Hymen joins your hands, and music's voice
Makes the glad echoes of thy domes rejoice,
Then shall Dione force the crowded hall,
Kneel at thy feet, and loud for justice call:
Could you behold her weltering on the ground,
The purple dagger reeking from the wound;
Could you, unmov'd, this dreadful sight survey?
Such fatal scenes shall stain the bridal day.

Lycidas.

The horrid thought sinks deep into my soul,
And down my cheek unwilling sorrows roll.

Dione.

From this new flame you may as yet recede,
Or have you doom'd that guiltless maid shall bleed?

Lycidas.

Name her no more.—Haste, seek the sylvan fair.

Dione.

Should the rich proffer tempt her listening ear,
Bid all your piece adieu. O barbarous youth,
Can you forego your honour, love, and truth?
Yet should Parthenia wealth and title slight,
Would justice then restore Dione's right?
Would you then dry her ever-falling tears;
And bless with honest love your future years?

Lycidas.

I'll in yon shade thy wish'd return attend;
Come, quickly come, and cheer thy sighing friend.
[Exit Lycidas.]

Dione.

Should her proud soul resist the tempting bait,
Should she contemn his proffer'd wealth and state;
Then I once more his perjur'd heart may move,
And in his bosom wake the dying love.
As the pale wretch involv'd in doubts and fears,
All trembling in the judgment-hall appears;
So shall I stand before Parthenia's eyes,
For as she dooms, Dione lives or dies.

ACT IV. SCENE I.

LYCIDAS, PARTHENIA, asleep in a Bower.

Lycidas.

MAY no rude wind the rustling branches move;
Breathe soft, ye silent gales, nor wake my love.
Ye shepherds, piping homeward on the way,
Let not the distant echoes learn your lay;
Strain not, ye nightingales, your warbling throat,
May no loud shake prolong the shriller note,
Lest she awake; O sleep, secure her eyes,
That I may gaze; for, if she wake, she flies.
While easy dreams compose her peaceful soul,
What anxious cares within my bosom roll!
If tir'd with sighs beneath the beech I lie,
And languid slumber close my weeping eye,
Her lovely vision rises to my view,
Swift flies the nymph, and swift would I pursue;
I strive to call, my tongue has lost its sound;
Like rooted oaks, my feet benumb'd are bound;
Struggling I wake. Again my sorrows flow,
And not one flattering dream deludes my woe.
What innocence! how meek is every grace!
How sweet the smile that dimples on her face,

Calm as the sleeping seas! but should my sighs
Too rudely breathe, what angry storms would rise! [crown'd,
Though the fair rose with beauteous blush is
Beneath her fragrant leaves the thorn is found;
The peach, that with inviting crimson blooms,
Deep at the heart the cankering worm consumes;
'Tis thus, alas! those lovely features hide
Disdain and anger and resentful pride.

SCENE II.

LYCIDAS, DIONE, PARTHENIA.

Lycidas.

Hath proffer'd greatness yet o'ercome her hate?
And does she languish for the glittering bait?
Against the swain she might her pride support;
Can she subdue her sex, and scorn a court?
Perhaps in dreams the shining vision charms,
And the rich bracelet sparkles on her arms;
In fancy'd heaps the golden treasure glows:
Parthenia, wake; all this thy swain bestows.

Dione.

Sleeps she in these close bowers?

Lycidas.

—Lo! there she lies.

Dione.

O may no startling sound unseal her eyes,
And drive her hence away. 'Till now, in vain
I trod the winding wood and weary plain.
Hence, Lycidas; beyond those shades repose,
While I thy fortune and thy birth disclose.

Lycidas.

May I Parthenia to thy friendship owe?

Dione.

● rather think on lost Dione's woe!
Must she thy broken faith for ever mourn,
And will that juster passion ne'er return?

Lycidas.

Upbraid me not; but go. Her slumbers chase;
And in her view the bright temptation place.

[Exit Lycidas.]

SCENE III.

DIONE, PARTHENIA.

Dione.

Now flames the western sky with golden beams,
And the ray kindles on the quivering streams;
Long flights of crows, high-croaking from their food,
Now seek the nightly covert of the wood;
The tender grafs with dewy crystal bends,
And gathering vapour from the heath ascends.
Shake off this downy rest; wake, gentle maid,
Trust not thy charms beneath the noxious shade.
Parthenia, rise.

Parthenia.

—What voice alarms my ear?

Away. Approach not. Hah! Alexis there!
Let us together to the vales descend,
And to the folds our bleating charge attend;
But let me hear no more that shepherd's name,
Vex not my quiet with his hateful flame.

Dione.

Can I behold him gasping on the ground,
 And seek no healing herb to staunch the wound?
 For thee continual sighs consume his heart,
 'Tis you alone can cure the bleeding smart.
 Once more I come the moving cause to plead,
 If still his sufferings cannot intercede,
 Yet let my friendship do his passion right,
 And show thy lover in his native light.

Parthenia.

Why in dark mystery are thy words involv'd?
 If Lycidas you mean; know, I'm resolv'd.

Dione.

Let not thy kindling rage my words restrain.
 Know then, Parthenia flights no vulgar swain.
 For thee he bears the scrip and sylvan crook,
 For thee the glories of a court forsook.
 May not thy heart the wealthy flame decline!
 His honours, his possessions, all are thine.

Parthenia.

If he's a courtier, O ye nymphs, beware;
 Those who most promise are the least sincere.
 The quick-ey'd hawk shoots headlong from above,
 And in his pounces bears the trembling dove;
 The pilfering wolf o'erleaps the fold's defence.
 But the false courtier preys on innocence.
 If he's a courtier, O ye nymphs, beware:
 Those who most promise are the least sincere.

Dione.

Alas! thou ne'er hast prov'd the sweets of state,
 Nor known that female pleasure, to be great.
 'Tis for the town ripe clusters load the poles,
 And all our autumn crowns the courtier's bowls;
 For him our woods the red-ey'd pheasant breed,
 And annual coveys in our harvest feed;
 For him with fruit the bending branch is stor'd,
 Plenty pours all her blessings on his board.
 If (when the market to the city calls)
 We chance to pass beside his palace-walls,
 Does not his hall with music's voice resound,
 And the floor tremble with the dancer's bound?
 Such are the pleasures Lycidas shall give,
 When thy relenting bosom bids him live.

Parthenia.

See yon gay goldfinch hop from spray to spray,
 Who sings a farewell to the parting day;
 At large he flies o'er hill and dale and down;
 Is not each bush, each spreading tree his own?
 And canst thou think he'll quit his native brier,
 For the bright cage o'er-arch'd with golden wire?
 What then are honours, pomp and gold to me?
 Are those a price to purchase liberty?

Dione.

Think, when the Hymeneal torch shall blaze,
 And on the solemn rites the virgins gaze;
 When thy fair locks with glittering gems are grac'd,
 And the bright zone shall sparkle round thy waist;
 How will their hearts with envious sorrow pine,
 When Lycidas shall join his hand to thine!

Parthenia.

And yet, Alexis, all that pomp and show
 Are oft the varnish of internal woe.
 When the chaste lamb is from her sisters led,
 And interwoven garlands paint her head;

The gazing flock, all envious of her pride,
 Behold her skipping by the priestess' side;
 Each hopes the flowery wreath with longing eyes;
 While she, alas! is led to sacrifice!
 Thus walks the bride in all her state array'd,
 The gaze and envy of each thoughtless maid.

Dione.

As yet her tongue resists the tempting snare,
 And guards my panting bosom from despair.

[Aside.]

Can thy strong soul this noble flame forego?
 Must such a lover waste his life in woe?

Parthenia.

Tell him, his gifts I scorn; not all his art,
 Not all his flattery shall seduce my heart.
 Courtiers, I know, are disciplin'd to cheat,
 Their infant lips are taught to lisp deceit;
 To prey on easy nymphs they range the shade,
 And vainly boast of innocence betray'd;
 Chaste hearts, unlearn'd in falsehood, they assail,
 And think our ear will drink the grateful tale.
 No. Lycidas shall ne'er my peace destroy,
 I'll guard my virtue, and content enjoy.

Dione.

So strong a passion in my bosom burns,
 Whene'er his soul is griev'd, Alexis mourns!
 Canst thou this importuning ardor blame? [same?]
 Would not thy tongue for friendship urge the

Parthenia.

Yes, blooming swain. You show an honest mind;
 I see it, with the purest flame refin'd.
 Who shall compare love's mean and gross desire
 To the chaste zeal of friendship's sacred fire?
 By whining love our weakness is confess'd!
 But stronger friendship shows a virtuous breast.
 In folly's heart the short-liv'd blaze may glow,
 Wisdom alone can purer friendship know.
 Love is a sudden blaze which soon decays,
 Friendship is like the sun's eternal rays;
 Not daily benefits exhaust the flame,
 It still is giving, and still burns the same;
 And could Alexis from his soul remove
 All the low images of grosser love;
 Such mild, such gentle looks thy heart declare,
 Fain would my breast thy faithful friendship share.

Dione.

How dare you in the different sex confide?
 And seek a friendship which you ne'er have try'd?

Parthenia.

Yes, I to thee could give up all my heart.
 From thy chaste eye no wanton glances dart;
 Thy modest lips convey no thought impure,
 With thee may strictest virtue walk secure.

Dione.

Yet can I safely on the nymph depend,
 Whose unrelenting scorn can kill my friend!

Parthenia.

Accuse me not, who act a generous part;
 Had I, like city maids, a fraudulent heart,
 Then had his proffers taught my soul to feign,
 Then had I vilely stoop'd to sordid gain,
 Then had I sigh'd for honours, pomp and gold,
 And for unhappy chains my freedom sold.
 If you would save him, bid him leave the plain,
 And to his native city turn again;

There, shall his passion find a ready cure,
There not one dame resists the glittering lure.

Dione.

All this I frequent urg'd, but urg'd in vain.
Alas! thou only canst assuage his pain!

SCENE IV.

DIONE, PARTHENIA, LYCIDAS.

Lycidas. [Listening.

Why stays Alexis? can my bosom bear
Thus long alternate storms of hope and fear?
Yonder they walk; no frowns her brow disguise,
But love-consenting sparkles in her eyes;
Here will I listen, here, impatient wait.
Spare me, Parthenia, and resign thy hate. [Aside.

Parthenia.

When Lycidas shall to the court repair,
Still let Alexis love his fleecy care;
Still let him choose cool grots and sylvan bowers,
And let Parthenia share his peaceful hours.

Lycidas.

What do I hear? my friendship is betray'd;
The treacherous rival has seduc'd the maid, [Aside.

Parthenia.

With thee, where bearded goats descend the steep,
Or where, like winter's snow, the nibbling sheep
Clothe the slope hills; I'll pass the cheerful day,
And from thy reed my voice shall catch the lay.
But see, still evening spreads her dusky wings,
The flock, slow-moving from the misty springs,
Now seek their fold. Come, shepherd, let's away,
To close the latest labours of the day.

[Exeunt hand in hand.

SCENE V.

LYCIDAS.

My troubled heart what dire disasters rend?
A scornful mistress, and a treacherous friend!
Would ye be cozen'd, more than woman can,
Unlock your bosom to perfidious man.
One faithful woman have these eyes beheld,
And against her this perjur'd heart rebell'd:
But search as far as earth's wide bounds extend,
Where shall the wretched find one faithful friend?

SCENE VI.

LYCIDAS, DIONE.

Lycidas.

Why starts the swain? why turn his eyes away,
As if amidst his path the viper lay?
Did I not to thy charge my heart confide?
Did I not trust thee near Parthenia's side,
As here she slept?

Dione.

—She straight my call obey'd,
And downy slumber left the lovely maid;
As in the morn awakes the folded rose,
And all around her breathing odour throws;
So wak'd Parthenia,

Lycidas.

—Could thy guarded heart,
When her full beauty glow'd, put by the dart?
Yet on Alexis let my soul depend;
'Tis most ungenerous to suspect a friend.
And thou, I hope, hast well that name profess'd,

Dione.

O could thy piercing eye discern my breast!
Could'st thou the secrets of my bosom see,
There every thought is fill'd with cares for thee;

Lycidas.

Is there, against hypocrisy, defence.
Who clothes her words and looks with innocence?
Say, shepherd, when you proffer'd wealth and state,
Did not her scorn and suppled pride abate?

Dione.

As sparkling diamonds to the feather'd train,
Who scrape the winnow'd chaff in search of grain;
Such to the shepherdess the court appears:
Content she seeks, and spurns those glittering cares,

Lycidas.

'Tis not in woman grandeur to despise,
'Tis not from courts, from me alone she flies.
Did not my passion suffer like disgrace,
While she believ'd me born of sylvan race?
Dost thou not think, this proudest of her kind
Has to some rival swain her heart resign'd?

Dione.

No rival shepherd her disdain can move;
Her frozen bosom is averse to love.

Lycidas.

Say, art thou sure, that this ungrateful fair
Scorns all alike, bids all alike despair?

Dione.

How can I know the secrets of her heart?

Lycidas.

Answer sincere, nor from the question start.
Say, in her glance was never love confess'd,
And is no swain distinguish'd from the rest?

Dione.

O Lycidas, bid all thy troubles cease;
Let not a thought on her disturb thy peace.
May justice bid thy former passion wake;
Think how Dione suffers for thy sake:
Let not a broken oath thy honour stain,
Recall thy vows, and seek the town again.

Lycidas.

What means Alexis? where's thy friendship flown?
Why am I banish'd to the hateful town?
Hath some new shepherd warm'd Parthenia's breast?

And does my love his amorous hours molest?
Is it for this thou bid'st me quit the plain?
Yes, yes, thou fondly lov'st this rival swain.
When first my cheated soul thy friendship woo'd,
To my warm heart I took the viperous brood,
O false Alexis!

Dione.

—Why am I accus'd?
Thy jealous mind is by weak fears abus'd.

Lycidas.

Was not thy bosom fraught with false design?
Didst thou not plead his cause, and give up mine?

Let not thy tongue evasive answer seek;
The conscious crimson rises on thy cheek:
Thy coward conscience, by thy guilt dismay'd,
Shakes in each joint, and owns that I'm betray'd.

Dione.

How my poor heart is wrong'd! O spare thy friend!

Lycidas.

Seek not detected falsehood to defend.

Dione.

Beware, lest blind suspicion rashly blame.

Lycidas.

Own thyself then the rival of my flame.
If this be she for whom Alexis pin'd,
She now no more is to thy vows unkind.
Behind the thicket's twisted verdure laid,
I witness'd every tender thing she said;
I saw bright pleasure kindle in her eyes,
Love warm'd each feature at thy soft replies.

Dione.

Yet hear me speak.

Lycidas.

—In vain is all defence.

Did not thy treacherous hand conduct her hence?
Haste, from my sight. Rage burns in every vein;
Never approach my just revenge again.

Dione.

O search my heart; there injur'd truth thou'lt find.

Lycidas.

Talk not of truth; long since she left mankind.
So smooth a tongue! and yet so false a heart!
Sure courts first taught thee fawning friendship's arts!

No. Thou art false by nature.

Dione.

—Let me clear

This heavy charge, and prove my trust sincere.

Lycidas.

Boast then her favours; say what happy hour
Next calls to meet her in the appointed bower;
Say, when and where you met.

Dione.

—Be rage suppress.

In stabbing mine, you wound Parthenia's breast.
She said, she still defy'd Love's keenest dart;
Yet purer friendship might divide her heart,
Friendship's sincerer bands she wish'd to prove.

Lycidas.

A woman's friendship ever ends in love.
Think not these foolish tales my faith command;
Did not I see thee press her snowy hand?
O may her passion like thy friendship last!
May she betray thee ere a day be past!
Hence then. Away. Thou'rt hateful to my sight,
And thus I spurn the fawning hypocrite.

[Exit Lycidas.]

SCENE VII.

Dione.

Was ever grief like mine! O wretched maid!
My friendship wrong'd! my constant love betray'd!
Misfortune haunts my steps where'er I go,
And all my days are overcast with wo.
Long have I strove th' increasing load to bear,
Now faints my soul, and sinks into despair.

O lead me to the hanging mountain's cell,
In whose brown cliffs the fowls of darkness dwell;
Where waters, trickling down the rifted wall,
Shall lull my sorrows with the tinkling fall.
There seek thy grave. How canst thou bear the light,
When banish'd ever from Evander's sight!

SCENE VIII.

DIONE, LAURA.

Laura.

Why hangs a cloud of grief upon thy brows?
Does the proud nymph accept Evander's vows?

Dione.

Can I bear life with these new pangs oppress!
Again he tears me from his faithless breast:
A perjur'd lover first he sought these plains,
And now my friendship like my love disdains.
As I new offers to Parthenia made,
Conceal'd he stood behind the woodbine shade.
He says, my treacherous tongue his heart betray'd,
That my false speeches have misled the maid;
With groundless fear he thus his soul deceives;
What frenzy dictates, jealousy believes.

Laura.

Resign thy crook, put off this manly vest,
And let the wrong'd Dione stand confest;
When he shall learn what sorrows thou hast borne,
And find that nought relents Parthenia's scorn,
Sure he will pity thee.

Dione.

—No, Laura, no.

Should I, alas! the sylvan dress forego,
Then might he think that I her pride foment,
That injur'd love instructs me to resent;
Our secret enterprise might fatal prove:
Man flies the plague of persecuting love.

Laura.

Avoid Parthenia; lest his rage grow warm,
And jealousy resolve some fatal harm.

Dione.

O Laura, if thou chance the youth to find,
Tell him what torments vex my anxious mind;
Should I once more his awful presence seek,
The silent tears would bathe my glowing cheek;
By rising sighs my faltering voice be stay'd,
And trembling fear too soon confess the maid.
Haste, Laura, then; his vengeful soul assuage,
Tell him, I'm guiltless; cool his blinded rage;
Tell him that truth sincere my friendship brought,
Let him not cherish one suspicious thought.
Then, to convince him his distrust was vain,
I'll never, never see that nymph again.
This way he went.

Laura.

—See, at the call of night,

The star of evening sheds his silver light
High o'er yon western hill: the cooling gales
Fresh odours breathe along the winding dales;
Far from their home as yet our shepherds stray,
To close with cheerful walk the sultry day.
Methinks from far I hear the piping swain;
Hark, in the breeze now swells, now sinks the strain!

Whither I'll seek him.

Dione.

—While this length of glade
Shall lead me pensive through the sable shade;
Where on the branches murmur rushing winds,
Grateful as falling floods to love-sick minds;
O may this path to death's dark vale descend!
There only can the wretched hope a friend.

[Ex. severally.]

ACT V. SCENE I.

A Wood.

DIONE, CLEANTHES (who lies wounded in a distant part of the stage).

Dione.

THE moon serene now climbs th' aerial way;
See, at her sight ten thousand stars decay:
With trembling gleam she tips the silent grove,
While all beneath the chequer'd shadows move.
Turn back thy silver axes, downward roll,
Darkness best fits the horrors of my soul.
Rise, rise, ye clouds: the face of heaven deform,
Veil the bright goddess in a sable storm:
O look not down upon a wretched maid!
Let thy bright torch the happy lover aid,
And light his wandering footsteps to the bower
Where the kind nymph attends th' appointed hour.
Yet thou hast seen unhappy love like mine;
Did not thy lamp in heaven's blue forehead shine,
When Thisbe sought her love along the glade?
Didst thou not then behold the gleaming blade,
And gild that fatal point that stabb'd her breast?
Soon I, like her, shall seek the realms of rest.
Let groves of mournful yew a wretch surround!
O soothe my ear with melancholy sound!
The village-curs now stretch their yelling throat,
And dogs from distant cots return the note;
The ravenous wolf along the valley prowls,
And with his famish'd cries the mountain howls.
But hark! what sudden noise advances near?
Repeated groans alarm my affrighted ear!

Cleanthes.

Shepherd, approach; ah! fly not through the glade.

A wretch all dy'd with wounds invokes thy aid.

Dione.

Say then, unhappy stranger, how you bled;
Collect thy spirits, raise thy drooping head.

[Cleanthes raises himself on his arm.]

O horrid sight! Cleanthes gasping lies;
And death's black shadows float before his eyes.
Unknown in this disguise, I'll check my wo,
And learn what bloody hand has struck the blow.

[Aside.]

Say, youth, ere fate thy feeble voice confounds,
What led thee hither? whence these purple wounds?

Cleanthes.

Stay, fleeting life; may strength a while prevail,
Lest my clos'd lips confine th' imperfect tale.
Ere the streak'd east grew warm with amber ray,
I from the city took my doubtful way;

Far o'er the plains I sought a beauteous maid,
Who, from the court, in these wide forests stray'd;
Wanders unknown; as I, with weary pain,
Try'd every path, and opening glade, in vain;
A band of thieves, forth rushing from the wood
Unsheath'd their daggers warm with daily blood;
Deep in my breast the barbarous steel is dy'd,
And purple hands the golden prey divide. [swain,
Hence are these mangling wounds. Say, gentle
If thou hast known among the sylvan train
The vagrant nymph I seek?

Dione.

—What mov'd thy care,
Thus, in these pathless wilds, to search the fair?

Cleanthes.

I charge you, O ye daughters of the grove,
Ye Naiads, who the mossy fountains love,
Ye happy swains, who range the pastures wide,
Ye tender nymphs, who feed your flocks beside;
If my last gasping breath can pity move,
If e'er ye knew the pangs of slighted love,
Show her, I charge you, where Cleanthes dy'd;
The grass yet reeking with the sanguine tide.
A father's power to me the virgin gave,
But she disdain'd to live a nuptial slave;
So fled her native home.

Dione.

—'Tis then from thee
Springs the foul source of all her misery
Could'st thou, thy selfish appetite to please,
Condemn to endless woes another's peace?

Cleanthes.

O spare me; nor my hapless love upbraid,
While on my heart death's frozen hand is laid!
Go, seek her, guide her where Cleanthes bled;
When she surveys her lover pale and dead,
Tell her, that, since she fled my hateful sight,
Without remorse I sought the realms of night.
Methinks I see her view these poor remains,
And on her cheek indecent gladness reigns!
Full in her presence cold Cleanthes lies,
And not one tear stands trembling in her eyes!
O let a sigh my hapless fate deplore!
Cleanthes now controuls thy love no more.

Dione.

[Aside.]

How shall my lids confine these rising woes?

Cleanthes.

O might I see her, ere death's finger close
These eyes forever! might her soften'd breast
Forgive my love with too much ardour prest!
Then I with peace could yield my latest breath.

Dione.

Shall I not calm the sable hour of death,
And show myself before him!—Ha! he dies.
See from his trembling lip the spirit flies! [Aside.
Stay yet a while. Dione stands confest.
He knows me not. He faints, he sinks to rest.

Cleanthes.

Tell her, since all my hopes in her were lost,
That death was welcome—

[Dione.]

Dione.

What sudden gusts of grief my bosom rend!
A parent's curses o'er my head impend,
For disobedient vows; O wretched maid,
Those very vows Alexander hath betray'd.

See, at thy feet, Cleanthes bath'd in blood !
 For love of thee he trode this lonely wood ;
 Thou art the cruel authorefs of his fate ;
 He falls by thine ; thou by Evander's hate.
 When shall my foul know rest ? Cleanthes slain
 No longer sighs and weeps for thy disdain.
 Thou still art curst with love. Bleed, virgin, bleed.
 How shall a wretch from anxious life be freed !
 My troubled brain with sudden frenzy burns,
 And shatter'd thought now this, now that way turns.
 What do I see thus glittering on the plains ?
 Ha ! the dread sword yet warm with crimson stains ! [Takes up the dagger.]

SCENE II.

DIONE, PARTHENIA.

Parthenia.

Sweet is the walk when night has cool'd the hour.
 This path directs me to my sylvan bower. [Aside.]

Dione.

Why is my soul with sudden fear dismay'd ?
 Why drops my trembling hand the pointed blade ?
 O string my arm with force ! [Aside.]

Parthenia.

—Methought a noise
 Broke through the silent air, like human voice. [Aside.]

Dione.

One well-aim'd blow shall all my pangs remove,
 Grasp firm the fatal steel, and cease to love. [Aside.]

Parthenia.

Sure 'twas Alexis. Ha ! a sword display'd !
 The streaming lustre darts across the shade. [Aside.]

Dione.

May Heaven new vigour to my soul impart,
 And guide the desperate weapon to my heart ! [Aside.]

Parthenia.

May I the meditated death arrest !
[Holds Dione's hand.]
 Strike not, rash shepherd ; spare thy guiltless breast.
 O give me strength to stay the threaten'd harm,
 And wrench the dagger from his lifted arm !

Dione.

What cruel hand with-holds the welcome blow ?
 In giving life, you but prolong my wo.
 O may not thus th' expected stroke impend !
 Unloose thy grasp, and let swift death descend.
 But if yon murder thy red hands hath dy'd ;
 Here. Pierce me deep ; let forth the vital tide.
[Dione quits the dagger.]

Parthenia.

Wait not thy fate ; yet this way turn thy eyes :
 My virgin hand no purple murder dyes.
 Turn then, Alexis ; and Parthenia know,
 'Tis she protects thee from the fatal blow.

Dione.

Must the night-watches by my sighs be told ?
 And must these eyes another morn behold
 Through dazzling floods of tears ? Ungenerous
 maid,
 The friendly stroke is by thy hand delay'd ;

Call it not mercy to prolong my breath ;
 'Tis but to torture me with lingering death.

Parthenia.

What moves thy hand to act this bloody part ?
 Whence are these gnawing pangs that tear thy heart ?
 Is that that thy friend that lies before thee slain ?
 Is it his wound that reeks upon the plain ?
 Is't Lycidas ?

Dione.

—No. I the stranger found,
 Ere chilly death his frozen tongue had bound.
 He said, " As at the rosy dawn of day,
 He from the city took his vagrant way,
 A murdering band pour'd on him from the wood,
 First seiz'd his gold, then bath'd their swords in blood."

Parthenia.

You, whose ambition labours to be great,
 Think on the perils which on riches wait.
 Safe are the shepherd's paths ; when sober even Streaks with pale light the bending arch of heaven,
 From danger free, through deserts wild he hies,
 The rising smoke far o'er the mountain spies,
 Which marks his distant cottage ; on he fares,
 For him no murderers lay their nightly snares ;
 They pass him by, they turn their steps away ;
 Safe poverty was ne'er the villain's prey.
 At home he lies secure in easy sleep,
 No bars his ivy-mantled cottage keep ;
 No thieves in dreams the fancy'd dagger hold,
 And drag him to detect the buried gold ;
 Nor starts he from his couch aghast and pale,
 When the door murmurs with the hollow gale.
 While he, whose iron coffers rust with wealth,
 Harbours beneath his roof deceit and stealth ;
 Treachery with lurking pace frequents his walks,
 And close behind him horrid murder stalks.
 'Tis tempting lucre makes the villain bold ;
 There lies a bleeding sacrifice to gold.

Dione.

To live, is but to wake to daily cares,
 And journey through a tedious vale of tears.
 Had you not rush'd between, my life had flown ;
 And I, like him, no more had sorrow known.

Parthenia.

When anguish in the gloomy bosom dwells,
 The counsel of a friend the cloud dispels.
 Give thy breast vent, the secret grief impart,
 And say what wo lies heavy at thy heart.
 To save thy life, kind Heaven has succour sent,
 The gods by me thy threaten'd fate prevent.

Dione.

No. To prevent, it is beyond thy power ;
 Thou only canst defer the welcome hour.
 When you the lifted dagger turn'd aside,
 Only one road to death thy force deny'd ;
 Still fate is in my reach. From mountains high,
 Deep in whose shadow craggy ruins lie,
 Can I not headlong fling this weight of wo,
 And dash out life against the flints below ?
 Are there not streams, and lakes, and rivers wide,
 Where my last breath may bubble on the tide ?
 No. Life shall never flatter me again,
 Nor shall to-morrow bring new sighs and pain.

Parthenia.

Can I this burden of thy soul relieve,
And calm thy grief?

Dione.

—If thou wilt comfort give,
Plight me thy word, and to that word be just;
When poor Alexis shall be laid in dust,
That pride no longer shall command thy mind,
That thou wilt spare the friend I leave behind.
I know his virtue worthy of thy breast.
Long in thy love may Lycidas be blest!

Parthenia.

That swain (who would my liberty controul,
To please some short-liv'd transport of his soul)
Shows, while his importuning flame he moves,
That 'tis not me, himself alone he loves.
O live, nor leave him by misfortune prest:
'Tis shameful to desert a friend distressed.

Dione.

Alas! a wretch like me no loss would prove,
Would kind Parthenia listen to his love.

Parthenia.

Why hides thy bosom this mysterious grief?
Ease thy o'erburden'd heart, and hope relief.

Dione.

What profits it to touch thy tender breast,
With wrongs, like mine, which ne'er can be redrest?
Let in my heart the fatal secret die,
Nor call up sorrow in another's eye!

SCENE III.

DIONE, PARTHENIA, LYCIDAS.

Lycidas.

If Laura right direct the darksome ways,
Along these paths the pensive shepherd strays.

[Aside.]Dione.

Let not a tear for me roll down thy cheek,
O would my throbbing sighs my heart-strings break!
Why was my breast the lifted stroke deny'd?
Must then again the deathful deed be try'd?
Yes. 'Tis resolv'd.

—Ah, hold; forbear, forbear!

Lycidas.

Methought distress with shrieks alarm'd my ear.

Parthenia.

Strike not. Ye gods, defend him from the wound!

Lycidas.

Yes. 'Tis Parthenia's voice, I know the sound.
Some sylvan ravisher would force the maid,
And Laura sent me to her virtue's aid.
Die, villain, die; and seek the shades below.

[Lycidas snatches the dagger from Dione, and stabs her.]Dione.

Whoe'er thou art, I bless thee for the blow.

Lycidas.

Since Heaven ordain'd this arm thy life should guard,
O hear my vows! be love the just reward.

Parthenia.

Rather let vengeance, with her swiftest speed,
O'ertake thy flight, and recompense the deed!
Why stays the thunder in the upper sky?
Gather, ye clouds; ye forked lightnings, fly:
On thee may all the wrath of Heaven descend,
Whose barbarous hand hath slain a faithful friend.
Behold Alexis!

Lycidas.

—Would that treacherous boy
Have forc'd thy virtue to his brutal joy?
What rous'd his passion to this bold advance?
Did e'er thy eyes confess one willing glance?
I know, the faithless youth his trust betray'd;
And well the dagger hath my wrongs repaid.

Dione [Raising herself on her arm.]

Breaks not Evander's voice along the glade?
Ha! is it he who holds the reeking blade!
There needed not or poison, sword, or dart;
Thy faithless vows, alas! had broke my heart.

O tremble, shepherd, for thy rash offence,
The sword is dy'd with murder'd innocence!
His gentle soul no brutal passion seiz'd,
Nor at my bosom was the dagger rais'd;
Self-murder was his aim; the youth I found
Whelm'd in despair, and stay'd the falling wound.

Dione.

Into what mischiefs is the lover led,
Who calls down vengeance on his perjur'd head!
O may he ne'er bewail this desperate deed,
And may, unknown, unwept, Dione bleed.

What horrors on the guilty mind attend!
His conscience had reveng'd an injur'd friend,
Hadst thou not held the stroke. In death he sought
To lose the heart-consuming pain of thought.
Did not the smooth-tongu'd boy perfidious prove,
Plead his own passion, and betray my love?

Dione.

O let him ne'er this bleeding victim know;
Lest his rash transport, to revenge the blow,
Should in his dearer heart the dagger stain!
That wound would pierce my soul with double
pain.

How did his faithful lips (now pale and cold)
With moving eloquence thy griefs unfold!

Lycidas.

Was he thus faithful? thus, to friendship true?
Then I'm a wretch. All peace of mind, adieu!
If ebbing life yet beat within thy vein,
Alexis, speak; unclose those lids again.

[Flings himself on the ground near Dione.]

See at thy feet the barbarous villain kneel!
'Tis Lycidas who grasps the bloody steel,
Thy once-lov'd friend.—Yet, ere I cease to live,
Canst thou a wretched penitent forgive?

Dione.

When low beneath the sable mould I rest,
May a sincerer friendship share thy breast!
Why are those heaving groans? ah! cease to weep!
May my lost name in dark oblivion sleep;

Let this sad tale no speaking stone declare,
From future eyes to draw a pitying tear.
Let o'er my grave the levelling ploughshare pass,
Mark not the spot; forget that e'er I was.
Then may'st thou with Parthenia's love be blest,
And not one thought on me thy joys molest!
My swimming eyes are overpow'rd with light,
And darkening shadows fleet before my sight:
May'st thou be happy! ah! my soul is free. [Dies.]

Lycidas.

O cruel shepherdes, for love of thee [To Parthenia.]
This fatal deed was done.

SCENE THE LAST.

LYCIDAS, PARTHENIA, LAURA.

Laura.

— Alexis slain!

Lycidas.

Yes. 'Twas I did it. See this crimson stain!
My hands with blood of innocence are dy'd.
O may the moon her silver beauty hide
In rolling clouds! my soul abhors the light;
Shade, shade the murderer in eternal night!

Laura.

No rival shepherd is before thee laid;
There bled the chastest, the sincerest maid
That ever sigh'd for love. On her pale face,
Cannot thy weeping eyes the feature trace
Of thy once dear Dione? With wan care
Sunk are those eyes, and livid with despair!

Lycidas.

Dione!

Laura.

— There pure constancy lies dead!

Lycidas.

May Heaven shower vengeance on this perjur'd head!

As the dry branch that withers on the ground,
So, blasted be the hand that gave the wound!
Off; hold me not. This heart deserves the stroke;
'Tis black with treachery. Yes: the vows are broke. [Stabs himself.]

Which I so often swore. Vain world, adieu!
Though I was false in life, in death I'm true.

[Dies.]

Laura.

To-morrow shall the funeral rites be paid,
And these love-victims in one grave be laid.

Parthenia.

There shall the yew her sable branches spread,
And mournful cypress rear her fringed head.

Laura.

From thence shall thyme and myrtle send perfume,
And laurel ever-green o'er shade the tomb.

Parthenia.

Come, Laura, let us leave this horrid wood,
Where streams the purple grass with lovers blood;
Come to my bower. And, as we sorrowing go,
Let poor Dione's story feed my woe
With heart-relieving tears.—

Laura. [Pointing to Dione.]

— Unhappy maid!

Hadst thou a parent's just command obey'd,
Thou yet hadst liv'd — But who shall Love advise?
Love scorns command, and breaks all other ties.
Henceforth, ye swains, be true to vows profess;
For certain vengeance strikes the perjur'd breast.

THE LIFE OF TICKELL.

OF Thomas Tickell, it is to be regretted, that the particulars which have been transmitted by his contemporaries, are insufficient to gratify the curiosity which his reputation must excite, and disproportionate to his rank in poetry and literature.

He was the son of the Rev. Richard Tickell, who possessed a considerable living in Cumberland; and was born at Bridekirk, near Carlisle, in 1686.

He was educated in his native country; and in April 1701, he became a member of Queen's College in Oxford.

In 1707, he expressed his gratitude to the University, in a poem, intituled Oxford, addressed to Lord Viscount Lonsdale.

Which thus my thanks to much-lov'd Oxford pays,
In no ungrateful, though unartful lays.

In 1708, he took the degree of Master of Arts; and two years afterwards he was chosen Fellow. As he had not complied with the statutes which required him to be in orders before he could be chosen to a Fellowship, he obtained a dispensation from the Crown.

At the university he acquired the character of excelling in classical learning, and in academical exercises; and was distinguished for his ability in versification.

He entered early into life, and became known to Addison and Steele, and other men of high character for talents and literature.

He is said to have first gained the notice of Addison, by his verses in praise of Rosamond; in which he censures the Italian opera as a vehicle of melodious absurdity, and compares his softness to Corelli, and his strength to Virgil.

The opera first Italian masters taught,
Enrich'd with songs, but innocent of thought;
Britannia's learned theatre disdains
Melodious trifles, and enervate strains;
And blushes, on her injur'd stage to see
Nonsense well tun'd, and sweet stupidity.
No charms are wanting to thy artful song,
Soft as Corelli, and as Virgil strong.

The censure of the Italian opera is well founded and strong; and the panegyric on Rosamond does not very much exaggerate its merits, except perhaps, in the conclusion.

To those verses, Dr. Johnson observes, it would not have been just to deny regard, for they contain some of the most elegant encomiastic strains; and among the innumerable poems of the same kind, it will be hard to find one with which they need to fear a comparison.

It may deserve observation, that when Pope wrote long afterwards in praise of Addison, he has copied, at least has resembled, Tickell.

Let joy salute fair Rosamonda's shade,
And wreaths of myrtle crown the lovely maid.

While now perhaps with Dido's ghost she roves,
And hears and tells the story of their loves.
Alike they mourn, alike they bless their fate,
Since love which made them wretched made them great.
Nor longer that relentless doom bemoan,
Which gain'd a Virgil, and an Addison.——Tickell.

When future ages with delight shall see,
How Plato's, Bacon's, Newton's, looks agree;
Or in fair series laurell'd bards be shown,
A Virgil there, and here an Addison.——Pope.

When Steele began the Spectator, with the assistance of Addison and the other wits, Tickell is believed to have contributed frequently to it; but his papers have not been ascertained. Those marked with the letter R, are all Steele's, as are many of those marked with T. It has been said that the latter mark was sometimes used by Tickell. There are more papers marked with R and T, than with any other signature; of these, it is probable, Tickell wrote many, as he was very much with Steele, as well as with Addison, and might be often solicited, as Steele was often in a hurry, to eke out the scanty materials which he had time to provide. He wrote a copy of Verses to the supposed author of the Spectator, inserted in No. 632, in which a high praise is bestowed on Steele's papers in the "Tatler," against sharpeners, which produced most beneficial effects.

From felon gamesters the raw squire is free,
And Britain owes her rescued oaks to thee.

He was also a contributor to the Guardian. All the papers on Pastoral Poetry, except one by Pope, in his own praise, are written by Tickell.

When the Tory Ministry were negotiating with France, before the conclusion of the peace of Utrecht, he published The Prospect of Peace, a poem, addressed to Dr. Robinson, Bishop of Bristol, the Lord Privy-Seal, one of the negotiators, the tendency of which was to reclaim the nation from the pride of conquest, to the pleasures of tranquillity.

To the Whigs, who disapproved of the peace then negotiating, the tendency of Tickell's poem could not be pleasing. Addison, however, in the candor of liberal criticism, overlooking the politics, bestowed in the "Spectator" very great praise on the poetry.

It was read at that time with so much eagerness, that six editions were sold. The quick sale of a composition on a temporary subject is no test of its intrinsic merit; the despicable bigotry of Sacheverell had a much more extensive sale, than Tickell's poem, which deserved a favourable reception, though Dr. Johnson "found it a piece to be approved rather than admired."

On the appearance of Cato, when so many made offerings of verses to the author, Tickell, who loved and venerated Addison as a father, contributed a copy of verses, superior, perhaps, to any written on the subject, except the prologue by Pope, and the verses by Jeffries.

Tickell had been a strenuous supporter of the Hanover succession, and other measures, resulting from principles of freedom; and on the accession and arrival of King George, he produced a poem, intitled the Royal Progress, which was inserted and praised in "the Spectator," No. 620. The pleasing emotions excited in a benevolent king, by the view of national industry and prosperity, constitute the most beautiful and interesting parts of the poem.

When the friends of the reigning family were apprehensive of designs to its prejudice, he wrote An Epistle from a Lady in England to a Gentleman at Avignon, against the Pretender and his abettors, which, Dr. Johnson says, "stands high among party poems; it expresses contempt without coarseness, and superiority without insolence. It had the success which it deserved, being five times printed."

He was now patronised at Court; and when Addison went into Ireland as Secretary to Lord Sunderland, he took him thither, and employed him in public business.

At the time of the publication of the first volume of Pope's "Homer," he published the first Book of the Iliad, as translated by himself, in apparent opposition to Pope's translation, with an elegant dedication, to the memory of Halifax.

To apologise for presenting his version to the public at such a juncture, this advertisement was prefixed: "I must inform the reader, that when I began this first book, I had some thoughts of translating the whole Iliad; but I had the pleasure of being diverted from that design, by finding the work was fallen into a much abler hand; I would not, therefore, be thought to have any other view in publishing this small specimen of Homer's Iliad, than to bespeak, if possible, the favour of the public to a translation of Homer's Odyssey, wherein I have already made some progress."

Addison declared that the versions were both good, but that Tickell's was the best that ever was made; and with Addison, the wits, his adherents and followers, concurred in opinion.

Pope did not long think Addison an impartial judge; for he considered him as the writer of Tickell's version, and appealed to the people as his proper judges, "and if they are not inclined to condemn me," says he, "I am in little care about the highfliers at Button's."

The reasons for his suspicion have been transcribed by Dr. Johnson, from Spence's MS. Collections.

"There had been a coldness (said Mr. Pope,) between Mr. Addison and me for some time; and we had not been in company together for a good while, any where but at Button's Coffeehouse, where I used to see him almost every day.—On his meeting me there one day in particular, he took me aside; and said he would be glad to dine with me at such a tavern, if I staid till those people were gone (Budgell and Philips). He went accordingly; and, after dinner, Mr. Addison said, that he had wanted for some time to talk with me; that his friend Tickell had formerly, whilst at Oxford, translated the first Book of the Iliad; that he designed to print it; and had desired him to look it over; that he must therefore beg that I would not desire him to look over my first book; because, if he did, it would have the air of double dealing. I assured him, that I did not at all take it ill of Mr. Tickell, that he was going to publish his translation; that he certainly had as much right to translate any author as myself; and that publishing both was entering on a fair stage. I then added, that I would not desire him to look over my first book of the Iliad, because he had looked over Mr. Tickell's; but could wish to have the benefit of his observations on my second, which I had then finished, and which Mr. Tickell had not touched upon. Accordingly, I sent him the second book the next morning; and, Mr. Addison, a few days after, returned it, with very high commendations. Soon after, it was generally known that Mr. Tickell was publishing the first Book of the Iliad, I met Dr. Young in the street; and, upon our falling into that subject, the Doctor expressed a great deal of surprise at Tickell's having had such a translation so long by him. He said, that it was inconceivable to him; and that there must be some mistake in the matter; that each used to communicate to each other whatever verses they wrote, even to the least things; that Tickell could not be busied in so long a work there, without his knowing something of the matter; and that he had never heard a single word on it, till on this occasion. This surprise of Dr. Young, together with what Steele has said against Tickell, in relation to this affair, make it highly probable, that there was some underhand dealing in that business; and indeed, Tickell himself, who is a very fair, worthy man, has since, in a manner, as good as owned it to me. When it was introduced into a conversation between Mr. Tickell and Mr. Pope, by a third person, Tickell did not deny it; which, considering his honour and zeal for his departed friend, was the same as owning it."

Upon these suspicions, Pope, always in his "Art of Sinking," quotes this version as the work of Addison; though the circumstances of the publication, not only do not prove that Addison was the translator, but do not even render probable the charge of meanness and dissimulation alleged by Pope against him; the opinions of Young and Steele are no proof.

Addison had a very great affection for Tickell, and might have revised his version, and approved of the publication, to confer a pecuniary obligation on him, by promoting a subscription for his Odyssey. But, it is evident, that he had no intention to oppose Pope; for, at the time of the appearance of Tickell's version, opposition to Pope could not do him any material injury. His subscription was full, and his contract with his bookseller completely performed. Had Addison wished to obstruct Pope's translation, the time for effecting his purpose, would have been when the subscription was beginning. He might then have promoted a subscription for Tickell, which would have interfered with Pope's. The influence of Addison with the Whigs, was fully equal to that of Swift with the Tories. With those, who were of neither party, his recommendation would have had more weight than Swift's, because he was in greater estimation, for elegant literature in general, and particularly for classical knowledge.

The circumstance of the time of publication, which provoked the irritable disposition of Pope, who supposed his character and interest so much concerned, is sufficiently explained by the advertisement above quoted. This advertisement was industriously suppressed, in Pope's publication on the subject. That Addison had any intention of publishing a version of the Iliad, there is no evidence even probable. Had he been actuated by jealousy, envy, or malevolence, it is not probable he would have spoke so highly of Pope's Iliad as he did in "The Freeholder."

"The translation of the first book of the Iliad," says Mr. Nichols, "which has been ascribed to Tickell, was said to be in reality the production of Addison, to prejudice that which Pope had undertaken; a notion certainly without foundation. Mr. Watts the printer, assured a friend of mine, that the translation of the first book of the Iliad was in Tickell's hand-writing, but much corrected and interlined by Addison."

To compare the two translations would be tedious; the superiority is universally allowed to Pope. Tickell has, perhaps, more of the simple majesty of Homer; but his version is inferior to that of Pope, in force, animation, elegance, and harmony.

In 1717, when Addison was appointed Secretary of State, he made Tickell under-secretary. When Addison's ill health obliged him to resign, he so effectually recommended Tickell to the patronage of Craggs, his successor, that he was continued in place till that gentleman's death.

Addison's appointment of Tickell to be his under-secretary, is said to have been displeasing, on some account, to Steele, who warmly opposed it; and his opposition having been reported to Tickell, produced a coldness between them, which might be aggravated by the controversy between Addison and Steele, on the Peerage bill.

His friendship with Addison seems to have continued without abatement; for when that great man died, he left him the charge of publishing his works, which, on his death-bed, he had dedicated to Craggs.

To the works of Addison, which appeared soon after his death, in 4 vols. 4to, he prefixed an account of his life, and an elegy on his death, addressed to the Earl of Warwick, his son-in-law, replete with genuine tenderness. It is the effusion of a refined mind, lamenting the death of a friend of the highest intellectual and moral excellence; whose value it completely comprehended, and whose loss it poignantly felt.

In his life of Addison he charged Steele with assuming the credit of Addison's papers in the "Spectator," an imputation from which Steele vindicated himself in the dedication of "the Drummer," to Congreve.

It is a remarkable circumstance, that Craggs, to whom Addison had dedicated his works, died before they were published; and that Lord Warwick, to whom the verses on Addison were dedicated, died likewise before their publication.

Tickell's interest with the great did not expire with his friend. His merit enabled him to retain and improve the footing on which he had been placed by Addison. In 1725, he was appointed secretary to the Lord Justices of Ireland, a place of great honour, trust, and emolument, in which he continued till his death, which happened at Bath, April 23, 1740, in the 54th year of his age.

He was married, and had children; the eldest of whom was the father of Richard Tickell, Esq. one of the Commissioners of the Stamp-office, and author of "The Wreath of Fashion," a poem; "Anticipation of the Debates of the House of Commons," 1778; "The Carnival of Venice," an opera; and other ingenious performances.

He died at Hampton Court, Nov. 4. 1793, universally beloved and lamented, leaving three children by his wife, Miss Linley, the sister of the lovely Mrs. Sheridan, wife of the celebrated Richard Brinsley Sheridan, Esq. who died in 1787.

His poems were printed in the second volume of "The Minor Poets," 1749, and have been frequently reprinted.

Tickell is said to have been a man of most pleasing manners, and of unquestioned honour and integrity. His conversation was gay and lively; he was a very agreeable companion, at least a temperate lover of wine and conviviality, and in domestic relations without censure. His writings discover a good understanding, an extensive knowledge of classical literature, a refined taste, and a feeling heart.

As a poet, he is characterised by elegance of diction, correctness of judgment, tenderness of sentiment, opulence of allusion, and harmony of numbers.

His versification exceeds Addison's, and is inferior to few of the English poets, except Dryden and Pope.

Most of his pieces, particularly the Prospect of Peace; the Royal Progress; the Letter to Avignon; Oxford; Kensington Gardens; Epistle to a Lady before Marriage, and the Elegy on the death of Addison, are distinguished by a judicious combination of ornament and simplicity; a happy mixture of sentiment and description, and a rare union of the beauties of style, and the elegancies of versification, with the niceties of method, connection, and arrangement.

Of Tickell, it has been said by Goldsmith, that through all his poetry, there is a strain of Ballad-thinking to be found: The remark is just, and to that strain he is not a little indebted for the reception he has met with; whether he had it from reading, or from nature, cannot now be known, as no memoirs of his life are satisfactory enough to inform us of his particular studies. His beautiful ballad of Colin and Lucy, probably assumed a tincture of tenderness and simplicity, from his taste for our obscurer writers; a taste which his friend Addison undoubtedly possessed in a degree superior to any of his contemporaries, except Rowe, as appears by his elegant critique on "Chevy Chase," and various scattered notices of a congenial nature in his periodical papers.

"In the few things that Tickell wrote," says Dr. Warton, "there appear to be a peculiar terseness and neatness. Highly elegant and polished are his Verses on Addison's death."

"The Elegy on Addison," says Dr. Johnson, "could owe none of its beauties to the assistance which might be suspected to have strengthened or embellished his earlier compositions; but neither he nor Addison ever produced nobler lines than are contained in the third and fourth paragraphs; nor is a more sublime or more elegant funeral poem to be found in the whole compass of English literature."

"Of his Royal Progress, it is just to say, that it is neither high nor low. Of his Kensington Gardens, the versification is smooth and elegant, but the fiction unskilfully compounded of Grecian deities and Gothic fairies. Neither species of these exploded beings could have done much; and when they are brought together, they only make each other contemptible."

"To Tickell, however, cannot be denied a high place among the minor poets; nor should it be forgotten that he was one of the contributors to the Spectator."

If by the term minor poet, the quantity of his poetry is meant, he is not improperly so called; but if the quality is thereby understood, it is a disparagement. If he cannot be placed in the first rank of poets, he has at least an unexceptionable claim to the second.

P O E M S.

On Queen Caroline's rebuilding the Lodgings of the Black Prince, and Henry V. at Queen's College, Oxford.

WHERE bold and graceful soars, secure of fame,
The pile, now worthy great Philippa's name,
Mark that old ruin, Gothic and uncouth, [youth;
Where the Black Edward pass'd his beardless
And the Fifth Henry, for his first renown,
Out-stripp'd each rival in a student's gown.

In that coarse age were princes fond to dwell
With meagre monks, and haunt the silent cell:
Sent from the monarch's to the muse's court,
Their meals were frugal, and their sleeps were short;
To couch at curfew-time they thought no scorn,
And froze at matins every winter morn;
They read, an early book, the starry frame,
And lisp'd each constellation by its name;
Art after art still dawning to their view,
And their mind opening as their stature grew.

Yet, whose ripe manhood spread our fame so far,
Sages in peace, and demi-gods in war!
Who, stern in fight, made echoing Cressi ring,
And, mild in conquest, serv'd his captive king!
Who gain'd, at Agincourt, the victor's bays;
Nor took himself, but gave good heaven, the praise!

Thy nurselings, ancient dome! to virtue form'd;
To mercy listening, whilst in fields they storm'd;
Fierce to the fierce; and warm th' oppress'd to save;
Through life rever'd, and worship'd in the grave!

In tenfold pride the mouldering roofs shall shine,
The stately work of bounteous Caroline;
And blest Philippa, with unenvious eyes,
From heaven behold her rival's fabric rise.
If still, bright saint, this spot deserves thy care,
Incline thee to th' ambitious muse's prayer:
O! could'st thou win young William's bloom to grace

His mother's walls, and fill thy Edward's place,
How would that genius, whose propitious wings
Have here twice hover'd o'er the sons of kings,
Descend triumphant to his ancient seat,
And take in charge a third Plantagenet!

TO THE

SUPPOSED AUTHOR OF THE SPECTATOR.

In courts licentious, and a shameless stage,
How long the war shall wit with virtue wage?

Inchanted by this prostituted fair,
Our youth run headlong in the fatal snare;
In height of rapture clasp unheeded pains,
And suck pollution through their tingling veins?
Thy spotless thoughts unshock'd the priest may hear;

And the pure vestal in her bosom wear.
To conscious blushes and diminish'd pride, [hide;
Thy glass betrays what treacherous love would
Nor harsh thy precepts, but insus'd by stealth,
Pleas'd while they cure, and cheat us into health.
Thy works in Chloe's toilet gain a part,
And with his tailor share the fopling's heart:
Lash'd in thy satire, the penurious cit
Laughs at himself, and finds no harm in wit:
From felon gamesters the raw 'squire is free,
And Britain owes her rescued oaks to thee.
His miss the frolic viscount dreads to toast,
Or his third cure the shallow templar boast;
And the rash fool, who scorn'd the beaten road,
Dares quake at thunder, and confess his God.

The brainless stripling, who, expell'd the town,
Damn'd the stiff college and pedantic gown,
Aw'd by thy name, is dumb, and thrice a week
Spells uncouth Latin, and pretends to Greek.
A fauntering tribe! such born to wide estates,
With yea and no in senates hold debates:
At length despis'd each to his fields retires,
First with the dogs, and king amidst the 'squires;
From pert to stupid, sinks supinely down,
In youth a coxcomb, and in age a clown.

Such reader's scorn'd, thou wing'st thy daring
flight,

Above the stars, and tread'st the fields of light;
Fame, heaven, and hell, are thy exalted theme,
And visions such as Jove himself might dream;
Man sunk to slavery, though to glory born, [scorn.
Heaven's pride when upright, and deprav'd his
Such him's alone could British Virgil lend,
And thou alone deserve from such a friend;
A debt so borrow'd is illustrious shame,
And fame, when shar'd with him, is double fame.
So, flush'd with sweets by beauty's queen bestow'd,
With more than mortal charms Æneas glow'd:
Such generous strifes Eugene and Marlborough try,
And as in glory, so in friendship vie.

Permit these lines by thee to live—nor blame
A muse that pants and languishes for fame;
That fears to sink when humbler themes she sings,
Lost in the mass of mean forgotten things:

Receiv'd by thee, I prophesy, my rhymes,
 The praise of virgins in succeeding times : [see,
 Mix'd with thy works, their life no bounds shall
 But stand protected, as inspir'd, by thee. [rise,
 So some weak shoot, which else would poorly
 Jove's tree adopts, and lifts him to the skies ;
 Through the new pupil fostering juices flow,
 Thrust forth the gems, and give the flowers to blow
 Aloft ; immortal reigns the plant unknown,
 With borrow'd life, and vigour not his own.

A POEM,

To his Excellency the Lord Privy Seal, on the Prospect of Peace.

" ——— Sacerdos

" Fronde super Mitram, et felici comptus Oliva." ——— VIRG.

TO THE LORD PRIVY SEAL.

CONTENDING kings, and fields of death, too long
 Have been the subject of the British song.
 Who hath not read of fam'd Ramillia's plain,
 Bavaria's fall, and Danube choak'd with slain !
 Exhausted themes ! a gentler note I raise,
 And sing returning peace in softer lays.
 Their fury quell'd, and martial rage allay'd,
 I wait our heroes in the sylvan shade :
 Disbanding hosts are imagin'd to my mind,
 And warring powers in friendly leagues combin'd,
 While ease and pleasure make the nations smile,
 And heaven and Anna bless Britannia's isle.

Well sends our queen her mitred Bristol forth,
 For early counsels fam'd, and long-try'd worth ;
 Who, thirty rolling years, had oft withheld
 The Swede and Saxon from the dusty field ;
 Completely form'd to heal the Christian wounds,
 To name the kings, and give each kingdom bounds ;
 The face of ravag'd nature to repair,
 By leagues to soften earth, and heaven by prayer,
 To gain by love, where rage and slaughter fail,
 And make the crossier o'er the sword prevail.

So when great Moses, with Jehovah's wand,
 Had scatter'd plagues o'er stubborn Pharaoh's land,
 Now spread an host of locusts round the shore,
 Now turn'd Nile's fattening streams to putrid gore ;
 Plenty and gladness mark'd the priest of God,
 And sudden almonds shot from Aaron's rod.

O thou, from whom these bounteous blessings
 flow,
 To whom, as chief, the hopes of peace we owe,
 (For next to thee, the man whom kings contend
 To style companion, and to make their friend,
 Great Stafford, rich in every courtly grace,
 With joyful pride accepts the second place)
 From Britain's isle, and Isis' sacred spring,
 One hour, oh, listen while the muses sing !
 Though ministers of mighty monarchs wait,
 With beating hearts to learn their masters fate,
 One hour forbear to speak thy queen's commands,
 Nor think the world, thy charge, neglected stands ;
 The blissful prospects, in my verse display'd,
 May lure the stubborn, the deceiv'd persuade :
 Ev'n thou to peace shalt speedier urge the way,
 And more be hasten'd by this short delay.

ON THE PROSPECT OF PEACE.

THE haughty Gaul, in ten campaigns o'erthrown,
 Now ceas'd to think the western world his own.
 Oft had he mourn'd his boasting leaders bound,
 And his proud bulwarks smoking on the ground :
 In vain with powers renew'd he fill'd the plain,
 Made timorous vows, and brib'd the saints in
 vain ;

As oft his legions did the fight decline,
 Lurk'd in the trench, and skulk'd behind the line.
 Before his eyes the fancied javelin gleams,
 At feasts he starts, and seems dethron'd in dreams ;
 On glory past reflects with secret pain,
 On mines exhausted, and on millions slain.

To Britain's queen the scepter'd suppliant bends,
 To her his crowns and infant race commends,
 Who grieves her fame with Christian blood to buy,
 Nor asks for glory at a price so high.

At her decree, the war suspended stands,
 And Britain's heroes hold their lifted hands ;
 Their open brows no threatening frowns disguise,
 But gentler passions sparkle in their eyes.

The Gauls, who never in their courts could find
 Such temper'd fire with manly beauty join'd,
 Doubt if they're those, whom dreadful to the view
 In forms so fierce their fearful fancies drew ;

At whose dire names ten thousand widows prest
 Their helpless orphans clinging to the breast.
 In silent rapture each his foe surveys ;

They vow firm friendship, and give mutual praise.
 Brave minds, how'er at war, are secret friends ;
 Their generous discord with the battle ends ;
 In peace they wonder whence dissension rose,
 And ask how souls so like could e'er be foes.

Methinks I hear more friendly shouts rebound,
 And social clarions mix their sprightly sound.
 The British flags are furl'd, her troops disband,
 And scatter'd armies seek their native land.

The hardy veteran, proud of many a scar,
 The manly charms and honours of the war,
 Who hop'd to share his friends illustrious doom,
 And in the battle find a soldier's tomb,
 Leans on his spear to take his farewell view,
 And, fighting, bids the glorious camp adieu.

Ye generous fair, receive the brave with smiles,
 O'erpay their sleepless nights, and crown their toils ;
 Soft beauty is the gallant soldier's due,
 For you they conquer, and they bleed for you.
 In vain proud Gaul with boastful Spain conspires,
 When English valour English beauty fires ;
 The nations dread your eyes, and kings despair
 Of chiefs so brave, till they have nymphs so fair.

See the fond wife, in tears of transport drown'd,
 Hugs her rough lord, and weeps o'er every wound,
 Hangs on the lips that fields of blood relate,
 And smiles, or trembles, at his various fate.
 Near the full bowl he draws the fancy'd line,
 And marks feign'd trenches in the flowing wine,
 Then sets th' invested fort before her eyes,
 And mines, that whirl'd battalions to the skies :
 His little listening progeny turn pale,
 And beg again to hear the dreadful tale.

Such dire achievements sings the bard, that tells
 Of palfrey'd dames, bold knights, and magic spells,

Where whole brigades one champion's arms o'er-throw,

And cleave a giant at a random blow,
Slay paynims vile, that force the fair, and tame
The goblin's fury, and the dragon's flame.

Our eager youth to distant nations run,
To visit fields, their valiant fathers won; [trace,
From Flandria's shore their country's fame they Till far Germania shows her blasted face.

Th' exulting Briton asks his mournful guide,
Where his hard fate the lost Bavaria try'd:
Where Stepney grav'd the stone to Anna's fame,
He points to Blenheim, once a vulgar name;
Here fled the household, there did Tallard yield,
Here Marlborough turn'd the fortune of the field,
On those steep banks, near Danube's raging flood:
The Gauls thrice started back, and trembling stood:
When, Churchill's arm perceiv'd, they stood not long,

But plung'd amidst the waves, a desperate throng,
Crowds whelm'd on crowds dash'd wide the watery bed,

And drove the current to its distant head.

As when by Raphael's, or by Kneller's hands
A warlike courser on the canvas stands,
Such as on Landen bleeding Ormond bore,
Or set young Ammon on the Granic shore;
If chance a generous steed the work behold,
He snorts, he neighs, he champs the foamy gold:
So, Hoeftet seen, tumultuous passions roll,
And hints of glory fire the Briton's soul,
In fancy'd fights he sees the troops engage,
And all the tempest of the battle rage. [bright,

Charm me, ye powers, with scenes less nobly
Far humbler thoughts th' inglorious muse delight,
Content to see the honours of the field
By ploughshares levell'd, or in flowers conceal'd.
O'er shatter'd walls may creeping ivy twine,
And grass luxuriant clothe the harmless mine.
Tame flocks ascend the breach without a wound,
Or crop the bastion, now a fruitful ground;
While shepherds sleep, along the rampard laid,
Or pipe beneath the formidable shade.

Who was the man? Oblivion blast his name,
Torn out, and blotted from the list of fame!
Who, fond of lawless rule, and proudly brave,
First sunk the filial subject to a slave,
His neighbour's realms by frauds unkingly gain'd,
In guiltless blood the sacred ermine stain'd, [heart,
Laid schemes for death, to slaughter turn'd his
And fitted murder to the rules of art.

Ah, curst ambition! to thy lures we owe
All the great ills that mortals bear below.
Curst by the hind, when to the spoil he yields
His year's whole sweat, and vainly ripen'd fields;
Curst by the maid, torn from her lover's side,
When left a widow, though not yet a bride;
By mothers curst, when floods of tears they shed,
And scatter useless roses on the dead.

Oh, sacred Bristol! then, what dangers prove
The arts, thou smil'st on with paternal love?
Then, mix'd with rubbish by the brutal foes,
In vain the marble breathes, the canvas glows;
To shades obscure the glittering sword pursues
The gentle poet, and defenceless muse.

A voice like thine, alone, might then assuage
The warrior's fury, and controul his rage;
To hear thee speak, might the fierce Vandal stand,
And fling the brandish'd sabre from his hand.

Far hence be driven to Scythia's stormy shore
The drum's harsh music, and the cannon's roar;
Let grim Bellona haunt the lawless plain,
Where Tartar clans and grizzly Cossacks reign;
Let the steel'd Turk be deaf to matrons cries,
See virgins ravish'd with relentless eyes,
To death gray heads and smiling infants doom,
Nor spare the promise of the pregnant womb,
O'er wasted kingdoms spread his wide command,
The savage lord of an unpeopled land.

Her guiltless glory just Britannia draws
From pure religion, and impartial laws,
To Europe's wounds a mother's aid she brings,
And holds in equal scales the rival kings:
Her generous sons in choicest gifts abound,
Alike in arms, alike in arts renown'd.

As when sweet Venus (so the fable sings)
Awak'd by Nereids, from the ocean springs,
With smiles she sees the threatening billows rise,
Spread smooth the surge, and clears the lowering skies.

Light, o'er the deep, with fluttering Cupids
crown'd,
The pearly couch and silver turtles bound;
Her tresses shed ambrosial odours round.

Amidst the world of waves so stands serene
Britannia's isle, the ocean's stately queen;
In vain the nations have conspir'd her fall,
Her trench the sea, and fleets her floating wall:
Defenceless barks, her powerful navy near,
Have only waves and hurricanes to fear.
What bold invader, or what land oppress,
Hath not her anger quell'd, her aid redrest?
Say, where have e'er her union-crosses sail'd,
But much her arms, her justice more prevail'd?
Her labours are, to plead th' Almighty's cause,
Her pride, to teach th' untam'd barbarian laws:
Who conquers wins by brutal strength the prize;
But 'tis a godlike work to civilize.

Have we forgot how from great Russia's throne
The king, whose power half Europe's regions own,
Whose sceptre waving, with one shout rush forth
In swarms the harness'd millions of the north,
Through realms of ice pursued his tedious way
To court our friendship, and our fame survey?
Hence the rich prize of useful arts he bore,
And round his empire spread the learned store:
(T' adorn old realms is more than new to raise,
His country's parent is a monarch's praise.)
His bands now march in just array to war,
And Caspian gulfs unusual navies bear;
With Runick lays Smolensko's forests ring,
And wondering Volga hears the muses sing.
Did not the painted kings of India greet
Our Queen, and lay their sceptres at her feet?
Chiefs who full bowls of hostile blood had quaff'd,
Fam'd for the javelin, and invenom'd shaft,
Whose haughty brows made savages adore,
Nor bow'd to less than stars or sun before.
Her pitying smile accepts their suppliant claim,
And adds four monarchs to the Christian name.

Blest use of power! O virtuous pride in kings
And like his bounty, whence dominion springs!
Which o'er new worlds makes heaven's indulgence
shine,

And ranges myriads under laws divine!
Well bought with all that those sweet regions hold,
With groves of spices, and with mines of gold.

Fearless our merchant now pursues his gain,
And roams securely o'er the boundless main.
Now o'er his head the polar bear he spies,
And freezing spangles of the Lapland skies;
Now swells his canvas to the sultry line,
With glittering spoils where Indian grottos shine,
Where fumes of incense glad the southern seas,
And wafted citron scents the balmy breeze.
Here nearer suns prepare the ripening gem,
To grace great Anne's imperial diadem,
And here the ore, whose melted mass shall yield
On faithful coins each memorable field,
Which, mix'd with medals of immortal Rome,
May clear disputes, and teach the times to come.

In circling beams shall godlike Anna glow,
And Churchill's sword hang o'er the prostrate foe;
In comely wounds shall bleeding worthies stand,
Webb's firm platoon, and Lumley's faithful band,
Bold Mordaunt in Iberian trophies drest,
And Campbell's dragon on his dauntless breast,
Great Ormond's deeds on Vigo's spoils enroll'd,
And Guiscard's knife on Harley's Chili gold.
And if the muse, O Bristol, might decree,
Here Granville noted by the lyre should be,
The lyre for Granville, and the cross for thee.

Such are the honours grateful Britain pays;
So patriots merit, and so monarchs praise.
O'er distant times such records shall prevail,
When English numbers, antiquated, fail:
A trifling song the muse can only yield,
And sooth her soldiers panting from the field,
To sweet retirements see them safe convey'd,
And raise their battles in the rural shade,
From fields of death to Woodstock's peaceful
glooms,

(The poet's haunt) Britannia's hero comes—
Begin, my muse, and softly touch the string:
Here Henry lov'd; and Chaucer learn'd to sing.

Hail, fabled grotto! hail, Elysian soil!
Thou fairest spot of fair Britannia's isle!
Where kings of old, conceal'd, forgot the throne,
And beauty was content to shine unknown;
Where love and war by turns pavillions rear,
And Henry's bowers near Blenheim's dome ap-
pear;

The weary'd champion lull in soft alcoves,
The noblest boast of thy romantic groves.
Oft, if the muse presage, shall he be seen
By Rosamonda fleeting o'er the green,
In dreams be hail'd by heroes' mighty shades,
And hear old Chaucer warble through the glades,
O'er the fam'd echoing vaults his name shall bound,

And hill on hill reflect the favourite sound.

Here, here at least thy love for arms give o'er,
Nor, one world conquer'd, fondly wish for more.
Vice of great souls alone! O thirst of fame!
The muse admires it, while she strives to blame.

Thy toils be now to chase the bounding deer,
Or view the courfers stretch in wild career.
This lovely scene shall soothe thy soul to rest,
And wear each dreadful image from thy breast.
With pleasure, by thy conquests shalt thou see
Thy queen triumphant, and all Europe free,
No cares, henceforth, shall thy repose destroy,
But what thou giv'st the world thyself enjoy.

Sweet solitude! when life's gay hours are past,

Howe'er we range, in thee we fix at last;
Toft through tempestuous seas (the voyage o'er)
Pale we look back, and bless thy friendly shore.
Our own strict judges our past life we scan,
And ask if glory hath enlarg'd the span;
If bright the prospect, we the grave defy,
Trust future ages, and contented die. [come,

When strangers from far distant climes shall
To view the pomp of this triumphant dome,
Where rear'd aloft dissembled trophies stand,
And breathing labours of the sculptor's hand,
Where Kneller's art shall paint the flying Gaul,
And Bourbon's woes shall fill the story'd wall;
Heirs of thy blood shall o'er their bounteous board
Fix Europe's guard, thy monumental sword,
Banners that oft have wav'd on conquer'd walls,
And trumps, that drown'd the groans of gasping Gauls.

Fair dames shall oft, with curious eye, explore
The costly robes that slaughter'd generals wore,
Rich trappings from the Danube's whirlpools brought,

(Hesperian nuns the gorgeous broidery wrought,
Belts stiff with gold, the Boian horseman's pride,
And Gaul's fair flowers, in human crimson dy'd)
Of Churchill's race, perhaps, some lovely boy
Shall mark the burnish'd steel that hangs on high,

Shall gaze transported on its glittering charms,
And reach it struggling with unequal arms,
By signs the drum's tumultuous sound request,
Then seek, in starts, the hushing mother's breast.

So, in the painter's animated frame,
Where Mars embraces the soft Paphian dame,
The little loves in sport his sauchion wield,
Or join their strength to heave his ponderous shield:

One strokes the plume in Tityon's gore embrued,
And one the spear, that reeks with Typhon's blood:
Another's infant brows the helm sustain,
He nods his crest, and frights the shrieking train.

Thus, the rude tempest of the field o'erblown,
Shall whiter rounds of smiling years roll on,
Our victors, blest in peace, forget their wars,
Enjoy past dangers, and absolve the stars.
But, oh! what sorrows shall bedew your urns,
Ye honour'd shades, whom widow'd Albion mourns!
If your thin forms yet discontented moan,
And haunt the mangled mansions, once your own!
Behold what flowers the pious muses strow,
And tears which in the midst of triumph flow;
Cypress and bays your envy'd brows surround,
Your names the tender matrons heart shall
wound,

And the soft maid grow pensive at the sound.

Accept, great Anne, the tears their memory
draws,
Who nobly perish'd in their sovereign's cause :
For thou in pity bid'st the war give o'er,
Mourn'st thy slain heroes, nor wilt venture more.
Vast price of blood on each victorious day !
(But Europe's freedom doth that price repay)
Lamented triumphs ! when one breath must tell,
That Marlborough conquer'd, and that Dormer fell. [narchs pale,

Great Queen ! whose name strikes haughty mo-
On whose just sceptre hangs Europa's scale,
Whose arm like mercy wounds, decides like fate,
On whose decree the nations anxious wait :
From Albion's cliffs thy wide-extended hand
Shall o'er the main to far Peru command ;
So vast a tract whose wide domain shall run,
Its circling skies shall see no setting sun.
Thee, thee an hundred languages shall claim,
And savage Indians swear by Anna's name ;
The line and poles shall own thy rightful sway,
And thy commands the sever'd globe obey.

Round the vast ball thy new dominions chain
The watery kingdoms, and controul the main ;
Magellan's straits to Gibraltar they join,
Across the seas a formidable line ;
The sight of adverse Gaul we fear no more,
But pleas'd see Dunkirk now a guiltless shore ;
In vain great Neptune tore the narrow ground,
And meant his waters for Britannia's bound ;
Her giant genius takes a mighty stride,
And sets his foot beyond the encroaching tide ;
On either bank the land its master knows,
And in the midst the subject ocean flows.

So near proud Rhodes, across the raging flood,
Stupendous form ! the vast Colossus stood,
(While at one foot their thronging galleys ride,
A whole hour's sail scarce reach the farther side)
Betwixt his brazen thighs, in loose array,
Ten thousand streamers on the billows play.

By Harley's counsels Dunkirk now restor'd
To Britain's empire, owns her ancient lord.
In him transfus'd his godlike father reigns,
Rich in the blood which swell'd that patriot's veins,
Who boldly faithful met his sovereign's frown,
And scorn'd for gold to yield th' important town.
His son was born the ravish'd prey to claim,
And France still trembles at an Harley's name.

A fort so dreadful to our English shore,
Our fleets scarce fear'd the sands or tempests more,
Whose vast expences to such sums amount,
That the tax'd Gaul scarce furnish'd out th' account, [strain,
Whose walls such bulwarks, such vast towers re-
Its weakest ramparts are the rocks and main,
His boast great Louis yields, and cheaply buys
Thy friendship, Anna, with the mighty prize.
Holland repining, and in grief cast down,
Sees the new glories of the British crown :
Ah ! may they ne'er provoke thee to the fight,
Nor foes, more dreadful than the Gaul, invite,
Soon may they hold the olive, soon assuage
Their secret murmurs, nor call forth thy rage,
To rend their banks, and pour, at one command,
Thy realm, the sea, o'er their precarious land.

Henceforth be thine, vicegerent of the skies,
Scorn'd worth to raise, and vice in robes chastise,
To dry the orphan's tears, and from the bar
Chase the brib'd judge, and hush the wordy war,
Deny the curst blasphemer's tongue to rage,
And turn God's fury from an impious age.
Blest change ! the foldier's late destroying hand
Shall rear new temples in his native land ;
Mistaken zealots shall with fear behold,
And beg admittance in our sacred fold ;
On her own works the pious queen shall smile,
And turn her cares upon her favourite isle.

So the keen bolt a warrior angel aims,
Array'd in clouds, and wrapt in mantling flames ;
He bears a tempest on his sounding wings,
And his red arm the forked vengeance flings ;
At length, heaven's wrath appeas'd, he quits the war,

To roll his orb, and guide his destin'd star,
To shed kind fate, and lucky hours bestow,
And smile propitious on the world below.

Around thy throne shall faithful nobles wait,
These guard the church, and those direct the state,
To Bristol, graceful in maternal tears,
The church her towery forehead gently rears,
She begs her pious son t' assert her cause,
Defend her rights, and reinforce her laws ;
With holy zeal the sacred work begin,
To bend the stubborn, and the meek to win.

Our Oxford's earl in careful thought shall stand,
To raise his queen, and save a sinking land.
The wealthiest glebe to ravenous Spaniards known,
He marks, and makes the golden prize our own,
Content with hands unsoil'd to guard the prize,
And keep the shore with undesiring eyes.

So round the tree, that bore Hesperian gold,
The sacred watch lay curl'd in many a fold,
His eyes uprearing to th' untasted prey,
The sleepless guardian wasted life away.

Beneath the peaceful olives, rais'd by you,
Her ancient pride shall every art renew,
(The arts with you, fam'd Harcourt, shall defend,
And courtly Bolingbroke the muse's friend.)
With piercing eye some search where nature plays,
And trace the wanton through her darksome
maze, [begun,

Whence health from herbs ; from seeds how groves
How vital streams in circling eddies run.
Some teach why round the sun the spheres advance,
In the fix'd measures of their mystic dance, [flow,
How tides, when heav'd by pressing moons, o'er-
And sun-born Iris paints her showery bow.
In happy chains our daring language bound,
Shall sport no more in arbitrary sound,
But buskin'd bards henceforth shall wisely rage,
And Grecian plans reform Britannia's stage :
Till Congreve bids her smile, Augusta stands
And longs to weep when flowing Rowe commands.
